MR. A. C. MORTON asked the right hon. Gentleman to make a change, as it was not fair to move the Second Reading of a Bill that was not printed, and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to have the Bill printed and circulated.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) said, a copy of the Bill could be obtained on application at the Vote Office.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, that if the Bill was anything like the Bill of last year it was highly contentious, and therefore it would be a breach of faith on the part of the Government, who gave an undertaking not to take any contentious business before Easter.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : There is nothing contentious in it.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES remarked that the right hon. Gentleman said the same of the Bill of last year, and he should object as strongly as he could to any contentious business being taken.

Bill to be read a second time To-morrow, and to be printed. [Bill 116.]

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolutions [20th March] reported.

1. "That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ended 31st day of March, 1893, the sum of £785 14s. be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom."

2. "That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1895, the sum of £3,918,500 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom."

Resolutions agreed to.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill, that they have power to make provision therein pursuant to the said Resolutions.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 1) BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Sir J. GOLDSMID in the Chair.]

Clause 2.

MR. A. C. MORTON : Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us what the Government are doing, as there is nothing on the Paper about these Amendments?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : Merely inserting the money granted last night for the Navy.

Bill reported, with an amended Title ; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

KITCHEN AND REFRESHMENT ROOMS (HOUSE OF COMMONS) EXPENSES.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

MR. A. C. MORTON moved for—

"Return showing detailed receipts and expenditure of Kitchen Committee for the year ending the 31st day of December, 1891, the 31st day of December, 1892, and the 31st day of December, 1893."

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire) : I hope my hon. Friend will not move this to-day, but put it down for an early day after Easter.

MR. A. C. MORTON : I shall be most happy to treat my hon. Friend in a more generous way than the Government treated me last night ; therefore I postpone it.

Motion postponed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (NO. 3) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. J. Morley, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Local Government Board for Ireland, under "The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878," relating to the rural sanitary district of Waterford, ordered to be brought in by Mr. J. Morley and Sir J. T. Hibbert.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 115.]

ROAD SUBVENTION ABOLITION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Charles Cameron, Bill to put an end to Subventions from one road authority in Scotland to another, ordered to be brought in by Sir Charles Cameron, Viscount Wolmer, Mr. Baird, Mr. Robert Wallace, Sir James Carmichael, Mr. M'Ewan, Mr. Cameron Corbett, Mr. Paul, and Mr. Provand.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 117.]

PUBLIC-HOUSES (HOURS OF CLOSING) (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Charles Cameron, Bill to amend "The Public-Houses (Hours of Closing) (Scotland) Act, 1887," ordered to be brought in by Sir Charles Cameron, Mr. John Wilson (Govan), Mr. Hunter, Sir John Leng, and Mr. Beith.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 118.]

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Courtney, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Courtney, Mr. Bolitho, Sir Thomas Lea, Sir Mark Stewart, Mr. Brynmor Jones, Colonel Ervilgman, and Mr. Alexander Cross.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 119.]

JURY LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Arthur Williams, Bill to amend and consolidate the Law relating to Juries, and to provide for the payment of Jurymen, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur Williams, Mr. Coleridge, Mr. Lloyd Morgan, and Mr. Havelock Wilson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 120.]

FACTORY AND WORKSHOPS ACT (1891) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir Henry James, Bill to amend "The Factory and Workshops Act, 1891," ordered to be brought in by Sir Henry James, Sir Henry Roscoe, Mr. Mowbray, and Mr. Fenwick.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 121.]

VOL. XXII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That Mr. Wolehouse be discharged from the Select Committee of Public Accounts.

Ordered, That Mr. Cameron Corbett be added to the Committee.—(Sir J. T. Hibbert.)

NATIONAL DEBT ANNUITIES.

Account presented,—of the Gross Amount of all Bank Annuities and any Annuities for terms of years transferred, and of all sums of money paid to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, &c. within the year ended 5th January 1894 [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. T. E. Ellis.)

ARMY ANNUAL BILL.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he wished to make an appeal to the Secretary of State for War with regard to the Army Annual Bill. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to ask that this Bill be read a second time to-morrow, and on being reminded that the Bill was not printed they were told by the Secretary to the Treasury that a copy could be obtained at the Vote Office. He went to the Vote Office, and was informed there that there were no copies of this Bill. That alone, he thought, was sufficient for the appeal he now made to the right hon. Gentleman not to persevere in his intention to read the Bill a second time to-morrow. They had a distinct understanding that no contentious business should be taken before Easter, and so wide was that undertaking that even the First Reading of contentious Bills had been postponed. If the Bill were urgent he should not be disposed to make any opposition even to a quasi breach of the undertaking ; but it was not urgent, because last year it only went up to the other House on the 18th of April, and consequently there would be ample time after Easter to pass it through all its stages and send it up to the other House for it to have its effect. On the grounds that they had not got the Bill, that they could not get it, that it was unreasonable to ask them to read it a second time to-morrow, and that a considerable number of Members would be away to-morrow, he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman not to insist on the Second Reading to-morrow.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The ordinary course has been followed in this matter, and the Second Reading can hardly be opposed, even by the hon. Member. If there is anything contentious it is discussed in Committee, and that stage will not be taken until after Easter, so that there will be ample opportunity to Members to raise any question.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked if, in order to afford a fair opportunity for discussion, the Committee stage would not be taken after midnight?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : That I cannot say.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Then we gain nothing, and I shall oppose the Second Reading.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, as he understood it, the right hon. Gentleman would not proceed with the Bill to-morrow, if it was desired that he should not do so. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would by to-morrow put himself in a proper holiday frame of mind, and would treat Members of this House in the same generous manner in which Members had treated the Government with regard to Supply. He was sure that in the interests of the Army they were not doing their duty without thoroughly considering and discussing this Bill, and certainly they ought to be afforded a proper opportunity for discussion. He would not press the matter further now, but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be in an Easter holiday frame of mind to-morrow. Before sitting down, he would like to ask the Leader of the House whether he had any further information to give them with regard to the remaining annuity to the Duke of Edinburgh, he meant whether anything had been done in the matter by the Duke and Her Majesty. They would have to take a further opportunity of discussing the subject, but he should be glad if the Leader of the House could give them some further information regarding it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) said, with regard to the Mutiny Bill, he never heard of any opposition to the Second Reading of the Bill; any changes that were made in the Bill were always discussed in Committee, and he hoped the same course would be pursued now. An ample opportunity would be given for discussion, and he hoped the House of Commons would not set the example of declining to read the Mutiny Bill a second time. With regard to the annuity to the Duke of Edinburgh, he had to say that he had nothing to add to what his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) said on a former occasion.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) asked whether it was proposed to legislate upon the Report of the Sea Fishery Committee. The Report of the Committee was practically unanimous, and as the condition of the fishing industry as a source of food supply and a field for producing sailors was most important, he hoped there was an early prospect of legislation. Then with regard to the Conciliation Bill, he trusted the Government would consent to report Progress with the Estimates on Thursday week at an early hour in order to give an opportunity to Members to make their observations upon it.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) asked if the Government would put down the Committee stage of the Mutiny Bill for some early hour?

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he would consider that. They would certainly put down the Conciliation Bill in time for hon. Members to consider it, but he considered it was a new and hostile practice to have discussions on the First Reading of Bills. Both sides of the House agreed in the importance of the Bill, and the First Reading ought to be a matter of course; it was a most hostile practice to discuss a Bill on its First Reading. He thought the Government ought to have the same privilege as private Members, whose Bills were read a first time without comment.

SIR A. ROLLIT said, he heartily supported the Bill, but he understood it was the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion that the Estimates should be postponed in order to take the First Reading of the Bill, and his inquiry was simply as to the time and with a view only to one or two brief and friendly suggestions, based on the experience of the London Conciliation Board, and for the improvement of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at half after Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 22nd March 1894.

House met at Two of the clock.

SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

House being met, the Clerk at table informed the House of the probable absence of Mr. Speaker, on account of the continuance of his indisposition.

Thereupon Mr. Mellor, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Chair and after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

NEW WRIT ISSUED.

Lanarkshire (Mid Division), v. Vynford Philipps, Esq., Chiltern Hundreds.—(Mr. T. E. Ellis.)

QUESTIONS.

SADDELL TENANCY DISPUTE.
D. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I wish to ask the Lord Advocate if his name has been called to the case of MacDougall, of Saddell, who obtained a decree against his landlord in the Court of Session for the eviction of his house in 1889, but without an order for costs against the tenant; and whether, under these circumstances, the landlord is entitled to the amount (£40 ls. 10d.) on account of costs incurred in his defence, or if he is bound to pay the money to the plaintiff by the Court, and to pay his own costs out of his own pocket?

LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. Fraser, Clackmannan, &c.): I have no knowledge of this case, but from the contents in the question it appears to be a dispute between two private parties in regard to a money claim, with which I have no power to interfere.

MACGREGOR: Is not the unsuccessful party to an action bound to pay at the order of the Court?

J. B. BALFOUR was understood to reply in the affirmative.

.. XXII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

HOUSES OF ILL-REPUTE IN LIVERPOOL.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the Report for the year 1893 of the Head Constable of Liverpool, and to the statement therein that, although during last year 831 houses in that city were convicted as brothels, it has been found impossible, owing to the inadequacy of the present law, to render a single owner or agent of such property responsible for its use, or even for its continued use, for immoral purposes; and whether any representations have reached him from the Watch Committee of Liverpool regarding the urgent necessity for an alteration in the law on the subject, if owners and agents who allow their houses to be used for such purposes are to be made amenable; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government propose to take immediate steps to remedy the present state of things by the introduction of a Bill on the lines suggested by the authorities at Liverpool or otherwise?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. Asquith, Fife, E.): My attention has been called to the Report of the Head Constable for Liverpool, and the statements in question as to disorderly houses in that city, and I have received a representation from the Watch Committee, which has received careful consideration; and, after consulting with the Chief Metropolitan Magistrate, I have come to the conclusion that it is not necessary to legislate on the subject, as, in my opinion, the law is at present sufficient to meet these cases if properly and rigorously administered.

TRESPASS PROSECUTIONS AT DINGWALL.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he is aware that, in the case of trespass for game tried on 13th February last before Sheriff Hill at Dingwall, in which Baron Middleton of Applecross was the plaintiff, and William Mackenzie, Ardneaskan, was defendant, the only witness for the prosecution was a game watcher named Macbeath, who admitted that his knowledge of English was very limited, while Sheriff Hill, who sentenced Mackenzie, had no knowledge of Gaelic ; and whether there is any interpreter attached to the Court House at Dingwall ; if not, whether it is proposed to engage the services of competent interpreters at those places where Sheriffs are ignorant of the language of the people ?

MR. J. B. BALFOUR : I communicated with Ross-shire when this question appeared upon the Paper, but I regret to have to say that a reply has not yet been received, and I must therefore ask my hon. Friend to postpone the question.

FOOTPATHS IN THE ISLAND OF LEWIS.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he is now prepared to state the result of his inquiry into the condition of affairs in the Park District of the Island of Lewis, where, owing to the non-completion of footpaths, large numbers of children are unable to attend school during severe weather ; and whether he is aware that the children of Grimshader and Cromore have been withdrawn from school for want of footpaths ?

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton) : As I have already stated in reply to the hon. Member, the large proportion of £2,000 out of the £3,000 grant to Ross and Cromarty was allocated to the Island of Lewis. The expenditure of this special grant was entrusted to the County Council, who elected to devote £1,033 to the construction of footpaths to schools, including those at Grimshader and Cromore, in the Parish of Lochs. The responsibility for the proper expenditure undoubtedly rests with the County Council. Upon inquiry, I regret to learn that the present attendance at some of the schools is not so good as it should be, but I fail to see any reasonable cause, as the approaches to such schools are, with the assistance which has been rendered, in a better position than they were last year, and the winter season is over. In the new Local Government Amendment Bill I propose to give power to enable County Councils to construct cart roads, footpaths, and footbridges in accordance with the provisions of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878.

Mr. Weir

INVERGORDON FERRY.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that the Rules and Regulations governing the management of the Invergordon Ferry are disregarded by the lessee ; that passengers using the present ferry boat incur great inconvenience and risk ; and that the landing piers are in a dangerous condition ; and whether it is proposed, in the forthcoming Local Government Bill for Scotland, to provide that this and other ferries, as well as piers, in the Highlands, now in the hands of private individuals, shall be placed under the control of the County Councils ?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : I have not received any representation in regard to the management of Invergordon Ferry referred to by the hon. Member. I propose to deal with the regulation of ferries in the Local Government Amendment Bill.

OVERCHARGES ON THE CHATHAM AND DOVER RAILWAY.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to a case, which is reported in The Standard newspaper of 31st January last as having been heard in the Queen's Bench Division, in which a passenger sued the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway for 4s., being the sum charged in excess of the maximum authorised by the Company's Acts between Victoria and Calais on an ordinary first-class ticket, and in which the money was paid into Court by the Company ; whether he can state what number of passengers travelled between London and Calais by this route during the year 1893 ; whether he will take steps, under the provisions of 7 & 8 Vict., c. 85, s. 17, to prevent such overcharge in future ; and what are the Acts under the provisions of which the Company's charges are made ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) : I have seen a report of the case referred to by my hon. Friend. The Board of Trade are not in possession of the necessary information to enable me to reply to paragraphs 2 and 4 of the question. With regard to the legal proceedings, I am informed by the Railway Company that the case is still sub judice, and it would appear from a newspaper report that the Court has made an Order which enables the plaintiff to obtain a decision by a more convenient method than that provided by 7 & 8 Vict. The powers of that Act should only be used in very exceptional circumstances.

POLICE COURT PROCEDURE.

MR. OWEN (Cornwall, Launceston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the case of "Pridham v. Jennings," heard before the Magistrates at Stratton, North Cornwall, on Monday the 12th instant, where the prisoner, accused of a trifling offence, elected to be tried summarily, and was so tried, pleading not guilty; the Bench disagreed, one Magistrate saying the accused ought to be discharged, and left the Bench, followed by another Magistrate; the two remaining Magistrates committed the accused to take his trial at Bodmin Quarter Sessions, a long distance from Kilkhampton, where the accused and his witnesses live, and without railway communication; and did the Magistrates act within their powers by committing the accused after trying him with his consent under the summary jurisdiction procedure; and, if not, will he take steps in the matter?

MR. ASQUITH: I have inquired into the facts of the case referred to, and find that the circumstances are not quite accurately stated in the question. It is true that the Magistrates at first intended to deal with the case summarily with the consent of the defendant, and that subsequently they determined to commit for trial.

I am advised that in so doing the Magistrates did not exceed their legal powers, and that the previous determination to deal with the case summarily does not render the subsequent committal for trial void. It is, of course, a serious irregularity that a man should be committed for trial without the caution required by law being administered to him, and his statement, if any, taken down in writing; but it is open to the prisoner to use in his defence this or any other irregularity by which he may have been prejudiced. I see no ground for interference at the present stage of the proceedings, which will, no doubt, go on in due course of law.

THE PROCURATOR FISCAL OF LOCHMADDY.

DR. MACGREGOR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he has seen a copy of the correspondence between the Procurator Fiscal of Lochmaddy and Sir John Campbell Orde, proprietor of North Uist, and his agents, regarding a residence for the former at Lochmaddy; whether he is prepared to take any steps to adjust the matter in dispute; and whether a landlord has power by law to deprive a public official, who must live in a certain locality, of the right to a suitable residence on his estate?

*MR. J. B. BALFOUR: I have seen a copy of the correspondence referred to, and I gather from it that Sir John Orde declines to give the Procurator Fiscal a feu on which to erect a house. This appears to me to be very unfortunate, but the question of providing residences for officials in the Highlands is a large one, and would require legislation, as there is no other way in which a proprietor could be compelled to grant ground for such a residence.

BARLINNIE PRISON.

MR. W. WHITE LAW (Perth): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether it is the intention of the Government to build an addition to Barlinnie Prison, to hold 260 prisoners, although there is accommodation for more than that number in the existing prison buildings in Scotland, if prisoners were more equally distributed among the different prisons; and whether, in the interests of economy, he will consider the advisability of utilising existing prisons by distributing prisoners more equally among them, instead of erecting new buildings while existing ones are not full?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: It is not proposed to enlarge Barlinnie Prison beyond the number of cells originally intended—namely, 1,000, that is, 200 more than at present. It is very desirable that prisoners should be detained in their own districts, and frequent removal of parties of prisoners to distant prisons is opposed to the policy of the 1877 Act, and the course hitherto adopted in regard to the re-arrangement of prisons in Scotland.

FINNOR POSTAL FACILITIES.

MR. HAYDEN : I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain what is the cause of the delay in establishing the post office at Finnor promised by him last June ?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.) : The authority for establishing a post office at Finnor, County Westmeath, has been cancelled under circumstances which I recently explained in a letter to the hon. Member for North Westmeath.

RAILWAY FACILITIES BETWEEN DROGHEDA AND DUBLIN.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, with reference to the Memorial recently presented to him from a considerable number of the inhabitants of Balbriggan and the surrounding district for permission to the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland to run a passenger carriage with a goods train from Drogheda to Dublin, whether he will reconsider his refusal to grant the prayer of the Memorial referred to, in view of the fact that the company are willing to carry out the suggested arrangement, that that arrangement would involve a saving of time and money to a considerable mercantile community, and that a similar arrangement was till recently in force without any injurious consequences in the shape of railway accidents ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I consulted the Railway Inspecting Officers upon the Memorial referred to by the hon. Member, and they were unanimously of opinion that it is most objectionable to attach a passenger carriage to a goods train. I am, in consequence of this advice, unwilling to take the responsibility of acceding to the prayer of the Petitioners. The Memorialists should consider whether it is not more expedient to urge the Railway Company to give additional facilities than to press the Board of Trade to revoke an Order made for the protection of the public.

MR. CLANCY : Does the right hon. Gentleman take into account the character of this railway ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I can assure the hon. Gentleman we are most anxious to do everything we possibly can to meet the convenience of the inhabitants, but we look on these mixed trains as most dangerous.

MR. CLANCY : But is the right hon. Gentleman not aware of the fact that no accident occurred when a similar arrangement was in force ?

MR. MUNDELLA : A Paper will be laid on the Table showing accidents which have occurred under these arrangements.

MR. CLANCY : But there have been none on this line ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I cannot say that.

MR. CLANCY : If none have occurred, will that alter the right hon. Gentleman's attitude ?

[No answer was given.]

IRELAND AND THE NEW REGISTRATION BILL.

MR. CLANCY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the new Registration Bill will apply to Ireland, or whether Irish Registration Law will be dealt with in a separate measure ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : I think it must be the desire of the Representatives of Ireland of all sections that the question of Irish registration should be dealt with in the measure that applies to England, and therefore the President of the Local Government Board will propose to introduce into the English measure a provision for the amendment of the Irish Registration Law. But I do not want to commit myself absolutely on the point.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University) : Upon what ground does the right hon. Gentleman state that this is the desire of all sections of the Irish Representatives ? I am not aware that any opinion has been expressed on the point.

MR. J. MORLEY : I understood that that was so, but perhaps I have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman and his friends.

MR. CARSON : And the hon. Member for Longford !

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) : May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman has considered the fact that the Irish Registration Law is totally different from the English and the Scotch, and is most complicated at the present moment ?

MR. J. MORLEY : The complication to which the hon. Member refers is a very good reason for trying to simplify the law. But I think the hon. Member should wait till he sees our attempt, and finds whether our provisions meet the Irish case before he takes objection.

MR. MACARTNEY : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the complication to which I have alluded is the result of attempting to amend the Irish Registration Law in English Acts?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am not aware of that.

MR. DARLING (Deptford) : I should like to ask whether the Bill will apply to England and to Ireland in the sense that it will establish the doctrine of one vote one value?

MR. J. MORLEY : The hon. Member must see that the time for raising questions of that kind is when the Bill is brought in.

HILLTOWN TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will make inquiry as to the desirability of establishing telegraph service with Hilltown, which is an important centre in the County of Down?

MR. A. MORLEY : The question of an extension of the telegraphs to Hilltown was considered in 1891. It was then found that it would not be remunerative, and it could not, therefore, be carried out except under a guarantee, which was not forthcoming. I shall be glad to make renewed inquiry on the subject, and I will communicate the result to the hon. Member.

FIRING IN HIGHLAND SCHOOLS.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to a statement, contained in a speech delivered at Staffin Skye on the 9th instant by the Rev. Duncan Mackenzie, to the effect that, although the Education Department had decreed the exaction of peats from children attending public schools to be illegal, he had repeatedly during this winter met young children of six and seven carrying peats to school; and whether he will inquire into this alleged infraction of the order of the Department?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : The speech to which the hon. Member refers gives no particulars, and does not state the name of any School Board in the district of which the rule has been contravened. If any such contravention is brought to my knowledge, I shall call the attention of the School Board to the rule.

CULCH ON THE ESSEX FISHING GROUNDS.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has been informed of the recent collision between fishermen of Tollesbury and those of Burnham, in Essex, who were removing culch from the public fishing ground, to the great detriment of oyster culture thereon; and whether he is aware that the Crown is the owner of the soil of such ground; and, if so, whether he will advise the putting in force of the Crown rights to protect the public grounds from such depredation in future?

MR. MUNDELLA : I have heard with regret of the collision which has taken place between certain fishermen of Tollesbury and Burnham. It has not, however, as yet been possible to ascertain the full particulars of the occurrence and the precise locality from which the culch is alleged to have been taken, but I am making inquiries.

MR. DODD : Assuming that the Crown is the owner of the soil on these grounds, will the right hon. Gentleman enforce the Crown rights?

MR. MUNDELLA : I can say no more till I have the details before me.

THE CANADIAN CATTLE TRADE.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the Colonial Department has communicated to him the representations of the Canadian Government as to the freedom of the Dominion of Canada from pleuropneumonia in cattle; and, if so, whether he will issue an Order forthwith, allowing cattle from Canadian ports to be landed without being subject to slaughter or quarantine?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, (Essex, Saffron Walden) : I received the Papers to which my hon. Friend refers on Friday last, and I am giving my most careful consideration to the representations by the Canadian Government which are contained therein. There are, however, one or two matters still upon which I wish to receive information from the Dominion Authorities, and until this is available I shall not be able to say definitely what course it will be my duty to take in the matter. I quite recognise, however, the desirability of my decision being made known at an early date, and I have written to the Colonial Office to ask that I may receive the information in question as speedily as possible.

DR. FARQUHARSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay on the Table of the House the Papers relating to this matter?

MR. H. GARDNER: When I have received the answer from the Colonial Office I shall be glad to consider whether the Correspondence can be laid on the Table.

GRESHAM UNIVERSITY DRAFT CHARTER.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill for giving effect to the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Gresham University Draft Charter, or to take any other steps in relation thereto?

MR. ASQUITH: The recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Gresham University Draft Charter are receiving the careful attention of the Government, but the question as to giving effect to them must depend to a certain extent upon the unanimity shown by the different bodies interested in accepting the recommendations.

THE GUBERNADOR ISLAND FATALITY.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government of Marshal Peixoto have given compensation for the deaths of the three British officers who were killed by the deliberate explosion of a magazine on Gubernador Island in November last?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The Brazilian Government have not given any compensation, but, as has already been explained, we have no evidence to show that the explosion was an act of deliberation.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Has the request for compensation been refused by the Brazilian Government?

SIR E. GREY: I stated on a previous occasion in this House that the question of compensation would have to be dealt with when the civil conflict in Brazil came to an end. The only addition I can make to it is that we have no evidence it was an act of deliberation.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Are the Government prepared to press this question of compensation?

SIR E. GREY: I have said the question of compensation is reserved to be dealt with when the present civil conflict comes to an end.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Then it is not settled yet?

SIR E. GREY: No.

PAPERS ON SIAM.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when the promised Papers with regard to Siamese affairs will be issued to Parliament?

*SIR E. GREY: I can only refer the hon. Member to the statement I made in this House yesterday, and that we are waiting to lay the Papers until we are quite sure the proceedings connected with the alleged murder of a French official has come to an end.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK WITHDRAWALS.

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state the number of Savings Bank withdrawals by telegraph during each month since the introduction of the system, and the average interval between the application of the depositor and the payment of the sum withdrawn?

MR. A. MORLEY: The new arrangements for withdrawing deposits by telegraph from the Post Office Savings Bank came into operation on the 1st December last. The number of withdrawals in December was 1,228, in January 1,416, and in February 1,798, making a total for the first three months of 4,472 withdrawals. In 3,774 cases repayment was required on the same day. The average interval between the application of the depositor and the payment of the money was 38 minutes in London, and between 50 and 60 minutes for the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. H. Gardner

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to whom Questions relating to the proceedings of the Charity Commissioners should be addressed pending the appointment of a Parliamentary Commissioner in succession to the hon. Member for Merionethshire ; and when such appointment is likely to be made ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) : The appointment of a Parliamentary Charity Commissioner in succession to the hon. Member for Merionethshire will very soon take place, and in the meantime my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council will answer in the House of Commons questions concerning the Charity Commissioners.

THE ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that no copy of the Army (Annual) Bill can be obtained in the Vote Office ; and whether he proposes to ask the House to read a second time a Bill which it has never seen ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.) : I have ascertained that there are no copies to be obtained, but for the information of the hon. Member I may say—what the Chancellor of the Exchequer pointed out last night—that the Second Reading stage of the Army (Annual) Bill is exempt from the ordinary considerations. It is a stage which has never been opposed in this House, and I will repeat my promise of last night that the Committee stage will be put down after Easter. That is the proper occasion for making changes in the Bill, and on that stage the matter can be discussed. Copies of the Bill will, of course, be available for hon. Members before that.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman proposes to ask us to read a second time a Bill we have not seen, will he undertake that the Committee stage shall not be taken after midnight, but at some hour when there may be adequate discussion ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Yes.

SEA FISHERIES BILL.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) : I beg to ask if the Government have yet considered the Report of the Sea Fisheries Bill, and when it is intended to introduce legislation ?

MR. MUNDELLA : The recommendations of the Select Committee on Sea Fisheries involve very important principles and also an International Convention, and I am not prepared, in the existing pressure of legislation, to state at present when legislation on the subject can be proposed.

THE IRISH LAND ACTS.

MR. CARSON : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland when he proposes to take the discussion on the Select Committee on the working of the Irish Land Acts ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I quite understand the desire of the hon. and learned Member that this matter should not be rushed. I will undertake that the discussion on the question of the Select Committee will not be taken before the first week after Easter.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe) : I am sorry to have to ask the indulgence of the House, but I desire to make a statement partly personal to myself and partly affecting the Department which I represent in this House. There is a letter of a very unusual character from a Member of this House (the Member for West Belfast) in The Times to-day. I have nothing to do with the first part of that letter, in which he refers to a Motion which stood in his name on the Navy Estimates for Monday and Tuesday nights. He says it was the only one passed over. I may remark that according to the Forms of the House there was only one Motion that could be put. That Motion was negatived. Hon. Members who wished to deal with other Motions duly rose in their place to catch the eye of the Deputy Speaker, but I do not know whether the hon. Member for West Belfast did so, or what measures he took to call attention to the subject. The Motion was as follows:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the information given to Parliament by the Parliamentary representatives of the Admiralty with respect to naval matters is misleading and unsatisfactory, and is not calculated either to inform Parliament or to promote the welfare of the Royal Navy.”

The hon. Gentleman, in his letter to The Times, says this—

“What I desired to point out was briefly this—that without, I believe, one single exception every answer which has been given to me during the last eight months by representatives of the Admiralty has been absolutely at variance with the facts, has been calculated to mislead the House of Commons and the country with regard to important matters of fact, and has to my knowledge misled and misinformed many persons.”

I think that the House will agree with me that the letter is of an unusual character for any Member of this House to address to a newspaper, and I do not know how many newspapers, with respect to the representative of a Government Department in this House. I am not going to discuss the matter now. I have given notice to my hon. Friend that I intended to take notice of his letter in the House to-day. I am sorry that the notice given was necessarily brief, and that he is not in his place. I wish to say, first of all, that before I give an answer to any question in this House I always endeavour to sift the matter to the bottom and obtain the best information that I can. Of course, I am dependent on the very trustworthy officials of the Admiralty for the information that I give to the House in reply to the numerous questions put down. My hon. Friend alludes specially to an instance of a question which I answered in respect to the Royal Marine Division at Chatham. With regard to that particular instance, I had the advantage, I may inform the House, of seeing the Colonel Commandant at Chatham, and subsequently I saw the Deputy-Adjutant-General of the Royal Marines, and thoroughly satisfied myself that the facts which I gave the House were correct. I saw the Deputy-Adjutant-General of Marines again to-day, and I am able to stand to the answer as not having been misleading, but absolutely accurate from beginning to end. I really do not need to say more than that, except this—that I was perfectly prepared on Monday and Tuesday evenings to meet my hon. Friend on the subject of his Motion, and if he will do that which I think should be done when an imputation of this kind has been made on any Member of this House, if he will bring the matter forward in the House, I shall be prepared to meet him and substantiate the answers I have given.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): As a matter of indulgence, I should like to say that I am quite sure my hon. Friend did not impute to my right hon. Friend anything personal in the statement he has made as to the information being accurate. I believe he is not in London and has not received the notice forwarded as to this matter being mentioned. When he returns, I have no doubt he will be prepared to offer an explanation, which I hope will be satisfactory.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked whether in the case of a Motion being brought forward relative to the insufficiency of the answers the right hon. Gentleman would procure an opportunity for discussion?

[No answer was given.]

THE COOTEHILL GUARDIANS AND THE LABOURERS ACT.

MR. YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the majority of the Guardians of Cootehill Union have persistently refused to make a scheme for providing suitable dwellings and allotments under the Labourers Acts; whether several labourers have frequently asked the Local Government Board for an inquiry under the provisions of the amended Act; is the Local Government Board aware that three-fifths of the elected Guardians are in favour of making a scheme; and whether the Local Government Board, after the proceeding of the Guardians on 23rd February, will order an inquiry forthwith?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have been informed that the Guardians of this Union have up to the present time declined to act on representations made to them under the Labourers Acts. Complaints from individual labourers have occasionally been received by the Local Government Board, but it was only during this month that application was made for an inquiry under the provisions of Section

Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth

5 of the amended Act. The Board is not aware that three-fifths of the elected Guardians are in favour of making a scheme, but a proposal for such a scheme was defeated at a meeting of the Guardians by 13 votes to 11. The question of holding an inquiry in the district will, on the receipt by the Local Government Board of certain documents which they require to be furnished with by the Guardians, be considered.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): Is it not the case that in the Cootehill Union, as well as in the Ballyborough Union, there are a large number of non-elected ex officio Guardians who are opposed to the administration of these Acts; and will he, taking the serious reports as to the condition of labourers' dwellings in these Unions into consideration, endeavour to increase the number of popularly-elected Guardians?

MR. J. MORLEY: I will direct the attention of the Irish Local Government Board to the matter.

THE DE FREYNE EVICTIONS.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether compensation has yet been paid to those evicted tenants on the De Freyne estate whose goods were confiscated by members of the Constabulary; and, if not, will he direct that no further delay be allowed to take place in the matter?

MR. J. MORLEY: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy, in reply to a question on the same subject on the 21st of December, stated that inquiry had been directed with a view to ascertaining whether the charges preferred against the police had any foundation in fact. These charges have been carefully investigated on the spot by the Divisional Commissioner, who is the highest officer in the district, and he has arrived at the conclusion that there is no foundation for them. I concur in the opinion that the case against the police has been disproved after examining this officer's Report and the statements made by the persons concerned. It is a fact, however, that one constable was charged with larceny while on patrol duty. He pleaded guilty, was convicted and punished, and dismissed the Force.

THE IRISH CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. HAYDEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will grant a Return of the number and names of the persons employed in the High Court of Justice in Ireland who have attained the age limit fixed for retirement in the Civil Service?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have given instructions that a letter be written to the hon. Member stating there would be no objection to a Return of the kind asked for if moved for in the usual way. It will be necessary to substitute for the words following "in Ireland" the words "above the age of 65 years."

MR. HAYDEN: I will make that change.

LOANS TO IRISH TENANTS.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork Co., W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will explain why a tenant farmer in Ireland, the Poor Law valuation of whose holding is £7, could obtain a loan of £50 from the Board of Public Works for the improvement of his holding two years ago, but cannot now obtain more than £21?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): It is true that for a certain period anterior to 1891 a tenant-farmer could have obtained a loan of £50 on a farm valued or judicially rented at £7, but this under conditions. The highest loan permitted since 1891 was £35, or five times the valuation or judicial rent, and a loan to that amount can still be obtained on a £7 holding if one of three conditions is fulfilled, namely: (1) If the landlord postpones rent to the Board's loan; (2) if satisfactory collateral security is offered; (3) if the rent is so low as to be virtually nominal. If none of these conditions are fulfilled, the limit of the loan would be three times the valuation or judicial rent, but, as the minimum loan permitted under the Land Law Act is £35, no loan of £21 could be granted.

MR. SEXTON: Is it not inadvisable that the Irish people should be allowed to suffer owing to the action which the House of Lords have taken. Can the right hon. Gentleman afford the House an opportunity of considering the question?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT : We have been anxious to secure an amendment of the law by which the loan could be secured on the holding in view of the possibility of evictions.

MR. GILHOOLY : Were the alterations made in the conditions under which loans are now granted to Irish tenant farmers sanctioned by any change in the law ?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The alterations were made on the authority of the Treasury.

THE CONVICT MICHAEL WALSH.

MR. HAYDEN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he explain why it was that a convict named Michael Walsh was removed in a dying condition from Mountjoy Prison to the Mater Misericordia Hospital, Dublin, about a month since, receiving 15s. out of £3 10s. earned by him while confined, and that he was discharged in prison clothes, which he is still wearing ; whether it is usual to give prisoners civil outfit and all their earnings on discharge ; and, if so, why was this man differently treated ; whether he is aware that this man is anxious to go to his family in America ; whether it is usual to give discharged prisoners means to go to their relatives on discharge ; and will he order that suitable clothes be supplied to this man at once, and that the balance of his earnings in prison be given to him, and that he will be provided with the passage fare to America when sufficiently recovered to undertake the voyage ?

MR. J. MORLEY : The General Prisons Board inform me that it is not a fact that the convict Walsh was removed to the hospital in a dying condition from Mountjoy Prison. The medical officer of the prison states that on the convict's removal he was quite fit to be removed, though he was suffering from pneumonia. The gratuity payable to him was £3, not £3 10s. as stated in the question, and out of the former amount he received 15s. on his discharge, the custom being to hand to the convicts portion only of their gratuities on their discharge, and to remit them the balance when they have returned home. I think the hon. Member will see that there is some prudence in not paying the full gratuity until the prisoner has returned to his home.

Mr. Sexton

The object of this arrangement is to prevent men suffering from reaction on their discharge after long imprisonment frivolously squandering the whole of their gratuities. He was not discharged in prison clothes, but in an outfit of Irish tweed. He did not say to the Governor of the prison that he intended to emigrate. It is the practice to defray the expenses of the convicts to the place of their arrest or conviction, or any other place which they may select which would not involve greater expense. In the present case, Walsh has not applied for his travelling expenses, but as soon as he does so they will be provided in the ordinary way. The Prison Board have no funds at their disposal to defray the cost of his emigration to America, but I may add, however, that in addition to the 15s. given to him on his discharge, the Governor handed over to him a sum of £5 private cash which, though speaking from memory, I am inclined to think was sent him from America.

LUNATICS IN BELFAST WORKHOUSE.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the number of additional nurses and officials appointed to the lunatic department of the Belfast Workhouse since 1st November last ; also the number of deaths in the lunatic department since that date, and the number on which inquests have been held ; whether the epileptics are still kept in the lunatic department, and if the Local Government Board has instructed the epileptics to be so kept there ; whether, at a recent inquest on an epileptic who died in that department, held in Belfast, the coroner's jury strongly protested against this practice ; whether he will state by what authority epileptics are placed there, or lunatics kept under restraint in the workhouse ; whether he is aware of the practice of exchanging patients carried on between the workhouse authorities and the Governors of the asylum at Belfast ; and if some inquiry will be made into the whole system in relief of these helpless afflicted persons ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I regret that I am not in a position to reply to-day to my hon. Friend's question, as I have not yet received from Ireland the Report for which I have called. Perhaps, therefore, the question will be put down for a future day.

BALLINA LIGHT RAILWAY.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in the construction of the Ballina and Killala Light Railway, a deviation from the deposited plans has been made—namely, in ending the line and erecting the terminal station at the Killala end, 250 yards short of the point shown on the plans; if so, why the line as constructed has been approved of by the proper authority, and whether that authority will now recall its approval and compel adherence to the deposited plans?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: It is provided in the Second Schedule of the Order in Council, paragraph 3, that the company shall construct the—"railway in accordance with the deposited plans and sections, as modified by the working plans and sections," &c.

The line is constructed in accordance with these latter, which have received the approval of the Board of Works. The change of the station site was made because, in the opinion of the Board, the new site was more convenient for the town, more economical as regards construction, and better facilitated the working of the line.

TOWN PARKS IN IRELAND.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the general dissatisfaction in Ireland, particularly in Ulster, with reference to the present state of the law relating to town parks; whether his attention has been called to the decision of the Land Commission in the case of Mrs. Letitia M'Cann, tenant, and the Marquess of Downshire, landlord, wherein the village of Dundrum, County Down, which had a population of only 372 in 1881, was decided to be a town to which the exemption from the benefits of the Land Acts applied; is he aware that the Land Commission had previously decided that Dundrum was not such a town at the passing of the Act; whether he is aware that the Cowper Commission recommended that the exemption should not apply to any town under a population of 5,000, and that the late Government accepted in the House of Commons, in the Land Act of 1887, an amendment providing that the exemption should not apply where the population was under 2,000; and whether some steps will be taken to preserve to tenants in towns in Ireland their property in such lands held outside the towns? At the same time, I may ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware of the large number of tenants in Ireland whose holdings have been exempted from the benefits of the Land Acts; whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. John Robb, of Belfast, tenant, and the Marquess of Downshire, landlord, where the Land Commission decided to fix an extra rent on the improvements made by the tenant, without any contribution from the landlord, on the ground that such improvements were too good for the holding; and whether the terms of Reference to the proposed Committee will be so extended as to include inquiry into the cases now excluded by the defects of the Land Acts, but which are equally entitled to the benefits which these Acts were intended to confer on all the farmers of Ireland?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that the Judicial Commissioner is at present absent from Dublin hearing fair rent appeals. There has not been sufficient time to communicate with him in the country since the questions were put on the Paper, and, therefore, I hope the hon. Gentleman will postpone them.

MR. SEXTON: I should wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether cases of the class referred to in these questions would not come within the scope of the proposed Committee to inquire into the working of the Land Acts?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have not considered that question, and I would rather not answer off-hand.

BELFAST ASYLUM.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a strong feeling exists among the Governors of the Belfast Asylum in favour of having the asylums of Belfast and County Antrim managed under one Board of Governors, as suggested before the Committee of this House on the Belfast Asylum Bill; and whether, considering the advantages to the patients likely to arise from this course, the Local Government Board will take into consideration the advisability of carrying it out?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that at a recent meeting of the Board of Governors of the Belfast Asylum a proposal to consider a scheme for the management, under the joint control of the Town Council and the Grand Jury, of the present city asylum and the new county asylum for Antrim was negatived by 10 votes to 7. Under the provisions of the Belfast Asylums Act (1892), which constitute the city and county separate asylum districts and requires the appointment of separate Boards of Governors, it would not be competent for the Board of Control to sanction the re-amalgamation of the two districts; but the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums, I may observe, are of opinion, so far as their judgment goes, that the amalgamation of the two districts would not be advantageous.

THE EVICTIONS ON LORD DILLON'S ESTATE.

MR. HAYDEN: I wish to ask the Chief Secretary a question of which I have given him private notice. Is he aware that eviction proceedings were commenced yesterday against the entire population on a portion of Lord Dillon's estate in County Roscommon; that although many of the tenants were not in arrears of rent, yet several families were evicted; that three of these families have been refused re-admission even as caretakers; were the police present at the evictions; were the forces of the Crown used for the purpose of protecting emergency men engaged in throwing down houses; and will the right hon. Gentleman, in order to prevent further proceedings of this kind, endeavour to have the Second Reading of the Evicted Tenants Bill taken before Whitsuntide?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am not in a position to give an answer in detail as to the transactions that took place yesterday. I am aware generally that these proceedings were announced, and that police protection was required, and was granted, as the law obliges us to do. The particulars about so many families having been evicted, and so forth, I cannot answer, as there has not been time for me yet to receive any details. The police, I presume, were present at the evictions. The forces of the Crown have not been used to protect emergency men in throwing down houses in other cases, nor will they in this. I cannot say whether we shall have the Second Reading of the Evicted Tenants Bill taken before Whitsuntide, but, of course, I shall do the best I can to press the measure forward.

ADJOURNMENT (EASTER). du

Resolved, That this House at its rising this day do adjourn till Saturday next, and at its rising on Saturday do adjourn till Thursday, 29th March. That on Saturday, as soon as the Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill has been passed, Mr. Deputy Speaker do adjourn the House without Question put.—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [21st March] reported.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1894-5 (VOTE ON ACCOUNT).

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,199,768, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charges for the following Civil Services and Revenue Departments for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1895, viz. :—[See page 789 |

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, that although he had no desire to detain the House for many minutes, yet he wished to call attention to one or two matters which he was precluded from mentioning on the preceding day by the Rules of the House. In the first place, he wished to ask his right hon. Friend the new First Commissioner of Works if he would consider the advisability of appointing a Select Committee with regard to the offices in Parliament Buildings. He thought the dining smoking and other rooms might very well be re-arranged, and if the whole question could be systematically considered by a Select Committee having the plans of the building before it, and if, too, some of those now residing on the premises could be induced to give up their residences, changes greatly in the interest of the general convenience might be effected. Many improvements were required, especially in connection with the Reporters' Gallery and rooms. Some sanitary matters also required attention and he therefore hoped he would receive a promise that this question should considered even if no definite undertaking were forthcoming that a Select Committee would be appointed. The next matter to which he wished to refer was as to the Commission instituted by Act of Parliament in 1812 for the management of business connected with the House of Commons. So far as he could understand, that Commission had not been in the habit of meeting. Certainly it did not, under these circumstances, do much harm, but of course it did no good, and he would suggest the appointment of a Select Committee to deal with the question. There were precedents for this course, such Committees having sat in 1833, 1835, 1836 to 1849, and it need not therefore be suggested that the appointment of another Committee would be an undue interference with the Act of Parliament constituting the Commission. Of course, a very different state of affairs to that existing in 1812 now prevailed. At that time there were many offices which were now non-existent. Officers were allowed to appoint deputies to do their work for them, and there were extraordinary methods of paying them. But that had all now been altered, and simple business arrangements were the rule. But the great fault of the present system was that there was apparently no one who had control over or could answer questions in the House relative to these matters. He wanted to know if the Government would allow a Select Committee to be appointed later on to consider the question? He thought that some of the lower class of officers in the House of Commons—the men at the bottom of the list—were not properly paid at the present moment. This was a matter that ought to be considered, with the view of paying them a little better for the amount of work they did. He had intended to have a discussion upon the appointment of the Kitchen Committee and the nomination of the Members the other night, and he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had promised that the Motion for its appointment would be brought on at a reasonable hour. As a matter of fact, it had been brought on exactly at 12 o'clock. He found that a Select Committee was appointed to deal with the subject of refreshments in the House in 1849, although the Kitchen Committee was then in existence, and he did not see why a similar course should not be adopted now. There was, he found, general complaint with regard to all sorts of things. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh; but if they wanted all the things enumerated, from cabbages to champagne, he could enumerate them for them. He had been asking for some years that the Kitchen Committee should issue a balance-sheet. He had placed a Notice on the Paper on the subject, and the late Chairman (Mr. S. Herbert) of the Committee had told him that he would object to giving any balance-sheet. The Committee made a Report about the end of December, and since then they had not held any further meetings, but had allowed the kitchen and refreshment-rooms to run themselves. He wanted to know why they should not have a detailed balance-sheet. For a number of years the House had been voting £1,000 a year to the Committee, and they were, therefore, entitled to a balance-sheet. But whether they voted money or not, they had a right to an account of the receipts and expenditure of anything connected with the government of the country or the management of the House, with the exception of the secret service. He was of opinion that the Secret Service Fund should cease to be secret, but, however that might be, he wanted to know why the proceedings of the Kitchen Committee should be on a par with the Secret Service Fund. Was there anything that should be hidden or concealed from hon. Members? Was there anything that was wrong going on? His experience of the management of public funds told him that as surely as there was secrecy there was something to conceal. He should like some assurance from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he would allow a Return to be made, whether the Kitchen Committee liked it or not.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I would point out to my hon. Friend that the Kitchen Committee and other Committees do not stand on the same footing as Her Majesty's Government. We are here to be attacked and denounced, and if we conceal things of course it is supposed there is something wrong. That is our mission in life.

*MR. A. C. MORTON : I did not attack the Government. I said the Government always gave particulars.

SIR W. HARCOURT : I would point out that the Kitchen Committee is a gratuitous Committee, whose Members are kind enough to give their services to this House. We are extremely grateful for those services. They do their work, I am quite sure, as well as they can, and when they have taken a great deal of trouble on our behalf I am not disposed to criticise or interfere with them. If a Return is not made I think it is entirely within their competence to deal with the question. The Government, however, are not responsible for the Kitchen Committee or for the viands which they supply. I disclaim all responsibility for the action of the Kitchen Committee, although as a Member of the House and a Member of the Government I wish to tender my thanks to them for the trouble they have taken. As regards the accommodation in the House, my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works will answer my hon. Friend's observations. On the subject of that celebrated "Commissioner," my hon. Friend has at length got hold of the right Minister by the ear. I am the Minister who am the Commissioner. The real truth is that these matters are substantially conducted by the Speaker, the First Lord of the Treasury, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There have been no formal meetings, but every matter affecting the officers of the House has to be settled by the three persons I have named. I am not aware myself of any ground for complaint. If the House is dissatisfied with the arrangements made respecting the staff of this House they can deal with the matter when the ordinary Vote is taken. I do not think there is any occasion for any complaint of the kind. I think the arrangement satisfactory, and I am not aware that the majority of Members have any reason to distrust the method by which the present system is administered. If my hon. Friend is, however, able to make out a case for inquiry that is another thing. My hon. Friend apparently has in view a rise of salaries. Of course, he cannot expect the Chancellor of the Exchequer to sympathise with such a proposal.

MR. A. C. MORTON : I only referred to those officers who are at the bottom of the list.

SIR W. HARCOURT : I know nothing myself of any matter in regard to the organisation of the staff of the House which is not satisfactory, and therefore, as at present advised, I cannot see that there is any particular occasion for action.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. H. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.) : I came down to the House prepared to answer a question that was to have been put by my hon. Friend the Member for Central Sheffield (Colonel Howard Vincent), and to say that, having regard to the statements made by my right hon. Friend the present President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) last year, and to what, I think, is the prevalent feeling in the House at the present time, I shall be prepared, on the part of the Government, to assent to the appointment of a Committee to consider the general question of the accommodation of the Members of this House. No doubt, that Committee will be able to take cognisance of the points raised by my hon. Friend.

MR. A. C. MORTON : That Committee will have power to consider the whole question ?

MR. H. GLADSTONE : Yes, that is so.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said, he regretted that the question of the increased grant to the Kitchen Committee had been raised at a time when everybody was anxious to get away. Some time ago a question was raised as to the advisableness of abolishing the "tipping" of waiters in the dining-room. [Cries of "Oh!"] He was sorry that anyone should express dissent, because to him and to some others the question was of great importance. He had never known a body of men who lived on "tips" who had anything like manliness or independence about them. When a Sub-Committee was appointed a short time ago it was decided that before a serious attempt was made to abolish "tipping" the waiters should have their wages raised. A deputation then waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt), who promised to grant £1,000 in addition to the £1,000 already annually granted, on condition that the "tipping" system was abolished. The wages of the waiters had since been raised 1s. a day all round, but the "tipping" system still continued in existence. As the condition on which the extra grant was promised had not been carried out, he felt himself justified in joining his hon. Friend in protesting against any increased grant being given from the Imperial Exchequer until that condition had been faithfully and honourably fulfilled. A body of hon. Members continued to tempt the waiters by offering "tips," and some of the waiters had told abominable falsehoods, to the effect that they had not had their wages raised and that they were being made martyrs of. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say that the extra £1,000 should not be granted unless "tipping" were abolished, he (Mr. Cremer) would be glad to withdraw any further opposition to the Vote. As to the question of a balance-sheet, it seemed to him that when the House voted money for any purpose it had a right to know how that money was expended, and ever since he had been a Member of the Kitchen Committee he had urged that a financial statement should be made by the Committee. This had not yet been done, but he hoped hon. Members would insist upon having it done, especially if an increased grant were made.

Dr. CLARK (Caithness) said, he did not see why money should be voted by Parliament to the Kitchen Committee at all. Hon. Members ought to pay the full price for their teas and dinners. The Chairman of the Kitchen Committee (Mr. S. Herbert) two years ago when the question was discussed said he would take the money voted by Parliament and spend it as he liked without giving the House any statement as to how it had been spent. If hon. Members voted money to themselves, as they were doing in this case, an account of the way in which it was spent ought certainly to be given. He hoped the Committee would be able to abolish "tipping" by paying the waiters proper wages. He begged to give notice that when the Vote was taken he should oppose the grant of an extra £1,000. The Kitchen Committee did not tell Members what the money was for.

Mr. CREMER: Yes they do. The money was asked for to enable us to increase the wages of the waiters and to abolish the system of "tipping." My complaint is that the wages have been increased 1s. a day and yet the system of "tipping" still prevails.

Dr. CLARK said, the House had never been told what the money was for; whether it was for wages or whether it was needed because the price of teas had been reduced from 9d. to 6d.

Mr. CARSON (Dublin University) said, he desired to call attention to what, as reported, seemed to him to have been a very unprovoked attack by the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. J. Morley) on one of Her Majesty's Judges in Ireland on that day week. The statements of the right hon. Gentleman, which he thought were entirely unfounded, had led to a good deal of discontent amongst many people in Ireland, and were calculated to weaken the administration of the law in that country.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member will not be in Order in dealing with that question.

Mr. CARSON said, he was sorry he could not refer to the subject, but he would call attention to the administration of the law in the County of Clare, out of which the matter arose. Mr. Justice O'Brien, at the last Clare Assizes, pointed to what seemed to be a very alarming state of facts with reference to the administration of the law in that county. The House was asked to vote a very large sum for public prosecutions in Clare, and he (Mr. Carson) wished to point out that those prosecutions had hitherto proved absolutely abortive for the purposes for which they were instituted. Since the present Government came into Office there had been three Assizes held in Clare. At the Spring Assizes in 1893 seven cases were tried—a very small number compared with the amount of crime there had been for the previous six months in the county. Out of the seven cases there was only one conviction. Mr. Justice O'Brien, referring to this fact, said that the law had entirely failed to bring the offenders to justice in spite of every care and vigilance used to attain the result. On the matter being brought before the House the Chief Secretary for Ireland made some very disparaging remarks about Mr. Justice O'Brien. He (Mr. Carson) rather thought the right hon.

Gentleman afterwards regretted having made those remarks. It must be remembered that Mr. Justice O'Brien was the one Judge in Ireland who, owing to the arduous duties he had had to perform, was obliged to have police protection. It was to be deprecated that a Cabinet Minister, a Minister of the Crown interested in the administration of the law in Ireland, should in any way lend himself—even assuming there were any grounds for so doing—to an attack on a Judge under such circumstances as these. This Assize passed over, and the Summer Assizes came on when the trials were before an entirely different Judge. He had not the figures before him of what took place on that occasion, but in the Summer Assize of 1893, so far as he could recollect, there was not, in any important case, any conviction, and Mr. Justice Gibson said that in trying cases there they were engaged in a solemn comedy, and that such a travesty was perfectly melancholy. At the Assizes which had just closed Mr. Justice O'Brien said that—"It was not possible to bring any criminal case into that county without it resulting in open contempt of the law."

The net result of these three Assizes at Ennis was that there was no important conviction, and only three altogether. It might be said that he had omitted to mention that at Cork, under the Winter Assizes Act, there had been 11 Clare cases and seven convictions. But what did that prove? It proved that when they had a change of venue and tried Clare cases elsewhere, they got a fair percentage of convictions, and he could not understand a stronger argument for putting in force those powers of change of venue which still existed than the argument that at the recent Winter Assizes at Cork they got seven convictions out of 11 cases, because the cases had been taken from the intimidation that existed in the County of Clare. He thought that when the Judges in Ireland were bold and free enough to draw the attention of the Executive of the country to the failure of juries to carry out the law, which, he said, came within the duty of the Judge—when they had the courage and boldness to do this, and had the manliness to discharge their duty, so far from being met with any opprobrium from those who were entrusted with the supervision of law and order, they ought to receive the commendation of those who were in high quarters. He could not imagine anything more likely to lead to a recrudescence of crime or to disrespect of the law than attacks on Judges, and the right hon. Gentleman would best consult his own dignity and the material welfare of Ireland if, instead of attacking Judges when they were compelled to draw attention to the failure of Juries to do their duty, he would back up the Judges and try to find some method by which crime might be punished and the law respected.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The hon. and learned Gentleman has so concluded his remarks that I have no right to complain in any way, but I say, in what the hon. Gentleman has had to say about Clare, I really fail to see what point he has brought against myself or Her Majesty's Government. He evidently intended to refer to a remark or two which I had occasion to make on the Charge of Mr. Justice O'Brien the other day, but into that we are not allowed to-day to go. The hon. and learned Gentleman has gone over ground which has already, I should have thought, been abundantly traversed ever since the present Government came into Office; the state of Clare has received more attention from this House than almost any other factor in regard to the condition of Ireland. I think there were four or five elaborate Debates on Clare last year, and I do not think the hon. and learned Gentleman has adduced one single new consideration throwing any light whatever on the attitude the Government ought to take up. I have not by me the figures as to the convictions in the County of Clare, but I will take the hon. and learned Gentleman's account as substantially accurate. It is no doubt lamentably true that out of the total number of offences of a certain kind committed in the County of Clare very few persons are made amenable. It is further true that at the Winter Assizes at Ennis, in the County of Clare, there have not been as many convictions as the Crown would desire, or as any impartial person might have hoped for, but, if my recollection is right, the four cases in which the jury failed to convict were not cases of that particular crime as to which, as the hon. and learned Gentleman knows, miscarriage of justice almost systematically occurs. I believe I am right in this. The hon. Member talks of the prosecutions that have been proved abortive since we came into Office, but I believe I should have no difficulty in showing, if I had the figures by me, that we have been as successful in securing convictions in the County of Clare, that we have obtained as good a percentage as was the case with the late Government.

MR. CARSON: We never got any in Clare, and gave up trying them there.

MR. J. MORLEY: Well, I will take my own ground, and that, if I may say so, is the ground on which I take the liberty of quarrelling with the line taken by the learned Judge at Ennis. It cannot be denied that the state of Clare has since December last shown a marked and decided improvement. Now, the learned Judge seemed to deny that proposition, and I would undertake to say that there is not a single man of authority and responsibility in Clare, beginning with the Lord Lieutenant of the county himself, and ending with the humblest private constable, that there is not one person with the means of judging and forming a responsible opinion, who would not tell you that the state of Clare shows a decided and remarkable improvement. In the month of December there were only four agrarian offences in the County of Clare. I do not make any boast of that. I never like to make any boast about Clare, because there might be a recrudescence of crime in Clare next month or the month after; but what I complained of was, that instead of congratulating the county on the improvement that had taken place, and which had undoubtedly taken place in Clare during the last four months, instead of congratulating the Grand Jury on the position of the county or of saying nothing about it, the learned Judge unfortunately thought it his duty to represent the state of the County of Clare as rather showing no improvement. I say it is not the duty of a Judge going Assizes to express opinions upon the general social state of the county, when those opinions are in entire disaccord with the views of those who are responsible for what goes on, and whom, I contend, from the Lord Lieutenant of the county down to the humblest private constable, will show there has been a marked improvement. The hon. and learned Member made some remarks in vindication of Mr. Justice O'Brien himself. I have nothing to say against those remarks; he is the last Judge on whom I would wish to pass any hostile criticism; but when the hon. and learned Member says we ought to be careful in criticising the action of Judges bold enough and free enough to express their opinions, and that when we do that we are tending to disparage the administration of the law, then I distinctly and diametrically differ from the hon. and learned gentleman. There are many Judges on the Irish Bench who dislike and condemn these general social Charges, and think that a Judge would do far more to bring the administration of the law into respect if he steered as clear as he possibly could of disputed ground and political controversies. It is the Judge who imports into his Charge, which ought to be cold and judicial, political considerations, and who identifies the administration of the law with a certain set of political opinions which tends to make the administration of the law suspected and disregarded. I do not think I have passed over anything calling for a reply. If it had been in Order, I should have been prepared to justify every remark I have made, by reference to chapter and verse upon the Charges of Irish Judges.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said, that yesterday he had, by the Rules of the House, no opportunity of referring to matters which he wished briefly to deal with. The first matter had reference to the Fishery Board. It would be in the recollection of the House that the question of trawling off Ross-shire and the Island of Lewis had been brought up time after time during the existence of the present Government. He had brought it forward himself, and had been told there was no money in connection with this work. The fishermen had been told that they ought to report any trawlers they might see to the official of the Board at Stornoway. But how could these men be expected to walk 30 or 40 miles? A gunboat, the Forhound, had been sent, which could steam only six or seven knots, while the trawlers could go at 12; and, moreover, it lay in Stornoway Harbour for weeks because it could not face the weather, which, however, did not keep the steam trawlers idle. Last year he found that £1,400 odd was returned to the Treasury by the Fishery Board, and he hoped that the Secretary for Scotland would this year take care

t the whole of the money granted s expended in connection with the ork of the Fishery Board, and mainly connection with trawling. He wished so to refer to the Board of Supervision. A few years ago the Secretary for Scotland admitted it was a very unsound and badly-managed Board, and required new construction. He would like to know whether anything had been done in that direction, or was it going on in the same sluggish fashion. He would also like to know whether Sir Donald McNeil was connected with the Board, and whether he was not the same man who associated himself very actively, two or three years ago, with the colonisation scheme, which was a scheme promoted by commercial speculators? He would not, however, deal further with the Board of Supervision, which was a very unsound and a very corrupt Board to-day—[Cries of "Oh!"] It was shockingly bad, and so corrupt that the right hon. Gentleman spoke of it in that manner.

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): No, never.

MR. WEIR said, the right hon. Gentleman admitted that it was unsound and badly managed.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: But you said corrupt.

MR. WEIR said, that if the right hon. Gentleman did not say it was corrupt he (Mr. Weir) did. Then there was a very large item for law charges. When he had spoken on these in connection with Highland matters, the Lord Advocate had shown the greatest ignorance of the geography of the Highlands. When he showed that a man had to travel on foot, in connection with a poaching case, from 30 to 35 miles to Dingle, and the same distance home again, the right hon. Gentleman persisted in saying it was only a distance of six or eight miles. He would really appeal to the Government to furnish the right hon. Gentleman's Office with an ordnance map, in order that these stupid blunders might not be made. Further, he had occasion to ask what number of Gaelic-speaking Sheriffs, Procurators Fiscal, and other officials there were in the Highlands; he asked for a Return, and was told it was not in the public interest that it should be supplied. What was there that it was necessary to keep dark? But he had obtained the information in spite of the right hon. Gentleman, though he did not think that Members of the House should be called upon to spend their time, their energies, and their money in getting information that was available to the Departments of the Government. He hoped that the Lord Advocate and the Secretary for Scotland when other appointments were made of Sheriffs in the Highlands would take care that Gaelic-speaking men were appointed, and that Edinburgh advocates should not be pitchforked into these posts by the Lord Advocate, men who had no knowledge of Gaelic or of the customs of the people of the Highlands. He did not think it was right that the Highland people should be treated in this manner. Perhaps to-day he might get some explanation as to the case of John MacLean. This was an old man who was 80 years of age, and on the 19th of July last he was charged with allowing trout to get into his net. [Laughter]. It was not a laughing matter. If the trout was earmarked as the property of the landlord, then the fisherman could give instructions for it to keep out of his net. This man was not summoned to Dingle, a distance of 30 or 35 miles, until winter time, and that could only be in order that he might be convicted in his absence, as it would be impossible for him to walk that distance in the winter. That was how the Lord Advocate allowed these matters to be conducted in the Highlands of Scotland. He found that three of the Sheriffs received £450 for services to the Board of Supervision—he supposed £150 each—and he wished to know why they were on the Board of Supervision at all, when what was wanted were men with a knowledge of sanitary matters, and not lawyers? Talk about tipping in the dining-room of the House of Commons! why tipping was carried out by the sanction of the right hon. Gentleman to an alarming extent. Even the fiscals were paid by salary and commission. What did they get commission on; was it the number of convictions they managed to secure, or was it? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would tell them what they got these Commissions for? The system, it appeared to him, of administration of the land in the Highlands was one of trickery and jobbery.

*SIR G. TREVELYAN was surprised that any gentleman have accused him of having charged the Board of Supervision with being corrupt. He should have as soon expected to hear Mr. Speaker rise in his chair and charge the officers of this House in being corrupt. He never used, with regard to the Board of Supervision, any of these adjectives. He said that the members of the Board of Supervision did their duty with great knowledge, experience, zeal and energy, but that the system was one which was not well organised, and that he intended to alter the system by a Bill which he proposed to introduce on Monday week next. The hon. Gentleman referred to the want of protection against trawling in the Western Highlands. But in England there was no protection at all. In Scotland that sort of protection existed, but was deficient in quantity. In no case could they expect to have a gunboat, or steam launch, or police launch, every 20 or 30 miles along the coast so as to obviate the necessity of the fishermen keeping their own eyes open, so as to report illegal trawling to the ministers of justice, who existed for the purpose of receiving complaints of private individuals on land and sea alike. It was not the case at all that this system had failed in being efficient, because quite recently a fine of £50 was inflicted on a trawler in these seas, and any case brought before a Procurator Fiscal would be looked into carefully. It was quite true that a sum of money had been taken to provide an additional steamship for protective purposes this year, but it was impossible for him to break through the well-recognised financial system under which the Government was carried on, and because there was £1,300 or £1,400 unexpended on a Vote of £20,000 or £30,000 to seize that money, and utilise it for a purpose quite different to that for which the money was obtained. As regarded the complaints of the hon. Member about justice in the Highlands, he did not know even what the hon. Member meant. He had no notion what the hon. Member meant by saying that Sheriffs, Deputy Sheriffs, and Procurators Fiscal lived by the process of tipping and pilfering. When he knew that he would inquire into the matter, but until then he should not do the Sheriffs and Procurators Fiscals the ill compliment of defending them against the accusation of tipping and pilfering. His own belief was that the general administration of justice in the Highlands was, on the whole, trusted by the great mass of the population, and to their judgment he left it.

Mr. Weir

Resolution agreed to.

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.—(No. 116.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he did not wish to oppose the Bill, but he did wish to say that his right hon. Friend promised that the Bill should be obtainable in the Vote Office before—

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I have explained that.

MR. A. C. MORTON was aware of this, but was not satisfied with the explanation that had been given. It was all very well to say they ought to allow the Bill to be read a second time without Debate. As he understood it, the Bill concerned the comfort especially of the private soldiers, and whether the Government liked it or not they would be compelled in the future to take more notice of the comfort and convenience of the private soldiers than they had done before, because even if the soldiers could not vote their friends could. Now that the franchise had been extended the friends of the soldiers would take more interest in such questions, and would insist that in future the soldiers should be better looked after. As the Bill largely concerned their welfare, comfort, and perhaps even their lives, they ought, before the Second Reading, to know if the Bill contained any new matter.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : My hon. Friend has asked me whether there is any new matter in the Bill this year. There are only two or three Amendments of a purely verbal kind, merely of this nature—to insert the year 1893 instead of the previous year where reference is made to some previous Act of Parliament which was altered last year. There is just one exception to these verbal Amendments. My hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh brought forward a Motion last year enabling soldiers to be assisted by counsel when they were tried before District Courts Martial. I have promised to introduce a word or two in order to carry out that which was obviously the intention and the wish of the House. That is entirely in the direction of extending the comfort and welfare of the soldiers, so that I do not think the hon. Gentleman will object. That is the only alteration. The main point is this—this is a Second Reading which affirms the principle that the law is to be applied to a certain number of soldiers and marines of the numbers voted by Parliament. The question before the House is the principle of the Bill. When we come to the Committee stage my hon. Friend may raise any objection he likes, but this is not the time to do so.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES did not think, after the undertaking which had been given that they should have a proper opportunity of discussing the Bill on the Committee stage, that there should be any opposition to the Second Reading. At the same time, he did not quite agree that the Second Reading of a Bill of this kind should be considered absolutely a matter of course.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I did not say so. If the hon. Gentleman objects to applying military law to the whole force of the Crown, that is the point.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, it was, of course, rather a serious matter, because it deprived nearly 250,000 of our subjects of their civil rights. He did not say it was not a thing to be done, but it was a serious thing, especially in the case of a Bill the Second Reading of which was to be passed sub silentio, and which had not yet been printed. He thought, however, that upon this occasion the Bill should be allowed to pass the Second Reading in consideration of the undertaking that in Committee there should be a proper opportunity of discussion.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday, 29th March.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 3) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Walter Foster, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the urban sanitary districts of Bristol, Dover, Henley-upon-Thames, Idle, Nottingham, Padstow and Hapton, Tunbridge Wells, and Wells (Somerset), ordered to be brought in by Sir Walter Foster and Mr. Shaw-Lefevre.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 122.]

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 1) BILL.

As amended, considered: to be read the third time upon Saturday.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Four o'clock till Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Saturday, 24th March 1894.

The House met at Twelve of the clock.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition:—

Whereupon Mr. Mellor, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table, and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 1) BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said, he had a few remarks to make relative to the Ordnance Vote. He hoped the Secretary for War would take care that in the future some substantial alterations were made in the magazine rifle (Mark I.) and not the miserable changes which he had indicated in answer to questions in June last. He was sorry the Secretary for War had no technical and practical knowledge of this work. If he had possessed that knowledge he certainly would not have described as alterations the miserable changes that had been made in the rifle, and he would have realised how necessary it was to reduce the friction now so marked a feature in some parts of the rifle. He questioned whether the magazine rifle was made as cheaply as it might be. The system of maintaining two factories, each only partially working, was extravagant. Irrespective of the double charges for establishment, rifles could be made more cheaply at Enfield than at Birmingham, and he therefore suggested that the factory at Enfield should be kept in full operation, and that that at Sparkbrook should be used as a reserve factory. Why was the Sparkbrook factory being maintained, and how was it that an order for 15,000 magazine rifles had recently been sent there? Was this a sop to Cerberus? Hitherto hon. and right hon. Members for Birmingham had been very loquacious in regard to the Sparkbrook factory? Was there now a conspiracy of silence? People would have their opinion as to that, and would be asking, Were the Members for Birmingham masters of the situation? Was the War Office controlled by the Cabinet or by the Members for Birmingham? If by the Cabinet, then why were not the magazine rifles made at the factory where the expense was the least? They ought to have only one factory—that at Enfield. It might suit the Secretary for War to send the work to Birmingham, but it would not suit the taxpayers. It was not business; but he was not surprised at that, as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had no commercial experience. Again, he hoped the Bagot Street repairing shop would be closed, and he must ask how it was that 54,000 rifles were to be sent there to be “browned.” That, surely, was not the work of a repairing factory. Now he came to the Navy. He was glad to see present the Secretary to the Admiralty, who was about to engage an additional number of men for his Service. He wanted to impress upon him that he ought not to gather these men from the slums of our great cities. There were many men available for the Service who were, so to speak, “to the manor born”; they were men born on our sea coasts, and he thought it very regrettable that the Admiralty should lose sight of such a magnificent recruiting ground as was presented by the Island of Lewis. If they would only send training ships there they would get the best possible material for the Navy, and officers and men could do good work, instead of wasting their time at Sheerness or Chatham, or in some of the Mediterranean ports. It would be far better to send them North, where they would breathe fresh air. The officers might not be invited to so many balls and tennis parties, but they would become very much healthier, and would be all the more fit for work if ever required for active service. Now, he understood that the Marines had not yet been provided with the Martini-Henry rifle. Why was that? Surely they ought to have the best possible weapon, seeing that they formed part of our first line of defence. When our new ships were completed and sent out to show the greatness of this great Empire we hoped the crews would be properly armed, and that officers and men would not be allowed to spend their time in idleness. They were told that a certain personage was strolling about finding mischief for idle hands, and he was sure his right hon. Friend would not encourage that. Let him, then, see that the men did not waste their time in southern ports while their ships were rotting in harbour, and let him send them on cruises in the Northern Seas, which would keep them fit for work and the machinery of their ships in proper order. They might, too, be supplied with Maxim guns to deal with the sea thieves who so infested the Northern Seas.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he had one or two observations to make. [Cries of “Oh!”] He should like to take this opportunity of congratulating Ministers on the improvement which he saw had taken place. He never saw so many Ministers attending Prayers before. This question between Sparkbrook and Enfield had been before the House previously, and it was found that the rifles could be manufactured at Enfield for much less than at Sparkbrook. That had been proved. He did hope that, after having gone to the expense of building most splendid works at Enfield, the Government would make the best and most use of them. In this £10,000,000 there was included part of a very large increase in the National Expenditure—between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000. They had not had any proper time to debate that, and he did not suppose they would have very much opportunity during the Session. He always noticed that when the Government had got the money there was not much time given for discussion. The Government had not actually got this money yet, and he hoped that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed means to produce it, he would take care that it was not to be dragged out of the pockets of the poorer classes of the United Kingdom, but that the incidence of taxation would be fairer in the future than in the past. This was not a matter that he wanted to detain the House upon. [Cheers and cries of "Oh!"] It would be well for hon. and right hon. Gentlemen to remember that these cheers were very much out of place. Hon. Members if they liked could take this opportunity of making their remarks. They had a right to take an opportunity which was given to them by the Constitution of the country, of the House, and of the Government, as the guardians of the rate-payers' money, to criticise the proposals of the Government.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): The hon. Member for Ross-shire and the hon. Member for Peterborough have seized this opportunity, to the obvious inconvenience of Ministers and Members and the officials of the House, to bring up certain subjects for the discussion of which there has already been abundant opportunity during the week or 10 days that have elapsed since the beginning of the Session and for the discussion of which there will be ample opportunity hereafter. I cannot conceive anything less convenient than the course which has been taken. I, of course, have had no definite answer at this moment that I can give to the hon. Member for Ross-shire that can be supported by facts and figures on the subjects which he has brought forward. With regard to the magazine rifle, the hon. Member has said that I have no technical knowledge. It is a very good thing that I have no technical knowledge, because this is a matter in which a little knowledge is a dangerous thing—as we sometimes see exemplified. All I can say of the new rifle is that, in the first instance, it has the whole approval of those skilled technical men who conduct the Government manufactories, and, in the next, that in practice it has been found to work well, and to answer all the necessary requirements in the hands of the soldiers who use it. I rely upon the opinion of these two classes of men who have technical knowledge in separate ways, and I am bound to say that, as they do not point out any serious faults, I am willing to accept the weapon as a satisfactory one. As to the matter of the Birmingham manufactory, we had that discussed only two or three days ago. My right hon.

Mr. A. C. Morton

Friend who sits behind the hon. Member knows what has happened with regard to it. There is a possibility of further discussion when the Army Estimates come on at a later period, and I do not think it necessary to delay the House upon it now. I may say the same with regard to the points raised in regard to subjects with which the Secretary to the Admiralty has to deal. He will be ready to answer any point at a proper time other than at the present. To-day we have met to pass the Third Reading of this Bill, and Members having come here at great inconvenience—not Members of the Government only, but other Members—to discharge that duty, and being anxious to do that, and having the one desire to get away as soon as possible, I am sure I should be ill consulting their feelings if I said any more now.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

Whereupon, in pursuance of the Order of the House of 22nd March, Mr. Deputy Speaker adjourned the House until Thursday 29th March without Question put.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before One o'clock, till Thursday, 29th March.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 26th March 1894.

ADDRESS.

The Queen's Answer to the Address of Monday the 12th instant reported; and Address and Answer to be printed and published.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Standing Order No. XXXIX. considered (according to Order), and dispensed with for this day's Sitting.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (NO. 1) BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a; Then Standing Order No. XXXIX. having been dispensed with) Bill read 2^a; Committee negatived; Bill read 3^a, and passed.

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock, to Thursday next, Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 29th March 1894.

COMMISSION.

Following Bill received the Royal Assent to—Consolidated Fund (No. 1).

House adjourned at half-past Three o'clock, to the 9th April next, at a quarter-past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 29th March 1894.

SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the probable absence of Mr. Speaker, and of the continuance of his indisposition;—

Upon Mr. Mellor, the Chairman of the Ways and Means, proceeded to the Chair, and after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

They have agreed to,—Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill, without amendment.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

House went;—and being re-

ROYAL ASSENT.

DEPUTY SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to,— Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Act,

QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Vice Chamberlain of the House reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address as followeth:—

XXII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

: "I thank you for your loyal and dutiful Address.

You may rely on My cordial co-operation in your endeavours to promote the well-being of My people in all parts of My Dominions."

QUESTIONS.

IRCHESTER RAILWAY FATALITY.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): On behalf of the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire, I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the inquest, on 8th March, on the body of a platelayer, named Cross, who was knocked down and killed at Irchester, on the Midland Railway; whether he has observed that it appears from the evidence that a curve in the line and a bridge prevented Cross from seeing in time the engine which struck him down; whether previous accidents of a similar character have occurred in the same locality; what precautions are taken on the Midland line for the protection of platelayers under such circumstances; and whether he will have an inquiry made by a Board of Trade Inspector into the circumstances?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): My attention has been called to the accident in question. I understand that the railway is on a slight curve only, the radius being 70 chains, and that there is no bridge or other obstruction to the view of the line in the direction of Bedford for the distance of about 400 yards from the point where Cross was working. The Midland Company have Rules for the guidance of their servants, and one of them (347) is specially directed to men working on the permanent way. A coroner's inquest has been held, and the coroner reports that a jury of practical men, one of whom had been an engine driver, returned a verdict of accidental death. The Board of Trade have been in communication with the Railway Company on the matter, and I have come to the conclusion that further inquiry would not throw any additional light on this sad occurrence.

THE CHARITY COMMISSION.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education when Mr. Austie ceased to act as a Charity Commissioner; and whether, by the terms of his appointment, he was appointed as a permanent Commissioner, or only as a temporary Commissioner in connection with the administration of "The City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883"?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (MR. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): I am informed that Mr. Austie ceased to act as a Charity Commissioner on the 30th of September, 1892, being the day on which the extended period prescribed by the City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883, for the duration of the powers and duties vested in, or imposed upon, the Charity Commissioners by that Act, expired. Mr. Austie was appointed a Charity Commissioner under the power, given to the Crown by the above-mentioned Act, of appointing paid Charity Commissioners to hold office during the pleasure of the Crown, and his salary as Commissioner ceased to be paid on the expiration of that Act as thereby provided.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, with reference to the recent Return of Charities within the County of London, the trustees of which have omitted during five years to transmit to the Charity Commissioners copies of the annual accounts of the charities as required by law, whether the Commissioners have taken any, and what, steps to obtain compliance with the law; and whether any, and what, steps have been taken by the Commissioners in the case of numerous trustees of charities in other parts of the Kingdom who, during the same period, have omitted to transmit copies of their accounts to the Commissioners?

MR. ACLAND: I am informed that the Charity Commissioners have taken steps to procure the Return of the accounts of the charities in question, and have already received the accounts in several cases; and that in every case in which such an omission is brought to the notice of the Charity Commissioners a compliance with the law is at once required and enforced.

MILITARY INSTRUCTION FOR VOLUNTEER OFFICERS.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that great difficulty has recently been placed in the way of Volunteer officers, who are anxious to make themselves efficient, at Wellington Barracks, Hythe, and other Military schools; that one officer of the 1st Volunteer Battalion, Royal West Kent Regiment, who applied early in February for admission to Wellington Barracks in March, was refused on the ground that the school was full in March, and on subsequently applying for April was informed that in April there would be no school at all; and that another officer in the same regiment, who applied last December for admission to the School of Musketry at Hythe for any month in 1894, was refused on the ground that there were no vacancies at Hythe in 1894 at all; and whether he will consider the possibility of giving increased facilities to Volunteer officers of obtaining military instruction?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): Referring to the specific instances quoted, the officer who wished to attend at Wellington Barracks in March, when there was no vacancy, has been informed that he can attend the April class. At the Hythe School of Musketry the only vacancy available in 1894 for the Militia and Volunteers of the Thames District was filled before this application was received. Speaking generally, the numbers which can be taken at the several Schools are necessarily limited; but, subject to those limits, there is every desire to afford Volunteer officers all possible facilities for making themselves efficient.

SEA FISHERIES.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has yet considered the Report of the Sea Fisheries Committee; and whether, and when, he intends to propose legislation in pursuance of its recommendations?

MR. MUNDELLA: I regret that, having regard to the number of measures proposed by the Government, I am unable to promise legislation on this subject at present.

STRUCTURAL ARRANGEMENTS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the proposed Committee on the structure and arrangements of the House of Commons will have power to inquire into the want of proper accommodation for Representatives of the Press?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. H. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): Yes, Sir.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON COMMISSION.

SIR A. ROLLIT: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, and when, it is intended to propose legislation in pursuance of the Report of the University of London Commission, and what will be the general character of procedure in reference to the subject?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): It is impossible to introduce legislation in pursuance of the Report of the University of London Commission this Session.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER AND THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the indulgence of the House while I make a very brief personal explanation. On Thursday last the Secretary to the Admiralty made a reference to me in this House. It would be quite out of place for me to go into the subject-matter of that statement. I wish, however, to say that my absence from this House was a misfortune which no one regretted more than myself. I recognise the courtesy of the Secretary to the Admiralty in giving me notice of his intention; but owing to what was perhaps the necessarily short character of that notice, I did not receive it till the following morning. I desire nothing better than to have an opportunity of stating my case before this House, but I fear from the reply given to the hon. Member for King's Lynn by my right hon. Friend that I shall not be allowed such an opportunity. I must, therefore, endeavour to state elsewhere what I should have preferred to state in this House. I may add that, despite the very categorical statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, I still find myself so sharply at issue with him that I do not feel justified—taking the view I do of what is the public interest in this matter—in allowing a misunderstanding of this kind to remain unexplained. I can only repeat, as my right hon. Friend seems to think otherwise, that this is in no sense a personal matter with me, and no hon. Member can point to a word of mine which justifies such a belief. I thank the House for its indulgence in hearing me, and I trust I have made it clear that it is by no wish of my own that I failed to support the exact terms of my Motion.

THE ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.

MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford): Is it proposed to take the Army (Annual) Bill to-night? If so, after what hour will it not be proceeded with?

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked if there was not a distinct understanding that up to the 29th of March no contentious business should be brought forward, and if the Secretary of War had not violated that understanding before Easter by getting the Second Reading of the Army (Annual) Bill without notice and before the Bill itself had been printed? He further inquired whether the Government really intended that night to proceed with this most contentious piece of business before hon. Members had had an opportunity of putting down Amendments to it?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN replied, that if there was any general feeling in the House, or any feeling at all, against the Committee stage of the Army (Annual) Bill being taken that night, it would not be taken.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Ronald Craufurd Munro Ferguson, esquire, for the Leith District of Burghs.

ADJOURNMENT.

LOSS OF THE "PORT YARROCK."

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON, Member for Middlesbrough, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, “the loss of life caused by the loss of the British sailing vessel Port Yarrock ;” but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. Deputy Speaker called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and less than 40 Members having accordingly risen :—

The House proceeded to the Business of the Day.

MOTIONS.

EQUALISATION OF RATES (LONDON) BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) : I have to ask leave to bring in a Bill to make better provision for the equalisation of rates as between different parts of London. This measure, I may explain, is the same measure which was introduced last Session by my right hon. Friend now Secretary of State for India. The Bill of last Session was introduced with a short statement on the understanding that anything like a general discussion should be deferred till the Second Reading, a stage which was not reached not because of any opposition on the part of hon. Members, but simply for want of time. On this occasion I propose to defer any general statement to the Second Reading, and the Government will endeavour to put down the Second Reading for as early a day as possible. We have every desire for the fullest discussion, for we regard the measure as one of great importance, and will endeavour at the earliest possible moment to carry it into law.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That Leave be given to bring in a Bill to make better provision for the Equalisation of Rates as between different parts of London.”—(Mr. Shaw-Lefevre.)

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, he thought the House was entitled to hear something more concerning this measure. The right hon. Gentleman told them it was exactly the same Bill as was introduced last year, but that Bill was not discussed, and it would only have been courteous to the House to at least have stated the general line on which it was framed. They were certainly all agreed that there should be some re-arrangement of the system of local taxation in London ; but it was a peculiar thing to bring in a measure of this great importance, which affected a larger population than did the Home Rule Bill, without a single word of explanation. The Bill raised many questions which no doubt were more or less matters of detail and would be better discussed when the Bill had been printed, but the general question involved that of the re-arrangement of the whole system of Metropolitan taxation, and was so important that he thought London had not been treated with due respect by the introduction of the Bill without a word of explanation from the Minister in charge. They ought to have some general idea of the Bill before they read it a first time. Although they desired that the burdens of local taxation should fall more lightly upon the poorer districts, they realised that a re-arrangement would have to be made with great care or else the general burden might be made more heavy in the future than it had been in the past. What had to be guarded against was the danger that drawing from a common fund would lead to extravagance, which would ultimately increase the burden of the rates even in the poorer districts. He had the honour to represent in that House a district in which there had been extremely careful administration of local funds and in which the average expenditure was lower than in other poor districts. Probably this Bill would at first have the effect of reducing the rates even in that district but he feared that ultimately the system of drawing upon a general fund would produce higher expenditure and greater extravagance with consequently increased burdens on the unfortunate ratepayer. That he therefore held that they ought to be informed what safeguards were provided in the Bill against these evils.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) : No doubt there are a great many questions in this Bill which constitute proper matter for discussion. But the other day, when the question of First Reading was mentioned, I ventured to make an appeal to the House, which I understood to be favourably responded to from both sides of the House, and it was that there should be no discussion on the First Readings of Bills. It is almost unknown to have anything in the nature of a First Reading discussion on the introduction of private Members' Bills, and until very recent times it was extremely unusual to raise discussion on the First Reading of Government Bills that were not in the proper sense of the term highly controversial, like the Home Rule Bill and the Bill for the repeal of the Corn Laws. Bills of the character now proposed it has not been the custom to discuss on the First Reading. The House has suffered greatly from want of time to transact its business, and to make a practice of discussing Bills on their introduction will have a prejudicial effect. I am not speaking merely in the interests of this Government, for it is equally in the interests of both sides of the House and of any Government that Bills of this character should be laid on the Table without discussion and that debate should be deferred to the Second Reading. In the interests of the business of the House and of all parties who might be responsible for legislation, I venture to appeal to the House not to discuss at this stage a Bill on which they are not fundamentally divided.

Mr. Havelock Wilson

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) : I will so far respond to the appeal which the right hon. Gentleman has just made as to refrain myself from discussing the Bill at this stage. It is true the Bill was introduced last year and that there was some little discussion upon it, but I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that we have practically abolished discussion on two stages of Bills—on going into Committee and on the Report stage. Therefore, we can scarcely be bound by the procedure in the past when discussion on these stages was allowed. I agree generally with what the right hon. Gentleman has stated, but I make this reservation. There were good reasons last year for discussing Bills on the Motion for First Reading, because it was evident that those Bills were introduced mainly to show the intentions and indicate the programme of the Government, and because there was no prospect of the Bills reaching the Second Reading stage. Therefore, the First Reading was the only opportunity the Opposition had of showing what was their attitude towards the measures of the Government. This is a new Session, and, without being authorised to say so, I venture to think that, if more Bills are introduced without a prospect of their being brought to the Second Reading, it will be the duty of the Opposition to discuss them on the First Reading. In this case I do not wish to prolong the discussion upon the Bill itself. I only desire to enter this caveat as regards the general principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman. I have no wish to assume an unfriendly attitude on the present occasion.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) said, he wished earnestly to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to allow some considerable and sufficient interval between the First and Second Reading to enable the Local Authorities of London to consider and express their opinions on the Government proposal. Although there was some little discussion on the measure last year, it was understood that, in consequence of the pressure of highly controversial business, there was a great likelihood that the Bill would be dropped after the Second Reading, and therefore it did not receive the consideration it required. The right hon. Gentleman might rely on the co-operation of hon. Members in passing the Bill into law, but he must bear in mind that the practical merit of the measure depended on its details, which were necessarily of a complex nature, and it was therefore desirable that the Local Authorities which had practical knowledge of the subject should have ample opportunity of considering the details before their Representatives were asked to give an opinion on the Second Reading.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, he wished to support the appeal of the hon. Member for Chelsea, for he very much doubted whether the Local Authorities were so well acquainted with the provisions of the Bill as the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think. The hon. Member for Islington had asked some very pertinent questions, and he regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not thought fit to give any answer, which he might have done in less time than he had occupied in stating his reasons for giving none. He would like to remind the Leader of the House, too, that there was a great deal of difference between Government Bills and private Members' Bills. Progress with the latter could practically be stopped by any Member or section of Members. Opportunities for rejecting private Members' Bills were, in his opinion, ample; but Government Bills stood in a more favourable position, and he therefore thought it was desirable to have a discussion on the First Reading. It was impossible for Members to be always present in their seats, and, therefore, if there was a discussion and a vote taken immediately, a great many Members would have to give their votes without having heard that discussion. They were told that most of the districts in the Metropolis were favourable to the Bill, which was not surprising considering that its effect would be to reduce the rates in most parishes and to increase them in a few. But then they had to consider the question whether it was fair to a district which, by economy and prudent management, had kept down its rates that it should not be allowed to continue to derive the advantages following from that management. If they had two districts, one of which had managed its affairs with economy and care, and another district which had not been so fortunate before they made a prudent district contribute to the other, they ought to have clear and conclusive reasons. In the present case no such reasons had been given. There might be considerable safeguards in the Bill, but they had not been indicated; and it was quite clear that unless there were some safeguards the result might be that, although there might be at first a diminution in the rates throughout the greater part of the Metropolis, the sense of responsibility and the feeling for the necessity of economy would be weakened and the rates eventually be generally increased. He did not see why they should stop at the Metropolis in this matter. Why not allow the proposal to be carried out in other districts? In too many cases they legislated for the Metropolis in a hurry and on the spur of the moment. Last Session, with no notice to London, with no opportunity for the Local Authorities to consider what was being done, this House introduced clauses into a Bill which not only entirely altered the management of the Metropolis generally, but placed it upon a different footing from that which prevailed in other large cities. He joined in expressing regret that Her Majesty's Government had not thought fit, on the introduction of the Bill, to give them some statement as to the character of the measure.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, he would express a hope that this period of consideration would not be too long. This was the same Bill as the Bill of last Session, and he remembered that there was a large amount of literature which reached him from the Local Authorities bearing upon it in the shape both of Petitions against it and of recommendations in its favour. As far as Islington was concerned—[Mr. BARTLEY : South Islington.] No;—Islington; he spoke for the whole parish, for the Vestry had itself passed a resolution and sent him a Petition in favour of the Bill—he believed they were generally in favour of the Bill, and that it would help them to do what they had been doing steadily ever since the London Health Act was passed for the benefit of its own district and the general health of the community, and it was desired that the measure should receive early consideration. Having regard to the fact that the Session was of doubtful duration and that the Bill was introduced last Session and was lost, and inasmuch as he was prepared to support it on behalf of his constituency, he hoped the interval would not be too long.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, he did not want to go into the particular merits of this Bill, which, apparently, there was no very great desire to subject to exhaustive discussion at this stage; but he must make a few remarks with reference to what had fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the general principle of the House reserving to itself the right to discuss measures on the motion for their introduction. He must remind the House that formerly there were five stages in which a Public Bill was subjected to discussion in the House as to its principles—the introduction, Second Reading, the Motion for the Speaker to leave the Chair, the Motion that the Bill, as amended, be considered, and that the Bill be read a third time. While those five opportunities remained it was usual to waive the first of them, and, generally speaking, in dealing with Bills of a not very contentious character, it was usual to leave the remaining four stages for the discussion of their principles. But now that the opportunity had been removed from Members of discussing the principle of a Bill except upon the Second and Third Reading, he thought the House had been very wise in reserving to itself the right which, he hoped, it was distinctly understood they did reserve—to discuss Bills upon the Motion for their introduction.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Walter Foster, and Mr. Sydney Buxton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 124.]

CONCILIATION BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): I ask leave, Sir, to introduce a Bill to make better provision for the settlement of labour disputes. I think it may be regarded almost as a non-contentious measure by all sections of the House. [Mr. J. LOWTHER: What is it about?] My right hon. Friend says he does not know what it is. If he will allow me I will supplement what I have to say by a few preliminary remarks. This Bill, in substance, was before the House last Session, but I shall be very happy to state to the House shortly the provisions of the measure, and when I have done that I hope we shall allow the Bill to proceed as rapidly as we possibly can with a view to its speedily becoming law. The Bill of last year gave no powers of initiative to the Board of Trade, but the present Bill does, and to that extent it differs from the previous Bill. It states that—

“Where a difference exists or is apprehended between an employer or any class of employers, or between different classes of workmen, the Board of Trade may, if they think fit, exercise all or any of the following powers:—First, to inquire into and report the cause of the difference.”

Then, it may go further: it may invite the parties to meet, together by themselves, or through their representatives, under the presidency of a chairman mutually agreed upon or nominated by the Board of Trade, with a view to an amicable settlement of the difference. That is precisely following the lines that were taken with regard to the coal dispute last year. So far, that is an addition to the Bill of last year. The Board of Trade may also take the initiative, and where there seems to be a deadlock may intervene and endeavour to bring the parties together and constitute a Board with a view to an amicable settlement. The next clause is simply to take power to appoint a conciliator or Board of Conciliation in the case of any difference. As in the foregoing section, the Board of Trade, on the application of any employer or workmen interested, and after taking into consideration the circumstances, may, if it thinks fit, set up a Board of Conciliation in that district in order to deal with the special dispute. That can only be done, as in the Bill of last year, on application to the Board of Trade either by the employer or employed. There is a sub-section which says—

“If it is agreed or arranged”

—this goes beyond conciliation—

“to refer any such difference to a person appointed by the Board of Trade, or to two or more persons, one of whom is to be appointed by the Board of Trade, the Board of Trade may, if it think fit, make an appointment accordingly;”

that is to say, the Board of Trade may appoint an arbitrator; and it is proposed that it shall keep a list of persons who are willing to act in that capacity. There are many men at this moment in England who for the last 20 years have been doing admirable service as arbitrators or umpires. It is impossible to over-estimate the value of those services. Mr. David Dale, for example, has been engaged in this work for more than a quarter of a century, and has done the noblest service to the industries of the country. So has Dr. Spence Watson, and in the last Report he presented he stated he had just issued his 50th award, and that never in a single instance had any award been disputed, and others I might mention—Sir Rupert Kettle and Members of this House—who have done excellent service in this way, and who, I am sure, will allow their names to be placed on a roll, or a list of honours as men who are willing to give their impartial services for the promotion of conciliation. I see my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) sitting in his place. We all know what he has done in the shoe trade during the last few years, his admirable services, and the success with which he has intervened in disputes in Lancashire, Leicestershire, Staffordshire, Derbyshire, and Nottinghamshire; and how he has prevented again and again the most serious outbreaks of industrial war, so to speak, in that great trade. Clause 3 gives power to aid in the establishment of Boards of Conciliation. In any districts where disputes are frequent, and adequate means do not exist to deal with them, the Board of Trade may appoint a person or persons to inquire into the conditions of the mischief and to confer with the employers and employed, with a view to aiding and assisting the bringing into existence of a Board of Conciliation. Practically, the object of this Bill may be summed up as a Bill to call, as far as possible, Boards of Conciliation into existence, to assist their organisation with such information, and such Rules, Regulations, and methods as have proved successful in the past, and to record and publish their decisions. It is part of their business to do all this to give proof of their usefulness and to enlist intelligent public opinion on their side. The fourth clause simply provides that there shall be a register of Conciliation and Arbitration Boards kept by the Board of Trade. The fifth clause requires that there shall be an annual Report made to Parliament of the work of these institutions. When we consider the vast mischief accruing to the industries of this country from labour disputes, I think we shall all agree that anything that can be done by this House to give sanction, aid, and assistance to institutions of this kind will be of the greatest possible benefit. The number of disputes recorded by the Labour Department during 1893 was 638, involving more than 600,000 persons. Of these, 525 ended during the year, of which the result is known, and the workmen were successful in 229 cases, involving 400,000 persons; they were partly successful in 110 cases, involving 140,000 persons; and they were wholly unsuccessful in 186 cases, involving about 70,000 persons. It is impossible to consider the mischief that was caused to the industries of this country by the coal dispute of last year without our doing whatever lies in our power to minimise such evils. The mischiefs which accrued from that dispute did not terminate when the dispute was ended. We know that our supremacy in industries is no longer in dispute. We have fierce foreign competition. We cannot afford these industrial wars. The effect of them is that our competitors find new customers, and trade once diverted into a new channel does not easily revert to the old one. At least we lose some of it, and our people in consequence suffer miseries, starvation, and a load of debt, which are always the consequence of long-continued strikes. My right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock) has a Bill before the House on behalf of the Chambers of Commerce, and I know he desires larger compulsory powers, to take evidence on oath, and to compel the production of books, &c. When we come to the Second Reading I hope we shall have an opportunity of discussing the desirability of extending the Bill, or otherwise; but I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman's object is the same as that of the Government—to facilitate, as far as possible, the introduction of pacific measures rather than industrial war, and to minimise the mischief which at present results from strife between capital and labour.

Mr. Mundella

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Leave be given to bring in a Bill to make better provision for the settlement of Labour Disputes."—(Mr. Mundella.)

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) said, he was very glad the right hon. Gentleman had enlarged the scope of his Bill as compared with what it was when introduced last year, and he should be very glad to co-operate with the right hon. Gentleman in making it as effective as possible. He had had some experience in this matter. He hoped, however, that facilities would be given for discussing the broader question put forward in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Lubbock), because, after all, the Bill of the Government was only a tentative measure. They wanted to go a little further. They wanted to put into motion two Acts of Parliament already on the Statute Book, neither of which, for some reason or other, had ever been applied to labour disputes. But anything that could be done to induce both employers and employed to settle their differences by a system of conciliation—and, if that failed, by arbitration—would certainly receive his support.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) said, he would like to say a few words in answer to what the right hon. Gentleman had said as to the Bill of last year being treated as contentious.

MR. MUNDELLA : I beg pardon ; I made no statement about the Bill of last year being treated as contentious.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) said, the right hon. Gentleman had stated that he hoped this Bill would not be considered contentious.

[MR. MUNDELLA : Hear, hear !] He thought that observation meant that the Bill of last year was treated as contentious. He, for one, pleaded guilty to having used the ordinary Forms of the House to prevent that Bill being taken at an unseemly hour because he and his friends thought it only touched the fringe of a great question, and he thought that this Bill now was of very much the same nature. He himself believed that the same good work that had been done by gentlemen in the past, to whom allusion had been made, could be done in the future without Act of Parliament at all. He complained that the Government, in dealing with this question, had omitted all power of making the decision of the Board of Conciliation binding upon either party. Yet without such a power the Bill would be absolutely useless. The question had been very carefully considered, and had been gone into very fully by the Labour Commission, and it appeared to him that it would be far better for both parties if the Government would wait until the Report of that Commission had been issued before proceeding far with the present Bill.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK said, he regretted as much as the noble Lord who had just spoken that there was no power contained in the Bill which would make the award of the Conciliation Board binding. He fully saw how difficult it would be to carry this out in all cases, but he believed that many disputes would occur in which both sides would be willing to agree to such a provision. He suggested that the Second Reading of the Bill should be taken at an early date. It was essentially a non-contentious measure, and, therefore, no great time need be occupied over it. His other objection to the provisions of the Bill as they now stood was that they did not go far enough. When the proper time came he believed they would be able to satisfy the right hon. Gentleman that there was a strong desire on the part of both employer and employed throughout the country to have stronger powers than those suggested in the Bill. The Bill as now brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman would not effect very much, and, all things considered, he thought it would be desirable to have a Committee appointed on the subject to take a certain amount of evidence. He urged the Government to take the Second Reading of the Bill at an early date and to refer the measure to a Select Committee, in order that the whole question might be thoroughly gone into.

*SIR A. ROLLIT asked whether the President of the Board of Trade would be willing to refer the Bill, backed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Lubbock), himself and others, and promoted by the London Conciliation Board, to the same Committee, so that the suggestions contained in it might have full consideration? He was quite prepared to admit that some of the present proposals were improvements, but he suggested for the consideration of the President of the Board of Trade how the appointment of an arbitrator was to be of practical value unless there was some means of carrying out and enforcing his awards. If the parties agreed that an arbitrator should be appointed, surely it might be assumed that they would not object to his award being made the final determination of the matter. The power to administer an oath to witnesses, in order to secure the truth, and to summons witnesses, were also subjects for the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman suggested by the experience of the London Conciliation Board.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) asked whether it was desirable to deal with this subject by Bill at all? He doubted whether the right hon. Gentleman could show that the Bill enabled him to do anything which he could not do already. He would probably say, as he said last year, that for what he proposed to do he wanted to have some kind of Parliamentary sanction. But in order to get that sanction it was not necessary to subject this grave and important question to the delays and difficulties incident to legislation. A Vote in the Estimates to meet the necessary expenses of conducting the inquiries and making the appointments would have secured all the Parliamentary sanction desired. That course had been adopted in regard to the appointment of Labour Correspondents, and he did not see why it should not have been taken last year in connection with this subject.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mundella, Mr. Secretary Asquith, and Mr. Burt.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 125.]

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CIVIL SERVICE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. W. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's) rose to move—

"That it is desirable to recruit the First Division of the Civil Service by promotion from the Second Division."

In submitting the Motion he said he did not represent a Civil Service constituency, nor was he aware that any such constituency existed, but he and those hon. Members who had promised to support the Motion were actuated only by adherence to the principle of general utility which ought to be the mainspring of political action both inside and outside the House. It was strenuously asserted that the written promises and implied contracts between the Government and the Civil servants had not been fairly carried out, and if any reasonable doubt remained at the present time as to the conditions of engagement and promises, surely the time had come when a clear and definite understanding should be arrived at. This great branch of the Public Service for which he spoke ought not to be conducted on haphazard chances or in irregular proceedings such as undoubtedly had occurred in the promotion and changes since 1870, when the pernicious system of patronage was abolished and open competition introduced instead. A quarter of a century ought to be a sufficient period of time for successive Governments to have made up their minds as to the best plan of governing the Civil Service. He had brought forward this Motion in consequence of attending an enthusiastic meeting in Exeter Hall, and he took up the question entirely on its merits. The fact of such a meeting being held showed that the gentlemen concerned were not afraid to appeal to public opinion; yet, at the same time, he thought that matters of that kind could be carried too far. But public opinion should be the breath of the law; and if the Government sought to evade discussion of the points which would be raised in this Debate, then he submitted they must have a case which would not bear discussion. At the meeting to which he referred the Member for South Islington was in the Chair, about two dozen Members of this House of different Parties were present, and co-operated in ventilating the grievances of the Civil servants, whilst many apologies were received from other Members, and also from Civil servants from all parts, who, while regretting their inability to attend, expressed their sympathy with the objects of the meeting. He should mention that the meeting invited analytical examination of the complaints put forward. In view of such a great demonstration, and the importance of the interests involved, the matter could not be lightly minimised by the Government officials who were concerned. This was a great question concerning the administration of the country; it was a matter of Imperial magnitude, and if ignored might tend to impair the efficiency of the administration in the most important Departments charged with responsibility. The Service should be contented and satisfied to be completely efficient, and this satisfaction could be easily accomplished, as the claims of the Second Division were founded on justice and reason. The first resolution at the meeting protested against the unfair treatment which had been accorded to the Second Division by the permanent authorities, who, notwithstanding the recommendations of the Ridley Commission, and repeated promises of the Treasury both in and out of Parliament, persistently ignored the claims of the Second Division to promotion to the First Division, filling such appointments from without instead of by promotion from within the Service; whilst the second resolution protested against the delay of the Treasury in dealing with the other points referred to in the Memorial of last year. The contention of the Second Division clerks was not for more money, but they asked that the conditions under which they entered the Service should be faithfully observed, and they were able to advance claims to show that the highest posts now given to young untrained men outside ought to be given to the trained officials who were in the Public Service. The House of Commons had been most reluctantly chosen as the tribunal of appeal. Memorials sent through the usual official channels to the Treasury praying for redress had remained unanswered, and, therefore, it had become necessary to appeal to Parliament, as no other channel remained open to the gentlemen of the Second Division, numbering 3,500—and whose numbers would probably be augmented to 5,000 in a few years—and to respectfully submit and urge that the requisition placed in the hands of each candidate for a Second Division clerkship, stating that under certain circumstances he might look for promotion after eight years' service, should be adhered to. They maintained that this condition had not been loyally or justly carried out. In a Treasury Letter of the 19th June, 1884, dealing with the question of the number of Second Division Clerks promoted to the First Division, the Lords of the Treasury stated—

Mr. Stuart-Wortley

"Although the number of Second Division clerks promoted to the First Division must always bear a small proportion to the number not so promoted, it is not necessary that they should be an insignificant proportion to the First Division. On the contrary, my Lords look forward to that Division being largely replenished in certain Departments from the best members of the Second Division. It will probably always be necessary to reserve a power of direct appointment to the First Division; but there are many Departments in which this power need not, so far as my Lords can foresee, be exercised habitually or even frequently. Promotion from the Second to the First Division may therefore fairly be considered as a legitimate aspiration for the superior members of the former."

He contended that that, to a certain extent, proved the case he had laid down. Again, it could not be asserted that there was an insufficient number of eligible second-class men to furnish the necessary recruits for the First Division. The Ridley Commission reported very highly of their ability, and one member of that Commission, the hon. Member for Preston, declared that they were of as good stuff as any of the First Division, whilst the examiners and heads of Departments bore eloquent testimony to their ability. On the 6th of February of last year the Secretary for War, in reply to a question, admitted that in his Office he had men fit for promotion, but said that a compact between the Treasury and the War Office prevented this promotion. He would like to know if there was any reason to believe there was a similar compact in force throughout the Civil Service where the heads of the Departments had made recommendations for promotion which, as a result of unwritten negotiations, had been for some time withdrawn? The Secretary to the Treasury would probably reply that a large number of promotions had been made from the Second Division. A Return was rendered in February last which showed that some 109 promotions were made to the First Division, and to the intermediate division between that and the Second Division. But was it fair to term them the First Division promotions when a large number were really not to the First Division? He would like the right hon. Gentleman to say what promotions had been given to the Second Division in the Treasury itself, in the War, the Colonial, Home, Foreign, Education, Charity Commissioners, and Post Office Departments. He would also like to know the number of direct appointments from the outside to the First Division since the Report of the Ridley Commission. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman stated on the 18th December last that, while there had been only three promotions from the Second Division to the First Division since the date of the Ridley Commission Report, 19 had been appointed from outside. He was informed that that was not the entire truth, but that 56, and not 19, such direct appointments had been made. Nineteen of these had been admitted into Class I. under examination, leaving 37 which had not been accounted for. The Second Division clerks contended that every class of superior clerkship was regarded by them as their natural inheritance, and they further submitted that every young untrained man who entered by such means as those to which he had reverted filled up a place which ought to be occupied by themselves, who had been trained in the business of their own Departments. The Ridley Commission declared that it was unnecessary to bring in young men into Class I., and in their Second Report they stated—

“We think the doors of promotion to all the upper posts should be open to any clerk who shows that he possesses the necessary qualifications for discharging the duties of the position.”

That was a recommendation which, coming from such a quarter, was deserving of serious consideration. The Commissioners further stated that the prizes of the Service should be open to exceptional fitness, and they advised that some definite and clear scheme of promotion should be formulated. Probably, at some times it might be possible that a gentleman could not be found in one particular office to suit the appointment vacant, but surely out of 3,500 gentlemen an efficient and capable officer could be found without bringing in outsiders. In the various ranks of the Second Division there were men fit to occupy the highest positions in the Service, whilst most of the eminent men who now filled with the utmost ability the various responsible positions under the Crown were those who had climbed from the lowest to the highest rung of the ladder. This was not a Party question, but a question of the efficiency of the Public Service of this great Empire, which was deserving of the most careful consideration. He hoped he should receive a sympathetic as well as a definite and clear statement of what would be done with regard to these promotions in the future, or otherwise he should be compelled to press the matter to a Division.

Mr. W. Field

*CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.) seconded the Motion from the firm conviction that it was undesirable in the interest of the country that a large body of public servants, numbering some 3,500, and who would probably eventually number 5,000, should continue to perform their duties while feeling upon the one hand aggrieved, and upon the other hand filled with chronic discontent. It might be asked whether he, having for a number of years served where great weight was attached to discipline, thought it desirable in the interests of the public that certain bodies in the Public Service should combine for the purpose of bringing their grievances to the House. As a broad rule he did not; but when he found that a body of public servants had their Memorials unceremoniously consigned to the waste-paper basket without the common courtesy of a reply; when he found they had been refused permission to approach the heads of Departments by means of deputations, and had had recourse to the columns of the public Press, and that none of these courses had procured the smallest redress, then he was prepared to exonerate them completely from any desire to overthrow discipline when they came to this House as the final Court of Appeal. What was the demand of the Second Division clerks? It was not demand for higher salaries or shorter hours, but a demand for fair play. It was a demand that the conditions under which they entered the Public Service should be neither minimised nor misconstrued, but loyally adhered to, and they further demanded that the recommendations contained in the Report of the Ridley Commission should be faithfully carried out. It was acknowledged that when each candidate for a clerkship in the Second Division presented himself for examination a paper was passed into his hands which left the impression upon his mind—and which it was supposed was the impression the Government intended to convey—that if to continue industry and uprightness of character added a certain amount of ability superior to that of the other clerks he might reasonably hope at the expiration of eight years to be promoted to the First Division. How had successive Admintrations dealt with the Second Division clerks, who had been led to believe that the First Division should be largely replenished from the Second? It was said that 107 appointments had been made from the Second Division to the First, or to posts higher than the Second, but when investigated they were found to be promotions only in name. It was admitted, in reply to a question in this House, that only three promotions had been made from the Second Class to the First, whereas 19 promotions had been made from the outside, and this was not the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. As a matter of fact, 56 promotions were made from the outside by means of first-class examinations and other methods, and the Second Class clerks considered themselves aggrieved in this matter, because they looked upon all promotions which were made from the outside—that was, when inexperienced, untried, and untrained men were brought into the Service over their heads—as an infringement of their legitimate rights. The right hon. Gentleman would perhaps tell them what promotions had been made in all the great Public Offices since the recommendations of the Ridley Commission. No answer could be made that the Second Division did not produce a sufficient number of men suited for promotion, because, as the Member for Dublin had pointed out, the Secretary for War had admitted that in his Department there were men suitable for promotion, but that he was unable to carry out the contract owing to an arrangement which had been agreed upon between the Treasury and the War Office. To him, as a Radical, there would seem to be something of a social question at the bottom of this, and as if it was a case of birth and not worth, or rather of money, for, after all, to a great extent, a University education and high educational examinations meant a case of money and not brains. The fact that many of the men who came up for the examinations of the First Class Division were University graduates had been dwelt upon, but as a matter of fact there were many University graduates among the Second Division clerks, and graduates, too, of a University whose curriculum for the degree was higher than any other—namely, the University of London. The question of competitive examinations had been spoken of. Familiar as he was with University and many other forms of examination he should not attempt to belittle examinations. Competitive examinations were excellent tests as compared with favouritism and similar methods. They were the best test known for untried, untrained, and inexperienced men, but were a very poor test as compared with the test of a man having performed satisfactorily for many years the very duties which these candidates were about to learn. It was asked why did not the Second Division clerks present themselves for examination? Many of them for the very cogent reason that they were already beyond the age limit. Was it fair to expect that a public servant, after toiling for years at seven hours each day, could enter a competitive examination on anything like equal terms with a young man fresh from a University, and having every hour of the day practically at his own disposal? It was demanding a double test from the Second Division clerks. It was as if the Military Authorities were to tell a man who had entered the ranks, and by long service, good conduct, and practical experience in the various duties of the profession, had worked his way up through the non-commissioned grades, and had arrived at the point to be promoted to a commission, that he should compete in the complicated and difficult examination demanded of candidates from Sandhurst. It was unfair to ask the Second Division clerks to perform their duties on the one hand, and to prepare for the examination on the other. He regretted to say that there was a tendency recently to take the Second Division men off the first-class work and put them on the lower work, and when their turn came for promotion to tell them they were not fit to perform the work which they had been performing when First Division clerks were absent. That was scarcely straightforward treatment; indeed, he might say it was a subterfuge. Again, it was not an uncommon thing for the heads of the Departments when they found an aspiring, zealous, and superior young man to recommend him for promotion. But the heads of the Departments knew that in doing that they were taking part in a screaming farce, because the recommendation was not worth the paper it was written on, for, as the Secretary for War had said, there were many men in the Department fit for promotion, but he was not able to promote them owing to the fact that an arrangement existed between the Treasury and the War Office.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) was understood to say that the Treasury had made concessions to the Second Division clerks in the matter of promotion.

*CAPTAIN NORTON said, that what the right hon. Gentleman had said was true, and yet was not true. The Second Division clerks had been given to understand that they would be promoted to the First Division, and then the First Division was largely reduced without any adequate compensation been given to the Second Class clerks. All the Second Class clerks had had from the Treasury was their sympathy. That sympathy was a very valuable thing, no doubt, but the Second Class clerks would appreciate it more if it showed itself in providing a certain number of promotions. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) once said that the Ridley Commission recommended that the gulf which divided the First Division from the Second Division should be bridged over. But ever since the Ridley Commission the Government had been doing everything to widen the gulf. They heard a great deal about legitimate aspirations. It was said that every Second Division clerk on entering the Service carried in his knapsack the proverbial Marshal's baton; but when he placed his foot on the first rung of the ladder of promotion new, raw recruits, who enlisted under different conditions, jostled him out of his place. The Government should understand in this matter that honesty was the best policy. Some time ago it was the custom to capture recruits for the Military Service by representing that they would be paid 1s. per day, but the recruits soon found out there were so many arbitrary deductions from the 1s. that they did not get half the sum. The result was a falling-off in recruits. But, latterly, the authorities had modified their system of deception with very good results. Surely, the Government must know that they could no more succeed in deceiving the Civil servant than the soldier. He would call upon the Government to act up to their pledges, and discontinue the present system which was crushing all hope out of the hearts of the Second Division clerks, by bringing in over their heads those untried and untrained men. There were two courses open to the Government. They could either revert to the original system under which all started at scratch and even weights, instead of some, as now, being handicapped to such a degree that they were practically weighted off the course of promotion. The old system had given the best officials the country could desire. Under it, the heads of Departments entered the Service by one single channel, and worked their way up from the bottom to the top. But if the Government did not revert to the old system, they could settle the matter by giving the Second Division clerks a certain proportion of the promotions—say one-half; and undertaking that, in the event of it being considered necessary to further reduce the First Division, adequate compensation would be given to the Second Division clerks for having their chances of promotion damaged. Until some such course was followed by the Government great discontent would continue in the Service; and it was on account of that firm conviction that he called upon the Government, in the interests of justice, efficiency, and economy, to deal fairly and honestly with the Second Division clerks.

Mr. W. Field

Amendment proposed, to leave from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words,

"It is desirable to recruit the First Division of the Civil Service by promotion from the Second Division,"—(Mr. Field.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) In rising to reply to the observations made by the Mover and Seconder of the Resolution, I do not wish to find fault with them in any way for the mode in which they have brought forward the question, because I admit readily that the Second Division clerks have long what they consider to be a grievance.

We heard of it in this House last year. We know that they have given utterance to it at meetings in Exeter Hall, and they have brought it before many Members of Parliament. I will not say that they had no right to attempt to influence Members in their favour, but I think it very doubtful whether their attempts should have been as vigorous as they have been. I do not refer to the Second Division clerks only, but also to other persons who are in the employment of the Government and who use their influence on Members of Parliament with the object of getting their demands brought before the House of Commons when they might have their cases treated in another and more satisfactory way. I will say at once that the Treasury have attempted to act, in connection with the Second Division clerks and the question of their promotion, in a straightforward and honest manner. From the first the Department have thought it their duty to follow strictly the recommendations of the Playfair and Ridley Commissions, and I think I shall be able to show that the grievances said to exist are not such as has been alleged by the two hon. Members. The Playfair Commission recommended that there should be two Divisions—the Higher Division and the Lower Division. I will read an extract from their Report—

"The amount of simple routine work in the bulk of Public Offices is very great in proportion to the amount of work of a higher class. The mechanical and monotonous labour on which clerks must, under such circumstances, be so long and continuously employed, in offices where no division or an inadequate division of labour exists, does not by any means, as a matter of course, fit them for discharging the duties of those higher posts in the Service which involve responsibility, discretion, and power to direct work, and to deal with the outside public in such a manner as to uphold the credit and efficiency of their Department."

To carry out this division of work it was necessary that there should be—

"two separate and distinct schemes of examination for admission to the Public Service, and two separate and distinct grades of clerks."

Then I come to the question of promotion. From what has fallen from the Recorder of the Resolution it would be thought that the Second Division clerks had a perfect claim to promotion into the Higher Division. That is not so at all. The Ridley Commission recommended that clerks might be promoted from the Second Division to the higher, but that such promotions should be exceptional and not the rule. This Motion would be contrary to that recommendation. It would make promotion the rule, and not the exception. The Playfair Commission had laid stress upon the necessity of strict division of labour between the higher and lower ranks in the passage which I have already quoted. The Ridley Commission, in like manner, considered that the routine work of the Second Division was not work that fitted every man in that Second Division for undertaking the duties of a First Division clerk, and they expressed the following emphatic opinion:—

"We have no doubt that it will always be necessary to introduce a very limited number of men by means of a higher examination, to fill directly some of the more important posts of the Public Service. We think it an object of the most serious importance that men of the same standard of liberal education as those who now adopt the open professions should be attracted into the Public Service and trained there, for selection for the highest permanent posts."

*SIR A. ROLLIT: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the words he has read do not mean, not that every Second Division clerk is unfit for the First Division, as he has wrongly implied, but that there are certain high and responsible positions, in which orders and directions are given, which might be otherwise filled?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I did not say that there were not clerks in the Second Division fit for the higher work.

SIR A. ROLLIT: I am speaking of your interpretation of the words you quoted.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I wish now to draw attention to the difference in the competitive examinations for entry into the two divisions of clerks. The competition for the Second Division consists of ten subjects—handwriting, orthography, arithmetic, copying MS. (to test accuracy), English composition, geography, indexing or docketing, digesting returns into summaries, English history, and book-keeping. The examination for entry into the First Division is very much wider. It consists of 13 heads of subjects—English composition (including précis-writing), History of England (including that of the Laws and Constitution), English language and literature, Greek, Latin, French, German, Italian languages, literature, and history, Mathematics (pure and mixed), Natural Sciences, Moral Sciences—that is, logic, mental and moral philosophy, Jurisprudence, and Political Economy. That shows a difference in the examinations for the two classes. No doubt many men who enter the Second Division are competent to undertake the work of an Upper Division clerkship. Many of them are University men, and many are members of the London University, where the standard is very high; but I must draw attention to the fact that there is nothing to prevent Second Division clerks from going in for the examination for Class I. Not only can they go in, but they have five extra years in which to do it. While a candidate from outside is obliged to compete between the ages of 22 and 24, a Second Division clerk can compete up to the age of 29. That is a very great advantage. This Resolution may be read in the sense either that all appointments to the First Division must take place from the Second Division, or only that such promotions should take place as are possible. It is not very clear. In the limited form the Government could accept it at once, but it cannot be accepted in the wider sense. If it were to stand in its larger form it would injure a very large section of Her Majesty's subjects. Now, everybody in the United Kingdom can compete in the examination for Class I., whereas if all appointments were to be made from the Second Division, everybody would be shut out except those who happen to be in that Division. I think some notice ought to be taken of that point. Then comes the recommendation of the Playfair Commission with reference to promotion from the Lower Division to the Higher. They say—“Promotion from the Lower to the Higher Division of the Service should be a matter of rare occurrence. This is necessary if there is to be any educational test for the Higher Division; and it is reasonable, not only because the original qualifications are lower, but also because the character of the work in the inferior grades will be rarely calculated to develop superior capacities. Such a promotion should not take place without a certificate from the Civil Service Commissioners granted upon a special recommendation of the head of the Department, and with the assent of the Treasury, and should be published in The Gazette.

The Ridley Commission also reported—

Sir J. T. Hibbert

“We are of opinion that it is desirable to secure young men of more liberal education for those posts in the Service which are not simply clerical, but demand a wider and more cultivated view of public affairs than can, as a rule, be expected from youths entering by the lower examination. We agree with the Playfair Commission that the best preparation for the Upper Division is not to be found in the purely clerical routine of the ordinary clerkship, though there may be exceptions. We are of opinion that, on the whole, open competition is the best method of selection.”

I do not for a moment wish to cast any reflection upon the Second Division clerks. I have no doubt that numbers of them are quite capable of competing in Class I., and of taking high places in it; but I wish to be allowed to say that the Ridley Commission recommended that promotions from the Second Division should be the exception. I think I am perfectly justified in saying that. It is said that the War Office have gentlemen who are fitted for promotion, but who cannot be promoted because some arrangement has been made between the Treasury and the War Office. Arrangements were made by the Treasury, not only with the War Office, but with other public Departments, to carry out the recommendations of the Ridley Commission to the effect that it was necessary to reduce the numbers of the Upper Division, and it is owing to this necessary reduction in the Upper Division that these promotions cannot take place. An advantage has been secured by this reduction of the Upper Division, which is that it has enabled a larger scale of salaries to be paid. Therefore, certain advantages do accrue from the reduction. Now I come for a moment to the question of the number of promotions that have been made—and here I think there has been a certain amount of misrepresentation. The number 56 has, I think, been mentioned by more than one speaker, but I have not been able to discover that there is any ground for it. I have never said anything of the kind, and I cannot find in the Treasury anything which bears it out. During the time which has elapsed since the issue of the Second Report of the Ridley Commission to the present date the total number of appointments from the Second Division to the First Division and to staff places together has been 132. There have been 12 appointments from the Second Division to the First, and these are appointments ordinarily filled by Class I. competitions. And during the same period, how many appointments does the House suppose have been made under open competition? Why, only 20. That, therefore, shows a large number of appointments from the Second Division—a larger proportion than even the Ridley Commission would have led the Second Division clerks to expect. In addition to these 12 promotions there have been 46 others which formerly, though not now, were classed as Class I. appointments. The 132 appointments have been divided between the Departments as follows:—The Admiralty 23, the Board of Agriculture 2, the Board of Trade 3, the Bankruptcy Department 6, the Patent Office 2, the Office of the Chief Secretary (Ireland) 4, Customs 2, Scotch Fishery Board 1, Inland Revenue Department 58, Irish Land Commission 2, Local Government Board (England) 5, Local Government Board (Ireland) 1, Paymaster General's Office 1, Public Works Office (Ireland) 8, Post Office 1, Science and Art Department 2, Secretary for Scotland's Office 1, Treasury 1, the Valuation Office (Dublin) 7, War Office 1, Woods and Forests 1. That is a total of 132. In connection with these promotions, I think I ought to state to the House that up to the present time, from the commencement of this new system, the Treasury have never hesitated to sanction recommendations made for promotion from any Department, and, therefore, whatever my hon. Friends wish to say as to the action of the Treasury they cannot say that we have not assented to the promotions proposed by the Departments. It does not rest with the Treasury to suggest these promotions, but with the different Departments. The Treasury have no authority to make recommendations, but they have to consider the proposals when they come before them. If any Public Department has a vacancy which it thinks can be adequately filled by an able man from the Second Division, if it makes a representation I can assure the House that that recommendation will be favourably considered by the Treasury in the future as it has been in the past. With respect to the general question, I can only say that I have been rather twitted with having expressed sympathy with the Second Division clerks. I would assert, however, that I have a real sympathy for them. I know them to be aspiring, and hoping to rise to positions in the First Division. I sympathise with them in that aspiration. I can only say that the matter will always be dealt with sympathetically by the Treasury. I have no doubt it will be dealt with sympathetically by the Departments; but I do hope that if my hon. Friend thinks it proper and necessary to carry his Motion to a Division the House will consider seriously before it passes such a Resolution. The Civil Service of this country is a very important body—one of the most important bodies in the country—and bears favourable comparison with similar bodies in any other country. I should be sorry if the House should think proper to pass a Resolution which would tie the hands of the Treasury or of the Government with respect to these appointments. On those grounds whilst, as I say, I sympathise in the strongest way with the aspirations of these gentlemen I do not think that they have made out their case against the Government. I consider that the Report of the Ridley Commission has been carried out honestly and fairly in their interest as well as in that of the State, and I see no reason why, as time goes on, there should not be an increased number of promotions made from the ranks of the Second Division as vacancies occur.

*MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): I cannot but feel that I have a certain responsibility in this matter as having preceded the right hon. Gentleman opposite at the Treasury, and having been in Office when the Ridley Commission issued its Second Report. The House will feel that I am only doing my duty in stating my view with regard to the matter before the House. It would be wrong for anyone who has held the Office that I have held, and who has had the same long experience of the Civil Service, to refrain, from whatever motive, from giving his opinion frankly to the House. With regard to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman opposite in his last words: he spoke of the high character of our Civil Service. I believe there is no country which has a Civil Service so good as this country. It has served us in excellent stead, and whatever changes there may have been in the currents of public opinion the British Civil Service has always maintained its high and intelligent position, and has never gone back in public estimation. We are far from the days when it was considered that clerks in the Civil Service played from 10 till 4. They work hard, and their work is highly appreciated, both by their employers—the public—and those who are immediately placed over them. I would make an earnest appeal to the House not to tamper in any way with the general principles of our Civil Service, of which one of the chief is that new recruits are to be taken from all classes of society. The large majority are taken from those—to whatever class they may belong—who are able to pass a certain high examination. I regret when I heard an hon. Member opposite speak about “birth.” Birth has absolutely nothing whatever to do with the matter. The question is whether it is desirable that a certain number of men should still be admitted to the Civil Service who are able to pass that extremely difficult examination. Hon. Members may say, “What is the use of requiring Civil servants to be acquainted with those branches of study in which they are examined; is not the experience gained in the Second Division sufficient?” Well, I say as a taxpayer and a Member of Parliament who has taken a great interest in this matter for many years that the examination for the higher positions in the Civil Service should be such as to enable the country to secure the pick of the best men in the country so that we should not be obliged, as a rule, to resort to the Second Division. There is nothing anti-democratic in that—nothing that can jar on the sensibilities of the most advanced Radical. We ought to be able to secure the most intellectual portion of the public for the public Civil Service, as it is secured in other branches of life. I would remind the House how we have arrived at this general position, and why there is this discontent to a certain extent, which I deplore, and which I hope will be removed as time goes on by the promotions which will take place and to which the Government have pledged themselves. At the same time, let me say this—that it is one of the mischiefs of Motions like the present that they tend to tempt Ministers to just a little more and to hold out a few more hopes than they afterwards are able to fulfil, and in this way expectations are raised, the failure to fulfil which brought forward subsequently as a breach of faith—and we know on what slight foundation these charges are made. When any other Minister speaks, I urge him—and I do this quite as much on behalf of Civil servants as against them—to let the House know as clearly as possible what the Government intend to do, and do not let them hold out vague hopes of departing from what has been recommended by the Playfair and Ridley Commission. There were phrases in the Report of the Ridley Commission which might be interpreted in different ways. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of accepting the Motion if it were slightly modified.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I do not think I went as far as that.

MR. GOSCHEN: I think he did. Well, I should deprecate any such course. Let there be a clear understanding on this matter. I believe the general principle to be this—that a certain number of the Second Division are to be promoted, not, however, as the rule but as the exception, and that exception is to be based on the recommendation of the heads of Departments. I am glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that the Treasury have not interfered but have sanctioned all the recommendations made to them. Now, how did they arrive at that position? The Report of every Commission has been founded on a desire for a reform in the Civil Service. The country desires economy, and, although by the abolition of a certain number of places a certain immediate economy is effected, discontent is raised in the ranks of the Civil servants, and there are heard, as the House has had experience to-day, suggestions of compensation for loss of prospects. I can understand that there should be compensation for loss of prospects, but it is a very elastic principle to introduce. There are hon. Members who hold the view that the State is almost prohibited from diminishing the number of appointments, all of which are not necessary for the Public Service, because of the fear of disappointing the expectations of those who have joined the Civil Service. If there are a certain number of higher posts and a certain number of lower, I can quite conceive that those in the lower will consider it a grievance if the number of higher posts are reduced. The country should know its own mind; it ought not first to abolish posts upon grounds of economy and then compensate discontented public servants for that abolition. I have thought it right to mention this to the House. I do not think I have exceeded my duty in doing so. In the alterations made in the reforms in the Customs there was discontent engendered. It slumbered for a time, but the nation had to repay in the end a portion of the amount saved by the posts that were abolished. The upshot of this part of my remarks is this—that I would urge the House not to interfere too much with the Executive Government in the management of the Civil Service. It is often urged that the Government should conduct its business on the same footing as a private firm; but how, I would ask, could a private firm conduct its business if its employés were able to appeal to the outside public in regard to questions of promotion and salary? It would be impossible. The Government find their friends ever ready to support them on political questions, but their friends sometimes find it difficult to give that support in regard to executive functions. I strongly sympathise with the Civil Service; but, impressed as I am with its excellence and industry, I consider it to be my duty in cases like this to support the Executive Government, and to allow no feeling of Party and no political differences to prevent my speaking out on a question like that involved in the present Motion, which really affects the whole Executive Government. I should look upon it as a disaster if this Motion were carried. It would be, indeed, difficult for the Executive Government to carry on the daily work of the nation if the House of Commons interfered too frequently between the employer and the employé, and, therefore, on behalf not only of the Government, but of the taxpayer, I make an earnest appeal that the Motion should not be carried.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: I hope that the important speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite will have all the weight which it ought to have with the House, for there is no one who has had fuller experience or is better able to judge of facts of this kind than the right hon. Gentleman. I rise thus early in the Debate in order to save the time of the House by expressing clearly the view of the Government now responsible in this matter. Of course, one of the first objects of any Government is to give satisfaction and contentment to every branch of the Civil Service, whether it is the highest or the lowest. I hope nobody will controvert that obvious fact. The principles on which these different classes of Civil servants are established were set forth in the language of the Reports of the two Commissions to which reference has been made. One paragraph, to which I would specially call attention, is in these words—

“We have no doubt that it will always be necessary to introduce a very limited number of men, by means of the higher examination, to fill directly some of the more important posts in the Public Service.”

Anybody who has occupied a responsible position in the Executive Government must know that the administration depends on keeping the more important posts in the hands of men of the very highest ability and education, and to depart from that would be to break down the just pride of this country in the efficiency of its Civil Service. The principle upon which Class I. is founded, and which was laid down by the Playfair Commission—a Commission composed, by the way, of men in non-official positions—is that it should be open to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, irrespective of birth or social position. In this way we get the pick of the nation. The Second Division is chosen from a different class—not socially, but as regards the educational test. They are men who represent, only in a much better form, those who in the old days were called “supernumeraries,” though the latter were no doubt introduced without examination. The view taken of Class II. by the Ridley Commission is that they are required on account of the amount of simple routine work being very great in proportion to the work of the higher class. The work falling to members of Class II. is not, as a rule, of a kind that fits them for the highest posts. If the House considers this matter it will see that from the manner in which these appointments are made, the men of the Second Division are not primâ facie of the order best fitted for the First Division. They can, of course, take part in the competitive examinations for the First Division if they are fit for it. The whole object of the scheme proposed by the Commission was that there should be two separate and distinct grades of clerks, the positions in which were to be competed for in two separate and distinct examinations. It has been remarked in the course of the Debate that in all trades and professions promotion is from the ranks, but it could scarcely be contended that a gasfitter is necessarily qualified for the post of chief engineer. The recommendation of the Ridley Commission as to promotions from the Second to the First Division has been closely observed. I may say, on behalf of the Treasury and the Government, that whenever the head of a Department has reported, as has occurred from time to time, that certain members of the Second Division have shown exceptional capacity and such qualifications as would fit them for the First Division, they have always received such appointments. That, I believe, will satisfy, as it ought to satisfy, the House. The hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Field) says he has received a large number of communications upon the subject, and I regret to hear it, because a question of this kind ought not to be made a matter for a personal canvass. The right hon. Gentleman opposite and myself, acting under a full sense of official responsibility, believe that the principles laid down in the recommendations of the Commissions are perfectly sound, and that if the House of Commons were hastily to endeavour to set those principles aside they would do infinite mischief, and would strike a fatal blow at the organisation of the Civil Service. Let the House consider for a moment what has been done in this matter. Complaint has been made that promotion is slow in the Civil Service. Promotion has undoubtedly been slow, but that has been caused by the necessities of the case, the great object having been to have a few men at good salaries for first-class work, and a number of men at sufficient salaries for inferior work. Steps have been taken for the purpose of accelerating promotion, including the creation of a number of staff appointments, so that the reasonable expectations of the clerks in the

Sir W. Harcourt

Second Division have been fully met. As my right hon. Friend has pointed out there have been, since 1888, 12 promotions from the Second to the First Division whilst the number appointed to the First Division from outside has been 20. That, I submit, shows a fair proportion of promotions from the Second to the First Division and is an adequate fulfilment of the policy recommended by the last Commission. I have taken great interest in this matter. I have watched the promotions from the Second into the First Divisions, and what happens is this though the work in the Second Division is not of the highest order the heads of Departments are enabled to pick out men of high natural ability who, by their sedulous devotion to the Public Service show themselves capable of discharging the duties of the First Division. Many of that character become known in the office. Not long ago the President of the Local Government Board recommended a man from his Department, and the promotion was immediately assented to. Whenever a fit person is recommended for promotion in this way the Treasury has never refused, and will never refuse, to make the appointment. I cannot believe that there can be anybody in this House who will say that a man is to go into the First Division who had not been a Second Division Clerk. Nobody, I think, can maintain such a proposition as that, for it would necessarily lower the whole character of the First Division. Instead of opening the competitive examination to the whole country you would confine it to persons who have been deliberately admitted to the Civil Service upon a lower scale of examination. Anything that would be more destructive of the Public Service of this country it would be impossible to conceive. What the Second Division have a right to ask is that those amongst them who in the work of their Departments have shown themselves capable men, and men on a level with the men of the First Division, should be admitted to the First Division. That is a view that the Government accept. If there have not been more promotions it has been because there have been so few vacancies. I think I am right in saying that during the time the late Mr. W. H. Smith was First Lord of the Treasury by his directions no appointments were made from outside at all. This was necessarily so, in order to carry out the recommendation of the Commission that all vacancies in the First Division should be filled up by transfer. I have endeavoured to state the view of the Government on this subject. We stand upon the Report of the Ridley Commission and the Playfair Commission, both most capable bodies, and we would advise the House to do the same. If, as representing the Treasury in this matter, I might add anything to what has been said by my right hon. Friend (Sir J. T. Hibbert), I would ask the House not to wreck that which is perhaps more than anything else essential to the good administration of the country—namely, the organisation of the Civil Service, and at the same time not to let it be believed that there is any wish whatever that the clerks of the Second Division should be treated with any unfairness. We desire to give what was called in revolutionary France a career open to talent in every form. We appeal to every class in the country to compete for situations in the First Division, while as to the clerks in the Second Division who were appointed on a lower examination, we say that if they prove their capabilities for occupying the highest positions they will have the good will and the cordial good wishes of the Executive Government. I hope that, with these assurances, my hon. Friend will be satisfied, and that he will not press his Motion to a Division.

MR. W. FIELD said, that after the speeches of the two right hon. Gentlemen, he did not deem it wise to trouble the House any further in the matter, but he trusted that the Secretary to the Treasury and the Leader of the House would take to heart the arguments he had laid before them and that the claims of the Second Division clerks would in the future receive every consideration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question again proposed, "That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LAW OFFICERS (PRIVATE PRACTICE).

RESOLUTION.

MR. HANBURY (Preston), who had given notice of his intention to call attention to the Treasury Minute of December 1892, regulating the official fees and the private practice of the Attorney and Solicitor General; and to move—

"That this House regrets that the public remuneration of the Law Officers having been increased in consideration of the arrangement as to private practice therein specified, that arrangement has been widely departed from,"

said, his Motion was not aimed in any way against the Law Officers of the Crown. Had he been in the position of the Attorney General, and had he had a Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal with who would have allowed him to draw larger fees than were ever drawn before by a Law Officer, he should have done exactly the same as the present Attorney General (Sir C. Russell) had done. If he brought any charge at all it was against the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt) for not having acted upon his own Treasury Minute. That Treasury Minute certainly led laymen to suppose that the private practice of the Attorney General and Solicitor General would be very largely reduced, and in fact that they would have no private practice whatever except upon retainers given to them before they took Office and practice in two specified Courts. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was the guardian of the Public Purse, and it was of no use to put extra pennies on the Income Tax if he did not keep a very strict eye on the way in which money leaked out of the Exchequer. Above all things, the right hon. Gentleman ought to be careful to prevent any expenditure which was in distinct violation of the Treasury Minute being indulged in for the benefit of his colleagues on the Treasury Bench. One of the great benefits which the country was to have derived from the new system started by the present Government in regard to the payment of the Law Officers of the Crown was that of greater clearness. As a matter of fact, he (Mr. Hanbury) thought the country had been rather mystified under the new system. The information given with regard to it was at present very scant indeed. Under the new arrangement the Law Officers obtained larger fees than formerly, whilst a new Office was set up. It was due to the public that they should know precisely what the arrangement was. Hitherto a Return had always been printed showing what remuneration the Attorney General and Solicitor General received. He (Mr. Hanbury) asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other day whether he would present such a Return this year, and the reply was that no such Return would be given. The House had been told that the new arrangement would save the money of the public, whilst at the same time the public were to be entitled to a greater portion of the time of the Law Officers. It was said to be monstrous that the Law Officers should be paid high fees, and yet be able to give practically all their time to private practice. He himself had always protested against that system, and had especially objected to certain fees that used to be taken by the Attorney General. Well, everybody had supposed that, after all the parade of virtue that had been made by the present Government, the public would have obtained more of the time of the Law Officers. It turned out that there was a great deal more hidden under the word "appear" in the Treasury Minute than Members had been led to believe. It seemed that the Attorney General and the Solicitor General were only prevented by the Treasury Minute from actually appearing in Court, and that they were perfectly at liberty to take any private practice whatever in their chambers, so that there was, in fact, practically no alteration in the system, inasmuch as the Law Officers might devote a great deal of time to their private practice as long as the public did not know of it. Formerly the private practice was done openly, and he contended that the public had no idea whatever that when the change in the system was introduced it would still be possible for the Law Officers to act secretly in Chambers although they could not appear in open Court. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in answering the question he (Mr. Hanbury) had put to him on the subject, quoted the words of the Attorney General and acted as the Attorney General's mouthpiece. He (Mr. Hanbury) had some reason to protest against this. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was responsible for the Treasury Minute, and he ought to act as a check upon the action of the Attorney General, and ought to see that his own Treasury Minute was carried out. The Chancellor of the Exchequer the other day confessed his complete ignorance of the whole subject.

Mr. Hanbury

SIR W. HARCOURT was understood to say that he had not stated that he was ignorant.

MR. HANBURY said, he had questioned the right hon. Gentleman with regard to two retainers. One related to the Salt Union and the other to the Sutherland case. Well, the Treasury Minute dated back to the appointment of the present Attorney General and Solicitor General. He wished to know what was meant exactly by the words—

"Retainers accepted before the appointment of the present Law Officers."

As a layman, he confessed he did not exactly understand what the word "retainers" covered, but he was told by his legal friends that it might cover a vast amount of ground. It might mean that if the Attorney General or the Solicitor General had been engaged by any private client for a particular suit before his acceptance of Office he should be allowed to conduct that suit, and he (Mr. Hanbury) would not complain of an arrangement of that kind. He was also told, however, by lawyers that it might mean that one of the Law Officers had accepted a sort of general retainer to act on behalf of any particular Railway Company or other company which was always having lawsuits, and that in that case he was at liberty to appear in every action that Company might bring or defend. If so, it was a farce, and they ought to know what was the meaning attached by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to his own Treasury Minute. He would now proceed to the other portion of his case, which was this: The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that he was ignorant of the two particular cases which he (Mr. Hanbury) had mentioned — the Salt Union case and the Sutherland case. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was very specific in the answer which he made, and so was the Attorney General. He did not deal with these retainers as though they were general retainers given, say, by a Railway Company, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking as the mouthpiece of the Attorney General, said that in each of these two cases the retaining fee had been given before the acceptance of Office, and with reference to the litigation referred to in the question. He might say that he only mentioned these two cases because he saw in the newspaper reports that the Attorney General or the Solicitor General had received very large fees, and because it was possible there might be other cases of the kind; and as the Treasury would not publish this arrangement, or tell them what was meant by this retainer under which the Attorney General and the Solicitor General acted, the public must, of course, protect its own interest in the matter, and know what the Treasury meant by having a Return delivered of the fees which its own public officers received from private clients. To take the Sutherland case:—The Chancellor of the Exchequer told him, in answer to a question specifically directed to the Sutherland case, that the Attorney General had received his retainer before he accepted Office. This statement came from a Minister who was responsible for the Public Purse, and not only that, but from a Minister who was specially responsible in this case, because by his own Treasury Minute he constituted himself the sole check upon the Law Officers of the Crown. Obviously the Chancellor of the Exchequer had paid no attention to this case, and it seemed that the Attorney General was in ignorance too, not as to the Treasury Minute, but as to the date of the death of the Duke of Sutherland.

SIR W. HARCOURT: What has that to do with it?

MR. HANBURY: Everything, because the right hon. Gentleman said that the retainer was given before the present Government took Office, and that the retainer was in reference to the litigation in the Sutherland case. [Sir W. HARCOURT dissented]. The Chancellor of the Exchequer shook his head. What, he said, was this—

"In each of the cases a retaining fee had been given before the acceptance of Office and in reference to the litigation referred to in the question."

What was the litigation in the Sutherland case? It arose out of the will of the late Duke of Sutherland.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.): Partly.

MR. HANBURY: Is the hon. and learned Gentlemen only going to deal with a part of the case? Is he going to deal with the business arising out of the will of the Duke of Sutherland?

SIR C. RUSSELL: Yes.

MR. HANBURY: What I want to point out is that the Attorney General did not take Office until six weeks after the Duke of Sutherland died. The Chancellor of the Exchequer laughed at that. Well, they knew how trustworthy a guardian of the Public Purse he was. Surely the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to guard the Public Purse particularly well when he was under a Treasury Minute to be sole judge as to how far it must be departed from, and the public money expended upon his own colleagues without the return which they had been led to expect. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was not entitled to laugh at that. It was a matter with which the right hon. Gentleman ought to deal stringently. It was certain that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was ignorant as to these two cases, although they were cases which ought to have been referred to him. The Minute said that in all cases of doubt—and surely the Sutherland case is one of doubt—reference was to be had to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was this question ever brought before him?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Certainly not.

MR. HANBURY: That showed the loose way in which this business had been transacted. Somebody was to blame in the matter. This Treasury Minute had been very loosely interpreted. He must ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Treasury Minute had been carried out, and whether any case of this kind had been brought before his notice? The Treasury Minute from first to last had been a gross deception, and it was under a misconception that last year they voted a large sum of money for the support of a new office and to raise the amounts of the fees of the Law Officers of the Crown, which he was told were upon an enormous scale, and based upon the fees paid to the Attorney General for private practice. Nobody was more ready than himself to acknowledge the abilities of the Attorney General. It should not be supposed that he wanted to depreciate the enormous talents of the hon. and learned Gentleman; but he would say that it was dangerous to set up such a standard as that. Having once set up a standard of that sort, they might hereafter have men of inferior ability filling the office, but yet the standard of payment must remain the same. His chief object in bringing this matter before the House of Commons was to get information, and to whom to appeal for information he really did not know. The Chancellor of the Exchequer upon his own confession was ignorant, and did not know what was going on. He did not know the circumstances in regard to the Sutherland case. He was not aware that this case had arisen after his own Government had come into power.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It did not arise.

MR. HANBURY: Then they knew how this Treasury Minute had to be interpreted. They knew the loose way in which it was to be interpreted. If that was the case—if they had the distinct statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that in his opinion, under the Treasury Minute, the language was so loose that it was quite possible for the Attorney General or the Solicitor General to get large fees in connection with the will of a man who died six weeks after the Government came into Office, although that Treasury Minute distinctly said that they might act only upon retainers given before the Government came into Office, then he said that this Treasury Minute was not worth the paper upon which it was written and was a mere farce, and that the public was entitled, in view of the confession of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to have more definite information, and that they ought to have laid upon the Table of the House the terms of the precise arrangement come to between the Treasury and the Law Officers of the Crown, so that the House, when upon the Estimates they voted the salaries of the Law Officers, should have the full information before them. He begged to move his Motion.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to second the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words,

"This House regrets that the public remuneration of the Law Officers having been increased in consideration of the arrangement as to private practice therein specified, that arrangement has been widely departed from."
—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Mr. Hanbury

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.): I thank the hon. Member for his tone of personal courtesy to myself. He has travelled considerably wide of the Resolution which is on the Paper. I wish to call the attention of the House to the precise point which is raised. It is no longer a discussion on the original arrangement in the Treasury Minute of 1893. The complaint is that the Minute has not been observed by the Law Officers. The question of the new arrangement was discussed, and discussed at considerable length, upon two separate occasions in the month of March 1893, and the House approved of the arrangement which had been entered into with the Law Officers. The point now is whether the Law Officers have observed the terms of the contract with the Treasury. I will say in a sentence that not only according to the letter but according to the spirit of that arrangement the Law Officers of the Crown have adhered to the terms of that Minute. I will say more—and I speak for my colleague and myself—that we have not exercised the rights we might have exercised under the Minute, and have declined to act in many cases in which, under the Minute, we should have been entitled to act. The hon. Member also complains that he has had no Return of fees paid to the Law Officers. Let me remind him that he has had that information in the most specific form in which it could be given for the only complete year of Office of the present Law Officers. On the 12th of January he put on the Paper a question which asked for the fees paid in previous years, as contrasted with the amounts paid to the Law Officers under the new arrangement, and on the 12th of January these figures were given by me in answer to the hon. Member for Islington: and that answer was given in full, and will be found in the Parliamentary Reports of the 13th of January. I come to the question of what this Minute means. On two occasions in March—the hon. Member for Birmingham will probably recollect it—I stated that according to the construction of this Minute the Law Officers were entitled to act upon the reservation expressly made—namely,

“Except upon retainers delivered before the acceptance of Office.”

I was asked the question whether that included general retainers as well as what are called special retainers. At that time the hon. Member for Preston, who knows a good deal but does not know everything, was under the impression that a retainer was the retainer of the solicitor.

MR. HANBURY: What I said was that a retainer for a Railway Company or a company of that kind would cover the cases in which they might engage, but I did not say from a solicitor.

SIR C. RUSSELL: I thereupon pointed out that a retainer was not the retainer of the solicitor but the retainer through the solicitor for a particular client; in other words, that it was the retainer of the client. In regard to the case of general retainers for Railway Companies or other bodies of the sort the question was asked, Are the Law Officers to act upon such retainers? My answer was Yes, they are entitled to do so, but speaking for myself, I should not act upon any general retainer for a Railway Company or any other similar body in frequent litigation.

MR. HANBURY: Both Law Officers?

SIR C. RUSSELL: My colleague was not here, but I added that I had not the least doubt that he would come to the same conclusion. I have never admitted that we should not be entitled to do this as a right, so far as it is consistent with the discharge of our public duties. But, as I say, we have not insisted upon it. The hon. Gentleman has said that under this new arrangement enormous fees are paid to the Law Officers of the Crown for the contentious work that they do—fees vastly in excess of what they got under the old system. I only wish that that were true. My clerk has furnished me with five specimen cases showing the amount of fees paid by the private litigants as against those paid by a liberal Treasury and by an extravagant Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, it is said, does not safeguard the Public Purse, to the Law Officers of the Crown. The counsel engaged in those five cases were Sir Horace Davey, Sir Edward Clarke, Sir Henry James, Mr. Findlay, and Sir Richard Webster—counsel who are leading men at the Bar and of the same standing as ourselves. The total fees paid in those cases to the leading private counsel were 585 guineas. According to the hon. Member for Preston, the counsel for the Crown ought to have had at least 585 guineas. He received, as a fact, 235 guineas. Therefore, I complain that under the parsimonious influence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the Treasury do not act up to the spirit of the Minute.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS: Did the counsel for the Crown appear?

SIR C. RUSSELL: Yes, they did appear; and not only did they appear, but they are not even entitled to be briefed, and are not briefed, unless they are expected to appear.

MR. HANBURY: Was this amount divided between the five counsel, or did they each get 585 guineas?

SIR C. RUSSELL: The total fees in the five or six cases I have mentioned paid to the private counsel were 585 guineas. The amount paid by the Treasury to the Law Officer of the Crown was 235 guineas; in other words, considerably less than half. Therefore, it is all moonshine—this extravagant and ridiculous statement about the enormous fees paid to the Law Officers. I feel a little strongly upon this point, because I have taken the liberty of insisting that, if it is a proper provision of the arrangement that the counsel for the Crown should be paid fees in contentious business at all, it is not right they should be paid on an inferior scale for the same class of work. Therefore, it is that in the Minute it expressly provides that in contentious business the counsel are to be paid such fees as counsel of like standing would properly expect to receive from clients under like circumstances. The figures I have quoted show that the Minute is not acted up to by the Treasury.

MR. HANBURY: But the new scale was an advance upon the fees previously paid.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: I have shown the hon. Member how this proposed new scale works out in fact and in practice. Now, with regard to Chamber practice. Let me say for myself that I do not believe I have earned or received five guineas for Chamber practice since I became a Law Officer of the Crown, nearly two years ago. My hon. and learned Friend's business in advising was always greater than mine. He will tell you that he has practically abandoned giving opinions in Chambers altogether—not that he has not the right to do so, but because of the demands on his time by reason of his public duties. As the House knows, I was not in favour of the change personally, and I came into the arrangement with a certain amount of unwillingness; but I feel bound to say that with the enormous increase of business of a public character which the Law Officers have to deal with, especially within the last five or six or 10 years, I believe this Minute points in the right direction, and that in order to do the public work well the Law Officers of the Crown must be practically confined to the discharge of their public duties. I say this, although I felt, and feel, strongly that the Law Officers of the Crown should be, in fact, the leaders of the Bar as well as the titular leaders of the Bar. Now with regard to general retainers. It happens, in my case, that I have a general retainer for a very large number of newspapers in London. In the case of the hon. Member for Northampton, for whom I have had the honour of acting for many years, and who has been considerably engaged in litigation, I have had recently, in the Zierenberg case, to refuse to act upon a general retainer. Only a few days ago Sir E. Lawson, of The Daily Telegraph, was brought up for alleged contempt of Court. I have had also the honour of a general retainer for that journal for many years, but in this case I felt that I could not act upon it, because it came within the category of clients who may be in frequent litigation. I could mention many other illustrations. Now I come to the next question. With regard to the Sutherland case, my retainer from the present Duke, the then Marquess of Stafford, was given on the 29th of January, 1892. I did not accept Office until the 20th August, 1892. That general retainer was in relation to litigation between himself and the late Duke—I am sorry to go into all this—which litigation was considered important in the interests of the Marquess of Stafford, and which has culminated in the disputed will case now pending. The state of the facts is, that I received the retainer on the 29th of January, 1892; I accepted Office on the 20th of August, 1892; the late Duke died on the 27th of September, 1892; and the Treasury Minute is dated the 5th of December, 1892. These are the exact facts. I received the Salt Union retainer on the 10th of May, 1892; the writ in the specific action was issued on the 11th of July, 1892; and as I have said, I did not accept Office until the 20th of August, 1892. Now, I do ask whether it is not monstrous, in view of these facts, to make such a charge as the hon. Member has made? Not only have we acted up to the letter, but I say we have acted entirely up to the spirit of this Minute. I know, speaking both for my learned Colleague and myself, that our sacrifices have been considerable. We have tried, in discharge of our public duties, to do our best, and certainly with the most thorough desire to fulfil them in good faith. The point of this Resolution is an assertion on the part of the hon. Member, which, if he will forgive me for so saying, he ought not lightly to make, that the arrangement made has been widely departed from by the Law Officers. I absolutely deny that there is any foundation for such an assertion, and I assert again that we have acted entirely up to the spirit of this Minute.

Sir C. Russell

*MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, the Motion conveyed to the House the idea that the Law Officers of the Crown had trespassed beyond the limit with regard to private practice. That was an accusation which it was necessary to meet, and he was bound in fairness to say that the hon. and learned Member in the cases mentioned had given an effective answer. But after all, that was not the real question. The real question was, what was the amount of public money which the Law Officers of the Crown were receiving from year to year?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER said, that was not the question which was raised by this Amendment.

MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS was not proposing to argue that question now, which must be raised at another time upon a specific Motion to reduce the Vote for the remuneration of the Law Officers. He might be allowed to say, however, that there was a prevalent impression that the present arrangement gave the Law Officers of the Crown no less a sum annually than about £27,000. If that was so, it would be a very serious matter for the House to consider, when the proper time arrived, and it would then have to be determined whether that was a rate of payment which could be continued. They could get three Archbishops for that sum, and the House would have to consider whether the services of two Law Officers of the Crown were of equal value to those of three such eminent ecclesiastics. This matter could not be allowed to rest where it was, for there was a far wider and more important question behind it, which, if nobody else would do so, he would raise when the proper time arrived.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, when the time came to vote upon the remuneration of the Law Officers he should have no hesitation in regard to the Lobby he should go into. However, that was not what the House had then to deal with. What they had to do with at the moment was a deliberate accusation against the Law Officers of the Crown of having done for their own personal advantage that which they ought not to have done, and which he certainly ought to have restrained them from doing under the terms of the Treasury Minute.

MR. HANBURY said, he had distinctly stated that he made no charge whatever against the Attorney General, but that the Treasury Minute had not been conformed with. That was all he had said.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the hon. Member had said quite enough, and a great deal too much, on the subject. He had made an accusation, for which he had no foundation whatever, against two as honourable men as ever filled these important Public Offices—made it on grounds as ridiculous as they were unfounded. He had referred to the mare's nest called the Sutherland case, and had asked whether the proceedings of the Attorney and Solicitor General had been watched, and whether they were entitled or not to the fees they took. He could only inform the hon. Member that he had other things to do, and that that was no part of his duty. He had simply, knowing the Attorney and Solicitor General to be men of honour and integrity, handed to them the Treasury Minute, relying upon them to act upon it both in letter and spirit. They had acted upon it both in letter and spirit, and the accusation that they had departed from it was baseless—founded upon no facts whatever; and he asked the House without further discussion to negative the Motion.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, that no such charge as the right hon. Gentleman had stated had been made against the Attorney General. The allegation was that a Treasury Minute having laid down the conditions under which the Law Officers of the Crown were henceforth to be employed and remunerated, the meaning of that Minute, so far as appeared to any outside layman, had been departed from. How did it start? It started by saying that an arrangement had been made—and this was the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—limiting the business in which a Law Officer might appear as counsel for private clients to cases in the House of Lords and Privy Council. The whole Minute was founded upon that principle; that was the main part of it, and the rest was mere ornament. Was the Duke of Sutherland's case a case before the House of Lords or Privy Council? Certainly not. It was the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer (who had just run away from the House) to satisfy himself whether the cases mentioned came within the true meaning of the Minute or not. The Attorney General had given illustrations of a case in which larger fees were paid to the other counsel than to the Law Officers. Yes, but the other counsel had not £13,000 a year, like the Attorney and Solicitor General, to divide between them. That fact had a very important bearing upon the case. What was complained of was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not performed his duty as guardian of the Public Purse. The right hon. Gentleman was always inveighing against extravagance, but in this particular instance he had not acted properly as guardian of the public money. As to the question of general retainer, they quite understood the principle which the Attorney General had laid down, that he and his colleague had a right to accept general retainers from public companies exposed to constant litigation, though they did not exercise that right. But the Attorney General was not the judge in the matter. The Treasury Minute laid down the broad principle he had stated. Foreseeing, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer did, that questions might arise it laid down two things—first, that any question arising should be submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose decision should be final; and, secondly, that a copy of the Minute should be sent to each of the Law Officers. When the question was raised whether the Duke of Sutherland's case came within the Minute, the Attorney General and Solicitor General knew that it was their duty to submit the case to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That was not done, and thereby they had all failed in their duty. The Law Officers had acted upon what they conceived to be their right, but they were not the judges; the Chancellor of the Exchequer was the judge, but again in this as in many another case the right hon. Gentleman had abandoned his post and had not fulfilled the duty imposed upon him.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question again proposed.

QUARANTINE.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES called attention to the system of quarantine. He said, the late President of the Local Government Board and he had had a difference upon this matter. What was quarantine? As a means of preventing the spread of disease by infection it was ridiculous. Forty days were prescribed, as though "forty" had some magic in it? He might refer to the lazaretto which had been built on the Chetney Hills in Kent, to which persons were sent who were likely to convey infectious disease to Her Majesty's subjects. Quarantine did not only extend under the Act 6 Geo. III. c. 7 to yellow fever, as the late President of the Local Government Board had stated; on the contrary, yellow fever was never mentioned at all in either that or succeeding Acts, except in an exceptional manner. Quarantine applied to any infectious disease or distemper highly dangerous to the health of His Majesty's subjects. It included cholera, and might be held to apply to swine fever. The provisions for carrying it out were the most ridiculous oppressive, expensive methods ever made in a civilised country. What was the system for protecting people from infection? We had four old hulks in the Solent, where they were established originally because vessels came generally to Southampton from the Mediterranean coast of Africa or Turkey, where the plague was supposed usually to exist. The lazaretto in Kent he had already referred to. Those were the means employed to prevent the spread of infection. But what was the case now? For one person who reached this country by way of the Solent hundreds and thousands came by Dover, Harwich, and other parts along the coasts. If we were going to maintain a system of quarantine it should, in the first place, be extended to the cholera; and, in the second, preventive methods should be applied where they were most needed, at the points of largest influx of foreigners into the country. It was perfectly ridiculous. If we were to allow streams of people to come in by Folkestone, Dover, Harwich and so on without question, to maintain those four crazy old hulks in the Solent. Such a system of quarantine afforded no protection whatever to the country against the spread of infectious diseases. If we were to have quarantine at all the matter could not stop where it was, because the great streams of foreigners not entering the country were untouched by our present system. But even supposing it were intended to make the system a reality instead of a sham, he very much questioned the wisdom of so doing; for quarantine did no good, but on the contrary it did a great deal of harm. Persons coming by sea required less quarantine than others, having by their voyage automatically quarantined themselves, so to speak. Confining people for a number of days in a ship or lazaretto was eminently calculated to spread the germs of disease if they existed or to produce them if they did not. Ridiculous as the present system was, even if made more effective, it would still be bad, for it would not prevent the spread of infectious diseases. He ventured to say no one on the opposite Benches could tell the House why such a system was kept up. No doubt abroad it was maintained as a kind of system of outdoor relief for

Mr. Gibson Bowles

Vice Consuls, providing them with fees in lieu of paying them salaries. For instance, the Spanish Government required a health certificate to be viséd at a charge of a few shillings by the Vice Consul of the place—an unnecessary visé by a person who did not know and could not know that a certificate given by a person who did know was correct. If the right hon. Gentleman was going to abandon his system of quarantine and call in the assistance of the Local Government Board, that would be a clear confession that his system was of no use; but if he intended to try and make it of use, let him apply it as the Act intended it should be applied. In that case, instead of having £1,600 or £1,700 put in the Estimates for quarantine expenses, the cost would be spread over the whole country. He had said enough to show that the present quarantine system was extremely useless, ridiculous, and expensive, and ought to be abolished. The time had arrived when we must either extend or abandon altogether this ancient system of quarantine, and he would be glad of an assurance from the Government on the subject, or that at all events they would promise the familiar remedy of a Select Committee. The only explanation of this old system having been allowed to go on was that its existence had been forgotten. For more than 100 years we had put up with it, but the time had come when an end should be put to an ancient and stagnant abuse.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I do not think the hon. Member opposite is quite justified in saying that the Act of George IV. contemplates yellow fever simply. It applies to infectious diseases.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he had stated that it was not exclusive of them.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, there had been five cases of vessels detained through yellow fever during the last few years, but such cases could be quite well dealt with under the Ordinances relating to the public health. That being so, it did not appear that there was any necessity, from the point of view of public health, for maintaining the quarantine law. The Government, however, were bound by certain Conventions with other Powers to maintain the quarantine regulations. In consequence of the Debate that arose on the Civil Service Estimates last Autumn, the Government had been giving their attention to the matter, and the Local Government Board had been in correspondence with the Departments concerned on the subject. Inquiries were being made as to the attitude of Foreign Powers, and as soon as replies were received to those inquiries the Government would be able to deal with the question. He did not think it would be necessary to have a Select Committee such as the hon. Member had suggested. Probably a Departmental Committee would be better. As he had said, however, the Government were bound by the Conventions, and until they obtained the views of the Foreign Governments could not act. They agreed that there was no longer any sanitary reason for maintaining a system which was to a large extent practically obsolete. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. Member would be satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of the Government. It was receiving the attention of the Government, and would certainly not be lost sight of.

IMPROVEMENTS IN NON-BOARD SCHOOLS.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston), who had given notice of the following Motion:—

“That this House is of opinion that full and reasonable time, without prejudice to the allowance of grants which may have been earned, should be allowed to non-Board schools, not supported by the rates, for carrying out such material improvements as the Education Department may, after considering all the circumstances, have ordered,”

he believed he was precluded from moving it, but he wished to make a few remarks on the subject. Just before the Easter Recess the House had had the advantage of a tolerably free discussion on the subject, during the course of which the Minister for Education (Mr. Acland) gave some assurances which, though they were not perfect, were in some degree satisfactory, for all of which mercies he was infinitely obliged to the right hon. Gentleman. The Motion was, however, placed on the Paper before that discussion took place, and, inasmuch as during the Easter Recess further confirmation had been received for the necessity for having something done, he thought it well to revert to the subject. In his native County of Worcestershire there had been abnormal activity in respect of the repairs and sanitation of voluntary schools. This was owing to the exceptional vigour of the Inspector who was appointed in that county. So great was the anxiety with regard to the poorer village schools that the rich landlords—if any landlords could in these days be called rich—and many small country gentlemen like himself had been obliged to raise a fund for the purpose of enabling the managers to meet the requirements of the Education Department. In the same way, in the part of Surrey which he represented, the people had been obliged to make great efforts to raise funds in order to meet the requirements of the Department. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Acland) very well knew that somewhat suddenly within the last year or two demands for material improvements which had never previously been pressed had been made. School committees had been going on for generations without any marked complaint being made to the Education Department, and although some further requirements were anticipated when the Free Education Act was passed, a year or so of gradual progress elapsed after its passage, and it was not until the present Government came into Office that demands were urged with what he regarded as exceptional and abnormal vigour. The schools to which the demands applied were, of course, more or less poor, and those who supported them were suffering from agricultural depression. He was sure that the vivid and graphic description recently given of them by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) would be still fresh in the recollection of the right hon. Gentleman. It was under these circumstances of poverty and depression that the school managers were required to redouble their efforts for improving the buildings. The demands which had been made upon them were of such a character as in their opinion to endanger their position. They were apprehensive that they would not be able to raise the funds needed within the requisite time. No complaints were made respecting the efficiency of their school management. Their management was admitted to be good. They actually were making greater progress relatively than the Board schools, who had all the advantages of the rates to fall back upon. It was considered to be hard that at a time when, despite all the enervating and depressing influences of the day, they had managed to maintain their schools in a state of efficiency which if it was equalled was scarcely surpassed by the Board schools, pressure should be put upon them for what was after all, a very secondary matter. That was the shell of the grievance, so to speak—the framework of the educational picture painted by skilful artists with the best of colours. It was for the sake of the frame that the picture was being imperilled. It did seem hard then when schools were kept up by voluntary effort they should be placed in a position of pecuniary embarrassment for the sake of such matters as the provision of a cloak-room or a few hat-pegs. Things as affecting sanitation, he ventured to say, were grossly exaggerated. The idea of the health of the children being endangered by reason of a few wet cloaks being hung about the place was really absurd. He admitted that cloak-rooms and hat-pegs should be provided, but to say that the health of the children was placed in jeopardy by the absence of these things was ridiculous. Look at the children—at their vigorous gait and rosy cheeks. They were far healthier than the children under the London School Board. Was there any danger to their health? Of course not. The provision of cloak-rooms, and so on, was not urgent. The want of them was not likely to provoke epidemics or juvenile complaints. The children on the whole were healthy and on the whole were progressive, and on the whole were doing well. Why then, should the schools be worried to death for the sake of material improvements of a secondary character? There was this further grievance—that the buildings were erected with the approval of the Education Department of their day, and had existed under similar sanction for more than one generation. There could be no particular reason—in the present year, at any rate—for enforcing these hitherto unprecedented demands. He (Sir R. Temple) and his friends submitted that the schools had claims of the first character on the Estimates. These were the schools that existed before Board schools were known. They were the pioneers of education in the country. They held up the light of knowledge at a time when there was general darkness among the humbler classes; and these were the institutions that had provided a vast amount of educational capital for school buildings—to be counted by many millions sterling—and these were the institutions which now for several generations had saved the pockets of the taxpaying ratepayers. They were saving the ratepayers now, at a time when all other rates was rising. He did not say they saved much to the taxpayer. They received as much as the Board schools, but they saved the ratepayer. And, further, they maintained the good old English idea—differentiating from Scotland and Ireland, and every other nationality under the sun in the employment of private enterprise in the sacred cause of education. Elsewhere these things were done by the State, but in this country they were largely done by private enterprise. This gave them a claim upon the nation. They did not deny that material progress must be made and go on pari passu with moral and intellectual progress. Poor as they were they were willing to make these material improvements, but they asked to be allowed reasonable time for the purpose. It made all the difference next year or the year after—that was to say, compared with the present year—between death or survival. That was the point. It was time they asked for. They even ventured to demand it, and they ventured to conclude their plea with the assertion, “Have patience with us and we will make thee all the improvements that are fairly to be required of us.” It was in order to obtain, if possible, some additional assurance from the right hon. Gentleman and also to show their educational friends who were regarding this question with great anxiety in all parts of the country that they in the House who were in favour of the voluntary system were not silent, but were firm in urging their case that he again brought this subject before the right hon. Gentleman—though he was precluded from moving a Resolution.

Sir R. Temple

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): I do not want to say anything discourteous to the hon. Baronet and his friends, but to raise the question for the third time within the seventh Parliamentary day is really a little hard on the Minister in charge of the subject. On both previous occasions I have done my best not merely to receive the statements made with sympathy, but to show, by the announcement I made as to the Returns I proposed to obtain and the Circulars I was going to publish, that I honestly mean to try and meet in some reasonable degree hon. Members themselves. I hope the hon. Baronet opposite will pardon me for saying that I am not prepared to go again into the general question. I know that my statements have been considered satisfactory by those interested in voluntary schools from the many letters I have received from clergymen and others. If the hon. Member had been able to move the Motion I should not have been able to accept it, as it would draw a distinction between Board and voluntary schools as to the way in which they are to be treated in this matter. What the Education Department has to do is to adapt its demands to the circumstances of the case, and that is what it is prepared to try and do; but a Motion which would give a special position to the voluntary schools is one that could not, and would not, be accepted by the House. It is the duty of every Minister of Education to see that in return for the enormous grants that are made to these schools by the country the schools shall be healthy and in a good condition. And if hon. Members desire information as to the condition of some of the voluntary schools I should advise them to read the addresses of the President and members of the National Union of Teachers. The hon. Baronet and his friends accepted in the most friendly spirit what I formerly promised, and I am not prepared to say anything more on the subject.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) said, the right hon. Gentleman had referred to the remarks which had been made on this subject on previous occasions. Well, many of them entertained strong feelings on the subject of the voluntary schools. Many people did not care about children being educated at all if they were not educated in voluntary schools. Even when Board schools were close to them they sent their children long distances to voluntary schools. They paid rates to maintain the Board schools, but derived no advantage from them. He had himself contributed largely to Board schools, but he also contributed to voluntary schools, in which he was more immediately interested. While no objection was raised to pay for Board schools, those persons who supported voluntary schools felt that they had not the same advantages as compared with the Board schools, of dipping into the ratepayers' pockets. In the past they knew that an endeavour had been made to run down the voluntary schools by means of the Board schools, in which low fees were charged. This was done in his district, but it was felt that religious education was necessary for the children. Whilst accepting the statement of the Vice President of the Council, that he was anxious to be fair to all classes of schools, they could not refrain from pointing out that in such serious times of agricultural depression as the present some consideration should be paid to the voluntary schools if only for the sake of saving the pockets of the ratepayers. He did not say any more than the right hon. Gentleman, that they should have the voluntary schools in an insalubrious condition or with worse internal arrangements than the Board schools, but he held that alterations which were not absolutely necessary should be postponed or spread over a number of years. The supporters of the voluntary schools did not wish to see such schools crushed by unnecessary demands being made upon them.

Main Question, "That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

SUPPLY,—considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS (ESTIMATES), 1894-5.

CLASS I.

1. £31,526, to complete the sum for Royal Palaces and Marlborough House.

MR. A. C. MORTON desired to call attention to one or two matters on the Vote for Royal Palaces, and to ask for a little information. He would first, however, congratulate his right hon. Friend on his appointment as First Commissioner of Works, and express the hope that they might expect a little more sympathy from him than they got from the other hand. With regard to the Windsor Royal Kitchen Garden, he saw there was down in the Vote £1,015, as against £978 last year. He was always careful not to say much about Palaces which were occupied by Her Majesty, and had no desire to alter the arrangements made when she came to the Throne. He could not, however, see why they should keep up the kitchen garden. Surely that ought to be kept up by the Civil List, and he should like to know why they were asked to pay for the garden. The next item was Kensington Palace, £2,415, as against £2,125 last year. There was no explanation of that increase as far as he could see. He objected to their being asked to pay for the repairs of these Palaces at all. These buildings belonged to the nation, but they gave them their use of them. The Queen nominated certain persons to reside in such Palaces, and, living there rent free, the very least that could be expected from them was that they would keep them in a good state of repair. The people who occupied the Palaces were well-to-do and did not require to receive this kind of outdoor relief; but, in addition to this, it was not fair to call upon the already too-heavily taxed people of this country to pay for the expenses of repairing these Palaces. There was an increase in the expenditure of over £600 in regard to the White Lodge, Richmond Park. He should like to know who occupied the White Lodge, and why they were called upon to pay this sum? The same remarks applied to Pembroke Lodge and the other buildings enumerated in the Votes. He desired explanations on these points. The next item to which he wished to refer was in respect of Holyrood Palace. He had for a number of years been calling attention to the bad state of repair of the Scottish Palaces and Castles, but so far he had got little sympathy from the Government. He hoped the present First Commissioner of Works would take some little interest in these buildings, and sympathise with the desire to have them kept in a proper state of repair. They were now, he was sorry to say, to some extent tumbling to pieces. With regard to the chapel that used to be attached to Holyrood Palace, the roof had tumbled

General Goldsworthy

, and the building gone to ruins. He suggested that something like £10,000 a year should be taken for 10 years to put these Palaces and Castles into a proper state of repair. He would ask the First Commissioner to visit Holyrood and Linlithgow Palaces during the summer, and he would be satisfied that their present condition was a disgrace to the nation, and that they sorely needed repair. Part of Edinburgh Palace came under this vote, and that structure also required some money spending on it to put it in good repair. A Mr. Nelson, a citizen of Edinburgh, formerly spent £20,000 out of his own pocket, not to embellish or decorate it, but to put it into a decent state of repair and prevent it falling to pieces. It was disgraceful that it should be necessary for a private citizen to do any such thing. Part of Edinburgh Castle was sold to a Railway Company some time ago, and the purchase money so received, instead of being spent on the building, had been put into the capital account of the Royalty fund. It was through the exertions of the Edinburgh Corporation that they got that money, and the least that could be expected was that the money so obtained should be spent in connection with the repair of that part of Edinburgh Castle under the charge of the First Commissioner of Works.

MR. THORNTON did not often find himself in accord with the hon. Member for Peterborough, but on this matter of Scotch Palaces and Castles he was most thoroughly in agreement with him. He had visited Holyrood in the course of an historical tour he made over Scotland last year, and there was a danger of the chapel and other parts of the building falling into a state of disrepair, which would be disgraceful to this country. After all, if there was no absolute engagement made at the time of the Union to keep these Palaces and Castles in repair he considered it to be a moral responsibility. Holyrood was of profound historical interest in Scotland—indeed, it did not sink beneath that of royal Windsor itself. Such an important historical building as Holyrood should be kept up, and the necessary funds found for that purpose.

MR. HANBURY desired some information in regard to the large expenditure of £8,500 required for new drainage at Buckingham Palace. He had very often had to complain of the serious danger and risk to health and life in our Public Offices on the part of the Civil servants engaged in such Offices. The condition of the War Office a few years ago was disastrous owing to the bad state of the drainage, and now they had the matter come home to Buckingham Palace itself. Of course, when the health of the Royal Family and Royal visitors at Buckingham Palace was concerned it was a serious thing. The fact that the drainage was in such a bad condition as to require the expenditure of £8,500 emphasised the desirability of a public inquiry into the condition of our Public Buildings, most of which he believed to be in a thoroughly insanitary state. The Government ought to set an example in this respect, and have buildings in such a sanitary state that those who worked or lived in them should not have their health endangered or injured. He did not grudge this amount. He could quite believe the money would be well spent, and he should like to see more going in the same direction, but the Government must not ask them to vote such large sums in the dark. This item appeared in the Votes for the first time.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): It appeared last year.

MR. HANBURY said, they did not have any explanation last year, and he hoped, therefore, they should be told what had been the defects in the drainage of Buckingham Palace, how the money would be expended, and whether sufficient guarantees would be taken that this would be a final sum?

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) desired to know what system of drainage it was proposed to introduce at Buckingham Palace? The drainage system was remodelled some years ago, and the system known as the pneumatic system, which had always worked with great satisfaction, was introduced. Was that the system which it was now proposed should be adopted? With regard to the Windsor Royal Kitchen Garden, he noticed that there was an increased charge this year. What became of the produce of this kitchen garden? The Royal Family were very seldom in residence there, and he should like to know ho got the benefit of the produce of the kitchen garden? If it found its way to Covent Garden, or if anything was made out of it, why should it not be applied in the reduction of the expenses.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES remarked that the Secretary to the Treasury was, no doubt, aware that Windsor Castle was not the property of the Sovereign as such, neither was it personal, but it was the Palace of the Order of the Garter, and was occupied by the Sovereign not as Queen of England but as head of the Order of the Garter, and if it were a conceivable thing that any other Sovereign could be the head of the Order of the Garter, that Sovereign would occupy the Palace at Windsor; consequently, it did seem to him that Windsor Castle stood in a somewhat different position to Buckingham and St. James's Palaces, which were no doubt personal Palaces—personal to the Sovereign as Sovereign. He was not sure whether, if the strict right of the matter were followed out, Windsor Castle should not be charged with the other paraphernalia of the Garter, of which they made a separate Vote in other departments of the Estimates. There was another subject to which he wished to call attention. For many years there had been two services held in St. James's Chapel, one at 10 o'clock in the morning, to which everybody was admitted, and another at 12, for which tickets were required. The 10 o'clock service, which he had long been in the habit of attending, was a most beautiful service, conducted with the utmost dignity and propriety, and had been regularly held up to last year. At the time of the Royal Marriage last year both services were interrupted at St. James's Chapel Royal, and were transferred to the German Chapel, of which he would only say that neither in propriety, in acoustic qualities, nor in appearance, was it at all comparable with the other, and, instead of being a delight and a pleasure to attend the service there, as it was at St. James's Chapel, it was rather a trial of patience.

THE CHAIRMAN: That question does not arise on this Vote.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that he only wished to complain that while part of the service had been restored to St. James's Chapel, the beautiful 10 o'clock service was carried on in the German Chapel, and was spoiled by the acoustic properties of the chapel. He, therefore, hoped that the First Commissioner of Works would see his way to restoring the service to the Chapel Royal.

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. H. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.) said, he was not aware why the change in the service in the Chapel Royal alluded to by the last speaker had been made, but he would inquire into the matter. The expenditure on the kitchen garden of Windsor Castle was for structural improvements, and the outlay upon Kensington Palace was attributable to ordinary repairs. The expenditure in connection with the White Lodge, Richmond Park, which was in the occupation of the Duke of Teck, was owing to the decrease in the water supply in the well. In order to insure an adequate supply in case of fire it was found necessary to expend several hundred pounds. In regard to Holyrood Palace, he quite agreed with the historic importance of the ruin, and it would be his duty to look very closely into that matter. His predecessor in Office had, however, satisfied himself that there was no danger from deterioration, and the Surveyor of the Office of Works, who had gone very carefully into it, had said that there was no ground for apprehension. He would undertake that the whole condition of the building should be carefully watched, and a further Report called for in the course of the year. In regard to Buckingham Palace, the underground drains had all been taken up, the system altered, and new pipes put in on the new system. The item this year was, doubt, very heavy, but was calculated to cover the cost of all the heavy work which would endeavour to profit by the restoration of the house. Member for Preston (subject of drainage generally. A complaint had also been made of the condition of the buildings of the War Office. Those buildings were very old, but very long the War Department have a new house in which the new system would be as satisfactory as the old. A question of the Windsor Royal Kitchen was outside his province, as a private matter.

Mr. Conybeare

MR. A. C. MORTON thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the way in which he had met them in regard to Holyrood. As to the occupants of the White Lodge, if their well-water gave out, why should they not have the Water Company's supply laid on, and pay water-rates, just as other people had to do? They got the house rent free, and the least they might do was to pay the water rate. He also thought that the occupants of the buildings, to which the Queen had the right of nomination—such as the White Lodge, Sheen Lodge, and Straw Lodge—should be obliged to keep them in a state of repair. An arrangement had been made by which these people were obliged to keep the buildings in repair inside, and he thought they might be asked to look after the outside as well, as they had the houses rent free.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked whether the Observatory at Kew was the place to which chronometers and nautical instruments were sent to be tested? He noticed under the heading of "Palaces"—stud-house, Hawthorn Lodge and Kew Observatory. The category of Palaces had been greatly extended when they included a stud-house, an observatory, and a lodge.

MR. H. GLADSTONE said, he was able to answer the question of the hon. Member who had just sat down. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Peterborough, he could not undertake to say that the charge for the outside repairs would be thrown on the occupants of the houses mentioned. The owners of houses usually did the inside repairs, in order to ensure that the buildings were properly preserved.

MR. CONYBEARE asked why the well-conditioned lords and ladies who occupied these Palaces, cottages, lodges, whatever they were, rent-free did not pay for their "fuel, lights, water, and household articles"? He accepted the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the produce of the Windsor Kitchen Garden. Perhaps Her Majesty had a right to make as much as she could out of the kitchen garden; but surely these people who had those buildings rent-free should pay for light and water and household articles.

MR. H. GLADSTONE said, his hon. Friend was under a misapprehension. The occupants of those Palaces did pay for their gas and fuel. The item referred to was for gas and fuel used in the Public Works Department in respect to these edifices.

MR. CONYBEARE said, that raised another question, which was whether the right hon. Gentleman so analysed the accounts as to apportion to each Palace its respective portion of the expense under this head?

SIR R. TEMPLE said, he would like to point out, in answer to the hon. Member for Peterborough, that it would be impossible to ask the Royal occupants of those Palaces to undertake the repair of the outside of the buildings. Those Palaces were national property; they had been erected by the Crown or by Parliament, and no one should be allowed to touch them on the outside except under the authority of Parliament or the Royal authority.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he desired to say, in reply to the question of the hon. Member for Lynn Regis in reference to the Royal Kew Observatory, that the Observatory had been built in 1778 by Sir Thomas Chambers for George III., but since Her Majesty had come to the Throne she had allowed it to be used by the Royal Society, which looked after the internal repairs, while the outside repairs were done by the Board of Works.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, the hon. Baronet the Member for Kingston did not seem to understand what he had said about the repairs of the Palaces. They had already made an arrangement whereby they compelled the people who lived in those buildings to keep them in repair internally, and he thought the principle should be extended to outside repairs, just as vicars or rectors were obliged to keep parsonage houses, which were also national property, in repair, inside and outside.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he agreed with the hon. Baronet that it was absolutely impossible to allow people to work their fancy on the outside of the Palaces, and that if any work of the kind was needed it should be done by the Board of Works. For instance, if the hon. Member for Peterborough occupied one of those buildings, he should not like to allow the hon. Member his way on the outside of the house, for he would probably spoil it.

Vote agreed to.

2. £79,228, to complete the sum for Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, that last year the First Commissioner of Works had promised him to provide additional seats in Hampton Court Park and Pleasure Gardens, and as the seats were very much required by the public, he would like to know whether the promise had been carried out. He also urged last year that a refreshment booth for the supply of temperance drinks should be erected in those grounds.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Why limit them to temperance drinks ?

MR. A. C. MORTON replied that a licence would have to be obtained, and that no doubt would be opposed by the public houses, which were kept up by hon. Gentlemen opposite so carefully. At any rate, all he desired was that the public who frequented those Gardens should be able to obtain temperance refreshments. He should also like to ask what became of the thousands of bunches of grapes which grew on the celebrated Vine at Hampton Court? So far as he could make out the grapes went to Windsor—what for he did not know—but as they belonged to the people, he thought the First Commissioner of Works should be able to give them to the hospitals for children in the Metropolis. With regard to Linlithgow Palace, he had again to complain that it was not in a proper state of repair. The walls of the Palace were still in a good and staple condition, and he thought the building might be roofed in and made use of. When Scotland got Home Rule the Palace might be used for the Governor of the country. He had received numerous complaints of the want of sanitary accommodation in Hyde Park, while the open spaces in the charge of the London County Council were admirably supplied in that respect. A little money spent wisely in that way would greatly benefit the people and visitors to London.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he noticed that £400 a year were charged to India, in respect to services rendered to that country by Kew Botanic and Pleasure Gardens. He should like to know what those services were. Complaint was constantly made about India being overburdened with taxation on behalf of England and he thought this small sum might very well be paid by this country, rather than be charged to India. It was a mere trifle, and not worth talking about ; but he raised the subject as a question of principle.

MR. THORNTON (Clapham) said that with regard to Linlithgow Palace, was aware a considerable difference of opinion existed in Scotland as to whether the building should be treated, and therefore no decision should be come to without careful consideration.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE said, that additional seats had been provided in Hampton Court Gardens, and he would consider the question of providing a Kiosk, as in Kew and other places, for the supply of light refreshments. The grapes of the Vine at Hampton went to their owner, Her Majesty.

MR. CONYBEARE : I thought we were the owner.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE said, that with regard to the £400 charged on India it was a very trifling matter, but as he had great sympathy with the views expressed by his hon. Friend the Member for Camborne, he would look into the subject. As the hon. Member for Clapham had stated, there was a difference of opinion about the treatment to be given to the ruin at Linlithgow, and apart from that, it was a matter that required careful consideration. The question of sanitary accommodation in Hyde Park would also be attended to.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, he would like to know what had become of the Report of the Committee which sat in 1892, and perhaps 1893 also, to inquire into the emoluments of the establishment at Kew Gardens? It would be remembered that the men employed at Kew desired that their emoluments should be rendered equal to the emoluments of similar establishments within the Metropolitan area. It was said that there were certain advantages at Kew, which were enjoyed in the Metropolitan Parks, and that living was cheaper there. To this the men replied that living was dearer

Mr. Gibson Bowles

Kew, and probably they were right. The Committee was appointed—he thought, under the auspices or executive control of the late Chief Commissioner of Works. For his own part, he had never heard that the labours of the Committee had had any result. Possibly something might have been done, for he had not heard a complaint for the past year or so. It would be satisfactory, however, if some statement were made on the point. In regard to the bill which was brought against India by Kew he believed it to be bonâ fide. No doubt Kew Gardens did furnish seeds and specimens for the Botanical Gardens at Calcutta and elsewhere in India.

MR. CONYBEARE said, that if similar services were rendered to the Colonies and not charged for why should India be charged?

SIR R. TEMPLE said, he did not know whether Kew Gardens supplied specimens to the Colonies or not. He would point out that the residents at Kew had a standing grievance in respect of the lofty wall enclosing the Gardens on the south western side. The wall was a great eyesore to the inhabitants of a very long row of houses, and it would be a great boon to them if it could be replaced by iron railings. It might be said that as the removal of the wall would tend solely to the benefit of the residents in the neighbourhood they ought to be asked to defray part of the expense. That clearly was a matter for negotiation between the responsible Minister and the residents. He wished to thank the Government for throwing open the Home Park at Richmond to the inhabitants of Kingston and Surbiton. There was still a question as to whether equestrians were allowed to ride through it or not. He should like to press the Minister in charge of the Vote to concede this privilege.

MR. HANBURY said, that as to this charge in India, though a small one, it was a shabby one. They were far too much inclined to put every charge they could on India. They had seen many evidences of that lately, and he protested against it with the hope of seeing the habit put an end to. The habit was the result of the policy of days gone by, when the House was only too ready to pile up small charges against the Indian Exchequer. He agreed with the hon. Member for Kingston that, no doubt, India did derive benefit from Kew, but he thought it a little unjust that these charges should be imposed on India, whilst they were not imposed on self-governing or Crown Colonies. If India benefited from Kew, did not Kew, on the other hand, benefit from the Botanical Gardens of India? If so, was not the present arrangement under which India alone was charged rather one-sided? As the Government had promised to consider the matter, he did not think it was worth while going to a Division against the item.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, the hon. Baronet opposite had pointed out that, in consequence of the representations he had made, a Committee had been appointed to consider the emoluments of the labourers at Kew Gardens. The Committee eventually reported. They did not recommend any general rise of wages. They made, however, a number of recommendations with regard to small improvements in the wages of labourers in the Royal Parks generally, and all those recommendations had been carried out. The wages of the labourers at Kew had been raised, not to any great extent, but sufficient to keep them in correspondence with the policy of the Government in regard to other Departments of the Public Service. If it were possible in future to go further and raise the minimum rate of wages throughout the Public Service, the labourers generally at Kew would, of course, participate in the advantage.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he had understood the hon. Gentleman who had replied to him on behalf of the Government to express such sympathy with the view he (Mr. Conybeare) had expressed that he did not think it necessary to press his Motion to a Division.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he agreed that it was ridiculous to make India pay the money to which reference had been made. He hoped no further charge would be made on that account. On another point, so far as his (Mr. Morton's) acquaintance with the Scotch Societies went, they all objected to keeping Holyrood Palace as a ruin. They said they wanted it roofed in—especially the old Parliament House.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the road in Richmond Park on the east side of Pembroke Lodge was in a bad condition, and very dangerous for riding purposes. It was a series of abysses, and a person riding on it was likely at any moment to come head over heels. It was badly kept, and in wet weather was simply a morass. For years they had been promised an entrance to the Park from London in Priory Lane. The lane ended in a gate, where there was a Royal lodge inhabited by a Royal keeper, who was paid for out of the Estimates. This parkkeeper, when applied to by a person—as he (Mr. Bowles) had himself applied—for egress, said, “I cannot let you go through this gate unless you get the permission of Mr. Hugh Smith, who lives down the lane.” He (Mr. Bowles) did not know who Mr. Hugh Smith was. It was not the Queen of England who was to give permission for a Royal Park Gate to be used; it was not even the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but Mr. Hugh Smith. He took no interest in Mr. Hugh Smith—he only took interest in the Park and in the Estimates. This system of keeping up a Park Gate for the behoof of a private individual who was to give permission to his private friends to use it had been going on for years. They thought last year that it was to be put an end to, but apparently it still continued.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, the hon. Member was quite right about this gate. It was not open to general use, because the road leading to it was private property—the property, he believed, of the landowner to whom the hon. Member had referred. The gentleman, however, was quite ready to hand over the road to the public if some security were given that it would be kept in proper repair. The difficulty was as to who was to repair it. The Local Authorities were certainly the persons who ought to undertake that work. He had entered into communication with them on the subject some time ago, but they were not disposed to keep in repair a road which simply led to a Royal Park. The cost could hardly be placed on the public funds. The owner, Mr. Smith, had made a most generous offer to the public, and it was a pity it could not be availed of.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he wished to call attention to the Vote for keeping Hyde Park in order. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer would agree with him that the money might be spent in a more advantageous manner, for it seemed as if work was purposely made in Hyde Park. Just now the authorities were putting down an expensive stone kerbing which was not only absolutely unnecessary, which would probably become a source of danger by reason of horses stepping upon it. Why they were putting such a kerb along Rotten Row he could not conceive; they had done without it for centuries, and the only explanation for laying it could only be that there was some money in hand which it was desired to spend.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE: I know nothing against this kerbstone, but I will make inquiry. I may point out to the hon. Member that the Vote covered expenditure in St. James's and other Parks, as well as Hyde Park.

Vote agreed to.

3. £30,855, to complete the sum for Houses of Parliament Buildings.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he noticed a charge for double sashes for the dining and grill-room windows. Similar items appeared on the Estimates two years ago, and he would like to know if the money then voted was expended on different works? He should watch this matter with some suspicion, as he feared there was a tendency to divert money for the purposes for which Parliament granted it. The promise of a Committee to consider the question of the structure and arrangements of the House of Commons rendered it unnecessary for him to go at any length into some of the matters he had intended to discuss. He did think there was a necessity for enlarging the post office, while the store rooms connected with the Vote Office were both ill-lighted and badly ventilated, being really unfit for any one to work in. Next, he wanted to know if the men employed in the House had been granted an eight hours day; surely they ought in this respect to be treated in the same manner as the employés in the Army and Navy Departments.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he was glad to hear that a Committee was to be appointed to discuss matters in connection with the arrangements of the House. He quite agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough that the post office was not large enough, and he held further that the staff of clerks was inadequate. But he wished the right hon. Gentleman to direct his attention to the condition of St. Stephen's Crypt Chapel. This was an exceedingly beautiful building, but all who had visited it recently would have noticed that the frescoes and other decorations were becoming frightfully disfigured by damp. It would be a very great pity indeed if the damp were allowed to increase the mischief. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take speedy steps to see that that was put right. There was another department in which he was much interested, and that was the Library. He had repeatedly raised questions as to the provision of which he might call the necessities of their existence. For instance, if they wanted certain Law Reports they had to go to the Lords' Library for them. He objected to having to do that, in view of the friction between the two Houses. Was it not ridiculous that the real legislators should be compelled to go to the House of Lords to look up the records as to the practical effect of their own legislation? During the Debates on the Local Government Bill it was frequently necessary to refer to the Law Reports for decisions on certain points, but the volumes were only to be had from the Lords' Library, and it was often the case that when reference had to be made that Library was closed and the officials had gone home. Now, he was not asking that the shelves of the Library of the House of Commons should be encumbered with a lot of musty old tomes, but he believed that the Council of Legal Education had recently prepared a new edition of Law Reports which had brought within a reasonable compass all the important decisions of the last 30 years, and he thought that that would prove a useful addition to the Library. He was not asking that the edition should be obtained in the interests of the lawyers who came down there to study their briefs, but he advocated it in view of the convenience of hon. Members generally. He wished, finally, to complain of the character of pens placed in the corridors and Library.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) said, he wished to direct the attention of the First Commissioner of Works to the question of the want of accommodation on the floor of the House. This was an inconvenience not experienced by Members and ex-Members of the Government; it was felt solely by private Members. Of course, the Benches on ordinary occasions were not crowded; but there were times on which private Members, unless they could spare time to come down to the House early in the day, found it impossible to get a seat from which they could hear what was going on. He hoped that the Government would take into their serious consideration the question of enlarging the House.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I admit that the occupants of the two Front Benches may not be the best witnesses on this question of the accommodation, but I would suggest to the noble Lord that hon. Members must look at the construction of the House not from the point of view of exceptional occasions, but from the point of ordinary use, when the attendance is nothing like that which would call for the provision of 670 seats. The House, as at present constructed, is not badly designed for every-day purposes; and I am not sure that by endeavouring to secure the convenience of hon. Members during a few exceptional sittings, the convenience of the many would not be sacrificed. That is a point well worthy the consideration of the House at large.

MR. CONYBEARE hoped that neither the present nor future Governments would not go on the line of increasing the size of the House. What they wanted to do was to reduce the number of Members to about 450, which would be sufficient for all legislative purposes; for such a number the accommodation was ample.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford) desired to draw the attention of the First Commissioner of Works to the absence of any means of communication between the House itself and other parts of the building. There ought to be some easy mode of communication between the House and the smoking-room and the Library, instead of Members who had to deal with a vast mass of correspondence being kept in total ignorance of what was going on in the Chamber. He was well aware of the fact that the Party Whips preferred the present system, as being better calculated to ensure Members voting straight. Some years since, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University was First Commissioner, he, upon the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion, got up a Memorial in favour of some change in this respect, in order to strengthen the right hon. Gentleman's hands against the Treasury. He induced at least half the Members of the House to sign it, and then presented it. The right hon. Gentleman took it away to some foreign watering place to consider, but nothing was done, and he had since regained possession of the document, which he intended to keep as an interesting memento of his first and last effort to get up a Memorial. He believed that the Exchange Telegraph Company offered to supply information of what was going on in the House to the Smoking Room and the Library for a sum of £500 or £600, if an operator and machine could be placed behind the Speaker's Chair, but their offer had not been accepted. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would agree to devote some consideration to this matter.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, he desired to strongly confirm what the hon. Member for Camborne had said with regard to the beauty of the architecture of the crypt, which was being destroyed by damp. The chapel was a structure well worthy of preservation in the utmost possible efficiency; it was the finest one of its kind in the Kingdom, and probably could not be surpassed by any structure of its description in the world. The interesting small room used as the cloak-room was also a fine specimen of architecture, and it ought to be kept in a condition worthy of the House of Commons. He complained that the tea room was not sufficiently lighted in the afternoons. Seeing that hon. Members were compelled by reason of their legislative duties to remain within the precincts of the House, he thought they ought at least to have the tea room as well lighted as the tea-rooms in their own houses.

Mr. Radcliffe Cooke

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he wished to support the First Commissioner of Works in the refusal which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman was about to give to the request that the House should be enlarged. In his opinion, the House was quite large enough for the purpose for which it was used. He was entirely opposed to any proposal that would deplete the Benches of that House of supplying information of what was going on in it to hon. Members in the smoking room or the Library. It was the duty of hon. Members to attend in the House, and they ought not to ensconce themselves in the Library and smoking-room. But he was bound to admit that writing, smoking, dining, and tea-rooms were too small. Hon. Members to eat, drink, and smoke, and sufficient accommodation should be provided for them. The occupants of the Front Benches, he believed, had their private rooms behind the Speaker's Chair, but private Members had no such privileges and they had to struggle for the writing tables and for the pens in most unseemly fashion. Many people could not write without smoking, and some even could not think without smoking, and he did hold it to be rather hard that the accommodation in this respect should be so restricted. Every Member knew what the smoking-room was like, and the accommodation in that respect should have been doubled or trebled years ago. If two or three other smoking-rooms were provided, they would not be too much. The same thing might be said of the accommodation for writing. There was no doubt about it that the writing and smoking-rooms were most uncomfortably crowded whenever the business occupying the attention of the House was not of very general interest. He hoped that steps would be taken to considerably increase the present quite inadequate accommodation given to hon. Members.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE was understood to point out that it was impossible to alter the windows while the House was sitting, but the work was to be carried out as soon as possible. The question of St. Stephen's Chapel and the chamber adjoining the cloak-room should receive immediate attention. Some minor matters had been alluded to by various hon. Members with regard to the accommodation of the House, the post office, tea-rooms, and so forth, all of which appeared to him questions that should be settled by the Committee. He had no doubt that the Committee which it was proposed should be appointed would keep in view all questions relating to the general convenience of Members.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he raised the question last year as to the accommodation in the Gallery, and asked whether the Committee, when it was appointed, would see its way to improve the present troublesome restriction which did not allow ladies to be accompanied by their husbands and brothers, but compelled them to sit away by themselves. It was a curious fact that ladies were not regarded as "strangers," and that, therefore, the arrangements which he proposed for their comfort last year were passed over. He trusted this question of better accommodation for ladies visiting the House would be brought forward for discussion before the Committee. Unless the right hon. Gentleman would promise that, he should oppose the appointment of the Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN thought that ladies should only be allowed access to certain portions of the House as now, and not to the Galleries generally all over the body of the House. If the Committee were to be empowered to make alterations in that direction, he would do all he could to prevent the appointment of the Committee at all.

MR. A. C. MORTON, referring to an hon. for £450 for lamp oil, said, he never saw a lamp in any part of the House, nor could he find out how that sum of money was expended. He hoped some explanation would be given, and if the right hon. Gentleman would inquire into the matter he would probably find that a saving under that head might be effected.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) pointed out that the accommodation set apart for the public was already extremely limited. If ladies were allowed to occupy seats in the Strangers' Gallery, which was already insufficient for the public, he should oppose the innovation. The space at present so limited for the use of the public should not be still further diminished.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE said, he would see that the question of the oil lamps received proper attention. He did not say the Government could give a day for a discussion, but they were perfectly willing, if it was the wish of the House, to assent to the appointment of a Committee; and he would suggest that some Member might put down a Motion for appointing a Committee for the purpose. The remarks made that evening showed clearly what the wish of many Members was. His idea was that such questions as that of the admission of ladies to the Strangers' Gallery might be referred to a Committee. That question had not been included in the Reference to previous Committees. He did not like to express a personal opinion on the merits of any particular proposal; but it seemed to him that it would be acceptable to Members generally if a representative Committee were appointed to consider the whole question. With regard to the hours of labour of the workpeople employed by the Office of Works in the Houses of Parliament, it was not possible to consider them without reference to all classes of workpeople employed by Government. It was his intention to consider the question as a whole.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, he was a Member of the last two Committees upon whose recommendations certain changes had been made. When the appointment of another Committee was proposed he would suggest "Let there be a discussion, so that it might be known what it was desired that the Committee should consider." On the last Committee the question arose whether the wording of the Reference would allow the Committee to consider the admission of ladies to the Strangers' Gallery, and it was decided that it would not. A discussion would now be the best means of elucidating the points to be considered by the Committee. As to the expenditure for oil, each succeeding First Commissioner had his attention drawn to it and gave the same answer—that the matter should be looked into. He did not know what troubled waters were calmed by the oil provided, or what light was thrown upon their proceedings by this expenditure of £1,300.

Mr. HANBURY (Preston) thought the First Commissioner was under some misapprehension in treating the question of eight hours a day for those employed about the Houses of Parliament as part of the larger general eight hours question, because he understood they were not Government servants at all. They were in the hands of that mysterious Commission mentioned the other day, whose existence was unknown to the Members of it. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman could not get out of an answer on the general plea he had given, as they were not Government officials, and the House was entitled to some explanation from the right hon. Gentleman upon this particular Vote—how the servants about the Houses of Parliament would be dealt with in this particular matter.

*Mr. H. GLADSTONE said, that the persons he referred to were employed directly by the Office of Works.

Sir J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras) said, the question of the accommodation for Members was not left in a satisfactory position. If a Committee was to be moved for, it ought to be moved for by the Minister responsible for the arrangements. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to show a little more backbone in the matter; and if there were to be a Committee appointed, to move for it himself rather than leave the responsibility to any individual Member. He made that suggestion in a friendly spirit, and trusted the right hon. Gentleman would accept it.

Mr. H. GLADSTONE said, the only desire of the Government was to meet the general convenience of Members. He should be ready to put down a Motion for a Committee on the understanding that the Government were not prepared to make any promise as to giving time for a discussion.

Sir J. GOLDSMID did not think that the few minutes that might be devoted to the discussion of the terms of the Resolution would be a serious loss of time to the Government.

Mr. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham) said, that last Session he had so many applications from his constituents for admission to the House that at one time he had 100 names on his list. If ladies also were to be admitted to the Galleries he would have nothing else to do but keep a list of applicants.

Mr. HERBERT (Croydon) regretted that of the several demands made upon the Government by the Refreshment Committee only one was provided for. All the alterations and improvements which had been suggested were postponed; and this was particularly disappointing to Members as regarded the suggested communication between the dining-room and the kitchen, for by that alteration alone could any real improvement in the arrangements be effected.

Sir R. TEMPLE said, that no Public Body, whether County Council, local, or otherwise, would be so slow in moving. It had always taken years and years before anything was done, and he felt sure, unless some effort were made, these matters would again take four or five years in carrying out.

Vote agreed to.

4. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £31,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1895, for the Extension of the Admiralty Buildings."

*Mr. STUART-WORTLEY asked how it came about that the original Estimate of £195,000 had been exceeded by £100,000?

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES thought that the new buildings promised to be a very handsome pile, but it was disappointing that their completion should be so long delayed. Until they were completed the much-needed thoroughfare between the Mall and Charing Cross could not be made for the enormous traffic between the lower part of Regent Street and the Strand.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. Member that that was not the question before the House.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES explained that the failure to open a thoroughfare arose from the delay in carrying out the Admiralty buildings, and he pressed for accelerated speed that the traffic might be relieved. In that respect the delay in completing the buildings was very serious, and he would be glad of an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman in the matter.

*Mr. H. GLADSTONE said, that the increased cost of the buildings had been due partly to a considerable rise in wages and in the cost of material, but more particularly to the necessity for laying the foundations deeper than had been at first anticipated. The buildings were by far the best Government Offices which had yet been built. As to the opening from the Mall to Charing Cross, that could not be made until the present block was completed. The question would then be considered. He could not enter into the matter more fully now, because a large expense was entailed, and it depended upon financial considerations as to how quickly the work could be pushed forward in future years.

Mr. HERBERT said, he had noticed on the east side of the building an extraordinary cupola, which in two days had disappeared again. Might he ask for an assurance that it would not be adopted as a permanent portion of the structure? He noticed that there was a sum of £5,000 down in respect of Block 1 for the removal of the staff of the Admiralty. Did the right hon. Gentleman contemplate the removal of any portion of the staff into the new building during the present year?

Mr. H. GLADSTONE said, he hoped that might be done. With regard to the cupola, he was bound to say that the first inquiry he made upon entering the Office of Works was with regard to the structure to which the hon. Gentleman opposite had alluded. The architect came to the conclusion that the base of the cupola was too heavy, the finial too high, and that the curves were wrong. The alteration was being carried out now.

Mr. HERBERT: Will there be another experimental exhibition of the cupola?

Mr. H. GLADSTONE: I do not know that it will be necessary, after the experience from the section that was put up.

Mr. A. C. MORTON said, he did not pretend to lay the responsibility upon his right hon. Friend, who was now First Commissioner of Works, but it appeared to him that there was great delay with regard to these buildings. It might be thought that they were saving money; but they were not doing that, and instead were losing money, because of the rent they had to pay for the wretched old rooms in which much of their business had now to be transacted. He hoped the Government would push on these works as fast as they could, and he believed they could do so without loss to the Public Purse. With regard to the foundations and extra basement, it seemed to him very extraordinary that the cost should amount to £110,000, or more than 50 per cent. of the original Estimate. He should like to have some details as to what was being done with the money. He had said that the First Commissioner was not responsible for the matters he had mentioned, but he was, at all events, responsible now for carrying on the work as fast as possible.

Mr. PLUNKET (Dublin University) said, that last year when they were discussing this question the then First Commissioner of Works held out a rather gloomy prospect as to the time when this Admiralty building would be completed. He said it would take two years from that time to finish Block 1 and seven years to finish Block 2.

Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE: What I said was that it would take two years before the second block was commenced.

Mr. PLUNKET said, he did not wish to insist upon his recollection as against that of the right hon. Gentleman. He was glad to see from the preliminary statement affixed to the Estimates that it was hoped the first block would be finished at the end of the summer or at the beginning of autumn. If that were so, it would be very satisfactory if some hope could be held out that the second prediction of the First Commissioner of Works would not turn out so badly as he feared. It seemed an extraordinary thing that it should take seven years to complete this block.

Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE: What I said was that seven years would elapse before the time of the completion of the whole building.

Mr. PLUNKET said, as he understood, the first block was to be completely finished and ready for use by the autumn of the present year, and that a sufficient amount of money had been taken for completing the furnishing of the building as well as for the building itself. He did not know whether the First Commissioner of Works could hold out some better prospect as to the completion of Block No. 2. He would venture to ask him when the second block would be finished?

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, he did not think they ought to miss so important a point as that raised by the hon. Member for Peterborough without some explanation from the Government. A difference of 50 per cent. upon an Estimate was almost unheard of, and would not be tolerated by any private individual. There were two grounds in respect of which he saw reasons for the increase—wages were higher, and the additional storey might account for another portion of it. But the cost of material had not increased. In fact, it ought to be less, and he must say that with the two exceptions he could not see any ground for so large an increase. If it were a matter for their own private expenditure the architect would be seriously taken to task for such an outrageous increase over the Estimate. The difficulty as to the foundations was one which ought to have been discovered before by means of borings.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Is not the increase due to the fact that although this is supposed to be a brick building there is a vast amount of stone put into it?

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, there was no doubt that the building had cost a great deal more than was estimated; but he was not responsible for that. He merely carried on the contract which was entered into by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and he himself was anxious that the work should be completed within as short a time as possible. The delay which had taken place had its origin in the mode in which the work was carried out from the beginning—by the erection of the building in two blocks instead of as a whole. It was the late Government that determined that it should be erected in two blocks. The first block would be completed at the end of this year—that was to say, at the end of the two years that he anticipated when he spoke last year. The second block would then be commenced, and, judging from the progress made with the first block, the second block would be completed at the end of four years from the beginning, which would make 12 years in all from the commencement of the scheme. That was not altogether a satisfactory state of things, but, as he had said, it arose from the decision of the late Government to erect the building in two blocks instead of one and a half from the unforeseen difficulties with regard to the foundations. The building extended 35 feet more into the Park than was originally intended, and instead of adhering to the original design it was decided to transfer the Admiralty storey into the first block, and for that reason the character and size of the rooms had been altered. That was the best explanation he could give of the various causes of the increase.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, he thought the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman opened up a matter of grave consideration. He had told them that the character of the rooms in the building had been completely altered. Those who remembered the discussion upon this building in 1887 knew what took place. The building was erected in accordance with the recommendation of a Committee which sat in that year. Great trouble was taken by the Committee upon the point of the construction of the rooms and they thought it desirable that instead of everybody having a small room to himself the work should be done in large rooms, so as to provide for greater economy and better supervision. Now it appeared as the explanation of the increased cost of the works, that this careful decision of the House of Commons had been reversed by the Government, and that they had gone back to the old system of small rooms, which was condemned by the Committee. This was a question of principle, and far more important than that of cost, which, as a fact, had not been satisfactorily explained at all. The increase of 50 per cent. had not been accounted for, unless it was said that it was owing to the alteration of the rule laid down by the House of Commons—to resort to the old system of small rooms. That seemed to be the only excuse for this 50 per cent. increase—that the Government had upset the deliberate decision of Parliament. He had been in the Civil Service for many years, and he knew it was generally acknowledged that in the interests of the Public Service it was better that the officers should occupy large rooms. The House of Commons had given the Government authority to act in this way, and they were entitled to know why the change had been made. The plans of the building were exhibited, and he asked a question as to whether this arrangement was being carried out, and Mr. Smith and the Chairman of the Committee distinctly stated that the recommendations of the Committee had been adopted. He thought that the late First Commissioner ought to tell them upon what authority the Government changed the plans of the building as they were decided by the Committee.

MR. PLUNKET said, the time referred to by the right hon. Gentleman just now was the time when he was at the Office of Works. It was an entire misapprehension, which he did not think was intended, to assume that the recommendations of the Committee had been departed from in this matter. There would be in the building large rooms as recommended by the Committee, and it was quite a mistake to suppose that that principle had been abandoned. The only changes which had been made, and which would cause but a very slight difference in the number of large rooms available for the use of the clerks, were made upon the earnest representation of the Admiralty, with whom they were in communication at that time. His noble friend who was then First Lord consulted his staff, and it was upon the urgent advice of the authorities at the Admiralty that the changes were made; but the number of large rooms available for the purposes of the clerks had not been substantially reduced at all. There certainly was no intention to depart from the recommendation of the Committee, and, so far as he knew, the recommendation had not been departed from. He believed that one or two rooms had been changed in allocation, but there was no change of small rooms for large rooms. He did not want in the least degree to shelter himself behind the Report of the Committee, but he did say that they tried to carry out the Report of the Committee as far as possible to the letter, and that any departures made as to the distribution of the rooms in the new building were made under the express advice of the authorities of the Admiralty. He was glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that they might hope that within a period of four years this building would be completed, and not only that, but he assumed that they would have the advantage of the way being opened up from the Park into Charing Cross, which would undoubtedly be a great convenience and do much to facilitate traffic.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he had no doubt the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman was all right, except that he said the alterations were made by the Admiralty themselves.

MR. PLUNKET: I said upon the advice of the Admiralty.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, of course these were the very people who would want to alter the large rooms into small rooms. It was these officials against whom the Committee was fighting in order to get these large rooms for the better carrying on of the work of the public. He did not say that the Commissioner of Works was responsible, but this was a matter which was not to be looked over very lightly. The Government had said that the building would be erected for a certain sum, and then it turned out that there was an increase of £110,000, or 50 per cent. upon the Estimate. He had no doubt they would hereafter have other increases, perhaps to the extent of £40,000 or £50,000. All Governments ought to get proper estimates, and let the House know what was going to be the cost. He hoped the present Commissioner of Works would get this building completed as soon as possible.

MR. HANBURY said, it was difficult to arrive at the facts in this case. The reason given by the late Commissioner of Works for some portion of this increased expenditure was that the plans had been altered, and that there were a good many small, instead of large, rooms. No sooner was that statement made than up jumped the previous Commissioner of Works and said that there was not this number of small rooms in the building. It was important that they should know the facts in this matter. It was not only that the House had been deceived, but the Committee had been deceived also. The Committee went very thoroughly into the question, and witnesses were called who said that not only in the interests of economy, but of good management, the clerks should cease to sit in the small rooms, and it was arranged that there should be large rooms in the new building. He contended that they were throwing away all the benefits that they had expected to get from the new Admiralty Buildings if the clerks were going to be placed in a series of small rooms. He agreed with the hon. Member for Peterborough that the Admiralty officials were the last people who should be consulted upon this matter. They had got into a groove with regard to a good many things, but to the best of his recollection there was not one witness who came before the Committee that did not impress upon them the desirability of enlarging these rooms. While one evil was being remedied another of a similar character was being perpetrated, and the result would be that the annual cost of the Admiralty Office would be as great in the future as it had been in the past. As there was a difference of opinion between the two ex-First Commissioners as to the course that had been taken, he should like to know what were the facts of the case. Was one right hon. Gentleman right when he said there was a system of large rooms in the Admiralty, or was the other right hon. Gentleman right when he said there were a series of small rooms?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I should be very sorry to be in conflict with my right hon. Friend, but what I understand is this. According to the plan of 1887 the principal officers were to be in the old building. The Admiralty Office, however, made a requisition that they should be allowed to remove their principal officers to the new building. Those officers do not want large rooms. The new building, as I understand, was to be laid out wholly in large rooms. The removal of the principal staff necessitates the provision of small rooms, which are of a more expensive character, for their accommodation. No doubt the old Admiralty will be remodelled in parts and larger rooms will then be provided. The principle of having large rooms for large bodies of clerks will, no doubt, be carried out.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, he understood, then, the cause of the extra expense was that the new building, which was to have been made in large rooms, had been made in small rooms for the admirals, secretaries, and people of that kind, and, further, that another sum was going to be spent in making large rooms in the old Admiralty for the clerks. It was extraordinary that after Parliament had sanctioned the expenditure of £195,000 the Government should, without authority, have altered the plans and thereby incurred additional expenditure, in order to provide certain officials, he supposed, with better rooms than they had at present. He said that no Government had any right to alter the building, at a large cost, without consulting Parliament. He moved the reduction of the Vote by £1,000, in order that Members might have an opportunity of considering the question, and of obtaining an undertaking that the original plans and the alterations would be exhibited in the tea-room. It was quite clear that the late Commissioner had had a great deal to do with the alterations.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That £30,200 be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Bartley.)

DR. CLARK (Caithness) said, he did not think the proposed reduction would be of any value. As a matter of fact, it was the ex-First Commissioner on the other side of the House (Mr. Plunket) who made the changes, and they had been actually carried out. He supposed that the only thing that could now be done was to sue the right hon. Gentleman and the late Government for spending the additional money.

MR. PLUNKET: As far as I am concerned, I have no objection whatever to the suggestion of my hon. Friend, that an opportunity should be given of showing exactly what alterations have been made. I venture to say that the result will be to show that the alterations are very small indeed. The idea that the system of large rooms has been sacrificed is an entire mistake, and the amount of money actually expended on the alterations forms a very small part of the increased expenditure. It will be found, I believe, to be something less than a tenth part of the whole additional expense.

MR. H. GLADSTONE: £12,000.

MR. PLUNKET: Yes; £12,000 was the whole expense which was incurred by these alterations, and the sacrifice of the principle of large rooms can hardly be said to exist at all. No doubt some of the rooms in the new building have been allocated in a different way from what was originally intended when the plans were made, but any changes that were made during the time that I had any knowledge of the Office of Works were made at the instance and by the advice of the officers of the Admiralty. I have no reason to think that they sacrificed to their personal convenience the whole of the Service, and I believe that the more this matter is inquired into the more it will be found that there is really no substantial ground for the grave view that has been stated by some Members of the Committee. I do not in the least wish to shelter myself from responsibility. I shall be very glad if the matter is inquired into, as I consider that a totally different complexion will then be put upon it.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE: I shall be very glad to have the plans showing precisely the difference between the original plan and the alterations that have been made placed in the tea-room. As the money has been already spent on the building, I hope the hon. Gentleman will not press the reduction.

MR. BARTLEY said, it would quite satisfy him if the plans were produced.

MR. A. C. MORTON asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would also issue a statement showing how the excess sum was made up?

MR. H. GLADSTONE: Yes, I will do that.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

5. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £59,278, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1895, for Expenditure in respect of Miscellaneous Legal Buildings—viz, County Courts, Metropolitan Police Courts, and Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland."

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, he saw that a large sum of money was included in the Vote for the Metropolitan Police Court Buildings. He had frequently protested against such expenditure out of Imperial funds on the plain and simple ground that outside London each town paid for its own police courts, whereas London did not. He believed he almost carried an Amendment on the subject at one time, and he had certainly thought that some alteration should have been made.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am not surprised at my hon. Friend bringing this subject forward again. He brought it forward last Session, and in the discussion that took place upon it my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt) promised to take steps to transfer these courts to some Local Authority. Within a very short period after the discussion in this House we communicated with the London County Council, and proposed that they should take over the police courts. The matter is a very complicated one, and we have been in communication with them ever since. We have had three or four interviews with representatives of the County Council, and only about a fortnight ago we had our last interview. We are still in treaty with the County Council for the purpose of getting them to take the courts over. They do not refuse to take them over, but they, of course, would like to have a quid pro quo. It is very natural that when they are asked to take over an expenditure of this kind they should desire to have something in return. I was hopeful that before the Vote came on this Session the buildings would be transferred. I am sorry to say that that has not yet been done. I think there is every prospect of making an arrangement, and if my hon. Friend will only give us a little more time I hope to be able to succeed in carrying out the object he has in view. I entirely sympathise with that view myself, and have always done so since I have been in the House.

*MR. STUART-WORTLEY: The announcement which has just been made by the right hon. Gentleman is a very serious one. Not only is the matter very complicated, but it will require legislation to effect this transfer. Those who have listened to previous discussions on this subject will remember that it has always been mentioned and never disputed that if you are to effect this transfer of charge from the Imperial Exchequer to the London County Council, or in some other form to the shoulders of the London ratepayers, there will inevitably be put forward claims for a set-off in respect of burdens which the London ratepayer at present pays, and which it is arguable that ratepayers in similar communities in other parts of the country do not have to bear—in other words, you will have in some way to revise the arrangement of 1888, under which the London County Council area was created, and under which the Exchequer contributions were made. Therefore, it comes to this: that for the sake of this purely theoretical re-arrangement of burdens under which if anything the Exchequer will be a loser rather than a gainer, for the sake of making the arrangement respecting these police courts square with what I may call the copybook theories of Radical legislators, the Government are burdening themselves with further legislation in spite of the fact that they have more already on their hands than they can hope to get through.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, he did not concur in the argument used by the hon. Member who had just sat down. He (Mr. Powell Williams) did not see why the taxpayers of Sheffield should contribute anything whatever towards the cost of the police court at Wandsworth. He did not understand on what ground the London County Council demanded a quid pro quo for the taking over of these charges. He should have thought it was the other way about. It seemed to him that the ratepayers of London for a long series of years had been receiving in regard to their local legal administration assistance to which they were not entitled and which no county or borough in the country received. Under these circumstances, he should have thought that the Government might have demanded from the London County Council assistance in the other direction.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: I wish to point out that I did not say that the claims to sets-off would be in all cases just, but that they would be arguable. What I meant was, that in regard to such financial re-adjustments you had better "let sleeping dogs lie."

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the hon. Gentleman seemed to be under the impression that, although the demand of the London County Council would be unjust, if it was arguable it ought not to be contested, because otherwise money might be lost over it in a Court of Law. On that (the Ministerial) side of the House Members were in favour of action, not because it was not arguable, but because it was just. He thought they were sufficiently powerful to deal with the London Members, and to let them look after their own pickpockets and their own gaol-birds. It was 25 years ago that he first called attention to this matter, and he had gone on preaching in the desert ever since. He did hope the Government would bring in some sort of legislation on the subject. Let there be a proper adjustment by all means, but let the question not be postponed because they were to "let sleeping dogs lie." Who were the "sleeping dogs"? He saw the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Burns) opposite, and he was sure the hon. Member would not suggest that anything unfair had been done in asking that London should pay for its own police courts.

MR. BARTLEY said, that as a Metropolitan Member, he had always taken the view that London ought to look after her own police courts. He could not, however, see the logic of the present position. If London ought to pay for the police courts, surely the County Council ought not to demand something to compensate them for doing so. If they were to be compensated, things might just as well go on as at present. If the London people were going to be so wonderfully virtuous, let them be virtuous for once, but do not let them say they would be virtuous on condition that they would be paid for it. Of course, they all knew what was at the bottom of this. The County Council wanted to get possession of the police. They would be a long time in getting that, and the Government ought to put their foot down and say so. The County Council were trying to use this question as a lever in order to get possession of the police, which no Municipal Authorities in any capital city in the world had yet obtained.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I think my hon. Friend is very unfair and unjust to the London County Council. They made no proposal to the Government in respect of this matter. The Government made a proposal to them, and I have every confidence that the County Council will treat the matter in a fair spirit.

MR. BARTLEY: But I think it was the right hon. Gentleman himself who said that they wanted a quid pro quo.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley

T. HIBBERT : Yes, I know d so, but that is no reason why I give it. I have every confidence in the London County Council with this matter in a fair way, comes to an arrangement with the City Council hon. Members will have an opportunity of expressing an opinion when the Bill is brought forward. The City Council made no proposal to us, we who made a proposal to

C. MORTON said, he objected to the people of Peterborough having to pay for the London Police Courts. He did not understand why there should be a pro quo, and he trusted that the London County Council would give way to the Government and pay for their own

J. ROLLIT said, he did not think the London Members would be unreasonable in a case of this kind. In the case of local administration of justice the principle that was applied to every borough was applied to London. So far as pro quo being necessary, it was his duty to tell him that if the London ratepayers ought to pay for the police courts they ought to pay for the Magistrates.

J. OWELL WILLIAMS wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman what part he had taken in the negotiations with the London County Council he had raised the question of the payment of the Magistrates in London? In all cases in the case of England the Stipendiary Magistrates were paid out of the borough rates and he thought that the same principle could prevail in England.

HIBSON BOWLES said, he thought that the questions involved were too large and important for the Bill to be confined to the maintenance of the Metropolitan Police Courts

J. OWELL WILLIAMS called attention of Mr. Deputy Speaker to the fact that it was now after 12 o'clock.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER said, the 12 o'clock Rule had been suspended.

HIBSON BOWLES said, he wished to point out that the question of the maintenance of the courts.

XXII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he agreed that it was a much larger question than that involved in the maintenance of the police courts. But the Government had thought it advisable to take one step at a time, and had not dealt with the question of the payment of Magistrates or the taking over of the staff. If they could see their way to carrying that one step out it would clear the ground for taking further action at some future time.

MR. HANBURY wished to point out the peculiar position in which the Committee were placed. This was a large subject, and it was impossible that it could be fully threshed out to-night. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to say whether there was not an understanding that this discussion should cease at 12 o'clock. The Committee could very well discuss the question further on, on the Vote for Magistrates' salaries. There had not been a single Division since the Deputy Speaker left the Chair, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not press for any Vote after this to-night.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he desired to report Progress after this Vote had been taken.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDER (HOUSING OF WORKING CLASSES) BILL.—(No. 3.)

Read a second time, and committed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.—(No. 1.)

Read a second time, and committed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 2.)

Read a second time, and committed.

BEHRING SEA AWARD BILL.

On Motion of the Attorney General, Bill to provide for carrying into effect the Award of the Tribunal of Arbitration constituted under a Treaty between Her Majesty the Queen and the United States of America, ordered to be brought in by The Attorney General, Sir Edward Grey, and Mr. Sydney Buxton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 123.]

MERCHANDISE MARKS (FILES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Stuart-Wortley, Bill to amend the Merchandise Marks Acts, 1887 and 1891, in respect of the marking of Files, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Stuart-Wortley, Mr. Coleridge, Sir Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett, and Colonel Howard Vincent.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 126.]

HOP SUBSTITUTES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Brookfield, Bill to regulate and restrict the use of Hop Substitutes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brookfield, Mr. Channing, Sir Edmund Lechmere, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, Mr. Rankin, Colonel Warde, Mr. Griffith-Boscawen, and Mr. Godson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 127.]

NAVY (VICTUALLING YARD MANUFACTURING ACCOUNTS, 1892-3).

Annual Accounts presented,—of the Cost of Manufacturing, Provisions, Victualling Stores, &c., at the Home Victualling Yards for 1892-3, with the Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General thereon [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

NATIONAL DEBT (SAVINGS BANKS).

Copy presented,—of Balance Sheet setting forth the Assets and Liabilities of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, in respect of Trustee Savings Banks on 20th November, 1893 [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

SUPERANNUATION ACT, 1884.

Copy presented,—of Treasury Minute, dated 14th March, 1894, declaring that Henry Highman, Inspector of Telegraph Messengers, Post Office, was appointed without a Civil Service Certificate through inadvertence on the part of the Head of his Department [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

GOVERNMENT INSURANCES AND ANNUITIES.

Accounts presented,—of moneys received and disposed of, and of contracts made, for the grant of Deferred Life Annuities, and for Payments on death, during 1893 [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

ARMY (PENSIONS OF SOLDIERS.)

Copy presented,—of Further Regulations relative to the Pensions of Soldiers [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

TRADE REPORTS (ANNUAL

Copies presented,—of Diplomatic and Consular Reports on Trade and Commerce Nos. 1331 (Greece), 1332 and 1333 (Portugal) [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

TRADE REPORTS (MISCELLANEOUS SERIES).

Copy presented,—of Report of the Subjects of General and Commercial Intelligence No. 326 (United States) [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES).

Copy presented,—of Statement of the Expenditure from the Public Education in England in the year 1893 upon Annual Elementary Schools, also the Statement of the Income of Elementary Schools on 31st December, 1893, &c. [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

EDUCATION (EVENING SCHOOLS) ACT, 1894.

Copy presented,—of Code of Regulations for Evening Continuation Schools with Explanatory Memorandum, and Appendices [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACT, 1869, AMENDING ACTS, AND VARIOUS ACTS RELATIVE TO INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION.

Copy presented,—of Scheme for the Management of the Funds applicable to the Intermediate and Technical Education of the inhabitants of the County of Flint in the matter of Samson's Gift, of the Hawarden Free School, &c., of the Holywell Free School, and of the St. Asaph Free School, &c. [by Act]; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 45.]

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACT, 1869, AMENDING ACTS, AND VARIOUS ACTS RELATIVE TO INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION.

Copy presented,—of Scheme for the Management of the Funds applicable to the Intermediate and Technical Education of the inhabitants of the County of Flint in the matter of the Free School and Almshouse of David Hughes in the parish of St. Mary's, &c. [by Act]; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 45.]

House adjourned at 4 o'clock after Tea.

USE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 30th March 1894.

R. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The House being met, the Clerk at table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition:—Whereupon Mr. Mellor, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Chair, and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

QUESTIONS.

WORDS OF PREVIOUS CONVICTIONS.

R. E. SPENCER (West Bromwich): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is the custom in many Police Courts for the Magistrates, prior to hearing charges, to be furnished with information of the previous convictions (if any) of the party charged; and, if so, will he issue directions that such information shall in future be furnished until after the Magistrates have decided to convict?

R. HANBURY (Preston): Before the question is answered I should like to know whether it is not also true that previous convictions are put before Chairmen of Quarter Sessions and Judges of Assize before they sum up to the jury, and whether at certain Petty Sessions the procedure by which previous convictions of prisoners is proved is often very lax?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. BATH, Fife, E.): In reply to the question of the hon. Member for West Bromwich, I have to say that I have no reason to think that it is customary for Magistrates, prior to hearing cases, to be furnished with information of previous convictions (if any) of the parties charged. It is a practice is, in my opinion, to be greatly deprecated, and in the Metropolitan Police Courts it is not allowed. In answer to the hon. Member for Preston I may say I believe that what the hon. Member states is the case, in some parts of the country at any rate. In my opinion, that information ought not to be supplied until the time of passing sentence. I think it might possibly prejudice the case of the prisoner even in the mind of a perfectly fair and impartial Judge that he should know what the prisoner's previous criminal record was. As far as my influence is concerned, it will be in the direction for the discontinuance of the practice. I agree that the present system of identifying prisoners is very unsatisfactory. I recently appointed a Departmental Committee to consider this matter. The Committee have presented their Report, and I hope to be able to give effect to its recommendations, under which I trust the possibility of mistake, if not altogether prevented, will be largely diminished.

THE CHARITY COMMISSION.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon): I beg to ask the Parliamentary Charity Commissioner whether it is intended to add to or alter the composition of the Charity Commission in order to enable that body to carry out the new duties imposed upon them by the recent Local Government Act, and to obtain Returns of charity accounts from the numerous charities in which such Returns are now in arrears; and whether it is intended by that body in carrying out such new duties to apply at once or gradually the Resolution of this House of 18th May, 1886, that every scheme ought to provide for the majority of the trustees or managers being directly elected by the ratepayers in the locality to which the charity extends?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) (who replied) said: (1) The question of making proper provision to enable the Charity Commissioners to discharge, consistently with the due execution of their other duties, the particular duties mentioned in the question, will be raised at the proper time; meanwhile, the Commissioners have no information upon this point. (2) It has been stated in the Report of the Charity Commissioners for 1892 that for many years past they have introduced into their schemes the principle of the representative appointment of trustees, and that the representative element has not infrequently been placed in a majority by those schemes. The Commissioners do not propose to recede from the practice thus stated in the administration of the Local Government Act of last Session.

MR. DODD : May I ask what, in the opinion of the Commission, is the proper time at which these questions should be raised ?

MR. ACLAND : I suppose some time between now and November.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) : Is it a fact that subsequent to the Resolution being passed by this House in May, 1886, a Select Committee reported they had satisfied themselves that the Resolution could not be practically carried into effect ?

MR. ACLAND : I think it very likely they said that in reference to certain cases. The hon. Gentleman must understand I am only acting temporarily on behalf of the Charity Commission, and I can only give him the information they have forwarded to me.

THE ESSEX FISHING GROUNDS.

MR. DODD : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the soil of the public fishing ground in Essex, where the recent collision took place between fishermen of Tollesbury and fishermen from Burnham, is vested in the Crown or in whom it is vested ; and, if it is vested in the Crown, whether he will advise the putting in force of the Crown rights in order to preserve the soil of the public fishing ground from being removed by the Burnham men to their private oyster grounds to the destruction of the oyster culture on such public fishing grounds, or what steps he will take to prevent the public fishing ground being destroyed ?

MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich) : At the same time I may ask the right hon. Gentleman what course either he or the Fishery Department propose to adopt in order to preserve the public fishing ground of the Colne and Blackwater from further depredations in respect to removal of cultch ?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) : The soil of the fishing ground where the recent collision took place between fishermen of Tollesbury and fishermen of Burnham is primâ facie vested in the Crown, and cannot, therefore, be claimed by one set of fishermen more than another ; but I am advised that it is a question of great legal nicety whether the cultch which lies on that soil is the property of the Crown or not. The best way of protecting these fisheries would appear to be to enlarge the powers of the Sea Fisheries Committees to make bye-laws, and this will require legislation. I will consider how far this is practicable.

Mr. Acland

DANGEROUS DERELICT.

MR. MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that, on the night of 28th February last, the rudder of the S.S. Larne was smashed by a floating derelict in latitude 47° 27' N., and in longitude 12° 2' W., the bearing of the Lizard at the time being N. 60° 49' E., 310 miles ; and will the Government cause inquiry to be made into the matter, and immediately concert such measures as will avert a similar catastrophe happening to our passenger and Mercantile Marine service in our trade routes between here and America ?

*MR. MUNDELLA : From the deposition regarding this casualty, which was taken on the 5th instant at the Custom House at Falmouth, and is on record at the Board of Trade, it appears that while the S.S. Larne was running under steam and sails before a fresh south-westerly gale accompanied by a very heavy cross sea, her rudder broke across horizontally at the water line. The casualty was attributed by the master as being "probably due to striking a floating spar." I am advised that with equal reason it may be attributable to the rough state of the weather. To search for every floating spar in the North Atlantic and elsewhere, and take it out of the water, would be a serious undertaking, but on a later question I will explain what the Government propose to do in the matter.

PRISON WARDERS' HOURS.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can hold out any hope of being able to introduce such reforms into the administration of the prisons as will shorten the long hours of the prison warders, and such alterations as will tend to make promotion more equal and rapid throughout the whole Service.

MR. ASQUITH : The whole question of the long hours of prison warders was gone into in 1891 by a Departmental Committee, of which the hon. Gentleman was a Member, and which suggested many improvements in the conditions of service, since carried into effect. The whole subject is engaging my attention, but I am not at present in a position to say more.

ILLUSTRATED LESSONS ON INTEMPERANCE.

SIR J. WHITEHEAD (Leicester) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is prepared to recommend, as part of the curriculum of our elementary schools, such instruction, either by coloured drawings or otherwise, as will show the evil consequences on the body and mind of drinking intoxicating liquors?

MR. ACLAND : The Code and Revised Instructions to Inspectors already make provision by which lessons on the subject of temperance can be given, and there is a slight addition to the New Code on this matter. The provision of drawings and the like, which may be valuable as illustrations, rests with managers and Boards, and not with the Department.

WORKING HOURS AT THE CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether telegraph clerks are employed on special wires in London from 6 p.m. until 6 a.m., whereas two clerks are employed in the country districts to perform special wire duties; whether clerks in the Central Telegraph Office, after having performed a week's duty of six days of 10 hours' duration, are called upon to work 12 hours' additional duty on the Sunday; and whether, having regard to the exhaustive character of the work, he will follow the example set by the Government with reference to employés, and grant an eight hours day for telegraph clerks?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.) : (1.) It is the fact telegraphists are employed on special wires in the offices of provincial newspapers in London from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m., whereas at provincial offices the duties are divided. Formerly the same arrangement obtained in the provinces as in London, and it is only from a desire to meet, as far as possible, the wishes of the Press and the convenience of the staff that the duty is not yet divided in London. (2.) In order to avoid calling upon the telegraphists to give two attendances in the day, the duties are so distributed as to give a working day of 10 hours and a working day of six hours, instead of two working days of eight hours each; and for the convenience of the staff themselves these long and short attendances are taken on alternate weeks. I find that in two or three cases telegraphists, after working a long attendance during the week, have given a further attendance on Sunday of 12 hours. And I have given instructions that this shall not be permitted in future.

CUSTOMS STATISTICAL DEPARTMENT.

MR. GROVE (West Ham, N.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the annual allowances of money, granted in addition to salary for special work, to abstractors and clerks in the Customs Statistical Department, and to second officers at certain of the Customs outports, are in accordance with the terms of the Orders in Council, which abolished duty pay; and, if not, whether such allowances can properly be granted in other Departments of the Service?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) : There is no analogy between the allowances referred to (which are of the nature of allowances for acting in a superintending capacity) and the duty pay forbidden in the cases of certain classes of Civil servants by the Orders in Council. There is no ground for extending the system of allowances in other branches of the Department or in other Departments.

HAULBOWLINE DOCKYARD.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Government intend to complete the equipments necessary to Haulbowline, so as to enable all kinds of repairs to be finished in the dockyard as originally intended; whether any portion of the enormous naval expenditure will be expended in Ireland; whether

H.M.S. Warspite is to be towed across to Devonport for repairs; and whether, having regard to the want of employment at Haulbowline and Passage, the Admiralty will give a fractional share of the work to those places?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): (1.) While there is no intention of fully equipping a sixth dockyard, the Haulbowline Yard plant is being rendered more and more capable of repairing ships in case of emergency. (2.) Yes; both at Belfast and Haulbowline there will be expenditure during the year 1894-5. The coastguard vessels on the Irish coast are repaired at Haulbowline, as well as the Warspite, so far as her repairs can be conveniently arranged for. (3.) When the Warspite proceeds to Devonport it will be under her own steam. (4.) The Admiralty have done, and will do, their best to allot to Haulbowline Yard and to contractors in the neighbourhood of Cork any work that can be done there with due regard to convenience and economy.

THE DESTRUCTION OF DERELICTS.

MR. MACDONA: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that a deputation waited upon the Prime Minister on the 16th instant to lay before him a Petition signed by about 900 masters of vessels, representing about 31,000 seamen, praying the Government to take immediate action in concert with the United States Government for the destruction of floating derelicts, now so numerous and so dangerous to the lives of passengers and seamen crossing the Atlantic; whether the present Prime Minister is as willing to act in concert with the American Government as the late Prime Minister stated himself to be in January last; and what steps do the Government propose to take to bring about so desirable an undertaking?

MR. MUNDELLA: My right hon. Friend has requested me to answer this question. The Prime Minister has forwarded to me for consideration the Memorial referred to by the hon. Member. It bears the signatures of 891 persons stated to be masters of British ships. Conferences have already taken place between the Admiralty and the Board of Trade on this question, and, in concert with the First Lord, it is arranged to appoint a Departmental Committee on which the Admiralty and the Board of Trade are to be represented, to consider and report on the Memorials which have been received, and the correspondence which has taken place on the subject of floating derelicts.

CLUBS AND EXCISE LICENCES.

MR. DODD: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether clubs which alcoholic liquors are sold to members are exempt from the necessity of taking out licences in cases where the profits of such sales go to the individual proprietors of such clubs, or in cases where the club is under contract to take such liquors from individual vendors or brewers so as to be in effect a tied house if such clubs are exempt, whether he is aware that such clubs compete seriously in many places with inns paying heavy Licence Duties; and whether he proposes to make any alteration in the matter?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): There is not any exemption in favour of clubs from the Licence Duty payable in respect of the sale of intoxicating liquors under the conditions mentioned in the question. In any case, therefore, of a proprietary club at which the liquors supplied are the property of the proprietor and are sold by him to the members penalties are incurred, under the Licensing Acts and the Excise Acts unless the proprietor is the holder of a licence authorising the sale; and where evidence of sale has been forthcoming there have been successful prosecutions in such cases.

THE DISARMAMENT QUESTION.

SIR J. WHITEHEAD: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, looking to the reported expressions of the King of Denmark to the effect that he knows that Russia, Austria, and probably Italy, are willing to enter into negotiations with other nations for a general reduction of armaments, the Government are now prepared to take steps with the object of bringing about a conference on the subject?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Of course, I cannot answer for reported statements of the King of Denmark. I will only repeat what I said the other night, that the Government will take every opportunity which appears to them to be favourable to promote the object indicated in the question. It is not possible at present to make any further statement on the subject.

INCOME TAX RETURNS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will issue a Return, in continuation of No. 228 of Session 1890, on Income Tax Assessments, made up to 5th April, 1893?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Return for which the hon. Member asks can be given in about six weeks. If he wishes it, a Return made up to April, 1892, could be presented more quickly; but probably he would be willing to wait for the more complete Return.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON COMMISSION.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to give notice that, in consequence of the answer given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday, that it is not intended this Session to propose legislation in pursuance of the Report of the University of London Commission, that I will on Friday, April 20, draw attention to the Report, and move a Resolution.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CHARITY COMMISSION (PARLIAMENTARY CONTROL).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) said, he had to move, as an Amendment,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether it is desirable to take measures to bring the action of the Charity Commission more directly under the control of Parliament, and to give it more effectual means of dealing with the business which will come before it."

The Charity Commission, the hon. Gentleman pointed out, consisted of two parts—one constituted 41 years ago for dealing with charitable trusts, and the other constituted 25 years ago for dealing with endowed schools. The major department, as he might term it, for dealing with charitable trusts had its origin in a very long continued and exhaustive inquiry by a Royal Commission, which sat from the years 1818 to 1837. Then in 1835 a Select Committee was appointed by the House of Commons, it being composed of its most experienced Members, and including Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell. That Committee drew up a very interesting and valuable Report, which formed the basis of a Bill that was not passed till 1853. By that Act the Commission was constituted for dealing with charitable trusts. The Act was amended in 1855 and amplified in 1860. The Act of 1853 fell far short of the recommendations of the powerful Select Committee of 1835. It, however, gave considerable powers of investigation; it enabled the Commissioners to apply to the Court of Chancery for orders with respect to charities; and in case these proceedings were insufficient, it empowered the Commissioners to introduce new schemes into Parliament, which schemes had to go through all the stages of Bills. Application to the Court of Chancery was found to be a cumbrous and costly proceeding; and the passing of schemes through Parliament fell through and became abortive. A Select Committee of the House in 1884 again examined into the matter, and in their Report drew special attention to the fact that the Charity Commission was not represented in Parliament, that there was no Minister responsible for its schemes, and that no Members were interested in conducting them through the various stages. This was the reason why the system became abortive. By the Amending Acts of 1855 and 1860 some defects were remedied; but the remedies applied by the Act of 1855 did not nearly approach the recommendations of the great Committee of 1835. An Amendment introduced into the Act of 1860 had a more vital effect, by exempting charities of a greater annual value than £50 from the prescribed procedure, and by that Amendment the Act was shorn of much vitality and force. The Charitable Trusts Department was thus founded upon three Acts of Parliament, the latest of which was passed 33 years ago; and that fact alone was sufficient to show that occasion must have arisen for some change in the matter of procedure. He had been very much struck by the magnitude of the interests affected. It was difficult to get at accurate figures, but a voluminous and careful Digest, which occupied many years in preparation, was laid before Parliament in 1876. It showed that the cases known to the Charity Commission at that time numbered 36,000, that the trustees connected with them held 524,000 acres of land, and that the income administered amounted to £2,200,000. Since that time a great many additional trusts had been discovered. Of the total number of trusts no fewer than 4,805, with an annual income of £227,000, had been founded since 1837. He now had to deal with the Endowed Schools Department of the Commission which was created in 1869 by an Act of Parliament. It was admittedly more or less of an experiment, and the duration of the Act was limited to four years. In 1873 there was another Committee, into whose inquiry more or less acute political and even religious controversy entered. The result was that in 1874 an Act was passed which put an end to the Endowed Schools Commission as constituted, and transferred all its powers and duties to the Charity Commission, to which two members were added. The Act expired in 1879, and he believed he was correct in stating that since that time the Commission had been kept alive by the Expiring Laws Continuance Act. Such briefly, and without minute details, were the origin and objects and powers of the Charity Commission. As to its constitution, it was sufficient to point out that there was a Chief Commissioner, with second and third Commissioners on the charitable trusts side, and 10 Assistant Commissioners (five of whom appeared on the Estimates, however, as temporary Assistant Commissioners); and on the endowed schools side there were two Commissioners and seven Assistant Commissioners. Thus the whole staff of the Commission consisted of one Chief Commissioner, four Commissioners, a Secretary, and 17 Assistant Commissioners. He left out of sight the position of Parliamentary Commissioner, which had been filled by the hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench

(Mr. J. W. Lowther), and also by the hon. Member for Merionethshire (Mr. T. Ellis), but at the present moment it was not filled by anyone. The expenditure of the Commission was £15,000 in 1854; £27,565 in 1874; and the Estimate this year was £40,380. He thought he would carry with him the assent of the House when he said it was eminently desirable that there should be occasional investigation into the working of these extra-Parliamentary bodies; and even the Commissioners would assent to this, because their Reports were strewn with suggestions as to the modification of their powers, which could hardly be carried out in legislation without being first embodied in the Report of a Select Committee. There were ample precedents for this Motion. In 1873 they had an inquiry by a Committee into the operation of the Endowed Schools Act; they had similar inquiries in 1884 and 1885 into the working of the Charitable Trusts Department, and again in 1886 and 1887 into the endowed schools work. Some very valuable recommendations were made by these Committees. Eight or ten years having gone by he thought his proposal one which would commend itself to the House. And he believed it would be felt by many Members that this was a particularly opportune moment for his Motion. The Local Government Act of last Session, which would ever be associated with the name of the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary of State for India, who displayed so much tact and statesmanship in conducting it through the House, cast new and onerous duties on the Charity Commissioners. His Motion was divided into two parts. But the first and, he was free to confess, the vital part—that portion relating to the new duties he had just touched upon—was as to whether it was desirable to take measures to bring the action of the Charity Commissioners more directly under the control of Parliament. He thought it would be agreed that the present position of things was inconvenient. The Government were not responsible for the Charity Commissioners. They had a Parliamentary Charity Commissioner who sat at the Board, and was therefore a connecting link, but he had no controlling or dominant voice in the work of the Commission, and really Parliament had no control over the Commissioners themselves. They might one day have the reductio ad absurdum of the system in seeing the Government compelled to support the grant of money in the Estimates for a policy of which they did not approve. The Committee of 1884 suggested the appointment of a Sessional Committee to deal with schemes just as the Commons Committee now dealt with enclosure proposals. The recommendations of the Committee of 1886-7 were to the effect that the responsibility of the Commission to Parliament should be clearly defined and made complete. It was in the hope that that might be the outcome of the proposed Committee that he brought forward this Motion. Finally, a word as to the spirit in which he made his proposal. He indulged in no carping criticism as to the labours of the Charity Commission. They had in the Commission a great engine for good. They had there men of high character and great ability, who were doing their duty to the State. To the Chief Commissioner and the indefatigable Secretary he was much indebted for their unvarying courtesy. But no human institution was perfect; and he had no doubt the Commission in its working might be improved by a healthy examination by a carefully constituted Select Committee. When one went into the rooms of the Commission at Whitehall he found them rather stuffy: they smelt rather of the schools; but if the windows were thrown open a little wider, and the healthy breezes of public opinion admitted, they would get more business-like common sense in its proceedings. It was in no spirit of hostility or carping criticism that he brought forward his Motion, but he earnestly and respectfully commended his Motion with the belief that its acceptance might strengthen and develop the powers for good of the Charity Commission.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) said, he proposed to follow the example of the hon. Member for Rushcliffe in casting no aspersions on the conduct or policy of the Charity Commission, and he did not think it would be necessary for him to detain the House at any great length. The Motion was one which he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer might accept without demur. He might remind the House that when a Select Committee was appointed some years ago the whole question of the charities was in a state of chaos. There had been a very long investigation, and many important facts had been brought to light, but there had been no well-defined policy; indeed, he ventured to say there was still no such policy in regard to the poorer charitable institutions. But since then circumstances had vastly changed. The changes which had been continually taking place and the circumstances of the people rendered it necessary to deal with the charities which had been left, and which might be given in the future, in a somewhat broader spirit than had been exhibited hitherto. Indeed, Parliament had found it necessary to apply many charitable bequests to purposes differing from those for which they were originally left; although, of course, the purposes were kept as nearly analogous as possible. He believed that the Commissioners themselves felt that they required larger powers and greater freedom in dealing with these charities, for at present they were constantly bound and hampered by existing provisions which were really out of date. It was with a view of enlarging and defining their powers that this investigation was now asked for. He hoped that hon. Members would agree with him that the proper time for making that investigation had come, and for having a Parliamentary Commissioner in the House in order to give Members a better means of dealing with the subject. At present the position was peculiar, as the Government had to defend acts and expenditure for which they were not responsible. They ought to have in the House a Representative able to answer all questions and to indicate the policy of the Commission. The position of the Commissioner would not be actually on a par with those of the other Charity Commissioners. He hoped that such an appointment would be made, for it seemed to him that if such a Commissioner were appointed he would have a very practical position in the House, and would be found of great service and assistance in dealing with the various questions as they came up. The Act of last Session proposed that there should be some Representative of the Charity Commissioners appointed with a seat in that House. He trusted that this part of the subject needed no further arguments on his part to induce hon. Members to assent to a Select Committee being shortly appointed. As to the second part of the Motion—namely, the desirability of bringing the action of the Charity Commissioners more directly under the control of Parliament—such a course was unquestionably now necessary in consequence of the growing need of the country. What was essential was that they should have the charities honestly, faithfully, and well administered, with due regard to the intentions of the testator, and ensuring that the class intended by him to be benefited should reap the benefit. He could not suggest a better way of securing that than by having a careful investigation made in the first instance of those charities which seemed specially to require to be under the direct control of Parliament. He was sure that if a Committee were appointed they would deal with the question faithfully and well. At present he did not think it could be said that many of the charities were properly and satisfactorily administered, or that they were administered with a due regard to the provisions under which they were specially bequeathed. He did not think that a lengthy investigation by the Committee would be necessary, looking at the facts that they would have before them; but he did think that if a Select Committee were appointed, it could do much to further the object in view, and if it were not too hampered by the terms of Reference the result of their investigations would be of the greatest value, and some useful legislation would be the result.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"A Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether it is desirable to take measures to bring the action of the Charity Commission more directly under the control of Parliament, and to give it more effectual means of dealing with the business which will come before it."

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) said, nobody would complain of the length of time occupied by the Mover and Seconder of the Resolution; on the contrary, any criticism made would be on the ground that their speeches had treated the matter too superficially, and had glossed over altogether the really important points where difficulties might be expected. The hon. Member for Rushcliffe gave a very rapid historical survey of the causes which had led to the appointment of the Charity Commission, but he made no suggestions for improving the present method of administration; he did not deal with the causes which were said to necessitate the present steps being taken, nor did he make a suggestion as to the way in which the Charity Commissioners were to be in fact brought under the more direct control of Parliament in the future. He was very anxious to be informed on these two points; but, to his regret, as soon as the hon. Member got to the crux of the question, he looked at it steadily in the face and then quickly passed on to some other unimportant detail. A good deal of the speech of the hon. Member was taken up in considering the question of how far the Commission could be brought more directly under the control of Parliament. That was a separate question.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: The words of my Motion are—

"To give it more effectual means of dealing with the business which will come before it."

MR. J. W. LOWTHER said, he would deal with that presently. But the main point before the House was the proposal that the Charity Commissioners should be represented by a Minister in the House—a Minister to be called, he supposed, the Charities Minister, or the Minister of the Interior. He thought the House might have fairly looked to the hon. Member himself for some light and leading in the matter. He had performed a prominent and useful part on one of the Committees in connection with the matter, but he had now given them no indication of his views. The House might fairly ask why a Select Committee was now thought to be necessary at all. They had a great mass of evidence on the subject of charities already to hand, and no new subject for inquiry had been mentioned. Those who wanted information had only to turn to the Blue Books for the past few years, and to the Annual Reports of the Commissioners themselves. The question had also often engaged the attention of the House, and several Bills had been introduced, some of which had passed the Second Reading, and therefore most hon. Members were familiar with the subject. He ventured to suggest that there was ample material to work upon already to hand, and that the appointment of a Select Committee was unnecessary. If the charities were so badly managed now by the Charity Commissioners at Whitehall, he failed to see how the fact that they were to have a Ministerial Representative in the House would in any way secure the better administration of the charity trusts. His hon. Friend had pointed out numerous cases in which Special Committees had been instituted with reference to particular charities, but he seemed to have forgotten altogether the fact that nearly the whole of one Session in 1883 was given up by a Committee to the subject, as was also the Session in the following year.

Mr. Howell

MR. J. E. ELLIS: The hon. Gentleman is not quoting my words.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER said, he thought he was fairly quoting the argument of the hon. Member, which was that the numerous inquiries which had taken place formed a precedent for a further inquiry. He would go further, and state that a great part of the Session of 1883 was taken up by an inquiry into the working of the Endowed Schools Act, in the course of which the action of the Charity Commission was thoroughly inquired into. The whole of the Session of 1884 was taken up by a Select Committee which was appointed to inquire into the working of the Charitable Trusts Act as worked by the Charity Commission. The whole of 1886 was taken up by the Select Committee that inquired into the working of the Endowed Schools Act as administered by the Charity Commission, and a considerable portion of the Session of 1887 was similarly taken up, and then, after the lapse of only seven years, the hon. Member came and said now was the time to have a thorough and a searching inquiry into the whole working of the Charity Commission. It seemed to him that they did not let the plant live, because they were always pulling it up to see how it was getting on. He regarded it as a most unnecessary proceeding to inquire into the whole working of the Charity Commission, because, as the hon. Member pointed out, the latter part of his Instruction to the Committee would raise the whole of that question. The hon. Member must know, from having served on the Commission, what very delicate subjects were touched upon, and what considerable friction frequently arose; and when friction arose, it meant a great expenditure of time in investigating and getting to the bottom of the matter, so that it was not very likely a Committee with such a wide Instruction as this would be able to conclude their investigations this Session, beginning at so late a period as it would be before this Committee was appointed. But, in addition to that, the hon. Member also informed them that the very point which he was now anxious to refer to a Select Committee had so recently been inquired into as last Autumn. The hon. Member informed the House that a Departmental Inquiry had been ordered and held by the Treasury, and he did not think he was committing any breach of confidence when he said that amongst others, he (Mr. Lowther) himself was summoned by Sir Robert Hamilton, the Chairman of that Committee, to give evidence before them, and he detailed his evidence before that Committee. The Report of such Committee, he presumed, was now in the hands of somebody, probably the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had not received a copy of the Report, and, so far as he knew, it had never been made public; but the Report was in the office, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Vice President of the Council would lay that Report upon the Table of the House, at all events the House would be in a better position to judge how far this very question, which the hon. Member now desired to go into, had been considered, and what were the views of Sir Robert Hamilton and the other very capable gentlemen who acted with him on that Committee in this particular. So much for past investigations. But the hon. Member said that the present was a very suitable time to inquire into the whole working of the Charity Commission; that the Local Government Act would come into force in November, and that it was desirable, if it was to do any good, that the new Minister for Charities and the whole paraphernalia which was to be set up, should be established and in working order before that Act was in force. Was that a reasonable proposal to make? Was it possible, with all the work the House had before it, and so short a time in which to transact it, that so thorny and difficult a subject could be adequately dealt with before that period? The hon. Member said it was a good time to inquire into the working of the Charity Commission. Of course, if they were making such inquiry it would necessitate the constant attendance of at least two of the Commissioners and probably of the Secretary. Already the work of the Charity Commission was considerably increasing in consequence of the Parish Councils Bill being about to come into force. Already applications were arriving at the Commission daily, and almost hourly, asking for advice, assistance, and instruction as to how far the Parish Councils Act, when it began to operate in November, would affect the particular charities in each locality. The work of the Commission, therefore, was already beginning in this very particular, and it seemed hardly a suitable time to take away two Commissioners and the Secretary twice a week for the whole of the Session in order that they might attend regularly upstairs instead of allowing them to carry out their duties in their office in Whitehall. He thought both the Mover and the Seconder of this Motion fell into one great error in the general view they took of the work of the Charity Commission. That great error was that they seemed entirely to have overlooked the fact that the great bulk of the work of the Charity Commission was construing Acts of Parliament. The Charity Commission, when they were established, were established almost as a branch of the Court of Equity. They had to administer the law. They could not, in the great bulk of the work that they dealt with, give scope to any private opinion which they might have, or to any great views of policy which they might desire to introduce into the administration of the charities. They had to administer the law as they found it, and not as they would wish it to be. They were, just as much as the Court of Chancery itself, bound by former decisions of the Court; they were tied up very narrowly by the Acts of Parliament of 1853, 1855, and 1860, and other Acts; they could not go outside the corners of those Acts, and he could not think that a Minister would be in a position, unless he were a legal gentleman, to administer these Acts of Parliament and to construe it which was at present the ordinary everyday duty of the Charity Commission. If the hon. Member would look at words of the Act which constituted the Commission, he would find that out of the three Commissioners two were obliged to be barristers of 12 years standing. Why was that provision introduced, and a standing so very high as 12 years, which was an unusually long term, insisted upon? The reason was because it was intended that the Commission should relieve the Court of Chancery of a great part of the work which they did, and, therefore, it was necessary that the Acts should be administered by gentlemen of legal training who were capable of construing the Acts with which they had to deal. During the four or five years he was connected with the Charity Commission he was very strongly impressed with the fact that practically it was so difficult to put one's own views and desires into the administration of these charities because they were being tied up in certain directions by the law which the Commission had to administer. There was another inquiry into this matter—that of the Schools Inquiry Commission—who reported that the work of the Charity Commission was divided into five heads. The first of these was the protection of charities against frauds or adverse claims. Secondly, that was a matter with which the Charity Commission were fully capable of dealing as a Minister might be doing in this House. It was not a matter in which policy could enter at all; it was solely and simply a matter of construction of legal rights. The second head was “the authorisation of legal mortgages, and sales.” The same rule applied here. The third head was “the appointment of trustees,” and there he admitted that questions of policy might arise, and he was sorry to think that questions of Party policy might very likely enter into that. He thought it was very desirable that they should not enter, and that was why he stood so strongly against a Minister having control of this matter, and its being taken out of the hands of an independent body of gentlemen who were not swayed and did not change from time to time, as the gentlemen came and went from the Treasury Bench. The next head was the removal trustees or masters, and, lastly, the power of framing new schemes. There, again, the matter of policy did enter to some extent; but in that very matter of framing new schemes the Charity Commission were not able to go one inch outside the doctrine of Cy-près as laid down by the Court of Appeal. In his opinion, it would cause great mischief to introduce a Minister to deal with these matters, which it would be far better to leave in the hands of an administration independent of the changing politics of the day. That was the original recommendation made by Lord Brougham's Commission; made by the House of Commons Committee in 1835, and made by Lord Chichester's Commission in 1849. These three inquiries went fully into the matter, and recommended as the result of their investigations that this Commission should be an entirely independent body. Nothing had occurred since to alter the status of the Commission, and it would be a great mischief if Party politics were allowed to enter into the administration of these charities. As he said, during the course of the Debates on the Parish Councils Bill, the Charity Commission was not a very popular body. The Tory Party thought it too Radical, and the Radical Party thought it too Tory; therefore, the probability was, that it did justice. Lord John Russell was strongly of that opinion, because he said in introducing the Bill to the House—

Mr. J. W. Lowther

"It would be better that the question of the general superintendence and administration of charities should be altogether separated from any political question and from the interests of any Party."

There was one other matter. As he had said, the action of the Charity Commission was subject to appeal to the Court of Chancery. If any person was aggrieved by any decision arrived at in the construction of different Acts, that person had the right of appeal to the Court of Chancery. He should not envy the position of a Minister in that House if his decisions were appealed from to the Court of Chancery and he was overruled. If it happened once, it might pass; but if it happened more than once, he thought the Minister would never hear the end of the mistake which the Court of Chancery would have held he had made. He remembered some years ago his hon.

and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth, who was Solicitor General, made some obiter dicta with regard to licences, and it was afterwards held that his view of the law was not correct. It was a great many years before his hon. and learned Friend heard the last of that from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the position of a Minister would be even worse if he, in the capacity of a Minister, gave a judgment which was subsequently overruled by the Court of Chancery. He had only this to add: If the Government thought it was a desirable and opportune moment to hold a full investigation into the affairs of the Charity Commission, and to inquire into this very matter upon which they themselves, through their agents, were at the present time informed, it did not rest in their (the Opposition) mouths to oppose them. He was speaking entirely in his individual capacity, and not in any way as representing his hon. Friends on that side of the House when he said that he could not conceive a more inopportune moment for the sake of the Charity Commission and for the sake of the House itself. It was admitted it was impossible to make any change before November, and any changes which would have to be introduced would have to be introduced by legislation. He fully admitted that the powers of the Charity Commission required alteration, but he was sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer would admit that to attempt seriously to deal with a Bill of that kind, which would largely increase the powers of the Charity Commission, would be adding to such an extent to the already heavy load he had to carry that it would really break his back. He should regard it as a very mischievous thing if they were to introduce anything in the nature of Ministerial control which would tend in any way to bring Party politics to bear in these matters. He would only say that during the four or five years he had the honour of a seat at the Board of the Charity Commission he found no difficulty and no friction arising. His position was simply this: that he was in the House to answer any questions that might be put during the course of the Session. When the Vote came on, although he was not responsible for the details of the Vote, he was responsible for, and ready to reply upon, any points relating to the policy of the Commission. If any point had arisen upon which the judgment of the majority of the House was contrary to the policy of the Commission, then there was no doubt that a Vote would have been passed at the instigation of the Government stating their view as to the policy that ought to be followed, and there was no doubt that in such a case the Charity Commission would have at once followed the policy indicated. He hoped that no friction had arisen—although he was rather inclined to think such was the case from the way the matter was dealt with by the Mover of the Motion—between the hon. Member whom he saw opposite who had acted as the fourth Charity Commissioner in this House—

MR. J. E. ELLIS: No such inference must be drawn from anything I have said.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER was glad to hear it, because he was afraid, from the way in which the hon. Member put a hypothetical case, that friction had occurred. He believed that the fact of a Commissioner being present in the House, and being in touch with hon. Members both in the Chamber and also privately in the Lobbies and elsewhere, was a great advantage both to Members of the House and also to the Charity Commission itself, and he should be very loth to disturb an arrangement which had been so highly recommended by those who had considered the subject.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he was very glad to hear the Mover and Secunder of this Motion say that they had not in their mind any desire to pass any hostile reflection upon the Charity Commission, or upon the able men who administered the work of that Commission. He believed they had the entire confidence of the House and of the country, and he hoped that anything said of these gentlemen would be said entirely upon that footing. The hon. Member for Cumberland had spoken, in the able way he always spoke, on a matter with which he was very well acquainted; but he was sorry that the hon. Member, during the five years he was at the Charity Commission, thought he was a member of an unpopular body—being unpopular with the Tories for one reason and with the Radicals for another. There was an intermediate body which was strongly represented at Birmingham, but no commendation of the Charity Commission had come from the right hon. Members for West Birmingham and Bordesley, so that the Commission was unfortunate in the respect that it had been criticised in many quarters. One reason for that was not the fault of the Commission or of the Commissioners, but the fault of the position which it occupied. The hon. Member had referred to Lord Brougham's Committee in 1835, and to its having represented in its constitution a Committee independent of Parliament. There was another Commission at that time still more important—namely, the Poor Law Commission—and that Commission was independent of Parliamentary control. One of the most acute and intelligent writers who had ever treated of the constitution of such bodies—the late Mr. Bagehot—said of the Poor Law Commission—

“The experiment of conducting the administration of a Public Department by an independent and unsheltered authority has often been tried, and has always failed. Parliament always talked at it until it made it impossible.”

That was the position of the Charity Commission. Parliament talked at it and criticised its action. The hon. Member said there had been Committee after Committee on this subject. Why had there been? They had had Committee after Committee because there was something with which Parliament was dissatisfied. In spite of the ability and character of the gentlemen who composed the Poor Law Commission, it was found impossible to sustain it. The same objection applied in a great degree to all independent authorities of this kind. Parliament became inquisitive; it became more or less a judge when they had bodies of that kind; and unless they could satisfy Parliament and the House of Commons that the matters were being administered in the way that was desired, they would always have Debates, Committees, and Inquiries of this character. The hon. Member for Cumberland had given a great many reasons why this Motion should not be acceded to. He understood the hon. Member himself said that he considered the Commission was too much tied up. That was the very reason why the Commission should have Parliamentary representation. A Parliamentary Representative would state what should be done. There were, for instance, restrictions which ought to be removed, and provisions passed for protecting and freeing the hands of the Commission so as to enable them to do what they ought to be able to do. The hon. Member seemed to think that the legislation with regard to charities and the Charity Commission, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, could not be altered. That was not so, and the moment they brought the Commission into Parliament they would find what were the obstacles in the way of its legitimate and beneficial action, which could be best removed by legislation. The hon. Member also said that the Commission consisted of lawyers of 12 years' standing, and that led him to think that the Bills must have been drawn up by lawyers. In moving for this Committee there was no intention to declare in any manner the exact method in which the change proposed should be carried out—whether it should be in the relation in which the Local Government Board stood towards the Poor Law, or in the relation in which the Treasury stood to the Commissioners of Woods. Whatever might be the arrangement, he could not but think it would be to the advantage of the Commissioners themselves, as well as to the interests with which they were entrusted, that they should be brought more directly into relation with Parliament. With that portion of his hon. Friend's Motion, therefore, he was in accord. As to the second part of the Motion, it had been urged by the hon. Member for Penrith as an argument against the appointment of a Committee that the demands upon the Charity Commissioners at the present time were so heavy that a member of that body could not be spared to attend to give evidence. That was hardly to be regarded as an argument against the adoption of the Motion.

Mr. J. W. Lowther

MR. J. W. LOWTHER said, his point was that it was not an opportune moment, just at the time when applications were pouring in from all sides, to compel the attendance of two Commissioners, and perhaps the Secretary, before a Select Committee.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that no doubt the House of Lords had, in the Local Government Bill, thrown some additional work on the Charity Commissioners, and this furnished an additional argument for giving them more effectual means to enable them to carry out their useful work. He should be extremely sorry to think that the Motion had anything of a Party character about it. But he did think that it would be well to give the Commissioners some more effectual means of discharging the onerous duties which they had hitherto so well discharged. Therefore, he heartily assented to the Motion.

SIR S. NORTHCOTE (Exeter) said, he did not know whether the Vice President of the Council would take part in the discussion; but if the right hon. Gentleman did so, he hoped he would take the opportunity of informing the House whether the Government had come to any decision with regard to the Departmental Report which had been alluded to by some of the preceding speakers. He thought it was a pity that they were not put in possession of the views of the Government on this Report, and also made in some degree acquainted with its contents. With regard to the general question, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer was fairly to be congratulated on the lightness of heart with which he had accepted a proposal to add to the already formidable body of his colleagues in the Government. If the Charity Commission was strengthened in the manner the right hon. Gentleman had indicated, the Department would undoubtedly benefit by having a high official to fight their battles in Parliament; but he was not convinced that there would be any corresponding advantage to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He agreed that it would be well to give the Charity Commissioners more effectual means than they at present possessed to discharge their duties. He referred particularly to a point that had not been touched upon—namely, the very inadequate means the Commissioners had of securing the proper audit of the charity accounts, and he hoped the Treasury would afford them increased facilities in this direction. The remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the hon. Member for Penrith must have convinced the Mover and Secunder of the Resolution that the question was one which could hardly be disposed of so

Charity Commission

{COM-}

ly as they seemed to think possible, but such changes as they appeared to indicate would involve long and anxious consideration in that House.

hon. Member for Bethnal Green spoke of securing greater local control over the charities, but hon. members who remembered the discussion on this point in connection with the Local Government Bill would probably feel that any proposal to further divert existing charities from the purposes for which they were intended would meet with strong opposition. He shared the opinion that the present was not an opportune moment for the appointment of a Select Committee, especially as the effect of the Reports presented by Committees during the past 10 years had been that, on the whole, the duties of the Charity Commissioners had been faithfully discharged. No complaints had been made of the manner in which the Commissioners had discharged their duties by the hon. Member who moved the Motion. He confessed, therefore, that the programme of the Government was sufficiently full to make it perhaps advisable that any step of the kind suggested should be postponed until some further acquaintance with the working of the Local Government Act was obtained. He feared there was a disposition to enter with too light a heart on the question of transferring the working of our charitable system from a non-political body to members of a political Party. He was persuaded that any such change would be disadvantageous to the administration of charity. The Commissioners, in their Report for 1893, stated that their action in applying to the relief of the sick and aged charities hitherto distributed in doles had encountered frequent opposition; but that when once established, the system was most free from friction and discontent. He believed that there was considerable danger that if the Department were presided over by a gentleman with a seat in the House, it would find it less easy to resist the political pressure of certain constituencies, and the change would not be at all conducive to the fair and proper distribution of the charities.

House in en-

inquiries which had

good Commission sat in 185-

President of his right hon. Friend in

Board, and the recommendations of the inquiry had not been carried out. For three years he, with a number of hon.

Gentlemen on both sides of the House and with the general approval of

two Front Benches, had endeavoured

carry a Bill to put the recommendation of the Commission into operation. But as the Leader of the House had point

out, every effort at making the Char

Commission more effective for its w

had been stopped by the action of right hon. Members for West

tingham and Bordesley, whose

violent energies were always arou

against every effort to reform the Cha

Commission. He had listened great interest to the speech of his Friend the Member for Nottingham

introducing this Motion; but he thou

his hon. Friend had rather misplaced importance of the two parts of speech. It was useless to alter

constitution of the Charity Commi

unless they gave them power to car

the work they had to do. The mission had no power in th

of a charity over £50 a yea

out calling into action the powe

Attorney General and a very

Chancery suit that might almo

up the charity. The Cha

mission was utterly powerle

very cases where its power

needed, and there had been

waste of the charity f

owing, he believed, to

carrying out the very mo

sensible recommendation

mittee of 1884. He th

no use in inquiring

matter unless the Gov

to carry into effect the

of the Committee, and

Commissioners the

to save those charit

now wasted.

*SIR F. S. POW

that as he had had

on the Committe

perhaps the Hon

while he submit

servations on the

House in en-

inquiries which had

good Commission sat in 185-

President of his right hon. Friend in

Board, and the recommendations of the inquiry had not been carried out. For three years he, with a number of hon.

Gentlemen on both sides of the House

and with the general approval of

two Front Benches, had endeavoured

carry a Bill to put the recommendation of the Commission into operation. But

as the Leader of the House had point

out, every effort at making the Char

Commission more effective for its w

had been stopped by the action of

right hon. Members for West

tingham and Bordesley, whose

violent energies were always arou

against every effort to reform the Cha

Commission. He had listened

great interest to the speech of his

Friend the Member for Nottingham

introducing this Motion; but he thou

his hon. Friend had rather misplaced

importance of the two parts of

speech. It was useless to alter

constitution of the Charity Commi

unless they gave them power to car

the work they had to do. The

mission had no power in th

of a charity over £50 a yea

out calling into action the powe

Attorney General and a very

Chancery suit that might almo

up the charity. The Cha

mission was utterly powerle

very cases where its power

needed, and there had been

waste of the charity f

owing, he believed, to

carrying out the very mo

sensible recommendation

mittee of 1884. He th

no use in inquiring

matter unless the Gov

to carry into effect the

of the Committee, and

Commissioners the

to save those charit

now wasted.

*SIR F. S. POW

that as he had had

on the Committe

perhaps the Hon

while he submit

servations on the

Sir S. Northcote

help learning from his experience on the Committee how severe was the injury done to the Charity Commission by the conduct of that inquiry. The Committee had had before them as witnesses members of the Commission, and some were constantly in the room; but it must be borne in mind that all the time was not occupied in the room, for the Committee had to make inquiries in the office of the Commission itself in consequence of complaints made and accusations brought before the Committee. He had reason to know that the service of the Commission had been greatly injured by that long inquiry; and if the House granted a new Committee fresh difficulties would be created for a body they all desired to strengthen. He wished to confirm what his hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvon had said with regard to the recommendations of the Committees not having been carried into effect by the House. The Committee of 1887 had made several recommendations, none of which had been carried into execution. One was—and he doubted the wisdom of its policy—that every new scheme of the Charity Commission should be submitted to a Standing Committee. Another recommendation was that the Commission should be strengthened by the enlargement of the numbers of the Assistant Inspectors. That recommendation had, to a certain extent, been carried out—not by the Treasury, but by the County Councils. Power had recently been given to the County Councils to contribute to the expense of inquiries; Inspectors had been appointed to hold the inquiries, and the cost fell very largely on the County Councils. A further recommendation was that the official staff should be strengthened and increased, but that had not been carried into effect either. In fact, if there had been any shortcomings on the part of the Commission during the last few years, he believed they had arisen from the neglect of the Treasury to carry out the recommendations of the various Committees. He was all the freer to make that remark, as a Conservative Government had been in Office during many of those years; and, therefore, he was complaining of his own Political friends. A desire had been expressed that there should be more complete control by Parliament over the Commission. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Motion had quoted the recommendations of the Committee in 1887 in that respect, but he had entirely omitted to quote the Committee's concluding words. The Committee, after stating that the responsibility of the Commission to Parliament should be made more clearly defined, added—

“This may be more readily accomplished by appointing a Minister of Education.”

That was a clear and definite recommendation, but it had not been carried out. It referred, however, to the educational side only, and had no reference whatever to the Charity Trust side of the Commission. He believed there was a great danger, if they had a Minister in charge of charities, of bringing the political element into the administration of the Charities. In the case of the Local Government Act, which was passed last Session, with the agreement substantially of both political Parties, the only time when any heat arose was when the question of the charities came up for consideration; and he thought they should avail themselves of the lesson thus emphatically taught them. Another reason against such an appointment was that the work done by the Charity Commission was essentially judicial. The making of law was a good thing, and the administration of it was a good thing; but what he believed to be a bad thing was confusion between the administration of law and the making of law. They would have in the changes of Parties—the right and proper changes of Parties—in the House from time to time sudden changes of policy with regard to the charities, and those changes of policy must interfere in a manner highly dangerous with the administration of the trusts. He felt, however, that although the Charity Commissioners were not fully represented in the House, they had always responded to public opinion in recent years. There could be no doubt that many of the complaints made before the Committee in 1886 and 1887 had received full attention from the Commissioners. They had taken less money from the purposes of doles for the purposes of education, and had given more prominence to the technical side of education than formerly. In these points the Commissioners had acted in accordance with public opinion.

He doubted very much whether there would be anything gained by a fresh inquiry, but as the Government had assented to it he would not express his opposition to it further. The Charity Commissioners had passed safely through the somewhat severe ordeal to which they were exposed by the inquiries of 1884, 1886 and 1887. Though those Committees did make some recommendations, the action of the Commissioners was substantially vindicated, and they came forth from the inquiries with increased public confidence and with greater strength in the powers of a moral character which they possessed and which they had used so much to the advantage of the country.

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) said, that two complaints had been made in the course of the debate against the Mover and Seconder of the Motion before the House. One was that they had presented their case in so superficial a way as scarcely to justify the House in adopting the Motion, and the second was that they had suggested nothing in the way of remedy or change. With regard to the first complaint, he thought he was right in attributing the course pursued by his hon. Friends to a motive which hon. Gentlemen opposite should not fail to appreciate. His hon. Friends did not wish to appear, in asking for this Select Committee, to be moving a vote of censure on the Charity Commission. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Penrith had admitted that the Charity Commission was a very unpopular body. The hon. Gentleman had stated one cause; it would be quite easy to name others. But he intended to follow the good example of the Mover and Seconder. There were, however, two points to which he would make reference, because they formed part of the case for the appointment of a Select Committee. One was the delay—the intolerable delay as some expressed it—that took place in the discharge of certain duties of the Commission. He was not referring to the preparation of new schemes for the administration of charities, because those schemes might require protracted consideration. He was referring to the appointment of new trustees and matters of routine, which many people thought might be disposed of more quickly than they had been hitherto. He was in possession of information which showed that in some cases such matters had been in hand 9, 12, and even 15 months, when much shorter period would have sufficed to deal with them. Ten years ago so many complaints were made, that pressure was brought to bear on the Commissioners, with the result that there was considerable improvement; but now was informed that the delays were great as ever. The second point which he wished to refer was the arrears of work which the Commissioners themselves acknowledged. His hon. Friend behind him said, "What is the use considering the constitution of the Commission unless you give them more power?" Well, he (Mr. Carvell Williams) would ask, "What is the use of giving the Commission more power if they do not make use of the power they already possess?" The Report of 1892 contained the admission that there were 2,474 charities, the particulars of which had come into the possession of the Charity Commissioners, but which they had not yet had time to enter on their Registers. A second statement was that the accounts rendered by the trustees of charities to the Charity Commissioners, in accordance with the Act of Parliament, were nearly 8,000 fewer in 1892 than they were in 1889. The Commissioners accounted for that falling off partly by reason of the increased employment of their staff in preparing Statistical Returns for the County Councils and partly because of increased applications for information; so that it was impossible for the staff to give the same amount of attention to the accounts as was given in previous years. Well, if that had been the result of the creation of the County Councils, he left the House to judge how much greater results were likely to follow the passing of the Act to which reference had already been made. The hon. Member (Mr. Lowther) himself had told them that already applications for information were coming in at a great rate. The hon. Member might be sure that these were but as the drops before the coming shower. The hon. Member behind him (Mr. Rathbone) had on this occasion, as on some others, insisted on the necessity for investing the Commissioners with greater powers than they now possessed. He (Mr. Carvell Williams) said frankly that he had always opposed that, because neither he nor a large section of the public had confidence in the administration of the existing Commission. They thought that it was not constituted so as to adequately represent public opinion, and that its methods and procedure were not in harmony with the characteristics of the times. As soon as the required changes in that direction were made, he for one should cease to be an opponent of the powers of the existing Commissioners. Complaint had been made by the hon. Member (Mr. Lowther) of the absence of remedial suggestions. Well, he (Mr. Carvell Williams) was inclined to suggest that, while on the one hand they might increase the powers of the Charity Commissioners, and give them more work to do, it would also be highly desirable to relieve them of some portion of their burdens. Their work was very easily divisible, and he could see no reason why the work of collecting information, and such like, should not be put upon County Councils and other Local Bodies. He was in favour of the adoption of the principle of devolution in the case of the Charity Commission, and of the popularising of that body. It had been pointed out that the functions of the Charity Commissioners were, to some extent, legal functions, and that they could not be discharged except by legal experts. He had no desire to take out of their hands work which required legal knowledge and experience. But there were other functions which might with great advantage be placed in other hands than theirs. He thought, too, that the Local Authorities should have much greater powers than they now possessed in regard to the framing of new charity schemes. He did not share in the feelings expressed very frequently while the Local Government Bill was before them, as to the paramount necessity of having regard to the wishes and intentions of donors and pious founders. He would modernise the charities, and remove the power of the dead hand as much as possible; but so long as these charities existed he desired that, by means of the Charity Commission and legislation in the House, they should be administered so as to produce the greatest good for the greatest possible number.

Sir F. S. Powell

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) said, he only desired to emphasise one remark, and that was as to the powers of Local Authorities and the consideration paid to them by the Charity Commissioners at the present time. His experience showed that the representations of Local Bodies to the Charity Commission, with reference to schemes bearing upon personal aggrandisement affecting their localities, had not received the attention they ought to have received. He thought that Local Authorities ought to have greater power to make their voices heard, and when the Committee came to consider the work of the Charity Commissioners they should take that into consideration. Another thing he strongly protested against was the aversion of the Commissioners to anything like popular control. They had erected barriers against the appointment of local trustees, thoroughly cognisant of the needs of a locality, in the shape of a rateable qualification. In this way they had prevented men being appointed as trustees, although the people in the district who were mainly interested in the trusts had conferred the highest honour upon those men by choosing them as their Representatives in Parliament. He thought that the time had come when the Charity Commissioners ought to pay more heed to local demands than they had paid in the past, and he hoped that one of the results of this investigation would be the sweeping away of the barriers to which he had referred. It was only with the one desire of emphasising the absurd position taken up by the Charity Commission that he had risen. He was delighted that a Committee was to be appointed.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, it was to be regretted that both the last speakers had introduced an element of controversy into the Debate which, happily, had been absent until now. For his own part, he welcomed more Parliamentary interest—he would not speak of control—in the administration of the Charity Commissioners. He would add that he hoped Parliament would do more now in relation to these matters. It was well to have control, but had Parliament always exercised that supervision and care in relation to the work of the Charity Commission which it should have done? He ventured to think that in the past Parliament had neglected its duty in two respects. Educational schemes had been systematically brought before the House at a time when Parliamentary criticism was impossible—namely, after 12 o'clock at night. From that point of view Parliament itself was very much to blame, and if delay had taken place Parliament had contributed to it by its inability or unwillingness to find time to discuss these subjects. Take another case in which Parliament had neglected its duty. The Charity Commission was unpopular a few years ago because of the diversion of charitable funds to educational purposes. He did not say there was nothing to be said for it. In some cases the charitable funds were wasted and were better applied to education; but, on the other hand, the House had now come to the conclusion that that policy was both wrong and a mistake—that the diversion from the poor to the middle classes of those funds originally left for the poor was unjustifiable both in principle and practice. Parliament was to blame in consequence of the unreasonable hours at which such matters were discussed. He hoped that Parliament would take care in future that such discussions should take place at a time when they would be effective. They should give Local Bodies more control over the administration and application of charities. These bodies were on the spot, and had a better opportunity of judging what would be advantageous to them than anyone else, and a reform in that direction might very well take place. He only wished to add that, in his opinion, the Commissioners had done a great public work in the help they had given to technical education in London. Their action had not been marked by those delays and subjects of criticism which had been applied to them in other directions. As a Metropolitan Member, he thought London was greatly obliged to them for the gradual rise of those industrial institutions which were so material to the development of London.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether it is desirable to take measures to bring the action of the Charity

Sir A. Rollit

Commission more directly under the control of Parliament, and to give it more effectual means of dealing with the business which will come before it.

Resolved, That this House do immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.—(Mr. Acland.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Deputy Speaker do leave the Chair."

do

PISTOLS AND REVOLVERS ACCIDENTS.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN said, he was anxious to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the number of accidents caused by the indiscriminate carrying of Pistols and Revolvers call for immediate legislation."

He did not think he need offer apologies to the House for bringing this matter before it. It was a subject he had taken an interest in a long time, and the object of his Motion was one which he knew had the sympathy of many Members in all parts of the House. He had seen it stated in several newspapers that his bringing the matter forward was a work of supererogation, the Government having stated that they were in favour of the principle of the Motion. He was aware that the Government had brought in a Bill, and no one regretted more sincerely than he did that that measure had failed to get into law, but he did not think the Motion was a work of supererogation, for the reason that he had put the word "immediate" into it. His only fear was that perhaps the insertion of that one word would prevent the proposal being received with favour by the Government, because he felt sure that if it had not been inserted the Government would have a great deal of sympathy with the Motion. He had put the word in, because he thought that the time was come when this growing and growing evil must be seriously and determinedly grappled with. He did not propose to go into the merits of the Pistols Bill of last year. He did not know that it would be in Order to do so, but he might be permitted to say that the Bill was in a rather peculiar position. The whole Session was a peculiar one because, while it was practically given over to one Bill, the Government gave a pledge that no measure of a contentious nature should be proce with. There was one hon. Member who took a strong and active part against the Bill, and, unfortunately, that Member was able to procure 37 hon. Gentlemen to go into the Lobby on a Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate, and these were quite sufficient to show the Government that there was some contentious matter in the Bill. The Government having given that pledge, of course there was nothing further for them to do but postpone the Bill. What hon. Gentlemen could have found contentious in the Bill he was bound to say he could not understand. They were not friendly to armed burglars, and they could not be in favour of allowing young children—mere babies—to go about carrying these absolutely useless and extremely dangerous weapons to the great danger of themselves and their unfortunate neighbours. Here was a case reported in all the newspapers yesterday—

“Fatal Revolver Accident.—A Jarrow Correspondent states that between 4 and 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon Miss Kathleen O'Brady Jones, daughter of the Rev. O'Brady Jones, Vicar of St. Luke's, Wallsend-on-Tyne, met with her death under painful circumstances. She had been taking part in a rehearsal for a concert which was to have been held yesterday evening, and was leaving the hall with friends, when a boy named Dewar, aged 15, presented a revolver with which he was playing and pulled the trigger, under the impression that it was unloaded. The weapon went off, the bullet being lodged in the girl's right temple. She died half an hour later. The revolver belonged to another lad, and was only purchased yesterday morning. Dewar, who is the son of respectable parents residing in the neighbourhood, is now in custody. The affair seems to have been purely accidental.”

In this case he did not ask for legislation against the boy. One sympathised almost as much with him and his relations as one did with the relations of the victim, but one did ask for legislation which should make it impossible for mere babies to go about carrying these very dangerous and useless weapons. The Home Secretary knew very well that the case was not an isolated one by any means. He could give the House countless instances of the same kind. It was the Home Secretary, he thought, who disliked so much legislation by Press Cutting Agencies. But Press Cutting Agencies had their uses. He (the Marquess of Carmarthen) had been for years a subscriber to Press Cutting

Agencies, and the only information he asked them to send him was accounts of accidents caused by pistols and revolvers. Since the Home Secretary introduced his Bill, he had asked from one of these Agencies the comments made upon the measure in the Press. He had been supplied with a large number, and they were all favourable to the Bill, save as to one or two practically small matters of detail. A further point was this—the coroners in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Devonshire had strongly supported the Pistols Bill, and juries had in every instance endorsed their remarks as to the danger attending the indiscriminate carrying of firearms. That alone was sufficient testimony to give him the right to demand legislation. But there was further evidence. There was the information supplied by the Home Office. The Return supplied last year showed that the number of fatal cases of this kind treated at hospitals was, in 1890, 10; in 1891, 22; and in 1892, 27; while the number of non-fatal cases was, in 1890, 59; in 1891, 72; and in 1892, 95; so that in each class there had been a steady increase; and he believed that that increase had been maintained in 1893, although the Returns supplied did not go beyond 1892. Of course, there were a number of cases which were not treated in the hospitals. In like manner the number of inquests in such cases had grown from 139 in 1890 to 180 in 1891, and to 217 in 1892. As he said, he had not the statistics for 1893, but from all he had been able to learn there was quite as much—he thought even more—injury inflicted by revolvers in 1893 than in 1892. An hon. Member for one of the Divisions of Lancashire, who opposed the Bill last year, said, “Why should not Englishmen have the right of protecting themselves?” No one wanted legislation, or asked for legislation, which would prevent responsible householders from arming themselves against burglars if they thought it right. What he did ask for was legislation which would strengthen the ordinary law, which would make it imperative on every one who carried arms to take out a licence, and would prevent young children from carrying dangerous weapons about. He had, he thought, said enough to show that there was some reason for this legislation. If the Government took exception to his proposal that there should be "immediate" legislation, he hoped they would, at any rate, re-introduce the Pistols Bill, and send it to a Committee. They should do something to put a stop to this great and growing evil. He was conscious that he had not made out so strong a case as might have been made out. He wished some one of more power and influence had taken it in hand, but he had interested himself in the subject for a considerable time and felt keenly in regard to it.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, he would only say one or two words in reference to the Motion, as the noble Marquess had really exhausted the subject. It was within the knowledge of everyone that pistol accidents were increasing day by day. The law was already very stringent with regard to the carrying of revolvers by burglars. The punishment meted out to a robber who was armed was always much more severe than that to one who was unarmed. The proper way to deal with the indiscriminate use of revolvers was to place a heavy tax upon them. He should think that revolvers and pistols ought to be dealt with under the gun licence; and he should suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was, as he understood, somewhat short of money, that he should put the heaviest possible tax upon revolvers. This would be a very useful tax. The evil was growing year by year, and these weapons were becoming more and more toys, and could be bought for a very few shillings. From the instances quoted by the noble Lord, it was evident that they had become mere playthings in the hands of children. He did not think the word "immediate" ought to present any difficulty to the Government. An opportunity would occur when the Chancellor of the Exchequer could deal effectually with this growing evil by the simple expedient of putting a heavy tax on revolvers in the Budget Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words,

"In the opinion of this House, the large number of Accidents caused by the indiscriminate carrying of Pistols and Revolvers calls for immediate legislation."—(The Marquess of Carmarthen.)

The Marquess of Carmarthen

Question proposed, "That the proposed to be left out stand part Question."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (ASQUITH, Fife, E.): The noble Gentleman who moved this Motion, and the Gentleman who has just sat down, know that so far as I am concerned have been preaching to the converted. I have more than once expressed much the same opinion as they have expressed upon the danger of the indiscriminate carrying of revolvers, and in this Session I did what I could to introduce legislation to put a stop to the practice. I believe that if the House had treated the measure which was introduced as a contentious measure we should have already seen its fruits, and many of the accidents which had recently happened would have been avoided. I do not recede from the position I have taken up, and I should only be too glad to see a Bill of the kind passed into law. I do not adopt the view altogether of the hon. Member for Preston that the matter which can be efficiently dealt with by taxation. Inquiries which have been made convince us that a licence will not be sufficient to meet the evil, and a higher tax. I am satisfied that the measure upon which we proposed to proceed is the right one—that any person who buys these pistols should be compelled to produce a licence; that each pistol should be identified by a particular mark; that the seller should enter the name and address of the purchaser in a book, just as is now done in the case of the sale of poisons. These are practical proposals which were in the Bill introduced last year, and it is not true that these provisions would seriously injure the trade. The noble Lord asks us to say that this is a matter which calls for immediate legislation. I say frankly that if there is a possibility of the Bill which I introduced last year being treated as a contentious measure I would not introduce it with pleasure; and if in the course of the Session I receive satisfactory assurances which convince me that it will pass as a non-contentious measure, I will undertake to say that I will re-introduce it. At the same time I am bound to acknowledge that after experience of last year, when no less than 7 hon. Gentlemen voted for the adjournment of the Debate, thereby strangling the Bill for the Session, I do not see any prospect that the measure, if re-introduced, would be treated as non-contentious. Therefore, I do not see how I can accede to the Motion of the noble Lord, which declares that this is a matter of immediate legislation. If I were to do so on the part of the Government the Bill would enter into competition with, and even take precedence of, other measures to which Her Majesty's Government are already pledged. While agreeing most heartily with the noble Lord as to the necessity for legislation on the subject, I am afraid that I must ask the House to negative the Motion as introduced.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) said, it ought to be borne in mind that the claim was put forward that certain Bills should be treated as non-contentious at a time when the House was brought together under exceptional circumstances. What took place was the outcome of an attempt to improve the Bill. Apart from that, he must say that there were many Parliamentary chances arising during the Session which might be taken advantage of if proper vigilance were exercised in order to pass the Bill. But, meanwhile, he should like to ask the Home Secretary whether it was not possible to do more to meet the necessities of the case by administrative action? When he was in the Department a Circular was sent out to the authorities inviting them to increased vigilance in prosecutions for the carrying of pistols, the idea being to bring home to the public mind the fact that a pistol was a gun under the Gun Licensing Act of 1870. There was no doubt that many people were under the impression that a pistol could be carried without a licence, and that they believed it was only for the carrying of a gun that a licence was required. He must say that he had found a certain looseness on the part of the Inland Revenue Authorities in prosecuting persons who carried revolvers without a licence. Their object was to get as much as possible for the Revenue, and they did not see any use in attempting to exact a 10 penalty from the class of people whom they wished to stop carrying revolvers. He could not help thinking that something more might be done by closer administrative action. He did not quite see why the Motion of the noble Lord should be negatived, because it was not at all necessary to adhere to the word "immediate"; and he contended also, that even if that word were adopted, it would not involve the dislocation of the Government programme of legislation. He remembered an occasion when the Conservative Party was in Office, when a Motion was brought forward relating to the use of schools for public meetings. The Motion was not resisted, and it was passed unanimously; and the claim was put forward that the Government ought to postpone all other legislation in order to comply with the terms of that Motion. But that, of course, was an untenable claim, and he was sure that the Home Secretary need not oppose the Motion of his noble Friend upon any such ground. He could promise that the same amount of support would be again received from the Opposition for the Bill. It was his belief that the central principle of the Bill of last year was a most valuable one, and he thought it should be made an offence for a person to carry a revolver in a public place.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. H. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.) said, he desired to cordially acknowledge the support which the Bill of last year had received. He did not agree with the last speaker that there had been supineness on the part of the Inland Revenue Authorities. There were very great difficulties in the way of the Inland Revenue officers, because it was not easy to ascertain who were carrying revolvers, and who were not. Unless in the actual commission of an offence the necessary evidence was not forthcoming. Moreover, they found that it was of no avail to prosecute children for offences against the Inland Revenue. Magistrates would not convict in cases of the kind. Another point in connection with the matter was that there was no power to confiscate the firearms. The Government, however, would do what they could to ascertain the feeling of hon. Members who opposed the Bill last year, and if it appeared that the measure would not be further opposed the Government would re-introduce it.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) that with all deference to what had been said from the First Commissioner of Customs he wanted to point out that the matter of complaint was that the licence was not applied to pistols and revolvers. If a man carried a gun without a licence he was prosecuted, but if he carried a pistol without a licence he was not prosecuted at all.

MR. H. GLADSTONE: It is a question of evidence.

SIR R. TEMPLE: Evidence in regard to a pistol would be as good as evidence in regard to the carrying of a gun. If a man is proved to be carrying a pistol without a licence he is liable to prosecution, and ought to be prosecuted.

MR. H. GLADSTONE: You can see if a man is carrying a gun, but you cannot see if he is carrying a pistol.

SIR R. TEMPLE: But our argument is that there is always evidence of the pistol having been carried in all cases in which an accident happens. Why are not the persons who carry these pistols prosecuted? We believe that it is the slackness of the authorities in prosecuting that is accountable for this condition of things. If the right hon. Gentleman asks what we propose, we say that more stringent steps should be taken by the Executive at once, and that the Public Prosecutor and his officials should be more vigilant in enforcing the law with reference to the carrying of pistols without a licence, especially in the case of young people. When an accident happens, there is never any doubt as to the actual carrying of the pistol, but the difficulty is that there has been no prosecutor.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 118; Noes 54.—(Division List, No. 8.)

Main Question again proposed.

THE INCOME TAX.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) drew attention to the necessity for some juster system of Income Tax being adopted by which a lower rate of tax should be charged on incomes derived from industry to that charged on incomes derived from realised capital. He said, it was somewhat unfortunate that this could only be an academical discussion, as the Rules of the House prohibited more than one Division, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to be grateful to him for bringing forward the subject in time for his Budget arrangements. This was a most opportune moment for discussing the incidence of the Income Tax. For four or five years past he had always been met by Chancellors of the Exchequer on both sides of the House by the objection that, however much they sympathised with the general principles of the Motion, however much there was to be said for it, they had arranged their Budgets, but would think of it for another year. A new Budget of a most startling character was now promised, and it would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer a solution of a very difficult problem. This was not a new subject. The incidence of Income Tax had been a burning question for many years. It had been found that the more the screw was put on, the more the tax realised, though he did not wish to say for a moment that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was anxious to screw out more than his predecessors. But the fact remained that year by year a larger amount was being realised by the Income Tax, and raised from a deeper and poorer stratum of society. Many thought that trade and industry were not affected by this tax, but, in fact, the tax more affected the trade and commerce of our country than this particular one. Glancing at its history, in 1842 when it was reintroduced by Sir Robert Peel on its present basis, 1d. in the pound brought in £850,000, while at the present time 1d. in the pound produced more than £2,000,000 sterling, showing how the tax had been developed in the last 47 years. That was, no doubt, a satisfactory proof of increased prosperity and wealth, but it had another side. It had been said that this being a tax payable by the rich which they could afford to pay it did not matter much to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but that was not the fact, for the tax was pressing harder upon the middle and poorer classes of society who were engaged in the work of the country. By the last Returns in 1889 under Schedule D., which included all the professional persons, merchants in trade, and others earning their money, representing one-third of the

Mr. H. Gladstone

of the tax, 436,000 persons paid. Of these, 215,000, or about half, paid upon incomes under £200 a year. That was a very startling fact. Another quarter of the whole number, 106,000, paid on incomes of £200 to £300, and 63,000 on incomes of £300 to £500. In fact, the 385,000 persons paid on incomes of £500 and upwards, while only 50,000 paid on more. It would be interesting to know that £21,000 paid on £1,000 a year and upwards. This referred to England and Wales. In Ireland, of course, the proportion of small incomes was even larger. A close study of the Returns showed that the more the tax was pressing upon the poorer classes of society. From 1870 to 1879 the numbers assessed at the end remained almost stationary, but in the 15 years from 1874 to 1889 an immense change had taken place in the incidence of the tax upon these classes of the community. The smaller incomes formerly exempted had largely decreased. £21,500,000 among 358,000 persons in 1874, £8,750,000 among 215,000 under £200 a year. The slightly larger incomes had increased from nearly £10,000,000 among 39,000 persons in 1874 to nearly £13,000,000 among 50,000 persons in 1889. This was a hard upon the lower middle classes, and showed that the net was being drawn tighter and tighter. Between £300 to £500 there had also been a slight increase, but only a slight increase. Between £500 to £1,000, while upon the incomes above £1,000 paying the tax there had been a considerable decrease. Those who would not be gainsaid by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and they showed more and more the Income Tax was paid by the lower middle and poorer classes of the community, the classes who ought, on the contrary, to receive most consideration, and whose income was largely instrumental in supporting the country. That consideration ought to force on the Chancellor of the Exchequer the importance of bringing a fairer incidence of this tax into existence at present. It was originally intended, as its name implied, to be assessed upon incomes; but it was far more, for it was charged upon not nett income. No allowance was made for repairs to property or depreciation of machinery; assessments were made upon buildings and plant with absolutely no set-off. Again, in many cases, the tax was levied upon much larger incomes than people actually enjoyed. That also had a very important bearing upon the subject. It was often said that many people made false returns and paid upon less than they really earned. That might be so, but these matters were looked after very carefully, and in most cases people paid upon more than they should rather than upon less. Another great grievance in connection with this tax was the mode of collection. They were grateful to the late Chancellor of the Exchequer for abolishing the system of poundage, but there was still a grievance in reference to appeals. The whole system of appeal was, according to many letters he had received on the subject, a farce. The unfortunate person assessed was not allowed any advice or even to be present in the room while the assessors fixed the assessment, and there was no appeal whatever. An amusing instance at Ealing had come to his knowledge, where the owner of a property stated exactly its cost, and was supported by a surveyor, but, nevertheless, he was assessed at infinitely more than the property should have carried. Taking all those points into consideration, it was clear that a much fairer system was demanded by the public. The only way in which this tax could be fairly adjusted was by making a distinction between industrial and spontaneous incomes derived from real property or securities. Spontaneous incomes and those derived from labour should not be as at present, assessed in the same way. An enormous difference existed between the positions of two men receiving £200 a year each, one from, say, Consols, and the other from his work, whether as professional man, doctor, clerk, or shop-keeper. In the one case the man might fairly spend every shilling of his income; but the man who had to earn his £200 was already taxed to an enormous extent. As a prudent man he must insure his life, and he must put by something to provide for accidents or being out of employment. He would probably be taxed by the exigencies of life as a wise and thrifty man to the extent of £30 of his income, or 15 per cent., paying ordinary taxes in addition like everybody else. That £30 a year the other man might spend, and to tax both equally was absolutely to discourage and even prevent provision for the future in the case of the income-earner, who would so far be greatly handicapped. In foreign countries—France, for example—spontaneous incomes only were taxed. Nobody would gainsay that the two classes of incomes were totally different, and that a man who had an income coming in whether he was well or ill, working or idle; which would on his death be continued for his wife and family, was in an entirely different position from a man whose income was absolutely dependent upon his continuing in health and work. This had been pointed out long ago. In 1842, when Sir Robert Peel reintroduced the tax, Lord Brougham said in the House of Lords—

“It is expedient to make a distinction between incomes arising from capital of every description and incomes arising from labour merely by levying a smaller proportion upon the latter than upon the former.”

Lord Brougham was a great authority, and so far from being an aristocrat in anything he was one of the Leaders of the Democratic Party at the time. In the House of Commons also an Amendment was moved to omit the words “profession or trade, employment or avocation.” That was the very question he was now raising, and the Amendment was supported by such well-known men as Lord John Russell and Mr. Hume. Against the opinion of such authorities, it was strange that this tax should have been allowed for 50 years to go on being levied in so obviously unfair a manner. Certainly, it was only regarded as a temporary tax in the first instance, and it was supposed would soon be given up. But it had always been, and probably would always be, found one of the main taxes on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer could rely. He thought he had made out a clear case, that it was most unfair to levy this tax upon spontaneous and industrial incomes alike. But it had been said that if a change were made, rich people receiving industrial incomes would benefit, large merchants, bankers, barristers, and others, who could afford to pay a higher rate. That was quite true, but the objection could easily be got over by fixing a limit, no matter where it was put, £1,000 or £500, so long as the principle was adopted that industrial income should not be taxed at the same rate those otherwise derived. If that could be carried out, it would be the beginning of a great change, and would certainly make the Income Tax fairer in every sense. Another objection was that poor people sometimes had small and spontaneous incomes. But those persons were so far of course, better off than people dependent upon industrial incomes, and there would be no objection to their being allowed a rebate at present under a certain amount. A third great objection was, that it would cause enormous trouble to make a change. No doubt; but that was no reason why the change should not be carried out, if it was fair and reasonable. It was the Chancellor of the Exchequer's business so to frame his Budget that it would work fairly smoothly, and without hardship or injury to any particular class. However, we had at present a system of differential rates for different classes of income. Schedule I was not only at a different rate from other Schedules, but it varied for different parts of the United Kingdom. Different rates were imposed for England, Scotland, and Ireland. Taking all these facts together, he urged that he had distinctly made out a case for an alteration in the present system of levying the Income Tax. The Income Tax represented more than a sixth of the taxes of the country. There had no doubt been several Committees on this subject, including one which sat in 1861, and in connection with which separate Reports were issued by the late Mr. Lowe, the late Mr. Hubbard, and the late Sir Stafford Northcote. In 1861, however, the whole subject of taxation was different from what it was now, and it was pointed out at the time that it would not be fair to alter the system of the Income Tax unless there was an alteration of many other taxes, and especially of the Succession Duty. Since that time great changes had taken place, and the pressure of the Income Tax had been growing more and more upon the middle and lower strata of society. It was urged by some that there should be a graduated Income Tax. In one of the organs of the Government it had been suggested that persons with an income of £100 should pay a 1d. tax, and persons with £200 2d., the tax increasing by 1d.

Mr. Bartley

for every £100 of income. Well, he had always held the opinion that the poorer persons in this country paid more per £1 than the richer persons, but he believed that a differential Income Tax was practically impossible to carry out. There would be so much temptation on the part of men to reduce their incomes, because if they went up to a certain amount the rate at which they would have to pay would be very largely increased, that he thought such a system would be very pernicious. The proposal he advocated was, however, of a totally different character, and was infinitely fairer in every way than that of a graduated Income Tax. The pressure upon industrial incomes was becoming greater and greater. The amount of the incomes derived from past savings was becoming greater from year to year, and the relative proportions of the two kinds of income showed that the spontaneous incomes were much larger than the industrial incomes. It might be asked what effect the system he advocated would have upon the Revenue. Of course, hon. Members could not conceal from themselves the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was more in need of money than he had been on former occasions, and it might be said that this was an inopportune time for raising the question. He could not see that this was so, because his argument was not that there should be a decrease in the burden, but that the burden should be better adjusted. If the smaller industrial incomes were relieved or were not increased it would be perfectly fair to add to the spontaneous incomes an amount which would be quite sufficient to make up the difference. He acknowledged fully that in his view the tax on industrial incomes might ultimately be done away with altogether, as in France, and that the Income Tax might be levied on spontaneous incomes only. He did not, however, propose this at present, although such a system would do away with nearly all the difficulties of taxation. All he proposed now was that they should get the wedge in, and should make some difference between the two classes of income. It was possibly unwise from one point of view to tax past thrift, but what was desired was to encourage people to be thrifty. The difference between the spontaneous income and the industrial income was so great, however, that some such proposal was necessary. The man who had to work his hardest in order to pull along was handicapped by the Income Tax. He was bound to set aside from 10 to 15 per cent. of his earnings in order to provide against sickness, want of work, early death, and other contingencies. When people, however, pointed out that they were taxed on their small incomes on the same scale as men who derived an absolutely permanent income from an investment, hon. Members would see that it was very difficult for those who advocated thrift to reply to them. He trusted that, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer must be cogitating how to arrange the fiscal burdens of the coming year, the right hon. Gentleman would take this great opportunity of saying that he would even in a small degree make a change by which a man's industrial income should be taxed at a lower rate than his spontaneous income. If the right hon. Gentleman would do this he would do that which he (Mr. Bartley) was sure would appear just and fair to a large part of Her Majesty's subjects.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): The object of this Debate is to induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the eve of the Budget, to discuss the exact principles on which particular taxes should be levied. I have never known such an attempt succeed, and I have never known such an attempt made in a bolder, or, I may say, a more audacious manner than this has been made by the hon. Member. He must, however, excuse me if I say that "in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird." I will not discuss with him whether there ought to be a graduated Income Tax, or whether there should be a difference made between small incomes and large incomes, and whether there ought to be distinctions made in the incomes derived from one source and incomes derived from other sources. Such a discussion would be premature to-night. The hon. Member will have opportunities of expressing his opinions in a much more effective manner than he can do at the present moment, and I will, therefore, ask him to allow me to postpone my statement until it can have more real effect than it can have on the present occasion. With reference to his arguments, they are, no doubt, excellent, but they are not novel. I have heard that speech made for 25 years.

MR. BARTLEY: I said so several times.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I should say that altogether I have heard that speech and these arguments 45 times in the House of Commons.

MR. BARTLEY: Never answered.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: It was supposed that there was an answer given in 1853 by my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). The speech has been made year after year. Mr. Hubbard, a lineal ancestor, in a financial sense, of the hon. Member, brought the subject forward year after year, and stated precisely the same arguments. In 1861 a Committee was appointed, of which Sir Stafford Northcote and Mr. Hubbard were leading members. As the hon. Member says his arguments have never been answered, I would ask him to see the Report prepared by Sir Stafford Northcote as a Member of that Committee. I think everybody would consider that Report a conclusive answer to the hon. Member. If you were to apply to a man with an industrial income a lower rate of tax than you applied to a person who had an annuity of £100 in the funds, the result would be to create an absurdity. The distinction between various incomes must depend rather upon the amount than upon the character of such incomes. It could not be contended that the owner of a great brewery, for example, should pay at a lower rate than an annuitant, because the annuity proceeded from a different source. There is a great deal in the hon. Member's speech with which I agree, and a great deal with which I differ, but he must excuse me if I postpone until another occasion telling him with what part of the speech I agree and with what part I differ.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, he did not think the very interesting figures brought forward by the hon. Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley) had justified the conclusion he had adduced from them. The hon. Member said that only 50,000 of the taxpayers in Schedule D paid on incomes of over £500. It would, however, be found that an immense number of persons who had incomes of over £500 were not in Schedule D but in other Schedules. The hon. Member said that there were 20,000 persons under Schedule D with incomes over £1,000 a year, and that the number was decreasing. He (Sir J. Lubbock) did not think anyone could for a moment that there were fewer persons with incomes of over £1,000 a year under Schedule D than there were some years ago. Surely everybody knew that the number of persons must be much larger now than it was formerly. Perhaps the explanation was, that there had been a tendency of late years for small businesses to be absorbed into larger ones, so that the returns which used to be made by a considerable number of persons were now made as one Return by a Joint Company. The hon. Member had suggested that the owner of Consols should pay at a higher rate than the owner of property who derived his income from his exertions. Consols, however, could not be taxed as Consols, or faith would be broken with the public taxpayer. A very bad example would be set to other countries. It would be inequitable to tax Consols as such, nor did we do so. Consols were not taxed income, and the holder of Consols paid on his income. A higher rate of tax could, therefore, not be placed upon Consols than upon other incomes.

MR. BARTLEY said, he had suggested anything of the kind.

He only referred to Consols as one specimen of spontaneous income.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK said, his point was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not deal with Consols unless he was dealing with all incomes.

He could not be taxed, although the income derived from them could be. That was an item of spontaneous income referred to by his hon. Friend was that derived from land, but it had been a decreasing income of late years, and he could not think that this would be a happy moment to choose for adding to the burdens now resting upon the cultivators. As to houses, they were of a different character the amount required for repairs differed immensely in different kinds of houses. The moment the question of an allowance for repairs was introduced the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be landed in a labyrinth of difficulties from which it would be impossible to escape. His hon. Friend said that it would be easy to distinguish between "spontaneous" and "industrial" incomes. He thought it would be almost impossible. His hon. Friend said that a man who had a spontaneous income was secure, and need not save. Income from savings might be spontaneous, but was not necessarily secure. Could it be said that a man whose money was invested in such securities as Portuguese or Greek funds had a secure income, or that the income of a man who had invested in some industrial undertaking was necessarily secure? Then, how was a distinction to be drawn between incomes derived from Bank of England Stock and incomes derived from the Stock of a small bank, or between incomes derived from a small brewery and a large brewery? The hon. Member had suggested a different kind of tax upon concerns making £1,000 a year from that upon concerns making £500 a year, but of course the number of shareholders or partners would have to be taken into account, and here another difficulty would arise. The hon. Member added the injustice of Income Tax was worse because it had been going on for so long. He (Sir J. Lubbock) should rather have drawn the opposite inference, because, happily, an inequality which might be very great at first was, if continued long enough, compensated for to a certain extent by other considerations. It was, however, perfectly true that the members of the legal and medical profession derived their incomes from the exercise of their brains, and that other persons might perhaps derive a similar amount of income without any exertion to themselves. The truth was that no tax could be a just and fair one. We must regard the taxation of the country as a whole, and if we found that some taxes pressed heavily on some classes, we should find that others pressed heavily on others, and the result was that some sort of justice was arrived at. Taxes derived from the Customs pressed, no doubt, with severity on certain classes of the people. That injustice was made up to a certain extent by the Income Tax, and in that way one tax to a certain extent compensated for the inequalities that existed in another. The matter was very carefully gone into by the very strong Committee of 1861. Nobody could read the very interesting Blue Book which related to that Committee and fail to see the extraordinary difficulties there was in dealing with the question in the manner proposed by the hon. Member. At the same time, great injustice would be done unless the Income Tax was kept within a moderate and reasonable limit. If it were raised much more than at present all the evils that had been pointed out would be aggravated. There were two points which he thought it desirable that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should consider in his Budget. He had never himself been able to see why the English farmer should be called upon to pay a different rate of Income Tax from the Scotch or the Irish farmer. If there was any reason for a difference originally there was no such reason now, particularly at a time when the agriculturists were suffering so greatly. He urged that they should be placed on the same footing. The other point on which he wished to say a word was as regards the assessment of industrial incomes. One great compensating circumstance in connection with the Income Tax used to be, that in the case of incomes derived from trade it was taken on the average of three years. If a man had made an average income of £1,000 a year for the previous three years and made more than that amount he could not be called upon to pay more than he returned, but if he made less than the £1,000 he was allowed a rebate. It was calculated by the Head of the Inland Revenue Department before the Committee of 1861 that this privilege was practically equivalent to an allowance of 30 per cent. That had been altered without, so far as he could learn, any sanction to the change having been given by the House, and he submitted that the old method of calculation should be revived, which would to some extent meet the objections urged by the hon. Member for Islington.

Sir W. Harcourt

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) said, he should like to point out a case of great hardship in the levying of Income Tax on industrial incomes.

way of making distinctions as to the manner in which income was derived or in graduating the Income Tax were almost insuperable ; but the difficulty had been overcome in some of the Colonies by substituting for a tax on income a tax on property. If the House would consider the matter for a moment they would see that this met all the difficulties and all the objections urged against making the suggested distinctions. For example, a person possessed £100,000 ; whether he invested the money in Consols or in foreign securities he paid equally on the £100,000. Though his income from foreign securities would be larger his risk would be greater. The system adopted with reference to incomes derived from trades or professions was to fix the number of years' purchase which a trade or profession was worth. A man who was making £3,000 a year from any trade or profession would not pay in the same way as the man who had invested £100,000 in Consols ; he would pay 10 years' purchase, or £30,000. In this way the distinction would be kept up very clearly between incomes derived from investments and incomes which were not of that permanent character, derived from trades and professions. This had been done in the colonies, and he had never clearly understood why the same system had not been adopted in this country. He was not going into the question raised by the hon. Gentle-denied that the hon. Member had out a very good case, whether it had been made out before or not, and so far (Mr. Gibbs) understood, the only urged against it was that it was difficult to amend the tax. No doubt was difficult, but the Chancellor the Exchequer and his advisers were, as they all knew, very busy people, and he was sure that it was beyond their powers to lighten the burden. It had been pointed out clearly what great injustice was done by the way in which taxes were altered in the House without anybody knowing anything about it. The manner in which the Income Tax was altered had been altered, and many people were very much surprised when by practical experience they discovered that an alteration had been made. He trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consider these matters, and endeavour to give some relief where it was very much wanted.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thames) : I wish, for the convenience of the House, just to mention that I intend to bring forward the Bill which stands in my name upon the Paper with regard to alien emigration. Looking at the present state of the House, it seems to me desirable to postpone that Motion to some more favourable opportunity. But before the discussion in which the House is now engaged terminates I should like to the Exchequer has stated that a case has never been known in which a gentleman holding his position has been "drawn." The right hon. Gentleman has no disregard for the process of establishing precedents, and I think that everyone who listened to his reply to my hon. Friend must have come to the conclusion that my hon. Friend, at any rate, has beaten the record in having been the first Member who has succeeded in "drawing" a Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to reply to his own argument as to what had been the invariable practice in regard to his predecessors, for he certainly was most successfully "drawn." As to the reply of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I do not wish to go into the points on which he dwelt. I was relieved to find that he does not contemplate in his Budget embarking in some of the transactions suggested by my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend guarded himself against being supposed to favour rash experiments of the kind he spoke of; but, at the same time, if incomes below a certain point are to be exempted from taxation, then the bulk of the Revenue must be raised from a small portion of the tax-paying community, and when that is taken concurrently with the suggestion which, I am afraid, is not altogether without sympathy on the Treasury Bench, under which those who are to pay the great bulk of the taxes have less electoral power than even that which they now possess, I think it will make most of us chary of endorsing such a proposal. The Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of attempts which have been made to discriminate between various classes of incomes. As I understood my hon. Friend, he proposed that incomes derived from what he called industries, including profits in business and trade, whether great or small, were in a different category from incomes derived from settled property, whether real or personal. My hon. Friend does not speak benevolently of the unfortunate small freeholder. I for some years represented a large number of small freeholders, upon whom I know well that taxation presses very hardly. My hon. Friend says he does not propose to diminish the amount of money at the disposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but that he only proposes to make the knapsack fit more evenly on the shoulders. What does that mean? It means that under my hon. Friend's suggestion the other Income Tax payers would pay more than they have done hitherto, which I think would be a great hardship upon them. I must own there is something to be said as to the different sources from which incomes are derived. My hon. Friend was on fair ground when he dwelt on the general proposition, but the moment he came to deal with it in detail his difficulties commenced. Now, my hon. Friend spoke of the interest a person has in a sum of money during his lifetime, and suggested that at his death that interest is available to those who succeed him. I am not sure that that is always the case. My hon. Friend knows very well that there are settlements which preclude persons entitled to a beneficial interest for life from disposing of the funds in a manner in which they may think fit. Then my hon. Friend talked about insurance. He said that a prudent person in receipt of an income of modest dimensions is bound to set aside a part of his income, at least, as an insurance fund. I would remind him that a prudential consideration would equally apply in a large number of cases to persons in receipt of incomes even from settled funds. The Secretary to the Treasury realises that. What I wish to enter a protest against is any system of what is called graduated taxation. I understood my hon. Friend to suggest the exemption of incomes up to £200 a year from Income Tax. I do not think that that would be at all wholesome advice for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take as tendered to him on behalf of the Conservative Party. As I say, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, unlike any of his predecessors, has been "drawn," and I hope the result of this discussion will be to show that any wild scheme that might have been suggested by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House tending in the direction of differential taxation and graduated Income Tax would certainly not meet with the approval of the great mass of Members in this House.

*MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge) said, he wished in a word to endorse what had fallen from the right hon. Baronet in regard to the taxation of farmers' incomes. It had been a matter of complaint for years that farmers' incomes were taxed on different scales in England to those in Scotland and Ireland, and he would respectfully suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this would be a particularly happy year to put the English farmer on the same footing as the Scotch and Irish farmers. Scotland and Ireland had been favoured by Providence with a particularly bountiful season, while the English farmer had been impoverished to an unprecedented degree. It would make small difference to the Revenue, and would be a welcome mark of sympathy with the English farmer, who would be still more grateful if he could be furnished at all with an income on which to pay, but he was afraid that to furnish that was not in the power of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In regard to the main question they were debating, it should not be forgotten that the Income Tax was only a matter of pence in the pound after all; but the rates were a matter of shillings in the pound, and personal property and earned incomes were exempt from the burden of the rates.

FLOATING DERELICTS IN THE ATLANTIC.

Done MR. MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe) said, he wished to call attention to the danger to life resulting from floating derelicts in the Atlantic. He should not attempt to occupy the time of the House except for two reasons: first, because he believed the matter to be one of very great urgency—a matter of very great importance to large numbers of people not only in this country but of every country in England and America. Great numbers of passengers crossed the Atlantic every week, and those passengers were all subject to the possibility of a momentary catastrophe which they could not very well contend against. The catastrophe was very different to every other danger to which sailors were liable. There were remedies against other risks, such as fire, but at night they had no remedy against floating derelicts, which were absolutely unseen. He had done all he could as a private Member to direct the attention of the Government to this most important subject. He had put questions to them, and he was bound to say that he had been received with great courtesy by the President of the Board of Trade and the Secretary to the Admiralty. The gentlemen, however, had shuffled off responsibility from one to the other. The question was one which could not be deferred, and, in order that it might receive the attention it merited, he turned upon himself to ask a question of the late Prime Minister, which was one of the last questions which the right hon. Gentleman answered on the Treasury Bench. The right hon. Gentleman gave a most satisfactory answer, stating that the matter was one of very great importance, and that it would receive the attention of the Government. It did, in fact, receive the attention of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman had not sent despatches, as has hitherto been the practice, but in answer to urgent questions put from time to time he had telegraphed to Washington to obtain further information. That further information had been asked for since, and they had been told that the Government were considering the matter. Questions of this kind the Government had been considering for a long time, and it appeared to him that the time had now come when the House ought to take some action for themselves. A Petition had been presented to the present Prime Minister signed by 800 masters of vessels, representing 31,000 sailors. The lives of these 31,000 sailors were of as much concern to the House of Commons as the lives of anyone in the country. They should look after those who were in peril on the seas, and they should take care they were not liable to this terrible and sudden catastrophe. It was their duty to limit the danger as much as possible, and they had the experience of another Government as to what could be done, because the American Government had had two of their men-of-war fitted up for the destruction of these derelicts.

Mr. Everett

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, Order! I have just ascertained that notice has been given for the Second Reading of a Bill on this subject; therefore, the discussion is out of Order.

FRANCE AND SIAM.

SIR R. TEMPLE hoped he should not be out of place if he once more pressed upon Her Majesty's Government the

Done

tion of the production of the Papers to Siam. They had been produced from time to time that these Papers could be produced, but the hope deferred the Government made the heart of the position sick. This question of Siam was one on which large sections of Her Majesty's subjects felt considerable anxiety. They feared the British interests had to some extent been sacrificed, the commercial interests especially not been safeguarded, and that France had been allowed to obtain a position with regard to Siam that might seriously compromise the independence of the country in the future. He was sorry the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs was not in his place, but it was known that they intended to raise the question, as their object was to obtain production of the Papers so as to enable them to judge how far their Foreign Office had been able to go with the Government of France in this matter; whether the Siamese had really been promised, and whether the independence of the Kingdom, which was co-terminous with the south-eastern portion of our Indian Empire, had been properly protected or not. The extraordinary delays in bringing matters to an issue had, he would not say been viewed with suspicion, but had caused grave apprehensions as to whether or not France contemplated the ultimate absorption of Siam. They were loth to take an unfavourable view of the motive and conduct of their gallant neighbours, but there had been so much high handedness in the conduct of France, such undue precipitancy in proceeding against Siam, such excessive severity in the execution of the same, that our French neighbours must be offended with them if they desired to take a stand on behalf of the British side in the question, and endeavour to press the matter forward. He was glad the Baronet had now come to his place, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would be able at once to inform them whether there was a chance of these Papers being delivered. They were told before Easter that immediately after Easter the Papers should be presented, but Easter came and gone, and yet they did not see the Papers. If they seemed unhasty in the matter their answer was that they were the only parties who had not got these Papers. Their French neighbours had got their Papers; the French Parliament, the French public and French politicians all knew the French view of the question; but the British Parliament and public did not yet know the views of their own Government. They did not know how these Papers would affect the general question between the two nations, how far they would be able to vindicate their own rights and position, or whether or not they ought to be satisfied with the position of Siam. All interested in this really burning question, which might be of enormous importance in the future, were unaware what considerations were hung up until they could understand what the Papers would show. The future independence of Siam was really the main object, and he would warn the Government that, unless some joint understanding could be arrived at between France and England in respect to the future of Siam, that India would probably not be safe. This was becoming a double pressure; it was a double-barrelled opposition to the progress of the British Empire in the East. There was a war-cloud hanging over both Continents, one on the side of Russia and the other on the side of France, and he did not know which cloud was darkest or the most menacing; but it would be a most dangerous concatenation of events for England if ever there should be a war in which France and Russia were on the one side and England on the other. Just imagine India between two such fires, but that was what they were being threatened with by Russia on the one side and France on the other. He had no doubt all this was as well known to Her Majesty's Government as it was to them, but they would like this knowledge to show itself in such vigorous action as might keep back those two advancing Powers, that should keep Russia in check on the one side and France in check on the other. There was no doubt this matter of Siam had greatly increased the risks and peril of India which, Heaven knows, were great enough before. He did not think anything so serious to the future safety of India could have happened than this matter of Siam. It had long been foreseen by Anglo-Indian statesmen, and warning after warning had been given. Atter ail, what did the Government say? That England had no immediate concern in the quarrel between France and Siam. England had no most vital concern, and to say that, on the part of the British Government, was entirely to give the case away and to leave it to the wolves. That was what happened, and he said it with great regret, because in all other respects he was one of those who greatly admired the manner in which our foreign affairs had been built up. The hope that after all some remedy might be found to mitigate this danger must be the excuse for troubling the Government in the matter. No doubt, it reminded them of the hammer and the tongs, but they were obliged to go on hammering. These warnings from Anglo-Indian sources ought to be far more respected by the British Parliament than they were. Every one of the misfortunes that had happened in Central Asia had been predicted. Every single prophecy in regard to the advance of Russia had been verified. Now similar warnings were given in respect to the advance of France, and they saw how little they were regarded. Still, they would go on warning and warning in order that the perils that threatened India might be somewhat mitigated. If a sound and conciliatory policy on the one hand, though firm and resolute on the other, were adopted, it would be still possible to preserve the independence of Siam.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick) said, he did not propose to follow the hon. Baronet in the discussion of the general question because it had been discussed in the House on previous occasions, and since it was last discussed nothing new had happened in the situation to render it desirable that it should be again discussed on the part of the Government. The hon. Baronet's views had often been expressed, they were always received with attention, and they were well known to Her Majesty, but he must dissent from one statement, which was, that the Government had declared that this country had no interest in Siamese affairs.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, he had not said that; what he said, and still said, was that Her Majesty's Government declared that when the quarrel arose between France and Siam on the bank of the Mekong that England had no interest in that quarrel.

Sir R. Temple

SIR E. GREY said, that he remembered aright he did not think anything more was said than this, that England had no immediate interest in the incidents of that quarrel. But his statement was made last year with effect that the Government considered that this country had considerable interest in the maintenance of the independence and integrity of Siam, and, of course, two statements must be taken into account. With regard to the production of evidence he had explained about 10 days ago that the Government were delaying the settlement of the points at issue between France and Siam should be as before Papers were presented. He understood that now there only remained one point outstanding and still to be settled. That point was the question of the murder of a Siamese official accused of the murder of a French officer. Of the trial had resulted in the acquittal of the official. They were not quite certain, but what they heard rather showed it was probable that there would be no further proceedings. He hoped, however, that the final result of this trial would not be long delayed. It was thought desirable still to wait a time from publishing Papers. He hoped that a satisfactory settlement of the outstanding point would be reached shortly.

Main Question, as amended, agreed to.

SUPPLY,—considered in

[Mr. MELLOR in the Chair]

(In the Committee)

CIVIL SERVICES AND DEPARTMENTS (ESTIMATES)

CLASS

1. Motion made, and ordered, that

"That a sum, not exceeding £100,000, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the expenses necessary to defray the cost of the in course of payment due on the 31st day of March 1891, in respect of Art and Science in Great Britain."

MR. BARTLEY said, he should like ask for an explanation of the reduction £2,000 in the item of new works, alterations, and additions in connection with the British Museum, and for a statement from the Government as to the truth or otherwise of the rumour that it was proposed to add four or five acres to the site occupied by the Museum.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) was understood to complain of the inconvenience which had been caused by the reversion of certain rooms in the Museum.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, there were several additions to the British Museum buildings, such as new wings, still incomplete, which must, no doubt, imperil the safety of the edifice. But notwithstanding that there was a diminution in the vote for buildings, one would have thought the object of the authorities would be to complete the buildings as soon as possible. He would like to know why the buildings were left in an incomplete state, and when they would be completed?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said that, as he had stated upon the Vote on Account, it was quite true that the Government proposed to purchase a considerable property from the Duke of Bedford. The amount could be borrowed and spread over a number of years, so that the payment would not form a very serious item of increase upon the ordinary Vote for the British Museum. Extensions of the building would probably be made from time to time, but at present there was no immediate intention of adding to the edifice. A Bill would have to be introduced into the House for the purpose of carrying out the transfer of the new plot of ground, and that would be the time to have the whole matter discussed. One or two matters were somewhat pressing upon the authorities, and among those was the question of removing some rather dangerous boilers from the lower portions of the building. Those would be removed on the first opportunity.

MR. HANBURY thought an excellent opportunity now existed for adding to the collection of Syrian sculpture in the British Museum by the purchase, at a very small cost, of samples of Syrian art and archaeology, which were lying exposed to the sun and weather in the neighbourhood of Nineveh and along the head of the Tigris. He had had the opportunity of visiting Nineveh, and had been much struck by these priceless archaeological treasures, with their inscriptions, which furnished the key to Syrian history, lying neglected and unprotected. The Pasha of the district has expressed his readiness to sell them for a very moderate sum indeed, and the cost of transport would be small. There ought to be some Member of the Government to whom they could appeal, and who would take a special interest in matters of this kind.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE said, that his responsibility was concerned with the fabric and with any structural alterations which might be decided upon. He would not therefore follow the last speaker's remarks, though no doubt the Trustees of the Museum were fully alive to the subject. He was not personally responsible for framing the Estimates, but, as far as he was aware, no demand by the Trustees of the Museum for money for necessary alterations had been refused by the Government. He did not think there were any unfinished building work at the Museum.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, there were scaffolding up outside portions of the building.

MR. H. GLADSTONE said, he was not aware of any new work. Though the inquiry of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson) rightly referred to a subsequent Vote, he would say that it was not part of the duty of the First Commissioner of Works to interfere with the discretion of the Trustees in such a matter.

MR. TOMLINSON said, the Committee were asked to vote money for alterations in the Museum buildings, and he thought it was the duty of the Minister in charge to give some reasons for carrying out these changes. He believed the proposed change in the rooms for gold ornaments and medals would not tend to the security or safety of the gold ornaments, and that was why he urged this matter on the attention of the First Commissioner.

MR. H. GLADSTONE said, he did not think the matter came within his Department. He understood that the change in the rooms had been sanctioned either last year or two years ago; but had not yet been completed. The Trustees considered the re-arrangement of the rooms desirable, and so far as he was concerned his responsibility lay entirely in any structural alterations of the building.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was sure the Committee did not wish to press the right hon. Gentleman as to matters of detail connected with the Department which they were all so glad to see him presiding over; but some protest should be made against the doctrine laid down by the right hon. Gentleman that the Trustees of the British Museum were the authority to which in these matters Parliament should bow. The Government were responsible to Parliament for the expenditure of this money, and Parliament was entitled to an explanation with regard to it from the Government.

MR. H. GLADSTONE said, that all he had stated, or meant to convey, was that the matter did not come under the jurisdiction of his Department, which was interested only in questions affecting the Museum buildings.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT explained that all applications by the Trustees of the British Museum were first considered by the Treasury—which had full control—and approved of before being laid before Parliament.

MR. BARTLEY said, the First Commissioner had stated he was not aware that there had been any refusal on the part of his Department of anything the Trustees of the Museum wanted in the way of building. As he had spent a good deal of his life connected with one of the Public Departments, he could say that the Departments were always most anxious to obtain money for their purposes, and he was sure that this money would not have been given up by the Trustees of the Museum unless great pressure had been brought to bear on them by the Treasury to reduce their demand for money for repairs and new buildings to the lowest possible amount, especially as they were in want of additional accommodation for their treasures.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he could give a satisfactory answer to the hon. Gentleman. The £1,000 had been spent last year on the basement for the

Mr. H. Gladstone

Assyrian sculpture, and, as that work had been completed, it was not necessary to ask for any more money for the purpose. The Trustees also knowing that the Government had in prospect the large scheme for obtaining additional land around the Museum, involving an expenditure of £200,000, thought it wise to hold their hands for a time before they asked for money for further extensions, for they would under the scheme be able to extend their building in a more satisfactory way.

MR. H. GLADSTONE said, he had learned that the scaffoldings referred to by the hon. Baronet the Member for Kingston were put up for the ordinary external repairs, and had nothing to do with any unfinished new work.

MR. A. C. MORTON thought that enough money had now been spent on Assyrian bulls. If the Government had any other bulls in view—such as Irish bulls—the House might consider whether it ought not to vote more money for the purchase.

MR. TOMLINSON said, the matter he had called attention to referred to alterations in structure, and was therefore relevant to the present Vote. He objected on principle to being referred to the next Vote, and when that Vote came up and he asked for particulars of the re-arrangement of the rooms to be told that he was not in Order, as the Vote for structures had been disposed of.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) said, that outside the very high railing in front of the British Museum there was a small railing, breast high, enclosing five or six feet of the footpath. The small railing had probably been put up about 30 years ago to keep off boys from climbing up the main railing, but as the latter was now sufficiently intimidating and as there were policemen about night and day, the small railing might be removed and five or six feet added to the footpath, which was all too narrow for the crowds of people who visited the Museum on holidays.

MR. H. GLADSTONE: I will look into that matter.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked for some information regarding the item of £950 to provide additional space in the copyright department. Was it connected with any new development, or expected development, of the Copyright Law? That law was not in a satisfactory position at present; it would certainly have to be attended to in a short time, and unless there was some completed plan with regard to the Law of Copyright, he doubted the wisdom of this large expenditure.

MR. HANBURY said, he did not know why there should be an annual charge of £1,000 for furniture for the British Museum. It was not an institution where one would have thought there was a constant demand for fresh furniture; and if this sum were spent yearly the Museum must be crowded with old furniture, for there was never any mention of an appropriation in aid by the sale of old furniture. He would like to know what became of the old furniture.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he was glad to see a Vote of £3,850 for Bethnal Green Museum. Instead of spending all the money on the West End of London, where those who called themselves the aristocracy lived, some of it should be devoted to the East End or the South West. He should like some explanation of the item of £3,500 for rent of Galleries at South Kensington, and why it was required to spend £4,500 on temporary buildings in that Museum. There was also an item of £860 for rent of galleries, in the Imperial Institute which showed an increase of £110 over the Vote of last year. He objected to the Vote last year because it looked like a subsidy to the Imperial Institute, which was, generally speaking, regarded as a sham and a farce, in which no one took any interest except a few adventurers and company promoters.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS asked the right hon. Gentleman to state to the Committee how far the completion of the South Kensington Museum building was being proceeded with. To their present unsightly condition as seen from the public road it would be difficult to find a parallel in this or any other country. He had been unable to find that any progress had been made in that direction.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that it was hoped a beginning would be made with the new buildings at South Kensington next year. There were obvious reasons for not going on with them this year. By the completion of a number of new and heavy works in the course of the present year a sum of £60,000 would be set free, so to speak, without substantially adding to the Votes for Public Buildings next year. In the meantime, a sum of £4,500 was asked for this year to provide temporary accommodation for the South Kensington staff. Hon. Members would agree that the Department was acting wisely in equalising the expenditure year by year, and money would be saved in the long run by the erection of temporary buildings.

MR. A. C. MORTON asked whether plans had been adopted for the new buildings?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, plans had been approved.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS said, it was desirable the plans should be exhibited.

MR. BARTLEY, speaking from considerable experience of expenditure on the South Kensington buildings, objected to an expenditure of £4,500 on temporary buildings which would have to be pulled down to make room for the permanent structure. There were several acres of land at South Kensington merely covered with grass, and which might be built upon, and common-sense would surely dictate that this money should be expended in making a commencement with the permanent buildings there, leaving the boilers alone. It seemed most extravagant to employ the money as proposed upon a building in which the staff were to be placed temporarily while the pulling down was going on. A block of buildings might be put up at the south-west corner, where at least a couple of acres of land were available, and the "Boilers" would, of course, ultimately have to come down.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the plan contemplated building over a considerable area, part of which was not at present occupied at all. Undoubtedly some provision must be made for the accommodation of the staff. He had understood that the new buildings erected on the vacant site would be utilised for that purpose, and the £4,500 should be employed in that way rather than in the erection of temporary buildings which would have soon to be removed as absolutely worthless. The Committee ought really to be further informed as to the progress of the buildings and the expenditure of the money voted for them.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS suggested that the Government should take this opportunity of making known to the House of Commons generally what plans had been approved for these buildings. He, at any rate, had not seen them. That was the more desirable, as the right hon. Gentleman had told them he was going to ask Parliament for a Vote for these buildings next year. Surely they should know what the buildings were to be like. Another important consideration was that they should not be built of unsuitable materials for the atmosphere of London, as had occurred in other instances where white stone and red brick, both easily spoiled and defiled, had been used. Terra cotta would much more successfully resist the ill-effects of our London atmosphere.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE stated that the plans were approved by the late Government. He would be glad to arrange for the plans being exhibited in the tea-room. As to the charge for furniture for the British Museum, he was informed that certain things had to be supplied in the nature of fittings for certain official residences, but the larger part of the money was expended in cases and necessary furniture for the Museum. With regard to the rent paid to the Imperial Institute, an arrangement had been made that, for the gallery occupied by the Department, it should pay annually 3 per cent. on the cost of that part of the building.

MR. A. C. MORTON objected to the Department occupying any part of the Imperial Institute, and to public money being paid to an Institute which did no good whatever, and was got up to provide salaries for adventurers. He was afraid this was a subsidy to the Imperial Institute, which was shoved into the Estimates for the first time by the late Government.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. A. C. MORTON was only pointing out that these arrangements were a sham and were merely a fraud upon the public. Why was it necessary to give public money to the Imperial Institute?

*SIR J. GOLDSMID said, it struck him that, instead of pulling down the "Boilers" and erecting temporary building a cost of £4,500, it would be to commence permanent building once; and, if necessary, to house the temporarily in the permanent build. That would be far more economical to put up temporary buildings at a considerable cost. And there was a danger of their being maintained when once erected, however little might have been at first intended. remembered a good many years ago temporary buildings being put up Parliament, as so much money had spent upon them, ultimately made permanent, so that they remained as sore to this day. The expenditure large sums upon temporary building very bad in principle. No doubt Vice President wanted his staff properly housed somewhere or other that was no reason why these built should be pulled down and temporary erected, when a commencement be made on the permanent structure where. The right hon. Gentleman have to offer a better explanation would satisfy him and a good many Members of the House.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, it only after the most careful consideration the conclusion had been come to that wiser course was to build accommodation for the staff on the site of the "Boilers" which at present were in themselves source of considerable danger, although that was not the principal reason removing them. There was not slightest wish to expend large sum temporary buildings, which he agreed would be great waste. This was most convenient place for locating staff. He would be very unwilling to authorise temporary buildings unless was absolutely necessary to do so.

MR. PLUNKET (Dublin University) said, it was certainly desirable that the hideous things called the "Boilers" should be removed, but he would whether they were to understand the erection of temporary building was to serve as an excuse for postponing the commencement of permanent buildings, in order that another year might elapse before the House pledged itself to the larger expenditure. They had money on good plans which had been exhibited and approved; and he should like an assurance that the works really going to be taken in hand and carried through. The only way to ensure something being done was to get the opinion of the House of Commons upon the matter. Of course, the Treasury was naturally anxious, as always, to postpone the incurring of considerable expenditure. He had had that struggle many a time, and could assure his right hon. Friend he also would have to undergo it. He wanted an undertaking that the Office of Works would not put off the House of Commons with this small expenditure, but that they would obtain the consent of the Treasury at the earliest possible moment to the principal scheme being carried out.

Mr. J. Lowther

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he had already, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman, stated that next year the Treasury would present an Estimate for the commencement of the new buildings. It was not possible to do it this year on account of the large expenditure for other works, which would be completed within the year. The Public Buildings Vote showed an increase of £20,000 for works which would be completed within the year; and to that extent the Department would be set free for next year. The right hon. Gentleman would recognise that the Department could not commence the whole of the buildings at once.

MR. BARTLEY said, the explanations given were so unsatisfactory that he should conclude by moving the reduction of this item. There was no doubt the Government could spend this £4,500 in erecting permanent buildings in which the staff could be temporarily housed, and thus obviate the necessity for erecting temporary buildings. The rough estimate of the whole expenditure to be incurred was about £500,000; and that showed the size of the site that had to be covered. It did seem a most extraordinary way to set about this work to begin by erecting temporary buildings. The "Boilers," as they were called, were only to be temporary buildings when they were erected in 1857; and if temporary buildings were put up now they would probably remain as long as the "Boilers" had done. The assurances that had been given might be given in good faith, but they were not worth very much, because, before next year, another set of officials might reign at the Treasury who might have different views on the matter. The whole system upon which the extension was being carried out was very unsatisfactory. He objected to the hiring of these spaces on the other side of the road. The country was paying many hundreds a year for the rental of these buildings outside, when there was as a fact plenty of space otherwise. It seemed to him that the whole system was in a state of chaos. The present proposal was to put up temporary sheds, which would be as ugly as the old "Boilers." He said that the time had come when they ought to stop this haphazard expenditure. They ought to have proper plans submitted to them, and those plans ought to be carried out. In the interest of the taxpayers and of the South Kensington Museum itself, he should move a reduction of this sum of £4,500, so that they might really test the feeling of the Committee upon the matter.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Item J, for Science and Art Department Buildings, be reduced by £4,500, in respect of Temporary Buildings at South Kensington."—(Mr. Bartley.)

*SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) said, that the report which reached him was that the "Boilers" were used for an entirely different purpose from the one pointed out by the Vice President of the Council. They were used now and then for the purpose of examining plans which were sent up from the country, and were not occupied by the permanent staff. The permanent staff were housed near the Oratory. He wanted to know whether it was not possible to economise by beginning to build at the other end, near the buildings where the permanent staff was now accommodated, leaving the "Boilers" to be dealt with last, when their temporary occupation could be made permanent. It struck him that, instead of pulling down the "Boilers" in order to erect temporary buildings at a cost of £4,500, it would be far better to commence permanent buildings at once in which the staff could be housed.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) said, there seemed to be some misapprehension with regard to this Vote. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down thought that the "Boilers" were a series of iron sheds, and he believed they were not used for the uses of the staff, but were deposited for the examination of plans. Whether they were used for plans or for other purposes, the "Boilers" occupied the site at the Government ought to start upon at once for the finishing of the buildings.

hon. MEMBER: No!] Well, he knew South Kensington just as well as the hon. Gentleman who cried "no." They had at least to complain that the appearance of one of the most beautiful buildings in London—he meant therompton Oratory—was spoiled by the unfinished state of the South Kensington buildings; and, consequently, he said that they ought to start with the completion of the frontage of those buildings as near to the Oratory as possible. When they found that that was the point at which some of the staff were situated it seemed to him that the First Commissioner of Works had made out a strong case for getting rid of the "Boilers" and completing the front of the Museum. The hon. Member for Kensington said that the staff could be accommodated by starting a new building at the other end of the premises. He thought that by the time the "Boilers" were pulled down, and the temporary building erected, they would find that there was no necessity for completing the new block at the south-west corner of the Museum, because by that time public opinion in London would protest against the Imperial Institute being used for its present purposes, and would demand that it should be handed over to the South Kensington Authorities, and be devoted to mechanical engineering, instead of being devoted to the uses of "Diplomatic Johnnies and Colonial Bounders." It was his opinion that they ought to have the staff housed in a portion of the building in close proximity to the Oratory, and that they ought to have these dangerous "Boilers" pulled down at once. Although he was opposed to the general system of temporary buildings of any kind whatever, he thought that, under the circumstances of the case, the Government were entitled to ask for a sum of money to complete the front of the Museum, so as to place it in harmony with the beautiful buildings both right and left.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that this proposal for the erection of temporary buildings was not a new one.

Mr. John Burns

It was decided upon by the late Government two years ago. He was no more desirous than the hon. Gentleman opposite to see temporary buildings erected. The immediate necessity, however, was the provision of a building for the staff. The staff was very insufficiently provided for at present, and was absolutely necessary that the first extension made should be devoted to their purpose. The hon. Member Islington said it would be a wise course to erect a portion of the building and to house the staff in it, and then to remove it again. The effect of that would be that they would have to erect in another portion of the ground a building for the staff, which would afterwards have to be used for exhibition purposes. As it was obvious that no building could be equally suitable for both purposes, he could only say that that course did not commend itself to his mind, and that he did not think it would commend itself to the Committee, if they had the plans before them. The course now recommended to the Committee seemed to him to be the wisest one that could be followed, and indeed the only one that could be adopted.

SIR H. MAXWELL (Wigton) said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman had agreed to exhibit these plans afresh in the tea-room. He was not aware himself that the opinion of hon. Members had been invited upon the plans. The impression left upon his mind was that the style of architecture adopted was neither classical nor Gothic, nor Renaissance, nor English domestic architecture. It was totally a new school. There was, undoubtedly, great merit in the originality, but he should be glad to know whether there was any chance of the plans being reconsidered.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Regis) said, he should not go into various styles of the architecture of a building, but should address himself to the sole question whether they were going to spend £4,500 on a temporary building or upon a permanent one. The hon. Member for Brompton had argued that they should erect a temporary building because a permanent building would never be required, much as he intended to turn the Imperial Institute into a school of mechanical engineering. He had said ad these buildings called "Boilers." In these "Boilers" was housed the staff of South Kensington Museum. They had so acres of ground vacant, upon which some time they were going to erect a permanent building. How were they going to erect this permanent building? They might begin by erecting a part of a permanent building on the vacant ground. But the hon. Gentleman said that, first of all, they must pull down the "Boilers," and then erect the temporary building. He presumed that what was wanted was that the temporary building was to be erected first, and then the clerks and staff were to be transferred, and that afterwards a permanent building was to be erected, and at some future time the staff and clerks were to be transferred from their second temporary home to their permanent home. It seemed to be plain that the whole of the money proposed to be devoted to this building would be absolutely thrown away. Let them take the £4,500 and begin upon the vacant ground with the permanent buildings. It would be as good, in any rate, as any temporary building that could be erected, and useful as well for other purposes. They would then have the £4,500, instead of putting it into a building which must hereafter be taken down, and they would be putting an end to the system of temporary buildings, an arrangement which was a disgrace to South Kensington, and had made the building ridiculous in the eyes of the artistic world.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID said, he should like to know where it was intended to erect these temporary buildings? He was inclined to think that the staff who were said to be now occupying the "Boilers" might prefer to remain in their present quarters rather than be removed a long way away from their work. He was glad to see that the Vice President had come back to the House, because they would be pleased to know how he was going to arrange for the housing of the staff who were temporarily accommodated in the "Boilers." They had heard that a good portion of the permanent staff occupied the "Boilers," but he understood that it was only a portion of the staff which was sent into the "Boilers" in order to examine the plans which came up from the country, and that they were not occupied by the regular permanent staff. It was necessary that they should have some explanation as to how this matter stood, and as to what was really intended to be done.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) said, that the present accommodation was absolutely unsuitable for the staff. Hon. Members seemed to think that providing proper accommodation for the staff was a very immaterial matter. If, however, they would take the trouble to go down one day and inspect the "Boilers" they would find some well-known and distinguished men like Mr. Morris and Mr. Crane located there. He thought that was a disreputable place for them to be in. They were just as much members of the permanent staff as any others. He understood that the building was to be on the other side of the Exhibition Road. A very important part of their work was carried on on the other side of the Exhibition Road, but as a fact it did not really matter on which side the buildings were placed.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that nobody had addressed himself to the practical question involved in the Amendment. Why could not the Government commence by erecting permanent buildings on the vacant ground? Why could they not commence their expenditure upon that portion of the ground which was now vacant, and house the staff in the buildings so erected, thereby saving this expenditure of £4,500?

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he was glad the Government had promised to exhibit these plans again in the tea-room. He must say he had been a pretty regular attendant at the House, but he had never seen these plans. Possibly they were put in the tea-room during the time of the General Election. As he understood, they were not bound to these plans although a tender had been accepted. It appeared to him that the answer of the Government was not a very good one as to the erection of temporary buildings. He did not suppose that they wanted to waste the money of the taxpayers, which could be very much better expended in other parts of London. The Museum ought not to be made a lounge for the aristocracy. It was not clear to his mind that it was necessary to spend this money on temporary buildings. He thought it could be spent upon new buildings, and so saved. It was all very well to say that the matter had been well considered, but they were not bound by the official mind. He found that what the officials wanted was money, and they knew that a great deal of it was wasted. He hoped the Government would consider whether this money could not be saved by spending it upon a part of the permanent buildings instead of upon a temporary building. They might put it upon what side they liked, but let them put it where it would be permanent. As at present contemplated the money would be wasted.

MR. TOMLINSON said, that whatever might be the merits of the question he did not think that they could be satisfied by the explanation of the Vice President. The right hon. Gentleman wanted to get the staff out of their temporary accommodation in the "Boilers," and yet he proposed to put up another temporary building for their accommodation. It would be a great deal better that a permanent building should be constructed; and in the interests of economy, and the carrying out of public works for the public advantage, he thought that the Committee ought to express its view against this proposal.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE said, that the only desire of the Government was to carry out the work as economically as possible. By the pulling down of the "Boilers" the staff would be displaced, and up to the present time it had not been found possible to find accommodation for the staff in any other way than that suggested. If they could find temporary accommodation in the neighbourhood they would endeavour to obtain the sanction of the Treasury to alter the proposal so that the staff could be placed in any accommodation so found.

MR. BARTLEY said, the Committee now heard that although the Government were asking for £4,500 for temporary buildings, that between this and the erection of the building they would, if they found it convenient, go to the Treasury for power to expend the money in a direction different to the verdict expressed by Parliament. Their argument was that they ought to begin the permanent buildings. What the Vice President had told him was that the "Boilers" were used for looking at the national competition drawings. If there was a place that could be used with advantage for the purposes suggested he should say that it would be one of the new courts of the Museum. Nothing could be better than that one of these new courts should take the place of the present "Boilers." The hon. Member for Battersea had said that he wanted to beautify the space between the Museum and the Oratory. There was ample room at the bottom of the building next to the Oratory to put up a new block quite as large as the "Boilers" themselves. The "Boilers" were not next to the Oratory. There was no question whatever that if the Government thought proper to do it they could set to work and put up one section of the new building which would do perfectly well for all the purposes required.

MR. H. GLADSTONE said, that the plans had been accepted, and that alterations, though possible, would involve a severe fine. Some provision must be made at once, otherwise it would not be possible to house the staff.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 25 ; Noes 82.—(Division List, No. 9.)

Original Question again proposed.

SIR R. TEMPLE called attention to the next item, £2,800 odd, for the purchase of property adjacent to the Bethnal Green Museum. Would the right hon. Gentleman tell the Committee something about it—what that property was, what purpose it was to serve, and to what extent the Museum would be benefited by it?

*MR. H. GLADSTONE explained that the expenditure was to acquire a small amount of property which projected into the open space at present existing, and which was a source of danger from fire.

MR. A. C. MORTON asked for an explanation of an item of £860 paid to the Imperial Institute. He said, he objected to any form of subsidising out of public money the Institute, which he regarded as a fraud on the nation altogether. Public money had been obtained and buildings promised, but the money had been spent elsewhere. He asked whether any agreement had been ade in this matter, and if so what it as ?

Mr. A. C. Morton

MR. H. GLADSTONE said, the sum was a terminable payment for rent of rooms in the Institute, space being wanted at South Kensington.

MR. JOHN BURNS called attention to an item of £3,850 for the purchase of houses adjacent to the Bethnal Green Museum in order to pull them down. He stated that the London County Council had recently acquired seven or eight acres of ground near the Museum for an open space, and suggested that the First Commissioner of Works should confer with the architect of the County Council with a view to the work being carried out as a whole in a symmetrical way.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE undertook to do this.

SIR R. TEMPLE asked what had been done to improve the accommodation for the Art students at South Kensington when they assembled there for examination. What had been done with the land required for the examination buildings? He believed some plan had been proposed for some fine new buildings, but was not aware what progress had been made with it.

MR. H. GLADSTONE said, his right hon. Friend the late First Commissioner had made the best arrangements he could for the present to improve the accommodation without spending too large a sum upon that particular item.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £21,161, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1895, for Expenditure in respect of Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, and for the maintenance of certain Cemeteries Abroad."

COLONEL TOMLINSON (Preston) could understand charges for proper repairs, but not that the charges should extend to providing furniture, in a building account.

MR. HANBURY asked for an explanation with reference to the contribution of India towards the rents of Legation and Consular buildings in China.

MR. A. C. MORTON referred to the charge for municipal and State taxes, including insurance at Berlin, and asked whether this country was to be asked to continue the payment of those taxes, when Great Britain made an exemption in favour of other Powers? He also objected to the poor people of India being called upon to make contributions which the British authorities ought to pay out of Imperial funds. The China rents also included a sum of £490 for taxes, which seemed very large, and satisfactory information should be given about these contributions towards the China rents.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE was understood to say that there was a certain amount of reciprocity observed with regard to the payment of rates and taxes, and that the payment by India towards rents of Legation and Consular buildings in China had been made for many years.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, that it would be only fair that notice should be given to the Embassies that the Local Authorities of London would charge them rates and taxes, and that we should insist upon reciprocity in this matter to the advantage of the ratepayers of various parishes as the case might be.

MR. LEGH (Lancashire, S.W., Newton) asked whether it was not the universal practice in all foreign countries to exempt Diplomatic and Consular Representatives from the payment of rates and taxes, and why the rule was not observed in Berlin and Vienna?

*SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) was bound to say that he did not think that India contributed too large a share towards the Diplomatic and Consular Services of this country when they considered the enormous advantage which she derived from them. No doubt the time had come when there might be some reconsideration and revision as to the particular cases in which she should contribute. But he thought that the result of any such revision would be to increase and not to diminish the extent of the Indian contribution, and that it would not be a good thing for India if the matter were re-considered. For instance, the expenditure in Eastern Africa, partly colonial and partly foreign, was almost entirely incurred on behalf of Indian subjects and Indian trade. Both the Indian subjects and the Indian trade had an enormous interest in the East Coast of Africa. The whole matter was very thoroughly considered in the famous investigation into the finances of India which took place upon the suggestion of Mr. Fawcett some years ago, and there was no case made out for India ceasing to pay towards the Diplomatic and Consular Services. There was another matter which arose upon this Vote under several different items. It would be improper to discuss a question of policy upon a Vote which was simply a Vote for buildings. At the same time, there were certain matters in the Vote in regard to which this was the only opportunity for discussion, and if they were not mentioned upon this Vote, they could not be mentioned at all. There were items of expenditure on behalf of British Central Africa and Zanzibar, some of which did not arise upon any other Vote; and in this connection it was desirable to take notice of how far the Foreign Office was becoming a Colonial Department. He held that the proper policy of this country was to place protectorates, which were virtually colonies, under the control of the Colonial, and not the Foreign, Department. With regard to Central Africa, there was no other opportunity of making mention of the fact, that British Central Africa was practically a portion of the British Empire—

*SIR E. GREY said, there would be opportunity for further mention of this matter.

SIR C. W. DILKE said, that although he might have an opportunity of mentioning Central Africa again, there were other items in the Vote which he could not mention. All he could say was, to take the case of Africa, that there were now in Africa a large number of establishments for which they were paying in this Vote in regard to places which were paying their running expenses out of the revenue they received; and there was no Budget presented by these colonies, as they virtually were. The proper thing was to place these colonies under the Colonial, and not under the Foreign, Office. He would not, however, discuss the matter further now, as he should be able to refer to it on Class V.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that before they entered upon this large field which the right hon. Baronet had opened out to them, they should clear up the question of the position which diplomatic residences in this country occupied in regard to local rates. The right hon. Baronet, who had a practical knowledge of the Foreign Office, said that the houses occupied by the Foreign Representatives were exempt from rates. If that were carried out strictly it would be unjust to localities from the local taxation point of view. He was under the impression that the Imperial funds made up to the localities for the sacrifice to which they were subjected in the Imperial interest. That was so, he thought. [A hon. MEMBER: No.] If, for instance, a house in a parish in London where a diplomatic residence was situated, for Imperial reasons was purchased for diplomatic purposes, it became extra territorial. Certainly the Imperial Exchequer ought to come to the rescue of the parish in cases of that kind. He thought that in the cases of diplomatic residences there should be exemption from rates. But before they entered upon any larger topic, he would like to call attention to the item for the accommodation of our Residences in China. Now India was largely benefited by our diplomatic expenditure in China, and he thought that it should devolve on the Revenues of India to make us some recompense. He did not champion the British Empire against the British taxpayer. It was considered to be patriotic to say that the British taxpayer ought to do everything, and to be very generous with his money, and that he ought to contribute towards all sorts of Imperial expenditure. He was glad to find that India did contribute something towards the expenses of these Services, but he thought they ought to know exactly what the proportion was. He was not saying that India ought to contribute anything at all, but inasmuch as there was a contribution, he should like to know what the details were.

Sir C. W. Dilke

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he should like to state what was the position of the case in regard to houses occupied by the Representatives of Foreign Powers. It was not the case that all the Representatives had their houses exempted from local rates. Formerly these houses were liable for rates, but the Foreign Representatives were not liable to be proceeded against for non-payment of rates. That question was brought up upon complaints made by the Local Authorities to the Government in 1891, and complaints were also made by the Diplomatic Body as to the trouble to which they were put in this matter. The Treasury at that time made a proposal to the Diplomatic Body and to the Foreign Office, which was accepted by all parties. The proposal was that local rates for the relief of the poor, School Board, police, baths, and washhouses, public libraries, and Burial Board were to be borne by Her Majesty's Government; and that the local rates for sewerage, drainage, maintenance lighting and improvement of streets, and fire-brigade were to be borne by the Diplomatic Body. This arrangement was only operative in cases where our Representatives in foreign countries received the same treatment. There was to be a system of reciprocity; and he had a list of 19 or 20 countries which adopted the system. The plan now adopted was that the Government paid both classes of rates in the first instance, and obtained repayment through the Foreign Office of that portion for which the Diplomatic Body was responsible. The plan worked most satisfactorily.

MR. A. C. MORTON asked whether the German Government came under this arrangement?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Yes.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, that Germany already had a long pull at the British purse, and he wished to be sure that they had no more.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, he must ask for an explanation of some of the figures of the Estimate. From an accountant's point of view the particulars given were not intelligible. Was the original amount £1,490, from which £490 was deducted for the Indian contribution, or was it that the gross sum was £1,000, to which India contributed £490. The specifications said under Subhead E (China Rents) that the amount was for "Rents of the Legation and Consular Buildings in China, in respect of which the Indian Government contributes, including £490 for taxes." What was the total amount of the contribution of India?

MR. HANBURY said, it was all very well for the Member for the Forest of Dean to say that if this matter were reconsidered India might have to pay a larger amount than she was paying at this moment. Four Ministers were interested in the Vote, and yet they were unable to get any answer to their questions. He thought they ought to know exactly what the Indian contribution was, and except he got an answer showing that Ministers knew what the contribution was, he should move a reduction. He begged, in order to get an answer from the Government, to move to reduce Sub-head E by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Item E., for China Rents, be reduced by £100, in respect of Rents for Legation and Consular Buildings in China."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

MR. TOMLINSON said, he noticed that in regard to the expenses for Legation and Consular Buildings in India the Vote was smaller this year than last year. He suggested, therefore, that a larger contribution was being made by India. That was quite consistent with such information as had been furnished to them. It seemed to him strange that there should be a reduction of the rent of the Consular Buildings from £1,270 to £1,000.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he did not know whether the Estimates were intended to be read according to the ordinary construction of the English grammar. He did not know whether it was to be supposed that the contribution of the Indian Government was £1,000. He was rather shocked to observe that the Minister for India was not in his place. The right hon. Gentleman would no doubt be able to tell them what was the amount that India did contribute. He, as the guardian of the Indian purse, would no doubt know whether India was or was not contributing a fair share of these rents. The definite question to which they wanted an answer was the amount contributed by the Government of India.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE said, that he was not possessed of full information on this point, and he could not answer for all the details of a Vote for the preparation of which he was not responsible.

SIR C. W. DILKE said, that the contribution from India was £12,500.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) said, the right hon. Baronet incorrectly stated the contribution to be £12,500. He had no objection to whether that contribution was much, but he might say that those took the deepest interest in Indian affairs were content with the arrangement under which that contribution was paid, and were not desirous that the matter should be re-considered.

Supply—Civil Services, {COMMONS}

Mr. HANBURY said, that he must consider the question from the British taxpayers' point of view. Justice ought to be done between the two countries, and if India ought to pay more why should she not pay more? He wanted to know what the particular contribution of India was to these China rents. He must insist upon the reduction which he had moved.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, it was very clear that there was a lump sum of £12,500, on account of the Consular and Diplomatic Services, paid by the Government of India, and whether that sum was paid for buildings or for salaries did not seem to him to matter. What did it signify whether it was paid under one particular item or another? The taxpayers benefited to that extent.

Mr. TOMLINSON said, that it made this difference, that they did not know what the cost of the Services was. They knew that they were contributing £1,000, and they knew that India was contributing something out of the £12,500, but they did not know what it was. He thought the Estimate ought to be made up in such a way that they would know what was being contributed. They were entitled to some explanation as to how this £12,500 was divided.

*Mr. H. H. FOWLER said, the hon. Member opposite was an experienced man of business, and he knew that the usual way of settling contributions either between one Corporation or another, or between one part of the Empire or another, was to ascertain what was the gross sum to be paid by the contributing party in regard to the whole service rendered. It was not practicable to divide and apportion the money in the detailed manner suggested. Competent Authorities on one hand and the Indian Authorities on the other agreed that the sum of £12,500 was a fair England pay, and for England. The Government took this Service as a whole, and said India derived great advantages from it, and that it was fair that she should pay £12,500 a year towards this part of the Diplomatic and Consular Service of Great Britain. If the hon. Member wished to re-open the question, he believed there was a Motion on the Paper complaining that India paid too much. To ask how the money was divided was to ask a question which could not possibly be answered.

Mr. TOMLINSON asked whether the £1,000 was the whole of the cost of the communication with China? *Mr. H. GLADSTONE said, that up to a few years ago one-third of the sub-head they were now considering was charged on the Indian Government. The change was made, and the sum included in the £12,500 now contributed by India in respect to the Consular Service.

Mr. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner (Mr. H. Gladstone) has performed what the Secretary of State (Mr. H. H. Fowler) described as an impossible task. He has told us that the contribution of India was not fixed at the sum of £12,500 as a matter of arrangement between the United Kingdom and its great Dependency, but was made up by calculating the fair share of each of the items concerned. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that the Indian contribution was estimated at one-third. The Secretary for India has just told us from his official knowledge I presume that in the interests of the Indian taxpayer he would recommend that the matter should not be further pursued.

Mr. H. H. FOWLER: No, I did not say that. I did not express any opinion of my own on the question. What I said was to communicate to the House the opinion of the India Office.

Mr. J. LOWTHER: Well, the better still. The right hon. Gentleman gave us not his views, but views of his official advisers, who are those most competent to form an opinion upon the subject. In the opinion of experts who advise the right hon. gentleman India pays too little. Of course, is a subject which, when up for the consideration of the House will have to be discussed. The ner this is a reasonable and fair

ment.

BARTLEY said, he had no t seemed a little hard that the y for India should be expected to nd these points, and perhaps a rd that the new First Commisf Works should have to under-hem, but the Committee really ight to expect that the Govern-ich had been in Office for a year alf should present their Estimate elligible manner.

H. GLADSTONE: It has been same form for the six years
g.

BARTLEY said, he did not at it was in exactly the same s year as it had been before. It ossible to understand the words stood. They did not constitute lish sentence, and they meant ly nothing.

I. GLADSTONE: I understand many years past no notice has towed upon this matter. I quite at the Estimate might be worded early, and I will see that this done in another year.

GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn said, the point was that the ee was asked to vote £1,000, as a matter of fact, £1,000 was led. The amount needed was to be reduced by some sum not nd of the amount of which no was cognisant except the First sioner of Works (Mr. H. Glad-who had made a shot of £300.
ery important that the Committee know exactly what they were

Hon. Members had been enable to elicit the slightest inn either as to finance or as to from Her Majesty's Govern-on put.

Committee divided:—Ayes 16;
—(Division List, No. 10.)

al Question again proposed.

STUART-WORTLEY: I see through these various European in the case of repairs the archi-ys has a fee of £24; but when to Washington the fee is £50.
; know whether this increase is the blessings of a Republican Government or to exigencies of Federal currency, but perhaps the right hon.

Gentleman will explain that on the Report stage.

Mr. BARTLEY asked whether the new Agency House at Cairo was completed. He wished to know what the item for maintaining the Agency grounds and gardens meant. He knew that there was a very nice garden round the Agency House, having seen it when he was recently in Cairo, and he wished to know whether the Ambassador was to pay half the cost and the State the other half?

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said, he noticed on page 28 the item of "Prisons."
This involved a claim to go into certain countries and put the subjects of those countries into prison. He was aware that under what were called the Capitulations we undoubtedly had the power in Turkey of putting Turkish subjects into prison under certain circumstances.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see how the question of the Capitulations can be dealt with under this Vote.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said, his point was that the items for prisons was unnecessary. There was a sum of £450 put down for Consular Offices, Prisons, and Post Offices. He wished to know how much of the £450 was applicable for the prisons. If the question could be raised on any other Vote he would willingly defer it, but his contention was that no prison should be maintained by the Sovereign of this country in another country in derogation of the power of the other Sovereign. The maintenance of a prison in Constantinople was, in his opinion, very unjustifiable.

*SIR E. GREY: I cannot state the exact sum which is spent upon prisons,
but I gather from the speech of the hon.
Member that his object is to object to the whole sum which is spent upon prisons, because he disapproves of extra-territorial jurisdiction. Well, Sir, that raises a very grave question of policy connected with the Capitulations in Turkey. If we were to renounce our rights under the Capi-tulations it would mean that British subjects residing in Turkey, or being in Turkey for any length of time, would become subject to the Turkish law, and could be placed in Turkish prisons. That is a course of policy which Her Majesty's Government have no intention of embarking upon. The present system has existed for a very long time, and the Government have no intention of renouncing their rights under the Capitulations. I do not think it would be a wise step to take, and I am surprised that the question should be raised by the hon. Gentleman, as it would mean the sacrifice of British interests.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, under those circumstances he should be obliged to move the reduction of the Vote by the whole sum of £450. He said boldly that if a British subject went into Turkey he should become subject to Turkish law, just as British subjects who went into Russia, or even into the Argentine Republic, became subject to the laws of those countries.

SIR E. GREY : I look upon this as a matter, not only of policy, but of very large policy indeed, and I should have thought that a more suitable occasion to discuss it would have arisen either on the Foreign Office Vote or else on the Vote for the Under Secretary's salary.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : That being so, I will not press the matter now.

*MR. H. GLADSTONE said, that the Agency House at Cairo was absolutely finished. The contribution to the Agency garden was on account of the special cost of water in Egypt.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.

Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

X SPORT REGULATION BILL—(No. 101.) SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."
—(Mr. A. C. Morton.)

MR. J. LOWTHER : This Bill seems to me to be as grotesque an example of attempted grandmotherly legislation as was ever submitted to Parliament. The hon. Gentleman who introduced it has been so good as to supply us with a Memorandum which states its aims and objects. Of course, it is easy enough to say that any particular sport is open to objection. No doubt, every sport taken in detail would be open to some objection, and I have no doubt that there may be persons who would be glad to put down all sport. Here is the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) who singles out many sports, some of which are more especially the sports of the people of this country. In the Northern and Midland Counties rabbit coursing prevails very largely. I confess that it is not a sport of which I have any personal knowledge, but those who take part in it have not the means of engaging in the more expensive forms of sport. They cannot have hunters or keep fox-hounds, or indulge in any other of the more expensive amusements.

Sir E. Grey

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Wednesday next.

NORTH BERWICK PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.—(No. 89.)

Read a second time, and committed.

MAGISTRATES' QUALIFICATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Dodd, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Qualification and Appointment of Justices of the Peace in Counties, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Dodd, Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Arch, Mr. Channing, Mr. Charles Fenwick, Mr. Carvell Williams, and Mr. Neville.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 128.]

CORPORATE ASSOCIATIONS (PROPERTY) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Howell, Bill for the better securing their Property to Corporate Associations, and for preventing the Alienation of their Funds, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Howell, Mr. Barrow, Mr. Beaufoy, Mr. Benn, Mr. Cremer, Mr. Frye, Mr. Montagu, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Rowlands, Mr. James Stuart, and Mr. Stewart Wallace.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 129.]

VALUATION (METROPOLIS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Pickersgill, Bill for better securing uniformity in the valuation and assessment of rateable property in the Administrative County of London ; to establish a tribunal to deal with assessment appeals ; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Cohen, Sir Albert Rollit, Mr. James Stuart, Mr. James Rowlands, Mr. Howell, and Captain Norton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 130.]

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [29th March] reported, and agreed to.—[See p. 963.]

House adjourned at five minutes after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 2nd April 1894.

QUESTIONS.

MILITARY INSTRUCTIONS REGARDING RIOTS IN INDIA.

MR. CAINE (Bradford, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if the India Office has yet received a copy of the recent Instructions issued by the Government of India, ordering that in future the police in dealing with a riot shall not use blank cartridge but use only ball cartridge; if so, has this Order received the sanction of the Secretary of State; and will he lay the Instruction and any correspondence thereon upon the Table of the House?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (MR. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): No definite Instructions have yet been given on this subject. The question is under the consideration of the Local Governments, by whom the Orders will have to be issued eventually, and the precise line to be taken will not be determined until the Government of India is in possession of their views. When the Correspondence is complete there will be no objection to its being presented to the House.

THE INDIAN COUNCILS ACT.

MR. CAINE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he is now able to lay upon the Table of the House some information, in the shape of a Return or otherwise, showing the composition of the recently elected Legislative Assemblies throughout British India, and the method pursued by the various Governors and Lieutenant Governors in carrying out the provisions of the Indian Councils Act?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: A Return showing the composition of the several Legislative Councils has been received from India, and the Papers showing the method pursued by the various Local Governments are being collected. If my hon. Friend will move for the Papers I shall have great pleasure in presenting them to the House.

VOL. XXII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

CHARGE AGAINST A HINDU DEPUTY COLLECTOR.

MR. CAINE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India is he aware that a Hindu deputy collector of Malabar, Mr. C. Kunhi Kannan was, on the ex parte Report of the acting District Magistrate, prosecuted by the Madras Government for alleged bribery in October, 1888, without being given any opportunity of explanation; and whether sworn evidence has been forthcoming, since the prosecution was ended, proving that the prosecution was the result of a conspiracy, and that the Madras Government has refused to order an inquiry; and, if so, will the Secretary of State call for copies of Petitions, dated 19th May and 21st December, 1893, with a view to considering the advisability of directing the Madras Government to hold an inquiry into the case?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Mr. C. Kunhi Kannan was prosecuted before a Court of Law to which he had the opportunity of submitting such explanation or defence of his conduct as he might have to offer. The result of the trial was, however, that he was convicted of bribery, and sentenced to imprisonment. Since his release he has petitioned the Government of Madras for a further inquiry, alleging that his conviction was the result of a conspiracy; but, as the trial had taken place in the ordinary way before the Sessions Court, the Government of Madras pointed out that his proper course was to apply to the Sessions Court for sanction to prosecute his accuser for perjury, or to move the High Court to take up the matter in exercise of its powers of revision, and that an investigation by a special officer would, by comparison, carry no weight, and would have no legal authority. In this view I am disposed, as at present advised, to concur.

THE BALLADHUN MURDER CASE.

MR. CAINE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if the full Report of the Balladhun murder case as tried before the Sessions Judge, Mr. John Clark, at Silchar, 29th September, 1893, and the full Report of the appeal against the verdict, heard before Justices Prinsep and Amir Ali, who delivered judgment 11th November, 1893, has now been received by the India Office; and, if so, will he lay them upon the Table; whether Mr. Clark is still in the service of the Government of India; and, if so, in what capacity; and, if so, will he order his suspension, pending a searching public inquiry into the grave charges against him? At the same time, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that it was stated, during the hearing of the appeal against the conviction and sentence of certain prisoners to death and penal servitude by Mr. John Clark, Sessions Judge of Cachar, 11th November, 1893, in the High Court at Calcutta, that Police Inspector Joy Chunder was sent down from Sylhet by the Assam Government to obtain evidence, with a promised reward of Rs.2,500 if he obtained a conviction; and that, on arrival at Balladhun, the place where the murder was committed, Inspector Joy Chunder arrested a large number of people indiscriminately, regardless of sex, and by prolonged imprisonment, torture, and threats, worked up a case based upon tutored approvers' evidence; if it is true that the village of Balladhun, and others in the neighbourhood, were placed under punitive police supervision; is Inspector Joy Chunder still in the employ of the Government of India; and has any action been taken to bring him to trial for the outrages charged against him?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I am aware that allegations have been made with respect to the proceedings in connection with the Balladhun murder case which require the fullest investigation. The Viceroy has instructed the Chief Commissioner of Assam to inquire into all the circumstances. I understand that the Chief Commissioner of Assam will shortly make his Report, and I believe that the Papers on the subject should reach me about the middle of next month. At present no official Papers relating to the case have been received in the India Office, and I am unable to give any further answer with respect to the details of this case.

MR. CAINE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that I put this question two and a-half months ago, and that I was then promised that an inquiry should be made? Is it the case that nothing official has yet been done?

Mr. Caine

MR. H. H. FOWLER: My hon. Friend did, no doubt, put the question, and the result was that the Viceroy communicated with, and he directed inquiry. Until that has been complete no Papers can be given.

ILLEGAL TRAWLING IN THE MORAY FIRTH.

SIR W. WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary Scotland, with reference to the alleged illegal trawling in the Moray Firth Sunday, the 4th of March, whether he is aware that numerous witnesses Portknockie are prepared to testify that the vessels in question were engaged the whole forenoon, from 8 o'clock to working under steam within a radius four miles, doubling, crossing, and crossing in such a manner as to show that they were trawling; whether an official visit of inquiry from H.M. Jackal, or from any other quarter, has been made to Portknockie with reference to this case; upon what evidence the Commander of the Jackal considers that the vessels in question were probably steam liners and vessels in passage and how many days since last September the Jackal has spent off the coast of Banffshire?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow B. Igeton): I am informed that it is the case that certain persons at Portknockie are prepared to testify that vessels were seen as stated in the hon. Member's question. But as the hon. Member is aware, unless offending vessels can be identified, nothing further can be done, and no evidence of identification has been laid before the Fishery Board. An official visit of inquiry has been made by the Fishery Board, as the information received from the Commander of the Jackal, the fishery officer at Buchan and other sources did not point to inquiry serving any useful end. The view of the Commander of the Jackal was based upon his general knowledge of the local movements of steam liners and other vessels. The Jackal has been off Banffshire for 19 days since September last, on watching duty, in addition to 14 days on scientific duty.

THE DEER FORESTS INQUIRY.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he will explain why the labours of the Royal Commission on Highland Pasture and Deer Forests are confined to the six counties in which the Crofters Acts are at present in force; and whether, as the same conditions of agriculture obtain in Moray and Nairn as in these six counties, Her Majesty's Government will direct the Commission to extend its labours to these counties?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The Royal Commission was appointed in order to obtain information with regard to those counties to which Parliament by the Act of 1886 applied the provisions relating to the enlargement of crofters' holdings. The Government are not prepared to extend the operation of the Commission beyond the bounds of those counties.

SAMOA.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state which of Her Majesty's ships is now at Samoa, and the date of her arrival there; and whether he can give the House any further information as to the deplorable events reported to have occurred there, and the course Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): There is no British ship of war at Samoa at present. Her Majesty's Consul reports by telegraph on the 22nd ultimo that there has been some trouble in Samoa, but that the presence of a man-of-war is not at all necessary, as an armistice has been arranged and a satisfactory peace is certain.

THE RUSSO-GERMAN COMMERCIAL TREATY.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a copy of the Commercial Treaty, recently concluded between Russia and Germany, has been received at the Foreign Office; when the said Treaty will come into force; and whether, under the Most Favoured Nation Clause, what British goods, if any, will be favourably affected?

*SIR E. GREY: The text of the Commercial Treaty recently concluded between Germany and Russia has been received at the Foreign Office, and is now in force. Its effect in regard to British goods is shown in a statement in The Board of Trade Journal published on the 15th of this month, page 291, to which I must ask the hon. Member to refer for details.

KIANG HUNG.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is a fact, as stated by Mr. Holt Hallett, that Her Majesty's Government are about to cede to China the Burmese district of Kiang Hung, through which the British railway to Yunnan and the South-Western Provinces of China must pass?

*SIR E. GREY: The cession of the rights of Burma in Kiang Hung, which we found under Chinese administration, is one of those questions dealt with in the Convention relating to the Burmese frontier recently signed with China. As that Convention has not yet been ratified it would not be in the interests of the Public Service to make any declaration with regard to it at the present moment.

RANGES FOR THE LEE-METFORD RIFLE.

SIR H. FLETCHER (Sussex, Lewes): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many ranges are now available for troops armed, and about to be armed, with the Lee-Metford rifle, and to specify the places in each military division in the United Kingdom; and what number of targets can be used at the said ranges?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): There are at present 48 ranges available for the troops armed, or about to be armed, with the Lee-Metford rifle. I have here a list of the places, if my hon. Friend wishes to see it.

MILITARY BILLETS AT WAKEFIELD

MR. NUSSEY (Pontefract): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the troops billeted or quartered at Wakefield during the late labour dis-

Derelicts in

{COMMONS}

9 tes were paid for by the Government the local innkeepers at a rate higher than the statutory payments made for billeting on the ground that it was a large and unusual burden upon such inn-keepers; and whether the same rule will be applied to Pontefract, where the inn-keepers had a similar burden cast upon them; and, if not, upon what ground a difference is made?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN:
 The local Military Authorities paid the innkeepers at Wakefield in regard to troops billeted there at the highest rate allowed by the Army Act for more days than the Regulations are held to justify.
 This was a mistake, and it was discovered before payment at Pontefract was made.

THE INDIAN STAFF CORPS.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University):
 I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether any Despatch has recently been received from the Indian Government relating to the complaints made as to the slow rate of promotion in the Indian Staff Corps; and when it may be expected that Her Majesty's Government will arrive at a decision on this subject?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: A Despatch on the subject has been received by the Secretary of State, who is in communication with the War Office on the subject.
 I regret the delay; but, in view of the importance and difficulty of the subject, it is not possible to state when a decision will be arrived at.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES AT LEIXLIP.

MR. KENNEDY (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received a resolution unanimously adopted by the Leixlip branch of the Irish Industrial League urging upon the Local Government Board for Ireland the necessity of having labourers' cottages speedily erected for the Leixlip district; if he can state what steps have as yet been taken by the Local Government Board and the Board of Guardians to provide labourers' cottages for this district; and whether, in view of the well-known un-sanitary state of the present dwellings at Leixlip, he will direct the Board to hasten the completion of a scheme to provide accommodation?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I have received a copy of the resolution referred to. The Local Government Board are now preparing an Order for the erection of nine labourers' cottages in Leixlip, and will endeavour to expedite the building operations by every means within the power.

INCOME TAX COMMISSIONERS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT
 (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can state the number of Income Tax Commissioners who are traders, bankers, bank directors in their respective localities?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY
 (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham):
 No information is available on this point.
 The Income Tax Commissioners are appointed by the Land Tax Commissioners (who are themselves appointed by Parliament), and are not bound to furnish any information except their names and addresses.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT:
 Can a Return be obtained?
 *SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I see no means of obtaining such a Return.

DERELICTS IN THE ATLANTIC.

SIR J. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he has had his attention directed to the Atlantic Pilot Chart, dated February
 1894, in which are marked the places
 22 derelicts, which, when last seen, were drifting in the track of vessels between the coasts of the United States; whether one of them schooner Fannie G. Woolston, appears in the chart a little to the of Cuba, has had her drift mark October, 1891; and whether, in with the Government of the States, anything can be done to such dangers to the navigation in the Atlantic?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): The Admiralty have been in communication with the Board of Trade on of floating derelicts, and it has been decided to appoint a small Departmental Committee to consider and report on the Memorials which have been received and the correspondence which has taken place on this subject. Pending the Report of that Committee questions like those of my hon. Friend, which are covered by this larger inquiry, will probably not be pressed.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Will the right hon. Baronet also take into consideration the recommendations of the Maritime Conference which sat at Washington in 1889 on this subject?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I have no doubt the Committee will take the whole subject thoroughly into consideration, and, therefore, they can scarcely overlook those recommendations.

CHRISTMAS PAY IN THE MANCHESTER POST OFFICE.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General will be explain why the town postmen of Manchester are only paid for work on Christmas Day at the ordinary day rate, whereas by legislative enactment Christmas Day is to be observed as a Sunday, and therefore they ought to be paid at rate and a quarter, at which rate other employes of the Manchester Post Office working indoors on Christmas Day are paid; will he explain why the town postmen themselves, who work indoors for some eight or nine hours (and only two and a half or three hours outside) under inspection of an officer, do not come under the higher rate paid without difficulty to the said inside employes; whether he will inquire into this grievance and cause it to be remedied; and will he inquire whether several of the hours worked on Christmas Day should be considered night duty?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): I am not aware that Christmas Day is by legislative enactment to be observed as Sunday. Postmen employed in the delivery and collection of letters receive at Manchester, as elsewhere, an extra day's wages on Christmas Day for all work performed, including the preparation of the letters for delivery, which must, of course, be done indoors, before they start upon their delivery; and it is not proposed to alter this rate of payment. The principle under which the indoor staff of the Post Office are paid a rate and a quarter or the overtime rate for work done on Sundays and Christmas day has never been applied to the staff employed on outdoor duties, who are not paid for overtime.

MR. SCHWANN asked if the men did not, as a rule, consider it a greater hardship to be kept at work on Christmas Days than on Sundays?

[No answer was given.]

STRANORLAR AND GLENTIES RAILWAY.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the time originally fixed for the completion of the Stranorlar and Glenties Railway, County Donegal, has been overpassed by about two years; whether the extension of time granted by the Irish Privy Council is now nearly expired, and that the works are still in a very backward condition; whether the county surveyor has recently reported that the Glenties extension is making very slow progress, and the time of completion is very uncertain; whether he is aware that the people of the district which would be served by this line of railway have frequently complained of the dilatory conduct of the contractors for those works; whether, under those circumstances, he will take steps to cause those contractors to make more rapid progress with works intended by Parliament for the benefit of an impoverished district, and for which public money has been voted; and whether the Government intend to require that the line shall be completed at any particular time; and, if so, will he be so good as to name the time?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The statement in Paragraph 1 is correct, but the time originally fixed by Order in Council was not fixed with any prospect of the line being finished within the time. Though the progress of the line has not been rapid, I understand that the works are not, on the whole, in a very backward condition, and one of the chief causes of the delay has been the difficulties met with by the contractors in getting possession of the land. The Board of Works have never relaxed their efforts to expedite the construction of the line, but no doubt some small extension of time will have to be applied for. It is not, however, for me to say what the decision of the Irish Privy Council may be when the application is formally made.

GERMAN PRISON-MADE GOODS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the Report of a Commissioner despatched to Germany by The Hardwareman, and published in the issue of that journal of 3rd March, to inquire into prison work and the exportation to England of prison-made hardware, hosiery, brushes, lithographic and other printing, whips, joinery, and other articles, many stamped as "perfection," "reliable," and other British words, with a view of misleading the English purchaser; and if Her Majesty's Government will cause immediate steps to be taken to put a stop to such competition with British workmen and workwomen, having regard to the successful protests made by Trade Unions and other Industrial Organisations against the competition of prison labour at home?

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): Before the question is answered I should like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if the words "with a view of misleading the English purchaser" are in Order?

*MR. SPEAKER: I cannot see with what object the words are used, unless it is to mislead.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): Yes, Sir; since the hon. and gallant Member put down his Question I have seen the statements referred to. There is no power to prevent the importation of such goods unless they contravene the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act, and on this point I am making further inquiry. They might be exported to the United States without being subjected to this risk.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: Will the Government use their influence with the German Government to secure that these goods shall be marked as prison made?

*MR. MUNDELLA: I do not think we could get the Germans to do it; I doubt whether we do it in our own prisons. We import carpets from India some are made in prison and some are not; it is impossible to discriminate between them.

Sir J. T. Hibbert

THE UNDERMANNING OF BRITISH SHIPS.

MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has considered the decision given at the Board of Trade inquiry, held at Glasgow on the 27th March, in regard to the wreck of the Port Yarrock, by which the whole crew of 21 persons were drowned; what he is aware the Court held that the vessel was neither properly nor efficiently manned, and that the disaster was contributed to by the vessel being shorthanded; and if it is his intention to obtain authority to compel British vessels leaving the United Kingdom to carry competent and sufficient crews?

*MR. MUNDELLA: My attention has been called to the case to which my hon. Friend refers, and the circumstances under which so regrettable a loss of life occurred are receiving careful consideration with a view, if possible, to further proceedings in the matter. The fact is, that at the present moment the case is before the Law Officers of Scotland to ascertain whether, under Clause 4 of the Act, we can take proceedings. I fully recognise the importance of British merchant ships being manned with competent and sufficient crews, and I am taking advice as to the best means of securing the seaworthiness of merchant vessels in so material a particular. As the hon. Member behind me (Mr. H. J. Wilson) has been informed by you, Mr. Speaker, that he cannot bring on the case of the vessel named, I will add that this question of undermanning has already received the attention of the Board of Trade, and we intend to pursue it still further. Up to the present time the Merchant Shipping Act does not allow of a ship being stopped in port on account of its deficient equipment in men; there is not a single precedent for a ship being so stopped. We intend that a thorough and explanatory inquiry shall be made by a Committee, including ship-owners, representatives of seamen, and experts of the Board of Trade.

MR. PROVAND: Will the Committee include Members of this House?

MR. MUNDELLA: It is premature to say how the Committee will be constituted, but I suppose there will be Members from both sides upon it.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): Was not the subject of the loss of life at sea inquired into by a Royal Commission 10 years ago; did not that Commission report on the subject of undermanning, and has the Board of Trade ever taken action on that Report?

MR. MUNDELLA: There were Commissions in 1888 and in 1876. One Commission reported that undermanning was a source of danger, and a second did not touch the question at all. In 1884, in answer to a question in the House, the right hon. Member for West Birmingham said that more harm would be done by fixing a minimum scale than by leaving the question open, because the general effect might be that the average equipment would be reduced. Everything that is possible will now be done to prevent the recurrence of such a disaster as that mentioned in the question.

MR. H. J. WILSON (Middlesbrough): Would it not be possible to have an inquiry into the abilities of the seamen shipped as well as the number of them?

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): Is it to be understood that the port officer of the Board of Trade has no power to prevent a vessel that is undermanned proceeding to sea?

MR. MUNDELLA: There is no such power unless it is a passenger vessel. There is no standard scale laid down for the manning of a ship unless it is a passenger ship. With regard to the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, I cannot give a promise until the time comes for the constitution of the Committee; but, so far as I am able, I will see that all desires as to the scope of the inquiry are satisfied.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: How many wrecks and casualties were reported last year from undermanning?

MR. MUNDELLA: There were five such losses reported, but all losses from undermanning would not be reported as a rule. In the case named the loss was obvious because it occurred in the bay of Brandon, but if it had happened in the open sea the Board of Trade would have heard nothing about it.

MR. H. J. WILSON: I had intended to move the adjournment of the House on the question of the undermanning of ships, but, owing to the satisfactory answer that has been given me by the President of the Board of Trade, I do not intend to proceed with it.

RETIREMENT REGULATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

MR. R. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any, and what, steps have been taken by the Lord Chancellor of England, the Lord President of the Court of Session in Scotland, and the Lord Chancellor in Ireland, in the Departments of the Public Service under their control, to carry out the spirit of Clause 10 of the Order in Council of the 15th of August, 1890, as to the compulsory retirement of officials above the age assigned in that Order as the period of superannuation?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: A Bill will be at once introduced giving the necessary powers, as regards England, to the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury. It has been thought desirable to defer legislation affecting Scotland and Ireland until the Bill in question has become law, as the conditions are somewhat different in the three countries.

LONDON BAKERIES.

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the Report of Dr. Waldo on the deplorable conditions under which a large proportion of the bakery business is being carried on in London; and whether the Local Authorities are impotent under the present law to enforce sanitary remedies; and, if so, will further legislation be introduced at the earliest possible opportunity to effect the object?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I have communicated with the authorities on the subject, and will, as soon as I get an answer, inform my hon. Friend of the result.

LONDON BUILDING BYE-LAWS.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a Private Bill of the London County Council to consolidate and amend the enactments relating to streets and buildings in London; whether he is aware that the Bill proposes to deal with and to repeal certain Public Acts relating to the Metropolis, such as the Metropolitan Building Acts and the Metropolis Management Acts, many of the enactments in those Acts being repealed by the Schedule to the Bill; and whether, in view of the wide extent and far-reaching consequences of the Bill, the Government will consider the advisability of proposing to the House that it should be treated as a Public Bill?

SIR A. ROLLIT: Will the Bill in the ordinary course, like other Municipal Bills, go before the Police and Sanitary Committee?

MR. ASQUITH: I cannot answer that without notice. With reference to the question on the Paper, the matters referred to should have been raised on the Second Reading. The matter is one over which the Home Office have no control.

MR. HOWELL: Have not these matters hitherto been administered under the Home Office? The Bill was read a second time on the Thursday before Good Friday, when no one seemed to know anything about the Bill. Everybody was taken by surprise. I ask the Speaker whether the Bill does not come within the purview of the ruling as to another Bill for the whole of London?

MR. SPEAKER: Any point of Order should have been raised before the Second Reading, but I am advised that the promoters were perfectly within their rights in bringing the Bill in as a Private Bill. There is no reason why it should not be introduced as a Private Bill. If the Bill raises a question of public policy, that is a question which should have been raised at the proper time, but a question of Order does not now arise.

MR. HOWELL: Has the attention of the Home Office been called to the character of the Bill?

MR. ASQUITH: Yes, Sir.

MR. HOWELL: I suppose the only thing I can do now is to give notice that on the Third Reading I shall move the rejection of the Bill.

IRISH SLATES.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is proposed to carry on further building operations at the Curragh; and, if so, will a preference be given to tenders from Irish slate quarries provided the quality is as good and the price as low as tenders from other parts of the United Kingdom?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The contracts made for the erection of buildings at the Curragh include the supply of materials; and I shall be very glad if the contractors are able to use Irish slates.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: May I enquire whether the invitations for tenders contain any stipulation with regard to the use of Irish slates?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Not that I am aware of.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman satisfy us by giving orders in that direction?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I believe it has been tried on previous occasions without success.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND MARRIAGE LAWS.

SIR G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Devonshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a case in the South Western Police Court, reported in The Daily News, 16th March, of a poor woman who complained to Mr. de Rutzen that a clergyman refused to perform the ceremony of marriage between her daughter and her would-be husband because she was approaching her confinement, although the banns had been paid for; whether a clergyman of the Church of England can lawfully refuse to perform the ceremony of marriage between two persons not otherwise incapacitated, upon the sole ground alleged; and whether, in view of the expense and delay involved in a prosecution for such refusal, he can take steps to prevent its recurrence in the future? In putting the question the right hon. Gentleman said he understood now that the clergyman had thought better of the matter and that the couple in question had been married by him, but he must press the matter, as it involved a question of law.

MR. ASQUITH: I have been in communication with the clergyman, who, it appears from what he tells me, thought it his duty, before pronouncing the blessing of the Marriage Service, to require some assurance of their sorrow for their past. He therefore suggested that they should be married at the Registry Office. Having received satisfactory evidence of their sorrow for their offence, the couple were married by him. With regard to the last two paragraphs, it appears to be a question of ecclesiastical discipline. I have no authority in the matter. I do not think a clergyman of the Church of England can lawfully refuse to marry a couple solely on the ground alleged. I do not see that any alteration of the law is rendered necessary by the occurrence.

ALLEGED BOYCOTTING AT KELLS.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the speeches made at Kells by hon. Members of this House on the 4th of February last, at a meeting held for the purpose of denouncing a gentleman resident in the district; whether the said meeting, having regard to its avowed object and the language used, was a legal assembly; whether any proceedings have been taken against any persons in respect of this meeting; whether he is aware that the gentleman referred to and denounced at the said meeting has been and is severely boycotted; and whether any steps have been taken to put an end to such boycotting?

MR. J. MORLEY: My attention was drawn at the time to a report of the speeches delivered at this meeting. The notice convening the meeting, which I have examined, did not, as stated in the question, disclose or advocate any illegal object, the professed and avowed object being perfectly legal. It is true that in the course of the speeches made at the meeting references were made to the re-taking of evicted farms in the locality, and there can be very little doubt, I suppose, that the promoters of the meeting had specially in view the action of the person referred to in the question in taking and holding this farm. As regards the effect of the speeches, however, they appear to be innocuous, and the police moreover were informed by the person who held, and still holds, the farm referred to that he did not care whether the meeting was held or not. The Government were advised by their legal advisers that there were not sufficient grounds for interfering with the meeting, and it was afterwards considered that proceedings with respect to the speeches made at the meeting would not be expedient. As the hon. and learned Member is aware, prosecutions, though sometimes justifiable, do more harm than good, and the present is just one of those cases. With regard to the effect of these speeches, I am informed that it is not correct to say that the man in question has been severely boycotted. It is true that several of his customers have withdrawn from his milling business; otherwise he has not suffered serious inconvenience. He buys and sells cattle at fairs without being in any way obstructed. The police are using, by my directions, the greatest possible vigilance to prevent any acts of intimidation, and so far they have been successful in their efforts.

MR. CARSON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that within the last month two additional meetings have been held for the purpose of adopting methods to secure a more effectual boycotting of this gentleman, and has the right hon. Gentleman taken any steps to deal with them?

MR. J. MORLEY: I was aware that these meetings had been held. I have watched this case carefully, and my information has been all the way through that this man—of course, for obvious reasons, I will not mention his name—has not suffered any harm, and, indeed, apprehends none. The police hold a similar view. Of course, they will not relax their vigilance in the slightest degree.

MR. CARSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow these meetings to go on until this man's trade is ruined? We have already seen that his milling business has suffered.

MR. J. MORLEY: As soon as I find the effect of any meetings of this kind to be injurious to the man in his business or otherwise, I shall take such steps

Civil Service

{(COMMONS)}

be deemed necessary by the visers.
W. KENNY (Dublin, St. en's Green): Is the right hon.
eman advised by the Irish Law ers that the facts are sufficient to ant a prosecution for criminal conacy?

MR. J. MORLEY: No, Sir; I have been advised to that effect. Some rases have been used which might, no doubt, point to what is technically a conspiracy; but, taking the speeches as whole, I have been advised that they are not such as to warrant a prosecution.

DOCKYARD PENSIONS.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN
(Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Board of Admiralty will take into their favourable consideration the unanimous request of the hired men in the dockyards, that when they are placed upon the establishment the time they have served as hired men should be counted for pension?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE AD-MIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee) (who replied) said: The Regulations under which pensions are awarded in the dockyards are common to all the labour employed in the service of the Crown, and are based upon the Superannuation Act, and the Treasury Minutes issued thereunder. The hon. Member will therefore see that it is not in the power of the Admiralty to take independent action of the nature suggested in his question, although they have given careful consideration to the statements of the men.

WAR OFFICE MEDICAL DIVISION.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what are the duties performed at the Medical Division of the War Office by the officer designated the "Professional Assistant" to the Director General?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN:
The Professional Assistant to the Director General of the Army Medical Department is his deputy in all matters, acting for him in his absence and assisting generally when present. He is Rules.

likewise the permanent President of the Medical Board at headquarters.

THE NOTTINGHAM EXECUTION.

MR. BALLANTINE (Coventry):
I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any medical inquiry was held at Nottingham Gaol into the mental condition of Walter Smith after his condemnation for murder?

MR. ASQUITH: At the trial there was no allegation that this prisoner was suffering from insanity, and not a para-mote of evidence to that effect was put forward by his counsel. On the contrary, it was said he was a steady man devoted to work. The first representation that he was mentally unsound was received by me the day before the execution in the form of a telegram from my uncle; but that gave no particulars, and there was never any Report or suggestion from the Medical Authorities of the that the man was mentally unsound that his mind was affected.

WALES AND THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (F
&c.): I beg to ask the President of Local Government Board how soon expects the translation and publication in the Welsh language of the L
Government Act to be completed?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LO
GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. S LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central):
arranging for a translation into Welsh language being made Local Government Act of last but I cannot at present state w translation will be completed.

CIVIL SERVICE RULE

MR. W. KENNY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury to date the new Treasury Rule at page 12, House of Comm
No. 515), under which men
Civil Service are not allowe years on abolition of office, and whether the Rule appl members of the Civil Serv
when it came into force?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: been in operation since when the Chancellor of stated to the House

years for abolition of office should only be granted in exceptional cases. The Rule applies to all Civil servants then serving or subsequently appointed.

SOLDIERS' INSTITUTES IN DUBLIN.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is in contemplation to start a second Soldiers' Institute in Dublin under the patronage of Lord Wolseley ; whether any of the Catholic clergy are to be upon its Board of Management ; and whether any, and what, religious services are to be held in it ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Nothing is known in the War Office of this proposed Institute, but I intend to make inquiries into the subject.

LETTERKENNY DISTRICT ASYLUM.

MR. A. O'CONNOR : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is in contemplation to spend a large sum, and, if so, how much, on the District Lunatic Asylum at Letterkenny ; how much is to be expended on the residence of the Medical Superintendent ; what will be thereafter the total annual charge upon the ratepayers of the district in respect of the asylum ; and whether the Local Government Board have given their sanction to the details of the scheme ?

MR. J. MORLEY : An expenditure of £26,100 has been authorised by the Privy Council on works at the Letterkenny District Lunatic Asylum to provide against overcrowding, and for other urgent and necessitous wants of the Institution. This amount includes a sum of £2,300 for a detached house for the Resident Medical Superintendent. The present residence of this officer is situated in the centre of the asylum, and occupies some of its most important space, and it has been considered desirable to utilise this portion of the building for asylum accommodation, and to erect a new residence for the Medical Superintendent. The sum of £26,100 will be repayable to the Treasury in 20 years with interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum ; but the Treasury may, under the provisions of the Public Works Loans Act of last Session, extend the time of repayment to a period not exceeding 50 years. The Board of Control, who are the authority in this matter, and not the Local Government Board, have approved of the details of the scheme for the additions and improvements now being carried out.

ALLEGED "CORKAGE" AT TEMPERANCE HOTELS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been drawn to the practice of certain so-called temperance hotels of admitting visitors with their own supply of alcohol, and charging corkage ; and whether this practice renders such hotels liable to the publican's licence ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) : The answer to the question is in the negative.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE IRISH LAND ACTS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : Will the Chief Secretary for Ireland state when he proposes to move the appointment of the Select Committee on the working of the Irish Land Acts ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am quite ready to move the appointment of the Select Committee at any moment. There is no difficulty on this side of the House, but hon. Gentlemen opposite, I understand, wish to have a discussion on the nomination of the Committee. I am not without hopes, however, that I may so alter the form that the hon. Members opposite will assent to it without discussion. I hope to be in a position to make a further statement to-morrow.

THE BUDGET.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) : May I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can name a day for making the Budget Statement ?

SIR W. HARCOURT : I hope at present to be able to introduce it on the 16th of this month. I cannot, however, say definitely.

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I see the Army (Annual) Bill is down in the Orders after Report of Supply. Is it intended to bring it on to-night ? I understand the opposition to the Second Reading was withdrawn on the understanding that Committee should be taken at a reasonable hour before midnight?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I do not apprehend there is any chance of its being taken to-night.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

Thomas Shaw, esquire, for the Hawick District of Burghs.

Harold John Tennant, esquire, for the County of Berwick.

Arthur Charles Humphreys Owen, esquire, for the County of Montgomery.

MOTIONS.

LAW LIBRARY, FOUR COURTS (IRELAND) BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

MR. J. MORLEY, in asking for leave to bring in a Bill to authorise an advance out of the general fund of moneys belonging to suitors of the Supreme Court in Ireland for the purposes of the Library used by the Bar of Ireland at the Four Courts, Dublin, said : I think a few sentences from me will be sufficient to indicate the object of the Bill which I have now to ask the House to give me leave to bring in. It is to authorise an advance out of the Suitors' Fund of the Supreme Court in Ireland of a sufficient sum for the purpose of altering and improving the Library of the Four Courts in Dublin for the use of the Bar in Ireland. It is an object which everybody in Ireland desires to see fulfilled. It has been found that the present Library of the Four Courts is inadequate, both in ventilation and otherwise, and it is necessary to make arrangements for improving the Library. All the parties interested are agreed on this subject.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) : Would the right hon. Gentleman kindly say what sum it is proposed to advance?

MR. J. MORLEY : My hon. Friend will allow me to postpone stating the exact figure. The Bill will be printed in the course of to-morrow or next day, and there are some details to be settled with the Treasury. It is not a very large sum.

MR. GOSCHEN : Is it public money?

Mr. Hanbury

MR. J. MORLEY : It is from the Suitors' Fund, which is a fund derived from money paid in on account of action and not disbursed.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to authorise an advance out of the general fund of moneys belonging to suitors of the Supreme Court in Ireland for the purposes of the Library used by the Bar of Ireland at the Four Courts, Dublin."—(Mr. J. Morley.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Morley and Sir J. T. Hibbert.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 131.]

STANDING COMMITTEE (SCOTLAND).

RESOLUTION.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton) rose to move—

"That, in addition to the two Standing Committees appointed, under Standing Order No. 47, a Standing Committee shall be appointed for the consideration of all Bills relating exclusively to Scotland which may, by order of the House, be committed to them, and that the provisions of Standing Order No. 47 shall apply to the said Standing Committee; that the said Standing Committee do consist of all the Members representing Scottish constituencies, together with 15 other Members, to be nominated by the Committee of Selection, who shall have power from time to time to discharge the Members so nominated by them, and to appoint others in substitution for those discharged; that Standing Orders No. 49 and 50 do apply to the said Standing Committee."

He said : I beg to propose this Resolution the considerations in connection with which are so bound up with the daily experiences of hon. Members in the proceedings of this House and the effect of those proceedings upon the progress of Scotch legislation that I think a plain and brief statement of the requirements and facts upon which it is founded will best show what I believe to be the strength of the case which I propose to lay before the House. When one brings forward a proposal to this effect it is necessary to prove three things—first, that the existing state of things imperatively demands a remedy; secondly, that the remedy proposed will be efficacious, and that the dangers and difficulties which it brings with it do not approach in gravity to those which it removes; and, thirdly, that the informed public opinion of those who are most interested in the question is in favour of the change, or, at any te, in the same direction. If I can make good these propositions it only remains that the Government should be ready to go through with this change, and on that point I can assure the House that nothing will be wanting. We do not regard this as a partisan measure. We look upon it as a practical and business-like measure for getting more time for the public Business of the House, and for doing justice to a great class of Members whose interests have had scant justice done them in the past. And we put it forward as a proposal for dealing with a state of things which must be dealt with decisively and at once. If anyone doubts that the present state of things must be altered, it is not the Scottish Members. They know how the business of their country has been left undone. They know the value of the time which is due to Scotland, and of which they get such a scanty share. I have often thought that the worst effect of the faulty custom of business to which men have become accustomed is that it lowers their standard from what is possible and what ought to be done; and I am quite certain that hon. Members who are not Scottish Members do not realise the plight in which Scottish Members are—not only are in this, but have been in all Parliaments. I am sure Scottish Members have been told in many a Session before this—and it is a very common thing to be told—“Oh, yes; you have no important Scottish Bill this Session; you had none last Session; but the Session before last you had such and such a Bill.” Now, is it not in itself an abuse of very great magnitude that 70 busy men, the representatives of a certain country, should come to Parliament, and only every other year be able to do important business about the country which they represent? If that was the case in any other trade or calling than that of a Member of Parliament, we should say it was a state of things which absolutely required to be remedied. Whoever is satisfied with this state of things, it is not the Scottish Members. The Scottish Members have taken every opportunity which they could to testify their dissatisfaction. In this Parliament they have only had one such opportunity, and then the hon. Member for Caithness moved—to deal with Scottish affairs in accordance with the wishes of the Scottish people, it is desirable to devolve on a Scottish Legislature all matters exclusively relating to Scotland.”

“That, in consequence of the pressure of public Business and the failure of this House

Now, this expression of the grievance of Scotsmen is very strong; the remedy proposed is very strong; and Scottish Members voted in favour of that Resolution by two to one; whilst I believe that there were many who agreed with the preamble of that Resolution who only differed from the conclusion about Home Rule. If the Resolution had been plainly put to the House I believe that almost every Scotsman would have voted for it. But it may be said that this is a temporary feeling in this Parliament. What was the feeling of the Scottish Members in the last Parliament about Scottish business? That was a Parliament when there were fewer Members who belonged to that Party to which we on this side for the most part belong. It was a Parliament which was very heavily worked, but less overburdened than this Parliament; and Scottish opinion was that Scotsmen ought to manage their own business much more in their own fashion, and with a greater command of public time. In May, 1889, a Scottish Local Government Bill was read a second time, and it was moved that it should be sent to a Committee of the whole House. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds moved that, instead of sending it to a Committee of the whole House, it should be sent to a Select Committee composed of all the Scottish Representatives and of 30 other Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection. Thirty-five Scottish Members voted for this Resolution and 15 against. In 1890 the Scottish Burghs Police Bill was referred to a Select Committee, and then my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, now Civil Lord of the Admiralty, moved that it should be referred to a Committee consisting of Members representing Scottish constituencies. On that occasion 31 Scottish Members voted for the Resolution and 13 against; and in the same Parliament the Resolution which I am now moving was moved very much in the same shape, and 30 Scottish Members to 16 voted in favour of it. The Scottish feeling, therefore, is permanent; it was the same in the last Parliament as it is in this Parliament, only in those days the Ministry, for reasons which I do not criticise for a moment, invited the great majority of Members to go counter to the wishes of the Scottish Members. That is not the course we take to-night. We offer the Scottish Members a proposal for enabling them, at one of the most important periods of process in the manufacture of their Bills, to have those Bills moulded in accordance with Scottish opinion; and as far as we can influence and devise English, Welsh, and Irish Members, we shall ask them not to thwart the Scottish Members, but to assist them in obtaining what we know to be the wish and what we believe to be the interest of Scotland. If hon. Members for other parts of the country will look at this matter calmly they will see that it is in the interest of the whole House, and not of Scotland alone, that this proposal is brought forward. The Parish Councils Bill for Scotland, according to all the Rules which govern the sequence of business in this House, is a debt to Scotland which must be paid out of the general time of the House. The Scottish Parish Councils Bill raises as many important questions as the English Bill—questions as thoroughly understood by Scotland's Representatives, and exciting quite as great interest in Scotland as the English provisions did in England. The English Parish Councils Bill took 42 days of the time of the House in Committee. How long will the Scottish Parish Councils Bill take? I think it is not an exaggeration to say that 15 or 16 days are the very least that Scottish Members will have to demand from the general time of the House for the purpose of passing the Parish Councils Bill through Committee; and the Parish Councils Bill is only the first of a good many items and measures which are due to Scotland. Scotland has a very large population. It is a country very highly organised, and, therefore, dependent to a remarkable degree upon legislation for the free working of its administrative machinery and for its social and commercial progress. I do not think it is too much to say that let a week pass but some Scottish Local Body, that thoroughly understands its business comes to the Scottish Office and asks that some statute passed in former years should be altered in an important particular, and saying that without this alteration the Statute will not work. The Burgh Police Act is one in which many alterations have been proposed. Then there are the private Members. This year the Scottish Members have not been very fortunate in the Ballot; and yet I already see on the Table of the House at least eight very important Scottish Bills, and I know that a good many more are in preparation. It requires almost endless patience and perseverance, and it requires almost humiliating appeals to the indulgence of English Members, to get one of those Bills occasionally passed between 12 and 1 o'clock in the morning. This proposal, therefore, to obtain time which is not taken from the general time of the House is a proposal for the advantage of Scotland indeed, but likewise greatly to the advantage of England and the rest of the Kingdom. I see that there are certain signs on the Order Book. One hon. Member, who agrees, I fancy, with this general proposal, thinks it does not go far enough. We are asking the House to take a new step, and therefore it is better and wiser to proceed on the old lines where they have been found efficient. We have followed carefully the old proposals with regard to Grand Committees. The number of Members proposed on this Grand Committee is almost the same; the quorum is the same; the Members who are not Scottish Members are to be selected by the same impartial body, and the Chairman is to be chosen by the same method from the experience, almost professional, of the Chairmen's Panel. In all respects the proposal is on the old model except in the business that is referred to the Committee and in the number of Members specially interested in the business, who are greatly increased in proportion. And, now, Sir, we place all the Scottish Members on this Committee. If you cannot put all the Members from Scotland on the Committee, I think you might as well leave it alone for a very obvious reason. If 30 or 40 Members were excluded, and if they know that business intimately connected with the country they represented was done in their absence, then the whole of that business would have to be done over again in the House, which would not be the case if this proposal is adopted. I remember that we have often been told that the Grand Committee ought to be the microcosm of the House in Committee of the whole House. This is the great argument I advance for the Committee which we propose to set up. This Scotch Grand Committee will not only be a sort of microcosm of the House in Committee of the whole House on Scotch business; it will be the House in Committee on Scotch business itself. What is the House in Committee on Scotch business? Before that Committee has gone on 10 minutes all the Members except the Scotch Members have left the House. No one but a Scotch Member speaks; no one listens—[Opposition laughter]—but Scotch Members. But I am sorry to say that the Members who are in the precincts of the House come in to vote. Nothing is more striking—it is one of the best-known phenomena of Parliamentary life—the indifference which English Members show to the details of Scotch Debates. I do not care much for the amusement which I have caused amongst hon. Gentlemen opposite, for I am speaking now to Scotch Members, who know that what I am saying is the fact, and who have felt it long. This indifference of English Members is very remarkable; and if you read the London correspondents' writing in the English provincial papers, you will see that they seem to grudge the time given to a Scotch Debate on Scotch business. Anyone who will read the English newspapers the day after a Scotch Debate on a Scotch question will see that what I say is precisely true. But Scotland is quite unconcerned at this indifference of Englishmen, if only Scotchmen are to be allowed to do their business in their own manner and at their own time. In Committee of the whole House on Scotch business you have every possible disadvantage, and you have not the great advantage which the proposal before the House will give—that in this Scotch Grand Committee you will get the opinion of Scotland. This proposal will enable you at a most important stage in each Scotch Bill to get the real opinion of Scotland; and my belief is that, in 9 cases out of 10, or 19 cases out of 20, Parliament will be only too glad to know what Scotland thinks, and will endorse its ascertained opinion. I have shown that the present state of things requires a remedy, and I have shown that this remedy, whatever else it will be, will be efficacious. I have shown also that the Scotch Members desire it. I will now refer to the question whether the evils and objections of this proposal outweigh the advantages. What are the dangers and disadvantages of this proposal? Are they dangers to the Empire or to the Kingdom at large? No Imperial question can possibly come on before this Scotch Committee. No question that can seriously affect any other part of the Kingdom directly can come before this Committee either. I shall soon introduce the Local Government Bill for Scotland, which will effect very large changes in all departments of Scotch life. I speak quite sincerely and honestly when I say that there is absolutely nothing in that Bill which can affect England, Ireland, or Wales, except as far as England, Wales, and Ireland are affected by the increased or diminished prosperity and content of Scotland. If anything is brought forward which touches other parts of the Kingdom the Chairman will rule it out of order, and if anything is brought forward which can injure the interests of other parts of the Kingdom there will be Members from other parts of the Kingdom to know what is being done in the Committee and to bring it before the attention of the House afterwards, and I venture to say that the House will take very sharp notice of it. But I believe the danger to be absolutely illusory. We are making a machinery which is to be worked by men of sense. And Scotch Members are men of sense. They know that this Scotch Grand Committee would not be worth a single Session's purchase if its Members used it to meddle with the affairs of other parts of the country. I suppose that the main argument which will be brought against this proposal will be the argument which was put forward—not at great length, but with great animation—by the right hon. Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, in the course of last month. There was one particular sentence in that speech to which I wish to refer, and the right hon. Gentleman will admit that it is the cardinal sentence. He said—

Sir G. Trevelyan

“It would be utterly unfair to English interests that, while the English were to have no voice in the framing of Scotch measures, Scotchmen and Irishmen should determine the form in which English measures were to be passed."

But are the English to have no voice in the framing of Scotch measures? First of all, leave has to be obtained to introduce the Bill, and with a contentious measure that is a serious stage. Then the House as a whole must approve or reject the principle of the Bill on the Second Reading, and in full House Instructions will be moved on going into Committee. Afterwards the House will revise the work of the Committee on the Report stage, with the Speaker in the Chair, and consider the measure in its final shape on the Third Reading. Without the concurrence of the English majority, over and over again given, no Scotch measure can possibly become law; and we do not endeavour to get the concurrence of that majority by any Parliamentary device. But we expect to get a very favourable hearing from the majority of the House when they find out what the Scotch opinion is on Scotch measures, and we believe that the House will treat that opinion with great respect. England, therefore, will have a voice in Scotch business; and what is the extent to which Scotchmen will interfere with English business? By far the most of the measures which are discussed in Committee of the whole House are not English measures in the sense that they are measures peculiarly for England alone. Electorate Bills, trade Bills, agricultural Bills, Bills affecting the factory laws, India, the Colonies, the Army and the Navy—in all these Scotland has as much interest as England. That is one class of the Bills in which Scotchmen will have a voice. Then there are the English Bills which go to Grand Committees, and I venture to say that the number of these will be considerably increased, because when purely Scotch Bills are referred to this Scotch Grand Committee the time which Scotch business now takes before Grand Committees will be saved, and there will be more time for referring English Bills to the other Grand Committees. What are these Grand Committees? When English business comes before them they are almost completely English bodies. Even when Scotch business comes before a Grand Committee and 15 extr. Scotchmen are put on, the English Members still have a very large majority. Now, when a Scotch Bill comes before this Grand Committee which we propose there will be a very large majority of Scotch Members. The right hon. Gentleman asks us whether England is to have reciprocity. This seems to me to be exactly reciprocity. This seems to me to be fairness and justice, the proposal that a Grand Committee on Scotch business should be managed by a majority of Scotch Members, just as English business is managed by a majority of English Members. I quite admit that something still remains, and the benefit of that admission it will be cheaper to concede at once to the right hon. Gentleman. I admit that from time to time a Bill will come before the Committee of the whole House affecting England, Wales, or Ireland, on which Scotchmen will have a vote on the same day that they have been disposing of Scotch business with only a small infusion of English Members. So far that is an anomaly, but it is not sufficiently serious that for the sake of it you ought to defeat a scheme which I believe to be useful and workmanlike; and I am sure that anomaly will not be regarded as a sufficient answer to our proposals by that practical nation the method of conducting whose business we are now discussing. I thank the House for the patience with which I have been listened to, and I have now, in conclusion, a word to say on some non-contentious topics. It is the great advantage of this proposal that it promotes public work without doing an injury to any individual. I refer to the problem of the private Member, which always presents itself when we discuss the procedure of this House. This scheme makes no demand on the time of the private Member, but it gives a great value to that time which it does not now possess. What method have private Members of initiating business of their own in this House? They may bring forward a Motion on Tuesday or Friday, or they may introduce a Bill for Second Reading on a Wednesday. But what is the use of bringing forward Resolutions in favour of legislation and of ripening questions for legislation when there is no time to legislate? What is the use of getting Bills read a second time on a Wednesday when there is no public time to pass them through Committee? But here you will have a special body to facilitate the transaction of special business which, I venture to say, in five years will have passed those private Scotch Bills best worth passing, and which, if a Scotch Member carried a Resolution in favour of legislation on a Tuesday or a Friday, will give the Government time to pass a Bill and carry that Resolution into law. Again, we do not push forward business by suppressing free speech. That is an argument which seems to be universally popular. Instead of cutting short the opportunities of speech we invite into the sphere of Debate many and many a man who now thinks he can best promote public business by his silence. [Laughter.] I do not see anything to laugh at in that. There are many such Members in this House, and we hope to give them a field in which they can speak by giving them an audience they like, and an audience which likes nothing so much as substance, point, and brevity. The Committee of the whole House is very different from what it used to be in the old days. I remember very well the time when it was a most exceptional thing to make a peroration in Committee, but now perorations in Committee are the commonest things; and what is a more serious reflection is that, if you want to go back to the old Committee limit of 10 minutes for a speech, it is to the Grand Committees, and not to a Committee of the whole House, that you must go. My belief is that on this Scotch Grand Committee business will be done after the good old Scotch fashion, which is so well known in Scotch Town Councils, County Councils, Ecclesiastical Assemblies, and Conferences of Town and County Local Bodies. [An hon. MEMBER: What is the Scotch fashion?] If the hon. Gentleman wants to know what the Scotch fashion of doing business is let him ask my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrewshire to lend him a copy of the proceedings of the Conference of County Councils, and there he will see in what a short time, with what practical argument, and with what large divisions the most important questions connected with the coming Scotch Local Government Bill were discussed and settled. This proposal is not made for the purpose of setting time for the advantage of the Government. I refuse to separate the Government from the House on a question of the importance of passing legislation. The Government have no more interest than the rest of this House in carrying good legislation. I believe there are two motives that induce hon. Members to enter Parliament. One is the honourable ambition to take a personal part in the business of the nation, and the other is a desire to assist in passing measures into law. To hon. Members who are actuated by these motives—and I believe they are an enormous majority of this House—the proposal of the Government, if they carefully examine it, will, I think, be found acceptable. It is a proposal to give Members genuine work of a sort in which they are specially interested; work the object of which they see and the conduct of which they can hope to influence. It is a proposal, likewise, to enable good measures to be carried, which most Scotchmen—in some cases almost all Scotchmen—desire, but for which under the present system no time can be found, or will be found, I am afraid, for years to come. These are the two main recommendations of our proposals, and against them, in themselves, I do not think any man will find anything to say. Objections of principle—still more objections of precedent and custom—will be found, and will, no doubt, be eloquently and forcibly put forward against the proposal; but, none the less, the Government, with the knowledge of all that can be said against it, confidently recommend the proposal to the approbation of Scotland, to the sympathy of Members from other parts of the Kingdom, and to the judgment of the House of Commons.

Sir G. Trevelyan

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in addition to the two Standing Committees appointed under Standing Order, No. 47, a Standing Committee shall be appointed for the consideration of all Bills relating exclusively to Scotland which may, by Order of the House, be committed to them, and that the provisions of Standing Order, No. 47, shall apply to the said Standing Committee.

That the said Standing Committee do consist of all the Members representing Scottish constituencies, together with 15 other Members, to be nominated by the Committee of Selection, who shall have power from time to time to discharge the Members so nominated by them, and to appoint others in substitution for those discharged.

That Standing Orders Nos. 49 and 50 do apply to the said Standing Committee."—(Sir G. Trevelyan.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): Mr. Speaker, in almost the closing words of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, he informed us that the Government were aware of everything that could be said against the proposal which he has laid before the House. I confess I never should have conjectured that from the speech to which we have listened. Nothing more amazed me in that speech, considering the occasion on which it is delivered, than the absolute ignorance, apparently, on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, that he and the Government of which he is a Member are endeavouring to make a change in our procedure which, I do not hesitate to say, would revolutionise the practice of this House. The right hon. Gentleman either knows, or does not know, of the Parliamentary arguments, the arguments drawn from Constitutional and Parliamentary practice, which may be urged against this proposal. If he does not know of them, what are we to think of a Government which allows itself to be represented by a Minister who, on an occasion of this sort, puts on one side all the really great issues on which we are called upon to decide, and occupies our time with a discussion, not unimportant in its proper place, of the precise opportunities which Scotch Members have of delighting each other with their own eloquence? What are we to think of him if he did not know of these arguments? But, if he did know of them—if he had them in his mind, and refused to touch upon them—what are we to think of the guidance given to the House on an important occasion like this by those who are responsible, after all, for laying before us the main considerations on which we ought to base our decision? Some of the arguments which the right hon. Gentleman used I do not think it worth while to touch upon. He told us, and I gathered from him—and apparently some hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite agreed with him—that he regarded the manner and character of Scotch speakers as of so admirable a kind—so far above the head of a mere English Member—that it would be grossly unfair to ask them to perform in an empty theatre, or to unsympathetic auditors, and that they ought really to be collectively relegated to some large room near the grand staircase where there would be the perfection of performances and the most appreciative of audiences. Well, Sir, as a Scotchman, I protest against this. I love to speak to my countrymen, but I do not wish to be confined absolutely to them. I prefer to lay my views, such as they are, before larger and more mixed audiences. Though that is not an important argument, yet it is almost the most important argument which the right hon. Gentleman gave us, except only the argument of the neglect, or alleged neglect, of Scotch business. I have never concealed from the House that with regard to legislation for Scotland, and also for England and Ireland, the machinery of this House very often does not supply the means for passing measures as quickly as many of us desire. There are occasions on which this would be a very proper topic to bring before the House, but I venture to say it is not a proper topic or argument on which we are to be asked, for the first time, to introduce this principle of nationality into our Grand Committees—to construct those Committees and to frame them in a manner absolutely subversive, as I shall show directly, of the immemorial precedents set by this House in that matter. The right hon. Gentleman asks us what dangers to the Empire follow from his plan? I say I do not think that any dangers do follow to the Empire; but, after all, there are interests other than those commonly described as Imperial which are very much threatened by it, and interests which, in my judgment, really and truly in strictness deserve the full epithet of being as wide in their importance as those affecting the whole Empire over which Parliament is called upon to rule. For what is the issue? It is the constitution of Parliament itself. It is the constitution of the most important branch of the Legislature, and nothing of that kind can be put off, as we have been asked to do to-day by gentlemen who think that no argument ought to be touched upon in dealing with this question except that which concerns legislation affecting the northern portion of this island. What is the procedure of the Government? Having determined apparently to upset our immemorial traditions, they do so, not in a scheme the whole bearings and results of which we can see and understand—not in a scheme which applies to England and Ireland as well as to Scotland, but in a scheme confined to one relatively small portion of the 35,000,000 of population over whom we directly rule. The enormous issues which are really at stake are deliberately concealed from us by the procedure the Government have adopted, and before I sit down I shall move an Amendment asking the House to refuse altogether to consider these piecemeal proposals, and to wait before finally approving or, as I hope, finally condemning any plan of this sort until we see it, in broad and unmistakable outlines, logically extended to every portion of the United Kingdom, and in all its bearings clear before us and the country. I have complained of many omissions made by the right hon. Gentleman in his speech, but I am glad he made no omission. He made no appeal to Scotch national sentiment. He told us a good deal about Scotch business, but of Scotch national sentiment he said nothing, and for this, I think, he acted well. I, for one, am one of those who have always believed that these subordinate patriotisms, if I may use the expression, are a most useful element in our public life, and I should be the last person in this House to say one single word in disparagement of Scotch patriotism. But the right hon. Gentleman has shown clearly, by his own speech, that this is no question of Scotch patriotism or nationality. It is a question of carrying through rather more quickly, or rather more slowly, a certain amount of Scotch legislation. That is the only argument upon the one side, whereas on the other side there are arguments which I venture to lay before the House which ought to make it hesitate, not once or twice, but many times, before lending itself to any device of this description. I should like to know when the Party opposite were converted to this plan. I see before me one of the greatest independent authorities upon the business of this House, the hon. Member for Bedford City. A speech of his has just been put into my hands, delivered a few years ago—subsequent to the conversion to Home Rule of hon. Gentlemen opposite—in which his very proposal was discussed, and the Member for Bedford, while advocating Grand Committees as a plan for aiding Scotch legislation, distinctly laid it down that if the proposal was that this Committee should consist of Scotch Members exclusively, or that on the Committee the Scotch Members should so preponderate in number as to overbear all other opinions, it was a bad and a dangerous proposal, and would only tend to accentuate the differences that might possibly exist between the two countries. These were words of sense, sobriety, and wisdom, and I quote them the more gladly because I think I gathered from the attitude taken by the hon. Gentleman this afternoon that he proposes to give us some further observations on the same topic to-night. I trust those observations will be in the same strain. Let us consider for one moment what this Committee is to be. It is to consist, to begin with, of all the Scotch Members, and the right hon. Gentleman quietly assumes that the mere fact of putting all the Scotch Members on the Committee is, by that process alone, an adequate method of representing Scotch opinion upon the details of local legislation. I deny that proposition altogether. I traverse it; I differ from it in toto. Why are Scotch Members elected by their various constituencies? Are they elected simply and solely because of their views on such legislation as is described in this Resolution—"Resolution solely relating to Scotland"? They are nothing of the kind; they are elected as part of the general system. They are elected in reference to an Imperial Parliament, in which Parties have a certain balance, and in which the various Parties have a certain policy. And if you were to grant Home Rule to Scotland to-morrow, as some gentlemen desire; if you were really to have in that country a separate Legislature—which Heaven forbid!—do you imagine for one moment that the representation in that separate Legislature would follow the lines adopted by the Scotch constituencies when they are sending Members to the Imperial Parliament? Clearly it would not. The most elementary student in Constitutional Government knows that it would not. When I am told Scotland thinks this or that, all I know is that gentlemen have been sent here to support one or other of the great Parties in the State, that Scotland may be taken to uphold these Parties in proportion as it sends Members to support one Party or the other. In that sense they represent Scotch opinion. But to tell me that they hold this or that opinion upon a sub-clause in a Parish Councils Bill, and therefore that is the voice of Scotland upon it, is to talk nonsense, and nonsense to which I absolutely decline to listen. The truth is, that upon a large number of these questions Scotch Members are no more experts—indeed, are not so great experts as a large number of English Members. What special qualification for dealing with the details of a County Council Bill applying practically solely to the rural districts has a gentleman who, so far as we know at all events, represents a strictly urban constituency, and that alone? Why, he has none. Again, what special qualification has a Member representing the Highlands for dealing with the problems of the Lowlands? The Lowlands of Scotland, agriculturally speaking, are incomparably nearer in all their conditions of life to the North of England than to the Highlands, and if you want expert opinion you had better travel to Northumberland or Cumberland rather than to Inverness-shire or Ross-shire. Does anybody doubt that? If so, he is not qualified to talk about Scotland. But, after all, I decline to consider this question as a Scotch question in the sense in which the right hon. Gentleman considers it. To begin with, is there such a thing as a Bill relating exclusively to Scotland? There is no such thing. The idea that we can legislate either for Ireland, or Scotland, or Wales, or England, and that that legislation passed for these countries does not react upon the other countries, is a fantastic absurdity. That is why I think Scotchmen as Scotchmen, and having in view the legislation of their own country, should resist this proposal. It must, if you carry it, be followed in the long run by a similar proposal for England; and if Scotland is to be excluded from her share of legislating for England, the result will be that Scotland will not have a greater but a lesser power over the legislation not merely of the United Kingdom, but of Scotland itself, than she possesses at the present moment. Therefore, in the interests of Scotchmen desiring to legislate for their own country, I protest against this scheme. But Scotchmen have even deeper interest than the mere legislating for their own country. The greatest interest of Scotland is the greatness of the House of Commons. The greatest interest that Scotland can have is the ancient traditions of the House; and if you destroy them in the pretended interests of Scotland, depend upon it a judicial revenge at a distant date will come upon you, you will find Scotchmen excluded their fair share of their inheritance in the legislation for these Three Kingdoms. I should like for a moment to ask the right hon. Gentleman what on earth he means by saying that in the proposed Grand Committee the ancient Rules governing Grand Committees have been carefully followed. The right hon. Gentleman evidently has not made himself acquainted with the method in which Grand Committees are constituted. I endeavour to enlighten him. The method by which Grand Committees are formed is this: An endeavour is made by the responsible members of the House for the selection of the original members of these Committees and of the added members to make the Committee as a whole the most perfect reflex possible of the constitution of this House, so far as regards the great Parties into which the House is divided. That is the principle which has governed not merely the constitution of Grand Committees, but of all Committees, and, as I shall show, not merely the traditional practice, but the practice absolutely necessary if we are to maintain Governmental responsibility in matters of legislation. Now, what is the proposal of the Government—a proposal made without a word of explanation without giving the House the slightest hint that they were initiating any policy? As I understand, they mean to put every Scotch Member upon the Committee. There are 72 Scotch Members, 49 or 50 of whom are supporters of the Government, and 22 or 23 oppose them. I may be allowed, perhaps, to state in passing that that distribution of Members by no means represents the distribution of opinion politically in Scotland. In fact, it has no resemblance to whatever, for whereas the relation of Scotch Members in this House is as 22 to 50 or 23 and 49, I believe the actual votes cast in favour of the two Parties respectively is as nearly as possible equal; and if these 72 were divided according to the votes of the constituencies, and hon. Gentlemen opposite had no advantage from the method in which the seats are divided, the Members on this side of the House, instead of numbering 23, would number nearly one-half of the whole 72. But I only make that remark in passing, because I am quite ready to take for the purposes of the argument the present representation of Scotland in this House. To the 72 Scotch Members you propose to add 15, making your total up to 87. And I presume the Committee of Selection, in choosing the 15, would follow the immemorial principle of giving the Government eight and the Opposition seven. That would give the Government 57 and the Opposition 30 Members on the Committee. Is that the proportion between the two Parties in the House? Can you describe a Committee in which the Parties are divided in the proportion of 57 to 30 as having the slightest resemblance to a House of 670 Members, in which the majority of the Government is not so great as it would be in the Grand Committee? Why, a more shameless proposal surely was never made. To listen to the right hon. Gentleman they were carrying on the ancient traditions of Grand Committees; but we find, when we look into the figures, that it is only a concealed dodge for giving the Government in the Committee stage of Scotch Bills a power which they have not got and cannot get in the House of Commons as at present constituted or as it is likely, as far as I can judge, to be constituted in the future. I do not know what answer the Government will give to that; but one thing is perfectly clear, that this circumstance to which I have called your attention is alone sufficient to upset the Government scheme, because if you once admit it you will never again be able to apply the immemorial principle on which we form our Committees, and never again will a Committee, Grand or Select, be a reflection of opinion in this House. But that is not the conclusion of the case against the Government proposal. The right hon. Gentleman did not in his speech mention Ireland. He mentioned England very perfunctorily, but Ireland not at all. After all, England and Ireland are portions of the United Kingdom, and when you are introducing a new and revolutionary scheme for dealing with the legislation of one part of the United Kingdom the least you can do is to tell us how your scheme will operate when by an inevitable logical process it is extended to other parts of the Kingdom also. Well, I take the case of Ireland first. Do you mean to extend this plan to Ireland? Is that your intention? It appears to me that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman could have been made word for word in favour of the application of such a plan to the case of Ireland, except that I suppose he would not have uttered a long and eloquent eulogy upon the brevity of Irish speaking. With that single exception there is no argument brought before us by the right hon. Gentleman which would not justify a precisely similar scheme if applied to Ireland. Well, then are you prepared to apply it to Ireland? I can only tell you that if you do a more chaotic condition of Irish legislation than that into which you will undoubtedly plunge can hardly be conceived. Hon. Members opposite may affect to think that that can only happen when a Unionist Government is in Office, and that if a Government of Liberal complexion holds the reins of power there will be harmony, and that nothing will be done in the Grand Committee by the majority of Members representing Irish constituencies to which the Government could object. But everybody knows that that is not the case. Everybody knows that, whilst hon. Gentlemen opposite may be perfectly prepared to wash their hands of Ireland and to allow Irishmen to cut their own throats in their own way in their own country, they would not allow Irishmen in this House to use this House for purposes which they knew to be unjust. Therefore, I believe that the Government will never dare to extend this plan to Ireland, although they think it can be safely extended to Scotland. But, after all, the case of Ireland is not so important or so serious as the case of England. The case of England was alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman, but it does not appear to us that he really understood the difficulty, which he certainly failed to surmount. I will take a concrete case. I will take the case of the Bill to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, the Scotch Parish Councils Bill. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to hand over his Parish Councils Bill for Scotland to his new Grand Committee, and in that Grand Committee Scotchmen as Scotchmen and Home Rulers as Home Rulers will have it all their own way and will be able to do exactly what they liked with the Bill. Now, consider what happened in the case of England. You brought forward a Parish Councils Bill for England, but you did not send it to a Grand Committee composed of Englishmen with a small proportion of Scotchmen and Irishmen added. If you had done so a very different Bill would have emerged from the Committee to the one which you have lately passed into law, and I want to know whether you think that unequal treatment of that kind will be acquiesced in indefinitely by England? I speak upon this point as a Scotchman, and I say that no greater danger menaces the political interests of Scotland than the danger that by our insane action we may arouse England to a sense that she is an oppressed nationality, and compel her to use the power which she undoubtedly possesses to exclude from all share in her affairs those who do not happen to live within her borders. Then I should like the Government to consider this question of England from another point of view. The whole system of Constitutional government as developed in modern times is this:—A certain number of gentlemen are selected by the Crown who have the confidence of a majority of this House, and upon those gentlemen is thrown the burden not merely of administering the Army, the Navy, and all the Public Offices from day to day, but of directing and guiding the course of our legislation; and if you take away from the responsible Government of the day the power of directing our legislation you strip them of half their functions. What would be the position of a Government if there were an English Grand Committee of which they did not happen to possess the confidence? The Government will read a Bill a second time by the aid of their small Party majority. They will then send it to the English Grand Committee, and that Committee will deal with it as it thinks fit, and will then send it back to the House very likely in a strangely different guise from that which it was originally presented. The unfortunate Ministerial author of the measure, beaten time after time in the Grand Committee, will have either drop the Bill, to accept it as it is, or reverse on the Report stage everything done in the Grand Committee. These three possible alternatives which is the one the Government would desire? Would they like to have to fight on Report stage a Bill of which they disapprove; would they prefer to drop their favourite measures rather than see them passed, or would they reverse on Report stage everything done in the Committee stage, having before them a certain conclusion that they would be told on every platform throughout England that they had gone against the declared wishes of the English people expressed in the Grand Committee. If their position would be intolerable, as that Government would no more trust the plan by which they would hand over the English legislation to a Grand Committee than they would dare, for example, to carry into effect many of the reforms which are so glibly advocated on platforms during bye-elections. I wish the Government would explain to us on what principle they mean to refuse this boon to England, and if they do not mean to refuse it, how they mean to carry on the Government with the Grand Committee system applicable to England. They are in this absolute dilemma. Give this to Scotland and refuse it to England, and you will make every Englishman and every English Member feel that he is not allowed to legislate for his own country as Scotchmen are allowed to legislate for their country. Grant it to England, and you make legislation by a responsible Government an absurdity whenever a Government happens to be in Office which does not command a majority of English votes. I have often thought of this question, and have asked myself how that dilemma is to be avoided. Never have I found anybody who could tell me a method of avoiding it, nor have I ever myself been able to devise any such method. I do not know that it is necessary for me to add anything to the arguments which I have endeavoured to address to the question—in that respect breaking away from the example set me by the right hon. Gentleman; but I think, if the House realises that one consequence of this must be as regards Scotland that in every case in which the House reverses the decision of the Scotch Grand Committee you will embitter Scotch feeling, and that you will give occasion for friction between the two countries which does not exist at the present time ; if you reflect on that in the first place—if you reflect, in the second place, that this scheme of appointing a Grand Committee is nothing more than a device by means of which the Government are to obtain an influence over the Committee stage of Scotch Bills outside the walls of this Chamber which they never could obtain inside it ; if you reflect that this is an absolute departure from every tradition that has hitherto guided this House in framing these Committees ; if you reflect that this is an outrage upon England if you do not extend this privilege to her, but the destruction in this House if you do extend it to her of Parliamentary Government by a responsible Minister in this House ; if you reflect, as I am bound as a Scotchman to reflect, that these sham gifts to my country are necessarily but the prelude to depriving her, as I think, of some of her most valuable political privileges ; and if, lastly, you remember that it is a change which goes to the very root of our whole Parliamentary system, which has not been proposed as an organic scheme, has not been laid before us with all its logical consequences, has not been presented to our judgment in a form in which we can finally decide upon it, then I think you will agree with me that we ought absolutely to decline to consider for one instant a proposal which, if made at all, must be presented to us in a very different guise and a very different speech to that which the right hon. Gentleman has made. As embodying, not indeed my views upon the broad principles involved—those I have endeavoured to state in my speech—but, as involving my views upon the procedure of the Government in this matter, I beg now to ask the House to accept the words of an Amendment to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman which I have placed, Mr. Speaker, in your hands.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"This House declines to sanction, in regard to Bills relating to one portion only of the United Kingdom, any plan by which the ancient practice as to the constitution of Committees of this House shall be fundamentally altered until it has had an opportunity of pronouncing upon a general scheme which shall extend a like treatment to Bills relating to each of the other portions of the United Kingdom."
—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'in addition to the two Standing Committees appointed under Standing Order, No. 47' stand part of the Question."

*MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.) said, that in rising to follow the right hon. Gentleman who had last spoken, he did not for a moment suppose that he could meet him on equal terms in argument, and his only excuse for taking the course he had, perhaps rashly, taken was because he thought it desirable this question should not be discussed entirely by means of one of those oratorical duels between the Front Benches which were the subject of such general admiration and instruction to them, but which sometimes prevented the views of an independent Member being heard. He wondered, in listening to the eloquent speech of the right hon. Gentleman, in which he described the proposal made by the Secretary for Scotland as subverting the ancient traditions of this House, whether the right hon. Gentleman had in his mind the remembrance that a similar proposal, not applied to Scotland but Ireland, had been made many years ago by Mr. John Bright, who was not distinguished by a rash desire to subvert the ancient traditions either of this House or of the British Constitution ? The right hon. Gentleman told them that as a Scotchman—and he was one of the most distinguished of living Scotchmen—much as he enjoyed addressing his countrymen he did not desire to be confined to that privilege, but that he desired a larger and more varied audience than he would have under this proposal. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman did not number among his many distinctions that of being a Scottish Member, therefore his privileges were not attacked in this Motion ; and, in the second place, if he were, and thought fit in pursuance of his duty to take part in the proceedings of the Standing Committee, that would not prevent him or any Member of that Committee from afterwards taking part in the proceedings of the whole House. The right hon. Gentleman said that Scottish Members were not elected by their constituencies solely to deal with Scottish questions. No, but they were elected in the first instance to deal with Scottish questions. If he might venture upon a general criticism of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman he should point out that he had treated the whole question as regarded these Committees from a Party point of view. He seemed to assume that any Scotch Bill sent to a Committee of Scottish Members would divide them, as they were divided now, on great principles in this House. He (Mr. Paul) did not believe that would be the result. His own experience had been very small, but he did sit upon a Standing Committee which dealt with a Scottish measure—the Fatal Accidents Inquiry Bill. He and other Scottish Members took a great interest in that Bill, and he did not find on the Committee that they were divided in accordance with their opinions on Home Rule for Ireland or Home Rule for Scotland. And was the Scottish Local Government Bill a measure which would naturally divide the Scottish Members in accordance with Party? No, he believed they would be always found voting on it independently, and regarding it as a measure on which every Scottish Member would endeavour to do what was best for the national interests, what was best for Scotland and the conduct of local government in that country, and for this purpose alone. The right hon. Gentleman said there were Highland Members who might not understand the position of the Lowlands, and Lowland Members who might not understand the position of the Highlands. Yes, but they would be all there. All parts of Scotland would be represented, as all parts of the Kingdom were supposed to be represented on Standing Committees dealing with an English Bill. He was told that England had an equal right to a Standing Committee on an English Bill. He most frankly and fully admitted it. He would take the case to which the right hon. Gentleman referred—the case of the Local Government Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said that the English Members were out-voted by the Members from Scotland and Ireland, and if that, in any case, were so, he (Mr. Paul) must bear part of the responsibility, and he bore it very cheerfully; for what happened when that Bill went up to another place? Very considerable alterations were made in it, most restrictive alterations going in the same direction—but very much further—as the Amendments moved from the Opposition side in Committee. The House of Commons rejected all these alterations of the slightest importance, and he believed that in every single case the rejection of these Amendments on a Division was supported by an English majority, because he knew that gentlemen opposite who supported the Local Government Amendments did not receive the assistance of the followers of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, who were accustomed to act with them in general politics. This, therefore, was not an instance in which an Act had been altered and amended over the heads and against the opinion of the majority of English Members. He did not believe, in the case of Scotland, that that was a real danger at all. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Secretary for Scotland had said nothing about national sentiment. What had national sentiment to do with it? This was a matter of business. It was an attempt—the right hon. Gentleman thought an unfortunate attempt—to get Scottish business done with greater celerity, not in accordance with the views of any one Party in Scotland, but in accordance with the general opinion of the Scottish public on matters which they understood. The right hon. Gentleman said that that (the Liberal) side of the House would have an unfair preponderance on the Standing Committee, because they would have a majority of 27. If this Committee was appointed, and if the Scottish Local Government Bill were sent to it, there would not be a series of Party Divisions, but a series of businesslike discussions. Why any English Member should desire the privilege of taking part in the details of Scottish business he could not conceive. He was sure he did not regard it as any privilege to take part in the details of a Bill which purely related to England, although it happened to be his own country, and he was quite willing to leave it to the Representatives of English constituencies. He would point out, if this majority, which the right hon. Gentleman considered unfair, were used for purposes which he considered illegitimate, it was open to the right hon. Gentleman for any Member of his Party to raise any question again in this House upon the report. He did not believe that would be done unreasonably or in small cases; but if there were any reason to suppose the Standing Committee had abused the powers entrusted to it, it would be open to anyone to invite the House to reverse the decision of the Committee. He supported this proposal, not from any Party point of view, but because he believed it was really a business-like reform, which was intended to, and which he was sure would conduce to the despatch of Scottish business, and he was persuaded when it was tried it would be generally accepted by public opinion as being, not a proposal for subverting the traditions of the House of Commons, or any other traditions, but a proposal for a reasonable, sensible, moderate, and practical purpose.

Mr. Paul

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.) said, that curiously enough his right hon. friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, who introduced this proposal, was an Englishman representing a Scottish constituency; his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, who followed him, was a Scotchman representing an English constituency, whilst the third speaker, the Member for South Edinburgh, was an Englishman representing a Scottish constituency. That showed how they worked in and in, in regard to nationalities, and how there ought not to be any hard-and-fast line drawn between the politics of the three countries. He would like to ask his hon. Friend whether he as an Englishman so represented South Edinburgh, because he was specially acquainted with Scottish business? [MR. PAUL: I endeavour to learn.] At the same time he did not think an apprentice, however willing, was the sort of person they ought to employ as an expert in important business. He congratulated the Secretary for Scotland upon the magnificence of his courage. He could imagine no courage greater than for the right hon. Gentleman to lay down the proposition that this was a non-partisan proposal, and then support his statement by proving that his own Party were the only people who had ever voted for it. Again, the right hon.

Gentleman said it was exactly the same as the other Grand Committees, and its opinion ought to have every possible weight, because the talk in the Grand Committee was to be an absolute reflex of what the talk was in the House. But it was the reflex of votes in the House itself that they ought to have in the Grand Committees. They did not care much about the talk, but it was because a Report which came from a Grand Committee was supported by votes which were a reflex of the majority of the whole of this House that such Reports of Standing Grand Committees had so much weight in the House itself. The Secretary for Scotland went on to say that this Scottish Grand Committee was a charming substitute for the gag, and he appeared to consider it a magnificent thing for the Scottish Members to be able to air their eloquence in a Grand Committee, instead of being closed and gagged in the House of Commons. Possibly that might please some people, but it did not hold out any special attractions to him. This proposal was that the Committee should consist of the whole of the Scottish Members with 15 additional Members to be added by the Committee of Selection. These 15 were added no doubt for one of two reasons. In the first place, perhaps, to enable Scotchmen who sat for English constituencies to take part in the deliberations, and to give the Scotch Members the benefit of their advice and experience, because many Scotchmen sitting for English constituencies had very great experience of Scottish business. But, on the other hand, these 15 might be added so that a sort of supervision might be exercised over the Scotchmen, to see that they acted exactly as they ought. He was inclined to think that these 15 were, as a matter of fact, to be added as a sort of sop to meet the scruples of hon. Members, who were very well represented by the hon. Member for Bedford city. That hon. Gentleman was pre-eminently qualified to speak on this subject from his long experience on the Committee of Selection. He would ask the hon. Gentleman whether the addition of 15 Members, most of whom might very possibly be Scotchmen, to the Committee of Scottish Members numbering 72, would prevent the Scottish Members from so preponderating in numbers as to override all other opinions? Unless it did prevent them from so preponderating it was, in the opinion of the hon. Member for Bedford himself, a bad and dangerous proposal. From the time he first had the honour of entering the House he had listened very attentively to the words of wisdom which had fallen from the lips of the hon. Member for Bedford. At first he used to look with admiration at the hon. Gentleman, who stood up as a sort of umpire between the two Parties. As time went on, however, and as he studied the hon. Gentleman's declarations, he was sorry to say he had been obliged to come to the conclusion that this self-constituted umpire was rather too much like those extremely useful umpires at cricket who invariably gave their own side "not out," and he was inclined to think that on the present occasion they would find the Member for Bedford would give his own side "not out," certainly by vote, probably both by vote and voice. But there was another body of Members whom this addition of 15 would rather annoy. For instance, the hon. Member for Dumfries said, on the 6th March, 1888, that he would not for a moment ask for or care to see a Committee which did not consist exclusively of Scottish Members. How would he like this Committee to which 15 additional Members were to be added? The hon. Member on the same occasion further said that, as a Scottish Member, he would never think of voting against English opinion on any Bill exclusively relating to England. He supposed the hon. Member for Dumfries bore that in mind during the whole of the proceedings on the English Parish Councils Bill, and he trusted he would also bear it in mind when the subject of Sunday closing for England came to the front. The Secretary for Scotland gave no reasons for this proposal, but he fancied the reasons in the view of the Government were, first, the neglect of Scottish business; and, second, that this Committee was to be a sort of means of giving effect to the Home Rule principle. As to the neglect of Scottish business, no one realised more than he the lamentable remissness on the part of the present Government with regard to Scottish business, but that was not always the case. From 1886 to 1892 even the Scottish Gladstonian papers were perfectly astonished at the progress they made with Scottish business. For instance, they passed the Local Government Act for Scotland, the Burgh Police Act—about the biggest Act of Parliament ever passed—the Criminal Law Amendment Act, Free Education, and so on, whilst, at the same time, Scotland was deriving benefit from such general measures as the Mines Regulation Act. But there was no doubt there was a most lamentable neglect of Scottish business at present. As far as he knew, the only Scottish measure that had been passed during this Parliament was the County of the City of Glasgow Act, a small, comparatively unimportant, and entirely non-contentious measure. Two other Scotch measures were indeed introduced, and it was entirely owing to the present Government that any time at all was wasted upon them. One was the Scottish Sea Fisheries Bill, which was received with howls of execration by the people whom it principally concerned, and the other was the Suspensory Bill for Scotland, which was simply laughed out of court. That was the whole of the programme as regarded Scotland, everything else being indefinitely postponed and deferred by the present Government. Even the Scottish Education Estimates for last year were not brought before the House until the 28th of July, and even then they had to be discussed before the Scotch Education Report was issued. That showed gross mismanagement. Yet never was a Government in such a position as the present Government to deal with Scottish questions. Six Members of the Cabinet, ever since the formation of this Government had been closely connected with Scotland: besides many subordinate Members of the Government were also Scotch Members, and would anybody tell him that in these circumstances they had not got the power if they only had the will to put Scotch questions to the front? But as the Opposition had always pointed out, it was perfectly impossible to expect the present Government to proceed with Scotch and English measures while they were hampered with Home Rule and loved Irish questions alone. Ireland was, as a matter of fact, the spoiled darling of the present Cabinet, whilst Scotland and England got all the kicks and none of the halfpence. As he had said, a second reason for the introduction of this proposal was that it would be a means of giving effect to the Home Rule principle. He would, however, point out that the Scottish Home Rule Association, of which the Member for Caithness was President, scouted the very idea of this proposal for a Grand Committee, and further, that the hon. Baronet who represented the College Division of Glasgow, on March 6, 1888, said—

“As for this peddling and pottering through Grand Committees it was not wanted by the people of Scotland. It would not satisfy them, and it would not cure the evils complained of.”

In reality, legislation raised much more questions of community and identity of interest than of community and identity of nationality. The interests of his constituents in Lanarkshire were infinitely more bound up with the interests of Lancashire and Yorkshire than with those of Orkney and Shetland, or, indeed, with any of the seaboard counties of Scotland. But if they did go in for this proposal of a Grand Committee on the score of nationality they must bear in mind that Englishmen or even Scotchmen domiciled in England were in no way Scottish National Members. As a matter of fact those hon. Members who were, in reality, much more English than Scotch, though they happened to represent Scottish constituencies, felt themselves bound, as Anglo-Scottish Members, to be much more Scotch than the Scotch themselves. They were the people who were always talking of Scotch opinion being overridden, and he found when they spoke in this strain they always meant Scottish Gladstonian opinion. Had this so called Scottish opinion—which he called Gladstonian opinion—always proved to be in the right? In the last Parliament the temperance question was brought prominently forward in connection with the Local Government Bill for Scotland. There was a proposal made that the licensing question should be handed over to the County Councils, the Gladstonian Party saying it was the will of Scotland that this should be done. He had the Circular of the Independent Order of the Good Templars of Scotland in his hand who, having considered this proposal, said that nothing could be more monstrous or lamentable, whilst the Scottish National Temperance Convention said that no proposal could have been worse. Therefore, on this great question of temperance, on which the Gladstonian Members pretended to be qualified to speak, they were, in the last Parliament, utterly wrong so far as these two important Societies were concerned. But even in this very Parliament, when his right hon. Friend introduced the first Education Minute, several Gladstonian Members got up, and professing, as always, to speak for the whole people of Scotland, stated that was not at all what was desired. The Secretary for Scotland withdrew his first and introduced his second Education Minute, and Circulars were sent out to all the different Committees in Scotland to ascertain their views. He had the Report of the Scotch Education Department, which showed that of 39 Educational Committees 24 preferred to adhere to the first Minute, while only 15 were in favour of the second, showing that the Scotch Gladstonian Members were again utterly wrong. The Report of the Education Department stated—that was, of course, the Secretary for Scotland—

“Notwithstanding the divergence of opinion shown, and the large support which their original proposal has met with, my Lords,”

“feel bound to attach great weight to the strong expression of opinion by the Scottish Representatives during the Debate upon the subject, and they hesitate in view of it to limit further than is absolutely necessary the freedom of local action.”

The Scottish Gladstonians were thus clearly wrong with regard to temperance and Scottish education, and they were equally wrong in wishing that a suspensory Bill for Scotland for that proposal had been howled out of court with shrieks of execration. With regard to the Sea Fisheries Bill, never had there been a measure so discredited and disgraced, though it was praised by most of the Scottish Gladstonian Members. With reference to the proposal before the House, there were many objections and difficulties in it connected even with procedure, not the least being the financial difficulty. He, therefore, regretted the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not present, but he could promise the right hon. Gentleman there would be absolute unanimity among the Scottish Members on this financial question. They would all try to get as large grants from the Imperial Exchequer as possible. If the Sea

Fisheries (Scotland) Bill passed it would not be the local rates but the Imperial funds that would be called upon. But he would point out to the right hon. Gentleman the great difficulty, which was really the crux of the whole matter. It was embodied in the familiar proverb, "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." If Scotch Bills were sent to a Committee of Scotch Members then Irish Bills must be committed to Irish Members, Welsh Bills to Welsh Members, and, above all, English Bills must be sent to a Grand Committee of English Members. Just consider for a moment how that would work out. How would the present Government like to send their Evicted Tenants' Bill to a Committee of the Irish Members? How would they like to send their Welsh Disestablishment Bill to a Committee composed of Welsh and English Members? Again, how would they like to have sent their English Parish Council Bill—which, by-the-bye, as Lord Rosebery boasted in Edinburgh, had been passed by Irish votes—to a Committee composed of English Members? Or, how would they like to hand over such a question as English Sunday Closing to a Committee of English Members? But it might be urged that the Government would never commit so suicidal an Act. They knew they were in a minority in England, which Lord Rosebery called the "predominant partner" of the United Kingdom. Let it be remembered that the present Government would not always be in power. Before many months, possibly before many weeks were over, another Government might be in power which would have a majority in England, "the predominant partner" of the United Kingdom. Then what a precedent would have been set by the adoption of this proposal. Was it supposed that the predominant partner in the United Kingdom would consent to be domineered over by the other partners? They would find, he thought, that the predominant partner would insist upon having predominance. As to the details of the Bills, measures of all kinds throughout the United Kingdom had to be framed more or less in accordance with the policy of the Government of the day, and the Government of the day and its policy were guided by the wishes of the majority in the House of Commons as a whole. Englishmen who were good enough to represent Scotch constituencies were naturally obliged to talk a great deal about Scotch nationality and Scotch opinion. They had to out-Herod Herod. In ordinary life it was only a "parvenu" who was always posing as being a descendant of the Plantagenets. The posing patriots from Putney and the Highlanders from Hampstead were about as contemptible as the posing parvenu. Curiously enough, he (Mr. Hozier) loved Scotland more than any Englishman who ever yet sat for a Scottish constituency, and could afford to be perfectly frank. Scotland had always been, and please God always would be, a nation—unlike Wales, she need not pretend to be a nation. The right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir G. O. Morgan), no doubt, had told Scotchmen they had no language, but only a dialect, but at all events Scotland had clearly defined boundaries, and they required no qualification, as was necessary with Welshmen in speaking of "Wales including Monmouthshire." A Scottish King succeeded to the English Throne, and Scotchmen were proud to think that England was therefore part of Scotland, and that London was the capital of the United Kingdom.

*SIR G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said, one very short answer to the suggestion of the right hon. Member opposite, that Scotch Bills should not be sent to a Scotch Committee without at the same time sending English Bills to a Standing Committee composed of Englishmen, was, that a Committee composed of all the English Members of the House would be a practical impossibility. There were about 400 English Members in the House, and a Standing Committee composed of all those Members would not be able to find accommodation within the precincts of Westminster. A new room would have to be provided for that Committee, as large as the House itself. As Chairman of Grand Committees of six years' standing, he could speak with practical experience on this subject. In the first place, the formation of a Scotch Committee composed entirely of the Scotch Members would practically exclude Scotchmen from serving on any Committees relating to other matters, for no man, however eager for work, could possibly serve on two Standing Committees. But there was another nationality, who were even more entitled than Scotchmen to have their affairs referred to their own representatives. He referred to Wales. He was not expressing his own opinion one, but would quote the words of the right hon. Member for Midlothian, whose opinion he was sure the hon. Member could respect, in one of the last speeches made in that House. Speaking in answer to the hon. Member for North Leicestershire, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"I should be very glad indeed, after we have seen what practical progress can be made with the Scotch measures, to see what better provision can be made for Welsh measures, for it will be felt that Wales should not, I think, and in a worse position."

He had at one time thought of putting down an Amendment which would extend the Resolution to Wales, but unfortunately such Amendments were like red herrings, to draw the attention of the House from the issue upon which it should be concentrated to side issues. When once the experiment had been made in regard to Scotland he hoped the Government would see their way to extending the operation of the Resolution to Wales. However, it was with Scotland that they had to do at present. The hon. Member spoke of this as a dose of Home Rule. But it was a very infinitesimal dose. What would happen was that Scotch Bills would, after being introduced and read a second time, be referred to a Committee consisting not entirely of Scotch Members but with 15 others added—why, he did not know. For his own part, he should have thought it would be better to send them to the Scotch Members. The measures having, in effect, been referred to the Scotch Members would come back to the House itself and be discussed finally on Report. Certain results would follow from adopting that course. In the first place, discussions upon them in Committee of the whole House would be avoided; in the next place, such Committees did not, as a general rule, act upon Party lines. It had been said that there would be an enormous reponderating majority of Liberals on the Committee; but he understood gentlemen opposite to say that the next General Election would reverse all that. In anyhow, he did not think it would make the slightest difference, because, as a matter of fact, in nearly every case when he had sat as Chairman of a Grand Committee there was no such thing as a Party vote. During last Session he had, as Chairman of a Grand Committee, taken a course which some considered to have been dictated by Party spirit. After a discussion had gone on for, as he considered, an almost interminable time, he had ruled that the Question should be put. It was said he did so to prevent an Amendment of a political opponent being discussed. That was quite untrue, for he should have done just the same thing in the case of a Liberal Member. At the same time, he might say that although he thought his action was technically right, and although it was afterwards approved by the Speaker, he regretted it now, for it was impossible for a Chairman on these Grand Committees to be too careful to avoid even the semblance of partiality. But really the great argument in favour of them was that the services were obtained of men who understood the business brought before them. How many of the entire 670 Members of the House knew anything about such matters as were ordinarily referred to Grand Committees? As a rule, no one attended them but those who were interested in the question; and if Scotch measures were referred to a Scotch Committee it would only be attended by men who understood and were really competent to discuss the matter brought forward. That was the result of his own practical experience on the Bail Bill (Scotland) Committee, when every English Member as soon as the discussion had been commenced fled from the room as if it was infected by the plague. One of the Amendments was proposed on the ground that the Motion did not go far enough, but the answer to that had been given by the Secretary for Scotland. Another Amendment had been placed on the Paper by the hon. Member for Wigtownshire, that the Motion was contrary to the usages of Parliament. But the Standing Committees themselves were an innovation upon the usages of Parliament, and 30 years ago they would have been resented as an infraction of the privileges of Parliament. Besides, this proposal was not quite so novel an experiment as had been represented. When he first entered the House it was the custom for Scotch measures to be referred to an informal meeting of all the Scotch Members. There was a general consensus of opinion among sensible men that measures affecting Scotland should be discussed by Scotchmen, and at these informal meetings the opinions of the Scotch Members were elicited; on those expressions of opinion changes were made in the Bills, and the result was that Scotch measures used for a long time to be passed through the House of Commons with the greatest ease and rapidity. It was only by adapting our old institutions to the changed conditions of the times that we could hope to preserve the one or satisfy the other.

*MR. G. W. BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) said, the remarks which had fallen from the right hon. Member for East Denbighshire raised the question what kind of Bills it was proposed to refer to this Scotch Grand Committee. The right hon. Member had suggested that it would be unnecessary to appoint a similar Grand Committee for England, because the Scotch Members would have their whole time taken up by their attendance upon the Committees on Scotch Bills, and would naturally be unable to sit upon Committees dealing with English measures. But what of those English Bills which were now discussed in Committees of the whole House? He would ask whether or not it was proposed that Bills of a contentious character should be sent to the Grand Committee? Hitherto, only Bills of a non-contentious character were supposed to be referred to Grand Committees. But it was rather difficult to distinguish between contentious and non-contentious measures. A very good illustration of that difficulty occurred during the last Session of Parliament in the case of the Employers' Liability Bill. If the House could be assured that it was intended to refer to this Scotch Committee only Bills of a non-contentious character much of the objection would be removed; but the House had had no such assurance given, and the idea seemed to be that Bills of every kind should be so referred. If it was intended to refer such a measure as a Parish Councils Bill to a Scotch Grand Committee, how could it be maintained that the two countries were receiving equal treatment? Unless this proposal could be applied to the other parts of the United Kingdom as well as to Scotland it stood condemned. If this Resolution were passed, and the Government refused to extend it to England, their successors would have to retrace the step now taken. The only alternative would be to complete it by extending these Committees, at events, to England. All the hon. Members who had spoken in favour of the Resolution had endeavoured to minimise its partizan character. But its partizan character could not be concealed.

1884, when the extension of the franchise was being considered, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian put forward a most extraordinary and fantastic theory of representation—that the number of Representatives should be larger in proportion to the distance from the centre, thus giving to Ireland and Scotland a larger number of Representatives in the House than their population would strictly entitle them to. That theory was laughed out of court at the time; but the Party opposite were trying to adopt it in practice. They acted upon it last year when they proposed to bring Irish Members here to vote on British questions, while British Members were to be prevented from having a voice in Irish questions; and it was very much the same thing in this proposal. The proposal of the Government was so constructed as to enable a Radical Government to pass Radical measures distasteful to the majority of English Representatives by means of Scotch and Irish votes, and when a Unionist Government came into power, to make it impossible for them to introduce a measure dealing with Scotland without danger that that measure would be fundamentally altered in Grand Committee to such an extent as would make it no longer acceptable to its authors. The scheme was obviously inequitable, unless extended to England and Ireland. Yet it could not be so extended without danger to national unity. He was a Scotsman, like the Leader of the Opposition, sitting for an English constituency. Personally, he regarded himself, in the first instance, as a citizen of the United Kingdom, and a Scotsman only in the second instance. He did not want to reverse that order, and become a Scotsman first. In both these capacities, however, he objected to the Resolution, even if it were extended to England and Ireland. He felt convinced that such a scheme would weaken their common country by tending to split it up into nationalities. If they once embarked upon this policy, it would ultimately have the effect of rousing England to assert er claims as against other parts of the United Kingdom, and that could only have one end—namely, the degradation of Ireland and Scotland into the position of subordinate provinces.

Sir G. Osborne Morgan

MR. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire) said, the Committee must always represent the Party that was in power at the time. The Liberal Party was at present in power, and the Scottish Members were Liberals. The Scottish Committee would therefore have a Liberal majority. It was perfectly true that that majority would not exactly correspond to the majority in this House; but that, after all, was a matter of very little object. If questions were on Party lines in such a Committee which he did not think they often did, the Party in power would still be in a majority, and it seemed to him a very small affair whether this majority was a large one or a small one. He maintained that the cases of England and Scotland were entirely different. Scotland required this scheme, and England did not. In this Parliament Scottish affairs did not get their requisite attention, and English affairs did. If Scottish affairs were attended to as English affairs were, as many laws could be passed for Scotland as for England. Population was not a thing that settled the legislative demands of a country. They were going to introduce the Parish Councils Bill. If Scotland had 10,000,000 of inhabitants instead of four, would they need 10 Bills? They might, under certain circumstances—if every 4,000,000 additional inhabitants were entirely different from each other and the first 4,000,000. In fact, the question depended on the complexity of the social, commercial, industrial, and political life of the country. That was the real measure of the legislative necessities of a country. In this case, he maintained, Scotland was the same as England, and Scotland offered as great a field for legislation as England itself. Did Scotland get it? The Imperial Parliament passed certain measures which were applicable to England and Scotland both, and it passed certain measures applicable to Ireland and Wales. He put these out of the question. There remained the measures which applied to England and Scotland alone. If Scotland got fair treatment, there would be as many measures passed for Scotland as for England. In the 12 years from 1880 to 1892 there were three different Parliaments and four different Governments in Office. One half of the time the Conservative Government ruled, and the other half the Liberal Government. During that time 318 measures were passed for England exclusively, and for Scotland only 102. That was to say, three times as many for the one as the other. That showed distinctly the inequality of legislative treatment, and it was in order to redress that inequality that he, for one, was willing to support the present proposal for a Committee. He did not regard it as a step towards Federalism, which was a much wider and more important proposal, but he regarded it as a simple temporary alleviation of the block in Scottish business.

*SIR H. MAXWELL (Wigton) said, it was extremely refreshing to one who had occupied a seat in the House for some years to receive an assurance from a Member who had sat in the House for as many months that they might accept this proposal with every assurance of safety. The hon. Gentleman who had just finished a most interesting and too brief a speech had told them that there was no ground whatever for the apprehensions on that side of the House because of the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland; but he thought it would be admitted both by his own friends and by Members on that side of the House also that he entirely forgot to adduce anything in the shape of argument in support of that contention, and that they might therefore be forgiven if they still entertained a considerable feeling of apprehension as to the ultimate effect and conclusion of the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman. He had given notice upon the Paper of an Amendment to the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman. He did not propose to move that Amendment, for this reason—that his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition had already moved an Amendment which, if it did not go quite as far as his own, still embodied the principle which he wished the House to take into consideration. If he might express any preference in favour of his own Amendment it was in this respect—that it seemed to him possible that there might be placed upon the terms of his right hon. Friend's Amendment a construction which he was sure he had guarded himself against, and which the words themselves were not intended to bear. Under the guise of an apparently simple Amendment of the Rules of Procedure the Secretary for Scotland had put before them an insidious and far-reaching measure. He proposed to ask the House to regard it in two aspects—first, its result on the character of the Imperial Legislature; and, secondly, its results as affecting the standing and convenience of the Scotch Members. The second, of course, was by far the least important. He proposed to take it first. The Scotch Members were not merely delegates returned to give voice upon affairs restricted in scope to the material interests of limited localities, but upon Imperial matters which affected the Scotch people just as much as they affected the people South of the Tweed. That was the interpretation which he put upon their Constitutional function—that was the mission on which they were sent from the last General Election. What they had to consider was how far their ability to discharge that function and to carry out that mission would be interfered with by the pressure of the additional duties which would be thrown upon them under the Resolution of the Secretary for Scotland. He believed it was admitted generally that there were limits to physical endurance. Both Houses of Parliament had been largely occupied of late, and rightly so, in consideration of the conditions of and the hours of labour. They had had a Sweating Commission, and there had been legislation also upon the hours of labour of railway servants, and it was only two or three nights ago that they were listening to the hon. Member for Peterborough, who was urging the Committee to take into consideration the hours of attendance of messengers and others employed about the Houses of Parliament. Members of Parliament were made of the same material as messengers of Parliament, and there was a limit to their physical endurance, just as there was a limit to the endurance of the messengers of Parliament, and it was time that a word should be put in upon their behalf lest their hours of labour should become excessive also. If this Resolution was carried they would have the Grand Committee meeting at 12 o'clock in the day. Of course, it would be the desire of every Scotch Member to take a full part in these proceedings, and he would be expected by his constituency to do so. The proceedings of the Grand Committee would last until 3 o'clock, and then the Scotch Members were to be asked to come down to that House to take part in discussions upon questions of the highest and greatest importance—questions of peace and war, of public liberty, of commerce, agriculture and education. Would they be, under those circumstances, in the same position as English and Irish and Welsh Members? Would they be as fresh when they had to undertake business in the House as other hon. Members, or would they not rather find themselves at a great disadvantage? Was it not conceivable that after having their minds saturated with the subtleties of the hon. Member for Ross, or wearied with the witticisms of the hon. Member for East Edinburgh, they would be at a disadvantage compared with the Members who came down to the House without these exhausting preliminaries? Of course, it might be said that in this respect they would be on a par with the Members who took part in Committees and Royal Commissions. But the fact was that at the present time they took their full share of the work done upon the Royal Commissions and Committees. He himself served upon one Royal Commission, four Committees of the House last year, and a Departmental Committee besides. It was not for him to say that the presence of Scotch Members upon these Committees was essential, but he might say that Parliamentary life would be shorn, so far as the Scotch Members were concerned, of a great deal of the interest which it at present possessed if they had not an opportunity of discharging their duties upon these Committees. It was his desire that the Scotch Members should take their full share in the proceedings of the Imperial Parliament; and they were extremely loth to surrender any part which they now took in those proceedings. Then, were Scotch Members to be debarred from serving on Private Bill Committees? Perhaps the Scotch Members would not feel the deprivation very keenly if that were so, but, at the same time, it would hardly be fair to English and Irish Members to throw upon them the entire burden of the Private Bill legislation upstairs. Attend-once upon Private Bill Committees was compulsory, and that rule would lebar the Scotch Members from taking part in the proceedings of the Grand Committee, and therefore one of two things must happen—the Scotch Member must be a less useful Member in the respect that he would not be available for the purposes of Private Bill legislation, or he would be obliged to sacrifice his duties as a Scotch Member of Parliament. If that was the case in regard to private Members, how did it operate with regard to the occupants of the Bench opposite? There were sitting on that Bench the Members for Forfar, Stirling Burghs, East Fife, the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow, Leith Burghs, Dundee, the Border Burghs, and the County of Clackmannan, all of whom were Members of the present Government. He was sure that Members of the present Administration would agree with their predecessors that it was a sufficiently ~~big~~ tax upon a man's energy to transact the work of a Public Department, and afterwards to represent that Department, and his constituents also, in this House, without the additional duty of representing the interests of Scotland at the same time upon a Grand Committee. Even the present Members of the Ministry had not succeeded in finding a solution of Sir Boyle Roche's problem. He yielded to no man in admiration for the abilities of the Secretary of State for War, but he believed that it was even beyond his power to attend to his business at the War Office and simultaneously to watch over the interests of the people of the Stirling Burghs at the grand Committee. The Home Secretary, too, was popularly supposed to be no incurist, but the good folk in the East Neuk o' Fife would expect him to have some care for their affairs before the Grand Committee, and it must come to this—that either the business of a great Department must be neglected, and the Ministers must attend the meetings of the Scotch Grand Committee, or that, upon the other hand, the proceedings of that Committee must be carried on in the absence of some of the ablest of Scottish Representatives. He should be told, perhaps, that he took an exaggerated view of the amount of business that would be delegated to these Grand Committees. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for Caithness said "Hear, hear!" Well, one of two things must be the truth—either this Scottish business was so moderate in amount that it would not overtax the energies of the Scottish Members in the way in which he had sketched, or it was so great and pressing that it was utterly beyond the powers of the Imperial Parliament, as such, to transact it. One of these two alternatives must be the truth. If the first was the truth, then he submitted there was no case for the change. If Scottish business was so moderate in amount that it would not overtax the energies of Scottish Members, then it must be the method and not the machine that was at fault—the administration of business, and not the extent of it. But if the second was the case, that Scottish business was so large in bulk as to have got beyond all control of the House, then Scottish Members would certainly be under the disability he had described. The hon. Member who spoke last had made an allusion illustrated by a profuse amount of figures which he (Sir H. Maxwell) confessed he was not able to follow as to the amount of Scottish business transacted in the last 12 years measured by the number of Bills. Well, he would not go back 12 years. If, as the hon. Member said, 102 exclusively Scottish measures passed into law in those 12 years and at the same time 318 exclusively English measures passed into law, he did not think there was much to complain of. England was more than three times as large as Scotland, and the calculation of the hon. Member had only given England three times as many Bills as Scotland.

MR. CROMBIE said, he had tried to explain that population should not be the measure.

SIR H. MAXWELL said, that was a matter of opinion. England had nine times as many people as Scotland, and if the measure were, as some people thought it ought, by population England should have nine times as many Bills as Scotland instead of three times as many. He would go back no farther than last Session. Last Session was exceptional in many respects, though not exceptional in the amount of Scottish business presented for the consideration of the House. There were two Bills mentioned in the Queen's Speech, and one of them was proceeded with. There was the Scottish Suspensory Bill, which did not seem to excite very much enthusiasm either within the walls of the House or without them, and there was the Scottish Fishery Bill. The latter measure he would not say was an average example, but it was a very striking example of the management of Scottish business in the House. They should scrutinise it a little closely in order to find out where the flaw really existed. Was it in the method, or was it in the machine—was it in the Legislature itself, or was it in the Executive? The Scottish Fishery Bill was a measure which Scottish Members in all parts of the House were anxious to see passed into law. They were willing to make sacrifices of their own views; they were willing, even, to accept a measure less perfect in many respects than, in their opinion, it might have been, in order that the important interests to be affected by that Bill might receive the attention which was undoubtedly their due. But no sooner was the Bill introduced to the House than it was seen to be an infant that could not live. It lingered on during the summer months. By heroic measures the Secretary for Scotland was able to get it through Committee as a non-contentious measure, and it went to the House of Lords. No sooner did it go there than the monstrous deformity of the production was recognised in the land that was to be affected by it. Numerous deputations came up from most influential towns in Scotland, and implored Parliament to reject the measure which was going to do them such an injustice. It was well known that the measure was not rejected, but returned to the House for consideration—consideration which the Government refused to give it, and they dropped the measure. But the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland surely would not have the hardihood to mention the Scottish Fisheries Bill as an example of the neglect of Scottish business in the House. There was nothing to prevent the measure passing last Session except its inherent imperfections—except its inherently unworkable nature. The next time the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland left his native country and crossed the border to go to Scotland he would find that it was notorious there, amongst all the persons who might be affected by the Bill, and who were interested in its passing, that it was lost, not on account of proceeding in the House, not on account of obstruction or delays in the other House, but on account of the imperfection of the measure and of the obstinacy as he was bound to add, the incompetency, of the Minister in charge of it. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would understand that he did not use the word "incompetence" in any but the most limited sense. The right hon. Gentleman's reputation in other fields was far too high for him (Sir H. Maxwell) to wish to attempt to put any slight upon it. He wished to be understood as restricting the observation entirely to the right hon. Gentleman's administration of affairs at the Scotch Office, on which he at least, was unable to compliment the right hon. Gentleman. This seemed to him (Sir H. Maxwell) to be an instance of a Scottish Bill which, by the co-operation of the Scottish Members amongst themselves, might at this moment have been an Act of Parliament had it been workable. It was the defects of the measure, and not the opposition in either House, that put an end to it. But he did not see, for his part, how the Bill could have proceeded any further, even if it had been referred to the Grand Committee. The same obstacles would have arisen; the same defects would have been fatal to its existence, and the only result would have been that the Scottish Members would have been asked to do double the work of the English and Irish Members, with nothing to show for it in the end. They protested against the proposed increase of their labours when, as they maintained, there was no cause for it. They did not grudge their labour. They had put their hands to the plough, and were not to be blamed if they demurred to the demand to put their feet on the treadmill. As to the other and larger consideration, the bearing of this proposal upon the character of the Imperial Parliament, the House was asked to assent to a compromise couched in the modest and unobtrusive garb of an amendment of procedure, but it was, in fact, a vital and serious change in the constitution of the House. A very similar proposal was made in the year 1882 when the Grand Committee were first set up. Mr. O'Donnell proposed that an Irish Grand Committee should deal with exclusively Irish affairs, and that proposal was dealt with by the then Prime Minister (Mr. Gladstone) in the following words :—

Sir H. Maxwell

"The hon. Member invited the Government to sanction at this moment the principle that certain Imperial powers—the powers of the Imperial Parliament—should be exercised by Members taken exclusively from one part of the United Kingdom. I greatly doubt whether Parliament would ever sanction anything of the kind. For this House to divide itself in the manner proposed would be an extraordinary and unnecessary innovation, and an innovation which the House will not, I think, under any circumstances be prepared to entertain. We are proposing to the House, and we are bound to the Rules of our proposal, arrangements of mutual practical convenience. Therefore, how can we possibly accede to the Amendment—which, to say nothing else, involves an enormous Constitutional innovation."

The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland had used almost identical words in proposing the Resolution. The late Sir George Campbell in 1888 proposed the establishment of a Scotch Grand Committee for the same purpose as that of the Committee which was now proposed to the House. The Gladstonian Party had at that time accepted the policy of Home Rule for Ireland, and therefore it was not surprising to find that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, being still in opposition, yielded to the temptation to give his verbal sanction to the proposal, which was opposed by the Government of the day. The right hon. Gentleman, however, did not vote in favour of the proposal. His right hon. Friend (Mr. A. J. Balfour) had shown what a wide departure from the immemorial custom of the House in the appointment of Committees was involved in the proposal of the Government in one respect, but had not touched upon the departure from the principle upon which Grand Committees were originally established. Grand Committees were usually composed of 60 Members selected from all parts of the House impartially by a Committee of Selection, and to them were added 15 Members in the character of experts. Under the proposal of the Government the system would be exactly reversed. The Committee would consist of 72 Scotch Members to deal with Scotch affairs, with 15 nondescript Members added in order to dilute the too exclusively Scotch nature of the proceedings. This was an extreme instance of what grammarians termed a husteron proteron—putting the cart before the horse. So far from carrying out, as the right hon. Gentleman said, the system upon which Grand Committees had always been appointed, it was an exact reversal and a sharp departure from those lines. The Grand Committee had been spoken of as a microcosm reflecting the House of Commons. How could it reflect the House faithfully, or how could it in any degree be a microcosm reflecting the House when the balance of Parties in it would be so absolutely dissimilar and disproportioned? The very structure and furniture of the Chamber in which they were assembled, and of the Chamber in which the Grand Committee would sit, were designed to carry out the idea of government by Party. He could quite well understand the desire of the English Members to escape discussion upon Scottish affairs. He could, however, tell them how this had been done in the past and how it might, with perfect ease, be done in the future. Almost his first experience in the House of Commons, 14 years ago, was that of being placed on a Select Committee, presided over by the hon. Baronet the Member for the College Division of Glasgow (Sir C. Cameron). It was a Committee on a subject in which he thought most English Members did not take an ardent interest. The subject was the herring brand. The Committee despatched its business upstairs in three or four days, and subsequently the Bill passed through the House without a single Amendment in Committee. That was the way in which they were accustomed to transact Scottish business, and it was the way in which it seemed they might transact it now. It was very often boasted that we were a businesslike people, but it seemed to him that they would be adopting a very curious method of dealing with business if they accepted the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. There were, of course, numerous differences between the procedure and the character of the Scotch and English peoples. Their laws were different, their churches were different, their agricultural tenure in many respects was different, and there were many other points of difference, but they were perfectly capable, acting as reasonable men, to settle their own affairs among themselves in the way they had been accustomed to. The hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter), who shook his head, would recollect one of the most portentous measures, in point of size, ever brought into the House—the Scottish Burgh Police Bill—a measure of upwards of 600 clauses. How was that Bill dealt with?

MR. R. T. REID: How long did it take?

SIR H. MAXWELL said, the hon. Member asked him how long it took. He would reply by asking why did it take so long? It passed through the mill of a Select Committee of Scotch Members upstairs, and that was a kind of mill which, though it ground small, did not grind as slowly as might be supposed. It came down to the House in a perfectly workable form. It was then opposed by Mr. Caldwell, who put down an impossible number of Amendments. Of course, Mr. Caldwell might have done just the same in a Grand Committee.

An hon. MEMBER: He was a Unionist.

*SIR H. MAXWELL said, he failed to see the relevancy of the interruption. He was endeavouring to speak of this matter in no Party spirit, and he had merely referred to Mr. Caldwell as a Scotch Member. At all events, the tactics Mr. Caldwell pursued were successful, as he prevented the Bill passing that Session. Next year the Bill went through the Committee stage in all its enormous proportions, and passed through the House ultimately with perfect ease and with almost perfect satisfaction to the towns and burghs affected. Why were they to give up proceedings of this reasonable and friendly nature? What had come upon Scotch Members that they could no longer meet the Lord Advocate in friendly discussion? He was sure there was nothing in the demeanour or the character of the present Lord Advocate (Mr. J. B. Balfour) to render him unapproachable in a greater degree than his immediate predecessor, and he (Sir H. Maxwell) was quite willing to testify to the admirable results which had been obtained by the consultations which had been referred to. Of course, what really commended this proposal to the House was that it was a kind of half measure of Home Rule—a kind of halfway house. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir G. Trevelyan) was not very long ago somewhat an authority on halfw houses. He denounced them in ambiguous language as undesirable and dangerous tenements, and declared, phraseology which Members were unlikely to forget, that for his part he would never consent to be a tenant of one of them. The times had changed, and here was the right hon. Gentleman offering for the occupation of hon. Members a halfway house between the present system of Imperial legislation in Scotland and Home Rule. The proposal, however, did not find very cordial acceptance. The Secretary of the Scotch Home Rule Association had written a letter to The Times and other public journals couched in terms not very amiable and very respectful towards Her Majesty's Government. He evidently objected to this halfway house, and did not think that half a loaf was better than no bread. He talked of this proposal as an extra time job which Her Majesty's Government were seeking to impose upon Scottish Members. He said—

“The Government either believe in Home Rule or they do not. If they do not believe in it they are playing a hypocritical, base part. If they do believe in it they are playing a mean, base, cowardly part.”

This was rather an unfortunate alternative, and for his (Sir H. Maxwell's) part he preferred not to apply such terms to the present occupants of such exalted positions. It was obvious, however, from this letter and from the harsh expressions contained in it that the present proposal would not satisfy the Home Rulers in Scotland. The only reason which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian gave for accepting Sir George Campbell's proposal for a Scotch Grand Committee in 1886 was that it anticipated larger demands. If the proposal was not to do that, what reason was there for it? Why should they waste time upon a proposal which the hon. Member for Caithness had given them to understand, was already unacceptable in lieu of a full measure of Home Rule? Scottish Members on his side of the House, for their part, objected to this “extra time job” altogether. They had no stomach for it. They did not desire to be relegated to a one-horse Parliament upstairs, turned into a kind of garret legislators, Parliamentary pariahs.

Sir H. Maxwell

in order that they might grasp a barren chimera of make-believe autonomy. They had been returned to this House as Imperial Members, and Imperial Members they intended to remain, in act as well as in name, until the people of Scotland decreed it otherwise; and he called upon—should he say the hospitality, the generosity, or the public spirit of Her Majesty's Government, to make suitable and decorous arrangements for the transaction of their national business.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.) said, the only objection he had to the hon. Baronet's speech was that he had made precisely the same speech against the proposal of Home Rule for Scotland. He thought he even recognised some of the extremely well-turned phrases as having been used by the hon. Baronet to denounce the denationalisation of his country; and such speeches had been made by gentlemen like the hon. Baronet against every proposal to facilitate the passing of Scotch Bills and the transaction of Scotch business. There was not a gentleman who had regard for his own character for candour who would deny that during the past 18 months the business of Scotland had been disgracefully neglected, and any candid man would admit that that neglect had been continuing for the six years which preceded the present Parliament. As an illustration he would mention the Burgh Police Act of 1891, containing about 700 clauses, which had been brought in for 10 successive years by the Government of the day, and, having reached a certain point, had been abandoned. Was that the pace at which the hon. Baronet desired to see legislation progress? He would take another case, that of Mr. M'Lagan's Bill referring to liquor. He voted for the Second Reading of that Bill in 1884, but he had never had another opportunity of doing so, although in the interval Scotch Members had been diligently endeavouring, by combination and otherwise, to bring that Bill forward again, so that they might have an opportunity of voting upon it. Scotch Members did not succeed in getting Bills through because their measures were objected to, thwarted, and blocked at every stage by English Conservative Members, who thought they had a prescriptive right to do so. The fresh proposal of the Government was due to the pressure of Scotch Members. Nearly every unofficial Member for Scotland, in August, 1892, presented, in deferential terms, a request to the late Prime Minister for this Committee, but that representation was treated with complete indifference—he was almost going to say contempt. Then at the beginning of this year they unanimously passed other Resolutions, but the note of deference was absent. They said that it was the duty of the Government to press forward Scotch business, and that unless the Committee were granted all prospects of Scotch legislation were illusory. To that language they adhered. He was satisfied with the Committee proposed by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for Scotland, who had always been most sympathetic and most desirous to push forward Scotch business; and he must say that although his right hon. Friend did not care for it, he, himself, with other hon. Members, was pained by the expression by the hon. Baronet, in a tone not often heard from him in the House, towards the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland. At the same time, he thought the proposal might have been better. It might have provided for the Second Reading also, and it might have omitted the 15 additional Members. What objection was there to the proposal as made? The Resolution retained the absolute control of the House over all Scotch business, and admittedly Scotch Bills would be committed to the most qualified people that could be imagined, for their consideration. Only one stage out of five was to be relegated to the Scotch Committee. Undoubtedly, the Committee stage was committed under this Resolution to the most qualified people. It was absurd to suppose that an ordinary Grand Committee was satisfactory in dealing with special matters relating to Scotch business. Hon. Gentlemen opposite objected to Home Rule, and to this Grand Committee; what did they propose themselves for the purpose of furthering Scotch business? It was notoriously the case that throughout the different constituencies in Scotland hon. Members opposite went about and complained of the inability of the Liberal Government to pass measures. That was the theme that had been harped upon in his own constituency and elsewhere. Was it generous or manly to adopt that course, when every attempt was being made to relieve Parliament of a congestion of business? It was unworthy of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and would not have been done except under stress of Party politics. He had observed the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London; he did not know whether it was intended to destroy or merely to supplement the terms of the Resolution, but the hon. Baronet raised the question whether this Committee would apply to Scotland alone, or whether it was also to be extended to England and Ireland. He would like to know, in the first place, whether it was the case that English Members desired it? If they did not desire it, they surely could not complain if it was not extended to them. If they did desire it, for his part he thought it would be the grossest possible unfairness to refuse it to them. The fact was, that the House was a composite body, representing various countries, and the hon. Baronet was not alone in regarding himself from a cosmopolitan point of view as regarded the constituencies of the United Kingdom; but there were special interests, and Members from Scotland protested against being constantly overridden by a majority of gentlemen who really did not know the circumstances of the case, and who did not listen to the Debates. What they really wanted was not, at the present moment, any interference at all with the constitution of the House, but merely machinery by which, in one stage alone, the business of a particular part of the House, which had been sadly neglected for many years, should be accelerated and put into proper shape. There was authority of a very high order for the proposal the Government had made. The late Sir T. Erskine May, whom many hon. Members would remember, wrote an article in 1854 strongly recommending the Grand Committees, and exposing the great evils which had arisen from the congestion of Parliamentary business. He reprinted in 1881 this most interesting article, with a letter addressed to the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone), in which he said—

Mr. R. T. Reid

"I have long been persuaded that useful results cannot be obtained from the abundance of talents, industry, and public spirit of numerous a body as the House of Commons without a careful division of labour amongst its Members. To this principle I first adverted in 1854, and I have since enforced it on numerous occasions before Committees of Inquiry. Should this principle be carried out, the House would relieve itself from that exhausting pressure of public affairs which tends to impair its credit and efficiency, while its Members, instead of being weighted with tedious Debates and idly some walks through the Division Lobby, would find scope for their special talents in labour more congenial to their tastes, and more conducive to the public good."

Then he quoted a sentence from the late Lord Ossington, saying that what had been most honourable service had become intolerable slavery. That was, he thought, the position of hon. Gentlemen in this House now, who were expected to spend their time in cheering Ministers or ex-Ministers, and in marching through the Lobbies when their own business was pressing, which he regarded as useless and most irksome labour. This was a mere business proposal which was, however, most important to enable them to get their work done. It was not a Constitutional question of any importance at all. [Cries of "Oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen were very sensitive about Constitutional questions—he referred particularly to the Liberal Unionists; but did they remember the readiness with which they offered self-government to Ireland in any form except that of Home Rule—that extreme anxiety for the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament? Scotchmen did not ask for Home Rule at present; they were going to ask for that to-morrow; they only asked now for an amendment of the proceedings in one of the five stages in the House of Commons. But the truth was, any stick was good enough to beat a dog with. The Unionists opposed the proposal because they wished to be able to say at the next General Election that the Liberals were able to do nothing for Scotland. Many Members opposite were, no doubt, sincere in the opposition, but he believed that gentlemen on the Liberal Unionist Bench were cheering with their tongues in their cheeks. They knew very well that the dangers to be apprehended from the proposal were extremely small, and the desire was to stop legislation in order to manufacture not quite candidly a cry throughout the country.

*MR. A. CROSS (Glasgow, Camlachie) said, that there were certain considerations upon which this proposal was based that he, for one, could not pass by as trivial or unimportant. It was said that the business of the House was congested, that the House was overwhelmed with business, and it was also said that Scotch business had been neglected. He did not deny that there was some force in these considerations, but they had been exaggerated. In one sense Parliament had more time, because the great Party controversial questions had been settled, but there were social questions of equal importance to those great controversial questions, and in respect of those questions progress had not been so rapid as he would like to see it. To assist progress, therefore, he did not think the present proposal should be passed by without serious consideration. If he were asked what Scotch business was neglected he should say that it was Private Bills. The proposal had much to recommend it—it would not involve any revolution, or even a General Election, and he was, therefore, not prepared to pass it by without careful consideration. It had been objected to by the Leader of the Opposition, but though he proposed to vote with that right hon. Gentleman he did not take that course for quite the same reasons. It was not so much against the traditional custom of the House as it at first might appear, because at present Scotch business was practically left to the discussion of Scotch Members; at present they practically had as much as they would have under the Regulation they were now discussing. He would remind the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigtonshire that the traditions and customs of the House, as a whole, would not be interfered with, for there would be the introduction stage, the Second and Third Reading and Report stages, on which the House would be able to discuss the subject-matter of Scotch Bills. The most serious objection he had to the proposal was the fact that it was confined entirely to Scotland. It was the essence of his position that the treatment to be accorded to the legislation of the four countries should be the same all round, and he could not assent to any plan which did not place all the countries on the same footing in that respect. He also objected to the proposal on the ground that the Scotch Committee would show a complexion of Parties different from that existing in the whole House, for there would be an overwhelming majority of Gladstonians in it. He also objected to it, because in the present Parliament Scotch Members had not been returned upon any local questions, but upon broad general issues. He did not say that Scotch business was not neglected in the House. He did not justify the Amendment on that ground, or on the ground that the House was overcrowded with business. He did not argue that Scotchmen knew their own business better than other sections of the House. The theory he maintained was that in this House they were not Scotchmen governing Scotchmen, or Englishmen governing Englishmen, but Englishmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen legislating for the United Kingdom. Much legislation had been passed for Scotland with the aid of English votes which had been greatly to the advantage of that country, and which, in some cases, had been far ahead of sentiment in England. He might refer, for example, to the question of Church patronage. Scotland was placed in a satisfactory position in regard to that subject long before English opinion was ripe on the subject. The Law of Hypothec had been abolished in Scotland, whilst the Law of Distress still existed in England. These examples were enough to illustrate his point, although, if necessary, he could adduce many others. He would also point out to the House that English legislation—the legislation which had marked the course of the history of England for 40 or 50 years—had been markedly influenced by the presence in the House of the Scotch element. They had all been individually and collectively associated with that legislation, and it was his belief that the legislation bearing the marks of all sections of Members had been legislation which had greatly benefitted by the process. After giving the matter careful consideration he had been constrained to oppose the Resolution in its present form, in the hope that the matter might again come up in a form that might be acceptable to the majority of the Members of the House, as he believed it would be to the country. It contained the germ of an idea which, properly presented, might take the place of other ideas which had no chance of becoming law, and which, if they did would in their nature involve great perils and dangers to the Empire.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, it would be difficult to overrate the importance of this subject, which so closely affected not only the procedure but also the constitution and policy of the House of Commons. For his part, he would have been glad if the proposal of the Government presented a solution of some of those Parliamentary problems which many hon. Members must feel to be so perplexing, and he should have welcomed any practical alternative to some of those difficult constitutional suggestions which had been made, having for their object the elucidation and, consistently with Imperial feeling, the enforcement of local views and opinions. Personally, he had strong prepossessions in favour both of local government and local legislation. He did not entertain the fears which possessed many on this subject. On the contrary, he thought that much of our lost legislation, and certainly a very large portion of our public liberty, had emanated from that local action of our Municipalities, which was one of the most characteristic features of the history of this country. Under the influence of this feeling some years ago, and before the adoption of the new Parliamentary system of Grand Committees, he proposed, at a meeting of his own Party in the Foreign Office, a resolution in favour of devolution of that character, and he was convinced by experience that what was then needful was much more needful now owing to the great pressure of Parliamentary work, and also that such necessity was one that would probably greatly grow. He might be allowed to say that he practised the principles which he advocated because he had taken part in the administration of the Grand Committees of both Trade and Law. He had taken charge of a Bill through the latter, and when many of his Party thought it their duty to withdraw on the Employers' Liability Bill he had not done so. So he spoke from some experience. The result of that experience had been to convince him that the Standing Committees were useful and successful, and he looked forward almost as a matter of necessity to the development of that class of work in conducting Parliamentary affairs. In fact, he believed it was absolutely necessary for the purpose of transacting Parliamentary business.

Mr. A. Cross

Parliamentary work was not always well done, and it was frequently not done at all; and though the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigton laid some stress on the difficulty of reconciling Party feeling with the procedure of Standing Committees one of the things which recommended those Committees to him was that they generally dealt more with business and with practical details and less with Party politics than marked the House, or the Committees of the House. He also desired to ascertain and give weight to local and even to national feeling in legislation. The basis of good legislation, he thought, was to ascertain what were the national or the local requirements and then to adapt them to legislation in the Imperial Parliament. Therefore, he was of opinion that the system of Standing Committees not merely for Scotland, but for the whole of the United Kingdom, and for the purpose of facilitating the business of the House was absolutely necessary. He was not much overcome by the argument of the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigton, the Members who had served on Grand Committees or Select Committees during the day would be completely exhausted and unfit for further legislative work. The conclusion he drew was that the business at any rate of Private Bills, ought not to be transacted at Westminster at all, but ought to be relegated either to Commissions or to the County Councils, or partly to one and partly to the other, and at a recent meeting of the Chamber of Commerce that view was strongly and widely expressed by unanimous resolutions—supported by all parts and parties of the Irish nation, Belfast, Cork, and Dublin, by Scotland, and by every part of England—in favour of that form of Parliamentary devolution. He thought also that there was something to be said for eliciting national and local feeling through a system of Standing Committees. It might be that such a proposal might at one time have been—indeed, it might be yet—an alternative to more drastic and less Constitutional proposals. He saw that the Attorney General shook his head. Well, the Scotch Home Rule Association had addressed the Members of the House urging that this Motion should be resisted, mainly on the ground that it was antagonistic to the proposal of Home Rule for Scotland. He thought there was a great deal to be said in favour of legislation of this kind being transacted in Grand Committees, because the Grand Committees were subject to the immediate check of the Imperial Parliament: they were able to be controlled by the House if they deviated from their proper lines, and their Bills could be subjected at once to the influence of reason instead of to agitation outside Parliament. Therefore, he was strongly in favour of the greater adoption of the principle of devolution through Standing Committees; and of referring to these Committees Bills, whether relating to England, Scotland, or Ireland, in order that the details might be thoroughly thrashed out and practically dealt with. But to determine otherwise than that Bills referring to all parts of the United Kingdom should be so dealt with indiscriminately would be, as the hon. Member for Dumfries had said, a gross unfairness. If they did it for one part of the United Kingdom they must inevitably and justly do it for all. And at this point arose the practical difficulty of this proposal which, as he had candidly said, commended itself to him in some respects. He very much doubted whether there could be practically a geographical classification of Bills. He would take as an illustration of the difficulty the Scotch Sea Fisheries Bill of last Session. He had personally a very large interest in the fishing industry. He had devoted years to its practical and scientific aspects; but he was bound to say from his experience that that Bill could not be limited to Scotland. It had a more widely reaching effect; it affected the food of the community of all those islands. He had been surprised to hear the brand of herrings referred to in the course of the Debate as a local matter. Why, this question of brand had been the means of either closing or opening up to us the markets of the world. Take the illustration of the Baltimore fisheries in Ireland, in which, owing to a better and more scientific system of curing, the American markets which had been formerly closed were now open to fish from that locality. Surely, then, the brand was a matter of even world-wide interest. Whatever might be said of local fishing industries along the coasts, the seas were unlimited geographically, and English fishing vessels constantly intermixed in Northern Seas with Scotch fishing vessels. Again, in the application of science, which was so essential to the fishing industry, in which such admirable work had been done by the Scotch Fishery Board, who had set a great example to the district fisheries committees in England, it was not a matter limited to Scotland only, but touched the fishing industry of the British Isles. Therefore, there was the greatest difficulty in drawing up a geographical classification of Bills. He granted that the Scotch Fishery Bill had been practically considered in a Scotch Standing Committee. He had been present in the House during the discussion; he had been greatly interested in the discussion; and had not found it Scotch business forbidding as was supposed, but had received a great deal of information. Notwithstanding that, he felt that if he had taken part in the discussion it would have been an intrusion, and practically the subject was limited in discussion to the Scotch Members, though it certainly affected English and Irish fishing interests to a very great degree. He granted, too, that discussion on Scotch Bills had been unduly pushed into corners of the House; many times towards the close of the Session, sometimes between stages of the Appropriation Bill, there had been a Scotch discussion, and too frequently the House had been deserted except by Scotch Members, though the Bills under discussion affected the commercial and even the political arrangements of the whole of the United Kingdom. In the able speech of the Leader of the Opposition there was one consideration urged which should at least make them think before they too readily adopted this proposal, and that was the tendency it might have to emphasise separate national considerations. He had been sorry to hear the other day, and he was sure they all had been sorry to hear, an expression like that of "predominant partner." The very basis of the continuity of a United Kingdom was the principle of equality; and if they were to establish a Scotch Grand Committee to look after Scotch business, a claim would irresistibly be made on the part of England for a like privilege and advantage, so that, in order to cope with this difficulty of the moment, they might bring forward antagonistic interests, which it should be their duty to suppress. Besides that, they would have the difficulty of reconciling this deviation with the system of Party government, which, for good or evil, had been set up in this country. Therefore, from these observations, he drew the conclusion that the very best measure of this character that could be proposed to the House was a plan applicable to each division of the United Kingdom. He refused, if he could help it, to make any new departure in favour of one portion of the United Kingdom, to the comparative disadvantage, or even the appearance of comparative disadvantage, of another. He had learned a lesson in that respect from Irish local government—a lesson which he recalled with very great regret. Ireland was told—and the co-operation of Irish Members was obtained on the faith of the promise—that as soon as England had been provided with local government, Scotland and Ireland should follow. The words that were used from the Conservative Treasury Bench on the subject—words which he had constantly reiterated on public platforms with approval—were “simultaneity and similarity”; but though England had received local Government in its fulness, though Scotland had received it in part, and it was now proposed to give it to her completely in the present Session, yet Ireland, where the existing system of local government could not be defended, had been kept at a constitutional disadvantage compared with other parts of the United Kingdom. Believing, as he did, that in treating with our various nationalities the only possible standing-ground was the standing-ground of equality, he thought that to make any new departure in favour of one branch which might possibly be resented by the other branches was a mistake, except it formed part of one consistent and complete plan, and it would lead to greater disadvantages than those which now undoubtedly existed in relation to Scotch business in the House. Those were reasons that influenced him to vote against the proposal of the Government, in which, as he had explained, he saw some good. The proposal was not a complete solution of the difficulty, but it might be, notwithstanding, some solution of the existing evils. On the other hand, he was convinced that in its present form it contained elements of danger and would lead to considerable disadvantages. If hereafter some joint, equal, and consistent plan of the character he had sketched, based on national feeling, and giving national machinery to work out, should be proposed, then, if it did not impair the relations between the different branches of the United Kingdom, if gave facilities for the transaction of Parliamentary business, for which there was so much need, and was conducive to useful legislation, it would have from him at any time, and from whatever quarter or Party it came, the most ready consideration and such support as he could possibly give to it.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanarkshire N.E.) said, the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken gave in the early portion of his speech extremely strong arguments in favour of the Motion before the House; but later on the hon. Gentleman adduced various considerations which would lead him to vote against the Motion. It was the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's speech which induced him to offer a few observations on the Motion which he had not otherwise intended to do. The hon. Gentleman had said he was in favour of devolution in the particular form of Grand Committees, but dissented from the present application of the principle, because it was not possible to proceed on geographical lines. He ventured to differ from the hon. Gentleman in the observation. He insisted that geographical classification of Bills was possible, and that in the case of Scotland it was desirable, because the laws and local institutions of Scotland were totally different from those of England; and accordingly to deal with Scotch legislation in detail—that was, in Committee—Members should be conversant with the laws and institutions of Scotland. That was a very good reason for a geographical derivation. The hon. Gentleman referred to the expression which was used by the Prime Minister about the “predominant partner,” and said it was an expression which they all regretted. He certainly did not regret the use of the phrase referring to the “predominant partner.” It was an expression which he entirely endorsed. The reason why a Committee for Scotch affairs was necessary was because England was the predominant partner. It was mere cant to deny that she is so. How was she the “predominant partner?” In votes. As the French said, “Victory is given to big battalions,” and accordingly the time of the House was allotted to those who had an enormous preponderance in votes, the others being squeezed out. That was the reason why they had to complain of the preponderance of the great partner—it was not because of any ill will exhibited towards Scotland by the English Members. The Scotch Members co-operated with the English Members in the most cordial manner, but they found that the result was one arrived at on arithmetical principles. Where there were six or seven Members to one, the latter got proportionately only about one-seventh part of the time. The time at the disposal of the House was not sufficient for its present business, and that practically meant that Scotch business was squeezed out altogether. Doubtless, no one could shut his eyes to the fact to what was candidly stated by the Secretary for Scotland in moving his Motion—namely, that the Motion proposed to a certain extent what was an anomaly—that was to say, it proposed to establish a Standing Committee for Scotch business, but did not propose to set up similar Committees for English and Irish business. So far as Ireland was concerned, it stood on a very different footing to Scotland. But so far as England was concerned he would ask the House and the country to look at this question in a practical manner. If the proposal were likely to damage the English Members of the House in the smallest degree it could not possibly be carried, and, indeed, would not have been proposed. It could not, however, damage the English Members. No one could say that it would reduce their chances of getting their business transacted. When the Members from one part of the Kingdom were in the proportion of six or seven to one in regard to those from another part of the Kingdom, whereas the larger body could out-vote and impose their will upon the smaller body, whether these liked it or not, the reverse process was not possible. The English Members had nothing to fear from the influence of the Scotch Members. No instance could be adduced in which English opinion had been out-voted by the force of Scottish votes. He, therefore, asked the House to treat this as a practical matter. While the Scotch Members asked for it, and claimed it as a necessary means of getting their work done, he would even on a separate ground ask the House to assent to the Motion—namely, as a further step in the process of devolution, and as a practical experiment which could be taken without risk to any section of the House.

*SIR M. J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright) said, he could have wished that the precedent set by the late First Lord of the Treasury had not been followed on this occasion—namely, that of bringing on very important Scotch matters on a Monday—on what was practically the opening day after the Easter Recess. It was rather hard to expect all Scotch Members to be in their places early on Monday afternoon. He himself had been unfortunate enough not to have heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland. Therefore, he spoke under some disadvantage, not having heard the initial part of the Debate. But there were questions connected with the proposed Grand Committee which must strike an humble Member like himself as being most important to be thoroughly considered in the House before being passed. In the first place, he could not see what real object was to be gained by carrying on the Grand Committee. Speaking from a Unionist point of view, in this Parliament there would be, with the addition of the 15 English Members to be added to the Committee, a majority of 57 against 30, and discussion would, therefore, proceed in Grand Committee on a Party basis. Downstairs in the House they were, however, able to take a less partisan view. The Government must not imagine that they had got the whole mind of Scotland in their favour because their supporters were pledged up to the hilt to vote in certain directions. The minority were not so pledged, and upstairs, in this proposed Grand Committee, they would have little chance of shaping matters in the way they desired. The result would be that there would be in the House longer Debates on Report and Third Reading stages. There would, therefore, be no economy of time effected. He had been a Member of the House for some years, and his experience had been that when it was sought to curtail discussion by methods which were not considered fair, discussion was not curtailed, but extended, for they derived less advantage from the views of gentlemen whose minds were unprejudiced. If the Resolution were carried, he predicted that instead of their having amicable relations upstairs, there would oftentimes be extreme bitterness, and that was not the way to provide for good legislation on any given subject. It was said that the law of Scotland was so essentially different from that of England that it was almost impossible to explain it and carry measures in the House where they had so little room for discussion. But whose fault was it that they had so little room for discussion in the House? The Scotch Members opposite practically controlled the Government, and if they insisted they could get Scotch business taken; but they preferred to sit mute and acquiesce in whatever the Front Bench chose to propose. Then they came down and said, "We want all the Scotch Members to discuss Scotch measures upstairs." That was not what Scotch Members came to this Imperial Parliament to do. They came here because they were still a United Parliament, and were determined to discuss from an Imperial point of view all measures brought before them. They dreaded anything which would prevent that discussion. Though they might be told that that opportunity would still be afforded them on the floor of the House, his reply was that the discussion to which he referred should take place on initial stages of measures before men's minds were prejudiced. In the Committee Room upstairs men's minds would be fixed upon the carrying out of a certain policy as defined at the polls. It was before the minds of the majority were fixed that it was desirable to endeavour to persuade them to take the right view before they gave their casting vote. The hon. Member who had just spoken referred to the French saying that "victory was given to big battalions"; then why did not the big battalions of Scotch Members sitting behind the Government insist on victory on the floor of the House? Why were they afraid to meet their opponents in the open? Why did they want to go upstairs to a Committee Room? Did they really expect that the Unionist Members were going to fall into this trap? Did they think they were going into a Grand Committee Room to be out-voted upon every question? Were they, for instance, going to consent to a measure for Scotch Disestablishment being discussed in the Grand Committee which the Motion proposed to establish without the country having a chance to express an opinion upon it? The votes of English Members were overridden every day by the Scotch Members behind the Government. The latter overruled, for example, almost every important vote that was given by English Members upon the Parish Councils Bill and the Employers' Liability Bill. They followed their Leaders; but now they turned round and insisted on having it their own way in Scotch legislation as well. The Amendment of the Member for the City of London was more to the point than the proposal of the Government. If they were to be treated in this way in Scotland, England should be treated similarly; also Ireland. To single out Scotland for exceptional treatment would not expedite business, nor would it be for the good of the country. The proposal would be most unfair for the House, for the country, and for the Government. The Front Bench men would have to attend to business in the House and be absent, so the Grand Committee would suffer. If, on the other hand, they stuck to their duties in Committee, would not Imperial interests suffer? He could not see that any considerable amount of time would be gained by its adoption. It would be opposed to the spirit of our Constitution, while the amount of bitterness which would be engendered in the Committee Room upstairs was not likely to facilitate business there, nor smooth the course of legislation. On these grounds he should record his protest by opposing the Resolution, and he trusted that all Scotch Members who loved their country and wished to see its interests advanced would do the same.

*SIR J. LENG (Dundee) said, the hon. Baronet who had just spoken had drawn a very gloomy picture of the results of the discussion and consideration of Scotch business by the Members for Scotland. In this he followed the hon. Member for Wigton, who seemed to think it should be a matter for complaint that there should be so many as 72 gentlemen whom he designated as experts on Scotch questions. In the appointment of Members to the Stand-

g Committee on Trade, and also to the Standing Committee on Law, it had always been understood that the gentlemen were selected on account of their knowledge of trade, or legal questions; at all events, the predominating number of the Members of such Committees were placed on them, because they were considered specially qualified to deal with these questions, and it certainly seemed remarkable that the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigton should be so much that was objectionable in referring questions to be considered by Members who specially understood them. In the course of the Debate reference had been made to the great differences there were, not only in the laws of Scotland, but in the legal phraseology and in the customs and habits of the country. Well, Scotch Members should be, and no doubt generally were, specially versed in these differences, and able to deal with them. The hon. Baronet who had just spoken had also referred to the mischief likely to arise from these discussions on Scotch Bills upstairs. One of the great complaints on the Liberal side of the House was that they might introduce Bills year after year, but never have an opportunity of having them discussed. He was a comparatively new Member of the House, but he had brought in a Bill now for four successive Sessions. His misfortune in the Ballot was such that he had never been able to obtain a day when there was the least likelihood of the Bill coming on for discussion. He would just refer for a moment to the history of that Bill. It was one which proposed to abolish grocers' licences in Scotland. Years ago, between the '70's and the '80's, great complaint was made on the subject, and in the year 1878 a Royal Commission was appointed when the Party opposite was in power, with the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Ferguson) as its Chairman. It made a very full and minute inquiry, and a more able Report could not have been made than that which was drawn up by the Chairman, but from 1878 to 1890 no steps whatever were taken to carry out the recommendations made in that Report. He brought in a Bill largely with that purpose. There were two alternative proposals—one to abolish the licence entirely, and the other to carry out simpliciter the recommendations of the Commission. This was the fifth year in which the Bill had been before the House, and there was not the least chance of it being brought on for discussion, hence his desire that some facility should be given for the discussion of such measures. They had heard a great deal about immemorial usage and ancient traditions, but he feared that other meanings were likely to be given to these phrases. They were in danger of drifting into immemorial uselessness, and, instead of perpetual talking about ancient traditions, he should like to see more of the modern transaction of business in a businesslike way. This continual talk, talk, talking, accomplishing nothing, was beginning to excite a strong feeling on the part of many of their constituents. They had heard that this was a new departure. Well, they needed a great many new departures. Times had changed, and the House must change with them. It must adapt itself to the changed circumstances in which they were placed. He was glad to observe that the noble Lord now at the head of the Government, referring to the phrase which had been frequently used with regard to another House, that the time had come when it must either be ended or mended, said that that phrase had its application to the House of Commons as well, and it was true. There were many things in the House that needed to be ended. They must set themselves to ending some things and mending many others. At present the forces of obstruction were allowed much freer play in that House, owing to its ancient Rules and Regulations, than were the forces of construction. They needed more constructive ability, and less of this perpetual obstruction of every useful proposal. He had referred to one measure. There were many others. He would only name one. The people of Scotland throughout the length and breadth of the land had been interested for years in an amendment of the law with regard to rights of way, and Bills for amending the law had been before the House for the last dozen years. Just as an illustration of how much talk they had had, and how little work they had accomplished, he mentioned that in the last Session 49 Scotch Bills were introduced—not a few of them by Members on the other side of the House. Out of the 49, 41 were dropped or withdrawn, and only eight received the Royal Assent. He was not so foolish as to say that the whole of the 41 were measures that ought to be passed, but he did say that there were amongst the Bills which were obstructed and with which no progress could be made a considerable number which, if they could have been referred to a Committee consisting mainly of Scotch Members, would have been passed to the advantage of the country. The time had come when a change should be made. They were continually told that proposals of this kind were calculated to affect the useful character of the Imperial Parliament. The greater number of the measures to which he referred were measures many of them of purely Scottish interest, some of them of comparatively local interest, the dealing with which outside the House would leave the House much more time for the consideration and discussion of great Imperial questions. The true way to aggrandise the Imperial character of Parliament was to devolve upon Committees or local Legislatures those sectional measures which only affected one part of the country. He hoped that they would really look to the transaction of business, and that they would have less and less talk and less and less obstruction. For that reason he would support this experimental proposal. Let them try it, and see whether it was not an improvement on the present state of things. His own belief was that it would be greatly to their advantage, and for that reason he would support the Motion.

MR. COCHRANE said, that the intricacies of Scottish law had been referred to, and it had been stated that one of the advantages of the proposed Committee would be that hon. Members who composed it would be conversant with these intricacies. Well, he himself had had a great deal to do with Scottish law, to the great advantage of the Legal Profession in that country. But as a Scotchman, and as representing a Scottish constituency, and as one who had had this opportunity of which he spoke, he could not pretend to a knowledge of any branch of Scottish law. Therefore, if this Grand Committee was to be composed of Members who had any knowledge of Scottish law it would become necessary for the hon. Baronet to move an Amendment that there should be a technical examination to qualify Members before they could be permitted to take part in it. Once or twice reference had been made to the Scotch Fisheries Bill. It had been suggested that that Bill was an illustration of a Scotch measure which might be submitted with advantage to a Grand Committee. He was not prepared to dispute that, but he did not see why such a measure could not have been submitted to one of the ordinary Standing Committees. It had been said very justly that that Bill did not receive the amount of discussion when it came up for Second Reading to which a Bill of that importance was entitled. He quite agreed with that. The Bill came up at a late hour in the evening, and many Members who were interested in it would have liked to have had an opportunity for more discussion upon it. The remark which was made to him in the Lobby outside the House was, that if he agreed with the principle of the Bill it was not necessary to discuss it, as the details had been thoroughly considered by the Government; but he thought they were all astonished that these remarks should have been made by the hon. Members who supported the Bill, when they found that the measure when it came to be discussed in another place was full of the most absurd and ridiculous provisions. He thought this Bill might quite as well have been discussed in an ordinary Standing Committee, and that any advantage which would have been derived from this Grand Committee would have been just as well derived from an ordinary Committee of the House. They had been told, and he believed properly so, that no Member could possibly attend the meetings of this Grand Committee and at the same time look after his business in the House of Commons. As a Scotch Member he protested against the making of such a fundamental change in their duties as would practically take place if the Scotch Members were relegated to the Scotch Grand Committee. The Scotch Members were in that House to deal not only with Scotch matters, but with English and Irish and Scotch questions. They were not sent there merely to deal with Scotch parochial matters, or with a Scotch question by themselves, but were entitled to be assisted by other intellects in the House, coming from every quarter.

Sir J. Leng

of the United Kingdom. He did not believe they had any mandate from their constituents to remove their affairs from the cognisance of the House and to take them to a Committee Room. It was an extraordinary Committee that was proposed under this Resolution. It was not in any sense a Committee such as they had seen before in that House. It was not a reflex of the opinion of that House; it was, in fact, neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor good red herring. The Scotch Members would not have the entire control of the Committee; but 15 Englishmen, or Welshmen, or Irishmen, were to be put in to see, he supposed, that they did not misbehave themselves in Committee Room 15. Some speakers had said that these 15 Members would have but little influence upon their deliberations and Debates; but it had been said, also, that there were a great many questions upon which the Scotch Members would not be divided in the Grand Committee as in that House; but if they were very nearly divided, was it not a monstrous thing that these 15 other Members should be brought in to decide their questions? If they were to have a kind of Home Rule, let them have Home Rule, and not a kind of watered down Home Rule under which their opinions were to be set at nought by a small packed body of English, Welsh, and Irish Members. Another point which had been alluded to, and one which ought to weigh a great deal with them, was that if these Grand Committees were set up they would lose the support, and advice, and opinion of those who were most qualified to assist them in their deliberations. In the Cabinet there were some of the ablest of the Scottish Representatives, and there was no doubt they would not be able to give to the Standing Committee that attention which they were now able to give to Scottish affairs. The Grand Committee would be sitting at hours which would be inconvenient for them—say, from 12 to 4—when Ministers would be busy in their Offices, and they must either neglect business at their Offices or the work of the Grand Committee. They would not only lose the advice and assistance of these gentlemen, but of the Scottish Members representing English constituencies—the Leader of the Opposition, and many others who were as fully qualified to deal with these matters as Scotch Representatives themselves. Then there was the question of the influence exercised by Scotch Members upon Imperial matters. There was no doubt that they exercised a great deal of influence, and, he hoped, in the right direction, but they would be withdrawn from much of that if they were to be sent into this Grand Committee. He believed there was a stronger Liberal feeling in Scotland than in England, even among the Unionists, and that their votes upon English questions had had a good effect, such as in the case of the Parish Councils Bill, where votes were given by Scottish Members upon a matter of principle. This was a great privilege that Scotland possessed, and one which ought not to be taken away from it. No doubt if they went away the English Members would say they were glad to get rid of them, and ask why they should take an active part in English affairs at all. Why the number of 15 English Members was selected it seemed difficult to account for. The Secretary for Scotland never gave them any reasons why he selected 15 in preference to any other number, and he thought they were entitled to some explanation from him. As to the measures being principally for the relief of Scotland, it was difficult to see how they could determine that certain measures should only refer to Scotland. They might have a Registration Bill before the Committee, and they might have an Amendment moved extending the suffrage to females. They might say that it only affected Scotland directly, but it would indirectly affect the policy of the whole country. He did not see how the fact that they were going to deal with Scottish affairs in this Grand Committee would place more time at the disposal of the English Members. They were told by the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries that only one-fifth of the Scotch Bills would be dealt with by the Standing Committee. If four-fifths of the time was still to be occupied in the House very little would be gained. It was his opinion that if the Secretary for Scotland had approached the Government, backed up as he would have been by 72 Scottish Members, all anxious to pass measures of a non-contentious character, that he would get more attention from the Cabinet than at the present time, and that they would accomplish their business more satisfactorily than under this proposal for a Grand Committee.

MR. J. WILSON (Govan) said, that if they were to have a mandate from their constituents for everything done in that House they would never be done with matters, and he thought the less they heard about mandates from their constituents the better. They were sent there by their constituents to do the best they could, and to lend their minds to the consideration of the subjects that came before them in the best interests of the country. The Member for Kirkcudbright twitted them that, now that they had a Liberal Government in power, they did not trust that Government. He (Mr. Wilson) was reminded that the Member for the College Division (Sir C. Cameron) had had on the Paper for the last seven or eight years a Bill that had passed the Second Reading in this House, for the purpose of the early closing of public-houses. Such a Bill was passed in this House, but the other House took out of the Bill all towns above 50,000 inhabitants. His hon. Friend had endeavoured year after year to get his Bill passed, and every Municipality had petitioned in favour of the Bill; but this House, so far as the Opposition were concerned, had turned a deaf ear to these representations. So long as Scottish Members were there they ought to be allowed to pass their own social legislation. He hoped that, whatever was done, the House would see the propriety of giving something to the Scottish Members. He hoped their backbones would always stiffen, and, if the House did not give them what they wanted, that they would go a step further, and, like their Irish friends, maintain that they must settle their own affairs in their own country. His constituents and the great body of the people of Scotland said that the Scottish Members were not carrying out the purpose for which they were sent there, because there had been no legislation for Scotland worth speaking of.

*MR. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrew's, &c.) said, it appeared to him that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid) was guilty of something like misrepresentation when he charged those who sat in that quarter of the House with performing at one time the difficult physical function of cheering with their tongues in their cheeks, as opposing measures of this kind in order that they might, from insidious motives, be enabled at some later period to quash the neglect of Scottish business against the Government of the day. He entirely disclaimed any such intention in opposition to the Resolution of the Secretary for Scotland, and he did not think it lay in the mouth of his hon. and learned Friend to charge those who took the course that he did on the Sea Fisheries Regulation Bill of last year—a course acknowledged by the Secretary for Scotland as being one of great forbearance—it did not lie with the hon. and learned Member to make unfounded and unwarrantable a charge against them. It appeared that most of his hon. Friends representing Scottish constituencies, and especially those of the north, who, with some lack of enthusiasm, had supported this heroic remedy, entirely ignored the magnitude of the Constitutional change which was proposed by the Resolution. It seemed most anomalous that that Resolution should have been advocated, in the first place, by the present Secretary for Scotland, and, in the second place, by the right hon. Baron the Member for East Denbighshire, both of whom were Members of the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, which was responsible for the initiation of the principle of devolution to Standing Committees. In the Debate which followed upon the Resolution of the late Prime Minister, in 1882, Sir Richard Cross challenged the Prime Minister as to whether he meant that his system should apply to measures relating to parts of the United Kingdom such as was now proposed by the Secretary for Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian interrupting Sir R. Cross, said with some vehemence—

Mr. Cochrane

“I never used such an expression, or intimated such an idea, that Scotland should be allowed to discuss its affairs by itself.”

Later on, in reply to another interruption the right hon. Gentleman said it would be absurd to make any connection between these local matters and the Grand Committees. He (Mr. Anstruther), therefore, understood that the Grand Committees were advocated, in the first place, to devolve upon a section of the Members of the House the duty of considering in detail measures which were non-contentious.

tious, and which, it might be fairly expected, would be dealt with solely with reference to their merits, and, in the second place, that these measures should be general in their application, although special in their character. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), in the course of the Debate on the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, said he would advocate the division of the whole House into panels, on the condition that each should be a perfectly true miniature of the House itself. Did the Resolution of the Secretary for Scotland comply with any of these three conditions which had been universally accepted? The Secretary for Scotland had not mentioned, with the exception of the Local Government Bill, what were the measures which it was the intention of the Government to refer to the Standing Committee of Scottish Members. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was entirely at variance with the principles laid down by the late Prime Minister, and they had very high authority for condemning a proposal which should compel the Members for any Division of the United Kingdom to sit upon a Grand Committee by themselves. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dumfries had quoted the authority of Sir Erskine May; but he should be very much surprised to find that Sir Erskine May ever advocated a proposal which vitiated in three essentials the principles upon which Standing Committees had always been advocated and appointed. The late Mr. Forster, in 1882, only gave his consent to the Resolution of the Government on the understanding that the constitution of the Grand Committee should be fairly representative of the House. Was the Grand Committee proposed by the Secretary for Scotland a fair Committee? If this proposal of the right hon. Gentleman had been in operation in the last Parliament, they would have had a Committee consisting of 38 supporters and 49 opponents of the Government; while a fair constitution of such a Committee on the lines laid down for Grand Committees would have given the Government a majority of 15. Was this a fair Committee? He submitted to the House that the plan now proposed by the Government was not a fair one. But the right hon. Gentleman had gone further. It so happened that this Parliament was most favourable to the proposed plan, and it had a semblance of fairness about it. In the last Parliament the balance of the Parties in the House presented a somewhat different aspect than they did now, for the majority of the Scotch Members who would then have voted for the proposal would have been 14. The majority for the Government at the General Election of 1886 was 118 (394 against 277), the Scotch Members being 43 against 29, a majority of 14 against the Government of the day. If this remedy which the right hon. Gentleman expected to work so smoothly and from which he anticipated so little friction had been adopted in the last Parliament, the Scotch Committee would have consisted of 38 Members supporting the Government and 49 against—a majority of 11 against the Government, while the fair constitution under the Rules of the House (Standing Order 48) of the Grand Committee in 1887 would have been a majority of 15 in favour of the Government, so that the difference in reality would have been 26 in the whole. They had a still further means of testing how the principles proposed to be adopted by the Government were likely to prove fair in their application. Lord Rosebery had, in forecasting what the next Parliament would be, anticipated that he would have 385 supporters against 285 of the Opposition, and that the Scotch Members would be divided in the proportion of 62 to 10. According to that forecast there would be a difference of no less than 42 votes between the constitution of the Scotch Grand Committee, and a Grand Committee appointed under the present Standing Order. He thought he had shown conclusively that the proposal of the right hon. Baronet had not fulfilled the three main conditions under which Standing Committees had been on former occasions sanctioned by this House. They had been told that the proposal would commend itself to hon. Members on several grounds. It was said that there was no time given for the proper discussion of Scotch business. So far as his experience had gone during the time he had had the honour of sitting in the House, he had noticed that whenever Scotch Members had really a bonâ fide reform to bring forward they were met by the greatest consideration, and every facility for fully discussing the Bill was given them. When, on the other hand, the measure put forward was merely a "log-rolling" affair, the Scotch Members competing with a number of other sections, the Government very justly and properly ignored it. In the last Parliament the Scotch Members supporting the Government represented a proportion of one-thirteenth of the whole Party; the proportion was in the present Session one-seventh, so that if they were unable now to induce the Government to give adequate time to the consideration of Scotch business, he could only say that either their influence or their importunity varied in an inverse ratio to their numbers. They had been told that evening with considerable hardihood by the hon. Member for South Edinburgh—who certainly had spoken with very considerable authority on Scotch matters—that he had been elected to represent a Scotch burgh for Scotch considerations first and Imperial considerations afterwards. He had seen also that another Englishman and Scotch Member, the Home Secretary, had thought it worth his while to go down to Berwickshire to influence Scottish affairs. It was noticeable that in his speech at Duns he referred to the fact that he had no local connection with the county he represented. He made no charge against the right hon. Gentleman, and was quite willing to agree that for the purposes of representing the political views of the majority of East Fife on Imperial questions the right hon. Gentleman's opinion and vote was not only as good as any other man's, but better than many might be. But how did that square with the argument that the Scottish Members were specially qualified by the fact of representing Scottish constituencies to deal with the details of Scottish business? For example, what had he as a constituent of the Home Secretary to thank the right hon. Gentleman for since the Election of 1892? There had been sent him a pamphlet containing reports of two speeches delivered by the right hon. Gentleman in the constituency between 6 p.m. on one Friday in October last and 11 p.m. on the following night, with a note regretting that the official duties of the right hon. Gentleman prevented him from visiting other portions of the division of East Fife which he had the honour of representing in Parliament, and presenting his constituents with copies of his speeches. It was almost surprising he had not added "price 1d." He made no charge whatever against the right hon. Gentleman, nor did he allege that he was disqualified for that reason to represent the political opinions of the majority of the electors of East Fife in the Imperial Parliament; but such a position of affairs destroyed the argument that the Scottish Members elected as at present had special qualifications for dealing in a Standing Committee with the details of Scottish business. One other consideration only had been put forward in support of the proposal. It was urged that the decision of such a body would come before the House when Bills came back from the Grand Committee backed by such authority that they would at once be endorsed without a word of comment or criticism. If that were the case, then there was no necessity for the proposed devolution; but however, it was not the case, the minority of the Committee holding strong opinions might choose to raise the whole issue in the House upon the Report stage, perhaps overruling the decision of the Committee and leading to greater delay not only in reference to Scotch measures, but in the general business of the House, than the right hon. Gentleman seemed to anticipate. He was opposed to the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman wished to thrust upon them, because he believed that it fundamentally touched the principles upon which any system of devolution had hitherto been advocated. It would be really forced upon them by a majority who did not pretend to have any interest in Scotch affairs, which they would rather prefer to manage for themselves in Scotland. If that should be necessary they would prefer to work under the ægis of St. Andrew, and not to have St. George wandering across the Border to interfere with them when they were perfectly competent to take care of themselves. If they were to shift for themselves under their own national emblem they should not be asked to provide political provender for others as well. The right hon. Gentleman might search to the bottom every system of devolution, and he would find that so far from conducing to the smooth conduct of Scottish business, this proposal would lead to greater friction and to even greater delay than that which the Scottish Members had now so much reason to deplore.

Mr. Anstruther

SIR J. CARMICHAEL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) said, he would make no comments upon the speech of the hon. Member for St. Andrews, but would say at once that he would vote for the proposal of his right hon. Friend with unalloyed satisfaction. He had listened carefully to the Debate, and there was no single result anticipated from this proposal by any hon. Member on either side which he should not embrace with gratification. The Leader of the Opposition said that the proposal would revolutionise the procedure of the House of Commons. As far as Scotch business was concerned, that was a consummation devoutly to be wished, and if the necessary consequence of the Motion must be that a similar Committee should be granted to England, he was prepared to accept that result. The sooner their procedure was revolutionised the better. But they were told in the same breath that England would turn and refuse the boon of an English Grand Committee for English measures.

SIR A. ROLLIT: Who said so?

SIR J. CARMICHAEL said, they had been told that it would be regarded as a most pernicious measure. He could understand that position, because English Members were in so large a majority that they already could be sure of controlling their own business if they felt strongly on any subject; but it would be rather acting like the dog-in-the-manger to refuse what was asked by the majority of Scotch Members on the ground that they did not want it themselves. The hon. Member for Central Leeds pointed out that if these Committees were established no Unionist Government would ever be able to legislate for Scotland, and no Radical Government could ever legislate for England, because in both cases the measures would be mutilated in the Grand Committee. That argument involved an admission that legislation was now forced on Scotland and England against the wishes of those countries, and surely it would be better that each country should wait for a sympathetic Government to legislate for it than to continue the present system. The House was also told that this Grand Committee was only the half-way house to Home Rule. If that were the case, again he would hail the result with great gratification. He would give his vote now in favour of Scotch Members managing their own business, and to-morrow for their managing it in Scotland. Home Rule was, no doubt, looked upon by their Unionist Members with no great favour as being a disintegration of the Empire, but that fear reminded him very much of what happened in the days of Eli, who used to tremble for the ark of God.

*MR. A. G. MURRAY (Buteshire) said, it had been suggested that this Motion was constituted on the same lines as the Standing Committee which were provided for under Standing Order, No. 47, but he denied that there was any resemblance in the proposal of the Government to a Standing Committee as hitherto understood. It differed from them in three essential particulars. The principle now proposed was one of nationality, and the Committee was not kept primarily for non-contentious matters. Further, the Committee would not be like previous Committees with which they were acquainted. Again, unlike every other Committee, Grand or otherwise, with which they had been hitherto acquainted, it would not be in its composition like the rest of the House, divided between the Parties in the same proportion as in the House. Further than that, there was the point that this Committee was to apply to Scotland alone, and that so far as the intentions of the Government had been indicated there were not to be similar Committees for either England, Wales, or Scotland. That point had, however, been very admirably dealt with by the hon. Member for St. Andrews. He wished to call attention to the extraordinary proceeding of the Government in the conduct of the Debate. The Leader of the Opposition at a very early period of the Debate called attention to several very important principles which were violated by the proposal of the Government, and showed that, either by accident or design, the right hon. Gentleman who proposed the Motion kept out of view entirely the great Parliamentary change which it entailed and the far-reaching effect which would flow from that change. That speech of his right hon. Friend was delivered at 5 o'clock, and having listened to every speech since delivered, he had no hesitation in saying that there had not in the interval been the faintest shadow of an attempt to answer any one of the arguments of his right hon. Friend. He thought that the cat had been let out of the bag by the hon. Member for

Dumfries, when he said that the proposal originated, not in the views of the Government, but in the fact that the Scotch Members had been for some time making themselves somewhat unpleasant. Although they had a Cabinet bristling with Scotchmen, they had seen few of them that night. They had had a few transient visits from the Secretary for War, but where was the Leader of the House? He was, perhaps, closeted with his convictions and sympathies which in a gentleman like him, with his respect for Parliamentary traditions, were far away indeed from the Motion before the House. The points made with such clearness by the Leader of the Opposition were, first, that the Members of Scotch constituencies were not specially qualified above all other Members to deal with the details of Scotch measures, because they were elected not upon local but upon Imperial considerations; secondly, that the point of demarcation between measures was more often one between burgh and county rather than between England and Scotland; thirdly, that the definition of a purely Scotch question was impossible; fourthly, that the effect of passing this measure would be that you would inflict an insult upon England if you denied a similar measure to her; and, finally, that it would become quite impossible to carry on Government on the true and old Party lines, unless they had by accident that which they never had had—a general majority in Parliament represented by a majority of each of the four nations. He ventured to assert, without fear of contradiction, that these arguments of the Leader of the Opposition had been left unanswered. The Member for South Edinburgh, who was eminently qualified to give an answer, if it could be given, had only shown that the case for the Government was poor indeed. He had suggested the possibility of the Government being out-voted, and of finding himself fighting alongside the hon. Member for East Lanarkshire, but the picture of the Ethiopian changing his skin and the leopard its spots would only apply where they were dealing with measures which were truly non-contentious. His very argument was destructive of the proposition of the general plan. The only other argument he advanced was that they ought not to deal with the question of proportion, as that was an arithmetical fallacy. A majority was a majority, and it did not matter whether it was proportionately large or small. He doubted the hon. Member for Merionethshire would have subscribed to that theory the previous Tuesday week. They had had a speech from the Member for East Denbighshire, who, referring to the Gaelic and Welsh tongues, talked about the brogue of Burns. He would like say in reference to that—although he feared the observation might fall flat that they might depend upon it that if Burns had a brogue, he wore it on his foot and not upon his tongue. The only argument that had been advanced on the Government side that night was that Scotch legislation in the past had not gone on so quickly as could have been desired, and that, therefore, a Grand Committee was necessary. But if quickness alone was desired, why have a Committee at all? Why not appoint a Committee of five of the Government's own supporters, or why not settle the business at a caucus at Dover House? The mere question of quickness did not grapple with the difficulties put forward by his right hon. Friend. He had pointed out that it was not proposed to form a similar Committee for England, but he would point out how English opinion had been borne down by Scotch opinion. The Secretary for Scotland said that a proper subject for consideration of the Grand Committee would be the Local Government Bill for Scotland. They had had the English Parish Councils Bill last Session, and he supposed that everybody would agree that one of the crucial points in Committee on that Bill was the Amendment of the hon. Member for Rugby. He had analysed the first Division on that Amendment, and he found that, whereas the Government had a majority of 46, if they deducted the Scotch and Irish Members from both sides, the Government would have been placed in a minority of 10. No doubt some hon. Members had had the courage of their opinions. The hon. Member for Dumfries had told them that he was willing, if necessary, to vote for equal treatment to England. But what did the Government say? The Government knew perfectly well that if they granted such a Committee for England the conduct of business in that House would, as the Leader of the Opposition had pointed out, be impossible. Then, as to the argument that Scotch Members were specially qualified to deal with Scotch matters, he ventured to suggest that on legal questions the number so qualified would be very few. It was supposed that the House at large would have some control over Scotch measures, because under this proposal it would be master of the Second Reading stage. The Secretary for Scotland said he could not understand any apprehensions of direct interference by the Scotch Grand Committee with any English points or English principles. Direct interference! No. But surely he must know that there was an indirect action—that where a measure was passed for one country it was likely to repeat itself in another. The right hon. Gentleman convicted himself even on this point out of his own mouth, because he said there was a debt due to Scotland, and that debt was a Parish Councils Bill. Why? Because they had passed an English Parish Councils Bill. Whenever legislation embodying new principles were successfully passed for one Kingdom, sooner or later it would, he ventured to assert, have an influence on the other. England obtained free education sooner than it would otherwise have done simply because Scotland got it a year or so before. He could point to countless instances where the really important principle of a measure was raised in Committee and not on the Second Reading. For instance, important as were the principles raised on the Second Reading of the Home Rule Bill, he ventured to say that far more important points were raised in Committee on that Bill. That was proved by the very title of the Bill itself. It was not even called the Home Rule Bill; it was called “a Bill to amend the Provisions of the Government of Ireland,” and that might have meant anything. The really important points involving changes of Constitutional law were raised in Committee. He might mention other instances. There was the dissociation of taxation and representation, which would be involved in some Bills to come before them, but that point would have to be raised in Committee, especially in connection with the Registration Bills. The same applied to questions of the incidence of taxation as regarded real and personal property. Let them take this year’s Bills. He found that there were altogether 11 Scotch Bills, and out of these he could find only one, or at most two, which did not seem to raise a perfectly general principle—a principle as applicable to England as to Scotland, and it would be out of the question to say that these principles would not be, and ought not to be, debated in the full House. Let them take, for instance, the Church of Scotland Reference Bill. That measure obviously raised a very important Constitutional question—whether there should be a referendum to the people of Scotland on the question of Establishment or not. Next came a Bill which was not general, inasmuch as it simply raised a question as to the expenses of County Councils; but then there was the Crofters’ Holdings Amendment Act, which proposed to extend crofter legislation to all leaseholds under £30. Was not that a general question which would have a far-reaching effect from one country to the other? There were also, among other Bills, the Bill for the abolition of grocers’ certificates and the Local Veto (Scotland) Bill. Surely these were not merely Scotch questions, but questions for the consideration of the entire Kingdom. Then there were the Mining Accidents Bill and the Bill dealing with the question of road subventions. On each of these Bills, if they were sent to a Grand Committee, questions of principle would arise proper for the discussion of the House in its full strength, and it would be a great pity if they were not debated by the whole House. The personal question could not entirely be left out of view. It had been conceded by some hon. Members opposite that the result of passing this Motion would be that some of the Scotch Members should not serve on any other Grand Committee. Speaking personally, however, he might say that he felt that if there was any way in which he could be of use on Grand Committees it would specially be in assisting the English Attorney General in amending the law of this country, by making to him suggestions for improvements borrowed from the more excellent law of Scotland. But under this plan he would not be able to do that. It would be a very great misfortune if they were deprived of the assistance, on Grand Committees, of several Scotch Members who now served most usefully and efficiently on them. There were, for instance, his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, also one of the hon. Members for Ipswich, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for North-East Manchester. It might be suggested that they could be included in the 15 added Members, but it was not to be supposed the Committee would be composed exclusively of Scotchmen. It was, furthermore, said that there would be a certain amount of check in discussing matters upon Report; but, after the experience of last Session on the Employers' Liability Bill, he would have thought that nobody would be very much enamoured of discussing, upon Report, matters which had not been raised on previous stages. What was the proposed Scotch Committee going to do upstairs? If their decisions were going to be discussed at length and revised in the House afterwards, it would raise a truly national grievance, and he would object to go upstairs to take part in a mere Debating Society, instead of as at present conducting, with others, the Imperial business of that Imperial House of Commons. It might be said that there had been a great deal of delay in passing Scotch Bills, but during the late Government they managed to get through a good deal of Scotch legislation, and if so much had not been managed lately, he suggested that Scotch Members on the other side might make themselves a little more unpleasant. Some people liked to be wooed with blandishments rather than by rougher wooing. The experience of the Irish Members seemed to show that the Government preferred the latter kind. He really thought some way might be found for getting through Scotch business without adopting a measure which would work badly in itself and would certainly effect a dislocation of all their old ideas of Parliamentary procedure.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.): My hon. and learned Friend began by stating that the Standing Committee proposed to be constituted was one in name, but not in nature. He spoke as if such Committees were in some sense sacred, and as if they had the advantage of great antiquity. But, as a matter of fact, the Standing Committees of the past 12 years were themselves an experiment, and in the discussions which took place in 1881 or 1882 many of the objections which we have heard to-night were raised. It was, however, quite the intention of the House, unless my memory deceives me, that, if these Grand Committees proved successful, their range, operation, and utility should be extended, and the mere fact that this would be an additional Grand Committee is no reason against establishing it. I, therefore, cannot admit that argument of my hon. Friend. If the experiment is one that seems fit for extension there is no Parliamentary Rule or law why it should not be extended. In this case it may well be that nationality will form a guide for giving a range of subjects to be so dealt with. One of the matters which we had in view when these Grand Committees were first set up was that there should be a certain fitness, or assumed fitness, on the part of those who were invited to serve upon them for the particular subjects to which their attention was to be addressed. Accordingly, in setting up the Grand Committee on Law, a preponderating number of lawyers was placed upon it, and in the same way in connection with the Grand Committee on Trade, a large number of Members were selected who were supposed to have wide experience in trade and commerce. That principle at once constitutes a guide in forming a Grand Committee to deal with the special and peculiar affairs of particular nationalities. That is what we propose to do in this case, and therefore it seems to me that the argument of my hon. and learned Friend, so far as it is founded on precedent and Parliamentary practice, is not valid, seeing that all we propose to do is to make a moderate extension of a principle which is not in itself many years old. The next point of my hon. and learned Friend was that the original intention of appointing Grand Committees was that they should deal with non-contentious matters, by which I suppose he meant matters non-contentious in a political or Party sense. I suppose there never has been any Bill sent to these Grand Committees which has not raised very fair subjects of contention—contention, however, of a kind which I hope may be solved, and which often has been solved, by friendly and full and fair discussions. There are a great many such Bills applicable to Scotland, and I hope we are not so contentious that we fight politically about everything. I can hardly imagine a matter in which there is a better

pect of the more satisfactory conditions which my hon. and learned Friend sees than the very example which has been mentioned to-night of the Parish Councils Bill. That is a measure on which the immense majority of the questions likely to arise are not, as far as I give or know, in the least likely to be contentious in a Party sense. But I am not prepared to admit that when a Bill has been read a second time, and the House as a whole has affirmed its general principle, the fact that some contentious matters may remain is a reason against sending it to a Grand Committee. If a Bill involves matters of a character which do not fit for such a Committee the House should not send it to the Committee. I must inform the House that the proposal of the Government is not to require that all Bills should be sent to a Grand Committee. The proposal will leave it to the House to select such Bills as are fit in its judgment to be sent to such a Committee. These were the principal points my hon. and learned Friend stated as against the proposal to apply this very useful principle of Grand Committees to Scotch questions. I do not admit in the least that nationality, merely forming a guide or indication, cannot be very useful as pointing the way to the Committee stage. If we look at this matter in a mere practical way, I am sure that all who have had the honour of carrying Scotch Bills through Committees of the whole House know that when a Scotch Bill gets into Committee, it resolves itself as a matter of fact into a Grand Committee of Scotch Members, and the discussion is conducted solely by Scotch Members. Some English and Irish Members have told me that they were quite unable to understand the phraseology of the Bills we were dealing with, for that and other reasons they left themselves. It is quite plain that there are very many Bills relating to Scotland, and to other parts of the country as well, with respect to which it is necessary that there should be a great deal of somewhat conversational discussion, and I do not at all share the feeling of my hon. and learned Friend, or it may have been some previous speaker, that if all Bills were sent to a Grand Committee, instead of being left in the more peaceful atmosphere, such as he said reigns usually with the House, they would be in a more stormy atmosphere, such as he said reigns usually in Grand Committees. My experience of Grand Committees is exactly the opposite. I do not profess to inquire into the reasons for it, but it does seem as if a Grand Committee is much more of a business body than the House itself. Therefore, that argument is not one which should deter the House from adopting this proposal if it otherwise commends itself. My hon. and learned Friend said the Government had not answered some of the arguments advanced by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour). I am quite sure that no one in this part of the House intended any discourtesy by that, and, of course, the answer will come in good time. I have tabulated the points which my hon. and learned Friend said were made by the Leader of the Opposition. He said, in the first place, that Members were elected not for local but for national purposes. Of course, I quite admit that Members are elected for national or Imperial purposes, but I utterly deny that they are not elected also for local purposes. They are elected for both purposes, and accordingly if a Member is going to fulfil the full measure of his functions he will take part in the discussion of Imperial matters in the House as a whole, and he will, in dealing with local matters, at least as appropriately take part in the discussion, and will do so more effectively, I think, in a body smaller than the House, and one which will give more attention to local interests. It would be quite a mistake to say that either class of interest was exclusive of the other. They both exist, and a Member would not fulfil his duties rightly unless he attended to both. The fact that a Member is elected for Imperial as well as local purposes is no argument against this method of devolution of the latter to a Grand Committee. Another point the right hon. Gentleman raised was as to the distinction between burgh and county Members. I must confess that I do not quite see what bearing that has upon the question. One of the great values of either a Grand Committee or the House as a whole is that they contain Representatives not of one type of constituency only, but of all types. The proposal is not to elect the burgh Members alone, or the county Members alone, but to elect them all. They would, therefore, be qualified to represent the country in all its aspects and all its interests. The third point which my hon. and learned Friend said the Leader of the Opposition had taken was that there was no definition of what were Scotch subjects. The language used in the Resolution is "all Bills relating exclusively to Scotland." I do not think that is difficult to understand. You have only to read a Bill to see whether it relates exclusively to Scotland. If it does, it may be sent to the Grand Committee, and if it does not, it will not be so sent. But surely there is nothing in the definition to make it impossible, either by a ruling of the Chair, or—what is left quite open by this proposal—the determination of the House, to decide whether a Bill is fitted to be referred to such a Committee or not. The House is left the master of the reference, and if the House should, in its wisdom, think that a Bill does not relate exclusively to Scotland, it has the power to keep it. Another point raised by the right hon. Gentleman was that this would be adding insult to injury. I am quite sure that no one from Scotland has the least desire to speak with the least disrespect of England, but I do not in the least see how by offering to withdraw our presence or—

*MR. A. G. MURRAY: What was referred to was non-concession to England of the same provision.

MR. J. B. BALFOUR: If England wants it, and gives the same evidence of a desire for it that Scotland does, England will be able to take it. I am not aware that there is any reason why, if England wants it, she should not have it. But I ask how can it be an insult to England, or to anybody else, to allow Scotland to settle the details of her own domestic affairs, and prepare them for the ultimate judgment of the House? Then the Leader of the Opposition said that discussions in Committee would be carried on upon Party lines, unless you have corresponding proportions of Representatives of each of the four nations. There, again, I could quite understand the objection if the proposal was to begin and end Bills by the decision of the Scotch Members, because it might be said that you would have inconsistent legislation with respect to the different counties. But surely if the House is the master of the Second Reading, and of the Report stage and Third Reading, it has in its own hands the power of preserving consistency and continuity of legislation. I cannot doubt that, so far from our adding insult to injury, the prevalent feeling in England will be one of amity and generosity to Scotland, and that there will be a desire to allow the smaller country, which has certain peculiarities, or, rather, differences of law and custom, to deal with one stage of its own Bills, and to save the House the time and trouble of dealing with that stage. The Leader of the Opposition said this was a change that would revolutionise the proceedings of this House. That sounds remarkably like what one heard said for days and weeks in 1882. I do not think it would revolutionise the proceedings of the House at all; but suppose it did, if it was reasonably necessary for carrying on the purposes for which this House exists, some change should plainly be allowed. I would just put it to hon. Members on both sides of the House who object to this proposal, are they satisfied with the existing provisions for the conduct of Scotch business? If they are satisfied, I understand their opposition; if not, I do not understand why they should oppose our scheme without tabling some alternative scheme. I have not heard anyone go the length of saying that there is no necessity for some change. We all know very well that the increase of what may be called the Imperial or general business of this House is so great that the House has not been in later times so able to devote itself to local questions and local interests as it was before. It has become a matter of almost universal admission that there must be some devolution. Many gentlemen opposite I know object very strongly to the idea of anything in the nature of Home Rule for Scotland. I should have thought that was exactly the state of mind that would have led them to welcome this moderate and temperate proposal. It is a proposal which will keep under the absolute control of Parliament all Scotch measures, while, at the same time, it will enable Scotch Members at one particular stage to shape after full discussion of a Bill its details, and to bring it back to the House in a form approved by the prevalent sense of Scotland. My hon. and learned Friend said that some of the enactments of the Parish Councils Bill were carried by Scotch and Irish votes. Be it so. Even if this proposal is assented to, it will be quite open to English Members, if they desire, after the Committee

Mr. J. B. Balfour

ge, to over-rule what has been done by a Scotch Members. I do not think they would exercise that power; I have far too high an opinion of their generosity to believe it, but they could have the power; and, therefore, there is no inequality in that treatment. There is one other point upon which I would like to say a word. It has been over and over again said to-night, "Why don't you ask for more time from the Government?" There has been a series of appeals to my hon. Friends on this side asking why they do not press the Government for more time. That would be a most excellent argument if time was an unlimited commodity, and if the Government had the whole time of the House to deal with and give away. But the Government have only a limited time to work upon. There are some things to be done which will not brook delay or postponement, and any Government must necessarily, in disposing of its limited quantity of time, have regard to the pressing character of the necessities of the case, and sometimes, perhaps, to the number of those who are making claims upon them. That being so, the smallest country is almost certain to go to the wall, and that, again, is a reason, when time is so necessarily limited, why it is difficult to give to Scotland as much of the time of Parliament as she reasonably requires. ["Why?"] I have already stated that time being of limited quantity, and matters of Imperial concern having the first claim, and there being a larger number of claims from other quarters, there is a tendency for Scotland not to get what she requires. It is not intended by this proposal to evade any claims which belong to the greater and more pressing questions, but side by side we desire to advance and mature the Committee stage of certain Bills, and, therefore, the suggestion that a demand should be made upon the time of the House which the House has not to give, and that hon. Members for England should be kept hanging about the lobbies outside—because I am afraid they are not much interested in the Committee stages of these Bills—is not a good reason for opposing this moderate and temporary devolution, and by which you gain a remedy greatly needed. My hon. Friend seemed to dread the effect of what I may call the reaction of the decisions by the Scotch Grand Committee upon English legislation. He said that though the decisions of the Grand Committee might have no direct effect, they would have an indirect effect. I am very much flattered by that suggestion, because the only indirect effect they could have would be by reason of their reasonableness and propriety, and I should not have expected that my hon. Friend, as a Scotchman, would have used the argument that the decisions of the Committee would have an indirect effect on English legislation as an argument against this proposal. These are the main points which were touched upon by my hon. and learned Friend. He gave as an instance of subjects which could not be left to such a Committee the difference in the two systems in regard to land tenure. I could not imagine a better example of what might with propriety be left to be dealt with by a Scotch Committee than the one which relates to the highly technical and special relations of landlord and tenant and of land tenure generally in Scotland. The Crofters Act might be given as an instance of that. It has been a great benefit to the country, and it is the kind of measure which might usefully go to a Scotch Committee. My hon. and learned Friend referred to the Referendum, to Disestablishment, and various other Bills, but every one of these Bills would be dealt with as regards its principle upon the Second Reading. The question as to whether there should be a Referendum, or Disestablishment, would be decided by the House as a whole, and only in the event of the House as a whole deciding that they were matters to be dealt with in Committee, would they make this reference to the Grand Committee of Scotch Members. If they decided in favour of such a reference, then I submit to the House it would be only reasonable it should be made to a Committee composed in the way proposed in this Resolution.

*MR. THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk) remarked that during the time he had sat in this House he had never heard a measure proposed with less argument in its favour to the House than the one now under discussion. The right hon. Gentleman in submitting it stated three propositions: first of all, that the existing state of matters required a remedy; secondly, that the scheme must be efficacious; and, thirdly, that those best able to judge of the matter were in favour of this proposal. He thought that no one would dispute that the existing business conditions ought to be remedied, but he doubted whether the remedy proposed by the Government would be efficacious. As regarded the remark that those best able to judge were in its favour, he thought it very likely that the right hon. Gentleman and himself took different views as to the capacity of gentlemen to form an opinion on this matter. The right hon. Gentleman stated that it would give more time to the business of the House. He was directly at issue with the right hon. Gentleman on that point. He believed if this proposal were carried out that the discussions upon Scotch questions in this House would not be materially lessened, because each Bill would be discussed to the fullest degree when it came to the Report stage and Third Reading. The right hon. Gentleman also complained that the congested state of the business of the House was such that as constituted it was not able to overtake Scotch business. He thought the present Government to a great extent—at all events, in this Parliament—were to blame for that, because they had got the millstone of the Irish question about their neck, together with the Newcastle Programme, and no doubt these two formidable items blocked the way. This Committee, they were told, was to be composed of all Scotch Members, plus 15 added by the Committee of Selection. Unless these 15 to be added were all Unionists, then the Grand Committee upstairs would not reflect the political complexion of this House, and that, to his mind, was a fatal objection to this proposal. Even if all the 15 added Members were Unionists, the political complexion of the House would still not be represented. The right hon. Gentleman said that when Scotch business was being discussed in this House it was left entirely to Scotch Members, and English Members did not put in an appearance to hear the arguments. But the very same thing might be said of English questions which Scotch Members voted upon. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he did not wish for the support of his Irish allies that night who had been conspicuous by their absence throughout the whole of this

Mr. Thorburn

Debate? The right hon. Gentleman had described his proposal as a useful and workmanlike scheme. For his part, he was inclined to adopt the views of the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow, when, speaking some two or three years ago on a similar proposal in this House, he described it as a peddling proposal. He would describe this proposal as not only peddling but parochial. It was said that Members would be able to speak at length in this Grand Committee and that there would be no Closure, but he found from the Report that the Closure had again and again been applied in Grand Committees. The hon. Member for South Edinburgh had made a very remarkable speech. There was no argument in it in favour of the proposal, but he supposed the hon. Member wished to appear before his constituents as more Scotch than Scotchmen themselves. The hon. Gentleman said he took little interest in any question which was not Scotch. [Mr. PAUL: No. If the hon. Member denied it he was quite prepared to accept his denial. He could only say for himself that while he was a Scotchman he took a great interest in many English questions, and he was an Imperialist out and out. He was proud of being a Scotchman, but he was still prouder of being a citizen of this great Empire, and he protested against the proposal of the Government as derogating from the power of the Imperial Parliament. If this Committee were given to Scotland, the same treatment could not logically be refused to England and Ireland, and possibly also to Wales. The result of such an arrangement would be to give a Radical complexion to Scotch questions referred to the Committee, a Conservative complexion to English questions, a possibly revolutionary complexion to Irish questions, and a Radical complexion to Welsh questions. When the Gladstonian Party were in power Scotch questions which went to the Grand Committee might also pass through this House. English questions, however, would not in all probability be passed as they left the Grand Committee, and as to Irish questions, it would depend very much upon the necessities of the Government whether they were allowed to pass them or not. When a Unionist Government was in power Scotch questions would not go through this House in the state they passed the Grand Committee; English questions would, in all probability, pass through the House, but Irish questions certainly would not. If the Government said they would pass similar Committees for England, Ireland, and Wales their position would be logical, but not otherwise. The late Mr. Bright, speaking at Birmingham in 1886, did make a suggestion similar to this, but he did so as an alternative to Home Rule. Did the Government mean this as a substitute for Home Rule, not only as regarded Scotland, but as regarded Ireland and the other portions of the United Kingdom? If so, while strongly objecting to the principle, he would consider whether he could not look upon it in a more favourable light than he did at the present moment. But would hon. Gentlemen from Ireland accept it as an alternative to Home Rule. He suspected they would not, for Ireland would not then be a nation in the sense desired by those hon. Members. In only one case, to his mind, would a Grand Committee for Scotch questions be satisfactory, and that would be for Bills which were non-contentious. If contentious measures were taken, then the time of the Grand Committee would be practically wasted, because the measures would be again fully discussed in the House on the Report and Third Reading stages. If the Grand Committee were constituted of Scotch Members, another objection was that they would not be able to serve on other Grand Committees or very likely on other Committees in that House. In the last Session of Parliament 43 Scotch Members served on the Scotch Committees; 18 Members served on one Committee, 11 on two, 9 on three, and 5 on four; and taking the average sittings as five, that represented a very considerable amount of work. This Parliament had a great record since the Union of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and he would do nothing which should in any way weaken the authority of that Parliament.

SIR E. CLARKE (Plymouth) said, he noticed that there were sympathetic cheers when the last speaker claimed that as a Scottish Member he was entitled to speak on this important subject, but it might be possibly thought that it was time for English Members to take part in this Debate. They had had 19 speeches either from Scotchmen or from Englishmen representing Scotch constituencies, and so far there had been only one speech by an Englishman representing an English constituency. It was desirable, he thought, that some debate at all events upon this matter should take place by English Members of Parliament, having regard to the effect that this great proposal would have upon their position. He did not imagine for a moment that the speech of the Lord Advocate was intended as an answer to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. The way in which his right hon. and learned Friend said that an answer would be made in good time showed that he was not looking upon his own speech as a summing up and reply, and there was a more remarkable evidence of that fact than was shown in the modesty of the observation to which he had referred, afforded by the Lord Advocate expressly declining to deal with the cardinal proposition of the Amendment which the Leader of the Opposition had put before the House. That cardinal proposition was that the proposal made to the House was one of so much gravity and so far-reaching in its effect that this House would decline to consider it unless the Ministry proposing it to the House and the Ministry which would have the conduct of affairs under the new state of circumstances set up by the new Rule was ready to declare to the House the whole of its mind and purpose with regard to this matter. It was quite obvious that this proposal before the House was a proposal in itself of a very limited scope. A great deal of the discussion which had taken place that evening would have been much more appropriate to-morrow evening when there was to be a Committee to consider the methods of advancing the business of the House. If they were only to deal with this proposal in the spirit in which some hon. Members had addressed themselves to the discussion, they might fairly have said that to-morrow night's Debate might be considered as an adjournment of this, and speeches might then be made which might be considered as a prolongation of this Debate. But it was something far different that they were discussing. He was almost as enthusiastic a reformer of the procedure of this House as was the hon. Member for Dundee, and during the last 10 or 12 years he had ventured to advocate alterations of its Rules which, he believed, would have assisted it to carry on the business. When Scotch Members in plaintive tones told them they were unable to bring Private Bills to a fruition and unable to obtain for them deliberate discussion and the adequate judgment of the House, they were not speaking of a grievance known to the Scotch Members alone. There were English Members who were just as anxious to pass Bills as the hon. Member for Dundee was to take away grocers' licences; but just as the hon. Member had to wait for an opportunity of discussing that fully before a delighted House, so English Members had to wait for an opportunity of discussing many Bills which a good many of them had got tired of putting down on the Notice Paper of the House, and in many cases had abandoned in despair. One of the Scotch Members had pointed out to them that this was not a matter upon which the Scotch Members had any very peculiar and remarkable grievances, and when that Scotch Member told them that in 12 years Scotland had passed 102 Bills against 318 for England, it appeared to some of them that Scotland had had, on the whole, rather an unfair share of the legislative activity of the House. But these questions merely of how they could promote the discussion of Private Bills or the passing of more Bills through the House were matters upon which they could meet without any great clashing of Party hostility, and he dared say that tomorrow evening, when he hoped the House would be discussing seriously and with a desire to do good work the Motion for a Committee to inquire into the arrangements that might be made for forwarding their business, it would be found that no division of Party would separate them in endeavouring to push forward reforms in the arrangements of this House. But this proposal of the Secretary for Scotland was a very much graver matter. His right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate talked about this being a moderate extension of the system of Grand Committees. He surely must have allowed to pass from his mind altogether the essential distinction between the Grand Committee now proposed and any Grand or Select Committees ever appointed by this House. For the first time they were asked to draw distinctions between

Members of the House as to their legislative authority and legislative work distinctions which were not themselves set up by their training or capacity inform the House upon the subject before it, but simply dependent upon the accident of their coming from one particular constituency. If there was a principle that had maintained the dignity of this House and given it efficiency and authority for its work it had been the steadfast maintenance of the principle which years ago Edmund Burke expressed in the splendid language, that a Member of Parliament was not a delegate for a particular constituency, but that, when he was elected, whether he came from an English, Irish, or Scotch constituency, he was a Member of one Parliamentary Assembly sharing with his fellows, with equal rights and equal responsibilities, the duty of doing his best for the welfare of the whole country. That was the principle of Membership of Parliament amongst them, and that was the only principle upon which Membership of this House could remain what it was to many of them—a great enjoyment and pride. To set up any other principle, to suggest that a Member who came to this House was to be considered here as simply the Representative of a certain number of persons living in one particular locality, would destroy the dignity and pleasure of the position of Members of Parliament altogether. They had a very curious instance the other day in this House of the sort of feeling to which he was referring. It would be remembered that, not a fortnight ago, there was a discussion in this House involving the question of the Naval Estimates. A strong protest—and, in principle, a very right one—was made against the special activity of Members representing certain constituencies in this House with regard to public expenditure. Why was the protest made? It was made upon the distinct ground that, when a Member of Parliament came to this House, he ceased to be, or ought to cease to be, merely the advocate of the local interest and class of persons in his constituency and take his share of Imperial responsibility and larger Parliamentary duties. He said this was a very grave matter. It was not an extension of the Grand Committee system, but an entire departure from the principle upon which that system was based. He did not want to admit, even casually, that he thought the system of Grand Committees in this House had been a success. He did not think that system was a success. There were, no doubt, Bills of the class of Bankruptcy Bills, or Partnership Bills, which might very well be sent to a Grand Committee; but they had found in their experience of Grand Committees, constituted even in the fair way in which they were appointed, they had broken down directly there had been a difference on the question before them involving strong Party feelings. Hon. Members of the House would recollect how the right hon. and learned Member for Bury was disappointed in 1883 that he could not carry through the Grand Committee his Bill for the consolidation of the Criminal Law, because the moment they came to a matter which involved the antagonism of the Irish Members the whole work of the Committee was thrown away. On two occasions the Grand Committees had had the Employers' Liability Bill before them, and the whole time of these Grand Committees had been absolutely wasted. He did not think, except for matters which involved no Party antagonism at all, and no principles upon which Members felt strongly, that Grand Committees were valuable, and for these he did not think the machinery of a Grand Committee was wanted at all. He was not one who believed in the system of Grand Committees, and he should be glad if the House adopted some simple Amendment introducing a Rule by which it would find itself able without difficulty to discharge the legislative business it wanted to do. The right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division, in proposing this Resolution, said it was necessary for them first to prove that there was a necessity for the taking of this step. He agreed the right hon. Gentleman ought to have proved it, but he did not, and the fault of his speech was that he began by stating what he ought to show, and sat down, after a not very prolonged speech, without having shown it at all. The right hon. Gentleman did not tell them for what Bills the Government desired to have this Grand Committee appointed. He did indicate one—the Scottish Local Government Bill—which he would propose to send to the Committee, but whether that would or would not be a fit Bill to go to a Grand Committee he (Sir E. Clarke) did not know. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned no other, though, before he came forward to make such a vast change as this would cause in the Rules of the House, he was bound to show the House what it was the Government wanted to do, and had not been able to do because of the difficulties that existed; and although they had taken every means to overcome the difficulties, the right hon. Gentleman did neither. He mentioned one Bill—the Scottish Local Government Bill—but that Bill had not yet been introduced. Where was his example of Bills the Government had introduced and had tried to push forward and failed to carry because of these difficulties? They knew why he did not mention them, because the mind of everybody went back at once to the Scotch Suspensory Bill and that marvellous effort of legislative activity, the Scottish Fisheries Bill, and for the right hon. Gentleman to have mentioned these to the House would have been to evoke not sympathy, but to have raised a laugh, so, of course, he did not mention them. But the right hon. Gentleman had brought no instance before the House of a Bill which had been actually brought forward, and which had failed to pass because of these great difficulties. He told them of no Scottish Bill that had ever been referred to the Grand Committee as constituted with regard to which any difficulty had arisen. He believed that only once or twice had a Scottish Bill been referred to a Grand Committee, and he was quite sure that in these one or two instances there was not a failure. So they had this great Constitutional change proposed to the House, the extent of which the Government would not tell them—first, without being told what the views were that the Government desired to advance, and, secondly, without having any statement from the Government as to the difficulty found in the present practice of the House. Then there was another very important thing to be considered in this case. When the Government proposed the present system of Grand Committees the understanding was—and the plan had been acted upon almost invariably since—that only Government Bills were to be submitted to these Grand Committees; and although that had been slightly departed from, he did not think that any private Member's Bill had been submitted to the Grand Committee unless it were connected with some Government proposal which had been already submitted to the Committee, or was in the process of such submission. But in this case all the private Members among the Scotch Members of this House would be on this Grand Committee; and were they to have the advantage of having all their Bills which had been in private Members' hands sent up to this Committee? Surely if private Scotch Members were to have the advantage of Committees at which all the difficulties which beset other Members of the House in their measures were to be got rid of then the claims for a similar Committee on the part of England, Ireland, and Wales were irresistible. It would be a case of grievous hardship to all the English Members of this House if their Scotch compeers had a Committee ready in one part of the House to deal with their Private Bills, while they were condemned to all the delays and disappointments of the general system under which they had suffered. He ventured, therefore, to say upon all these three grounds that this was something far more serious than what his right hon. and learned Friend spoke of as a moderate extension of the system of Grand Committees in this House, and he would make a further protest against it upon another ground. Hitherto, when the House had dealt in any way with the devolution of its work, it was selected either by its own direct action or the action of some of its trusted Members, persons whose capacity qualified them for dealing with the measures submitted to the Committee. How would that principle be interfered with here? The Committee would consist of Scotch Members. How about Scotchmen who were not Scotch Members? The arrangement which would exclude them would be an unnatural and an unfair one, because their exclusion would result in Members being appointed upon this Scottish Committee who were inferior in their knowledge of Scottish matters to many of those who were outside the ranks of the Scottish Members.

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Thursday.

Sir E. Clarke

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That the Select Committee on Public Petitions have power to send for persons, papers, and records.—(Sir C. Dalrymple.)

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Mundella, Bill to consolidate enactments relating to Merchant Shipping, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mundella, Mr. Secretary Asquith, and Mr. Burt.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 132.]

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [30th March] reported and agreed to.—[See page 1064.]

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS DISTRIBUTION.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in superintending the form and regulating the Distribution of Parliamentary Papers.

Ordered, That Mr. Bartley, Mr. Causton, Mr. Cavendish, Mr. Edwards, Mr. Fisher, Mr. Flynn, Mr. Howell, Sir Herbert Maxwell, and Mr. Francis Stevenson be Members of the Committee.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.—(Mr. Causton.)

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL, &c.

Lords Message [19th March] communicating the following Resolution, namely—

"That it is desirable that all Statute Law Revision Bills and Consolidation Bills of the present Session be referred to a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament," considered.

Resolved, That this House doth concur with the Lords in the said Resolution.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Lords to acquaint them therewith.—(The Attorney General.)

SUPERANNUATION ACT, 1894.

Copy presented,—of Treasury Minute, dated 21st March 1894, declaring that Patrick Moran, Acting Issuer, Army Service Corps, Barbados, War Department, was appointed without a Civil Service Certificate through inadvertence on the part of the Head of his Department [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 3rd April 1894.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (TOWER BRIDGE SOUTHERN APPROACH) BILL
(by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

*MR. ALBAN GIBBS (London) said, that when he gave notice of opposition to this Bill he did not, of course, intend to oppose what he might call the subsidiary clauses of this Bill—that was, the proposal to construct an approach leading from the south to the Tower Bridge. He did not regard the plan that had found favour with the London County Council as altogether the best plan that might be made, and he did not think it reflected credit on the management of the London County Council that the plan was only now going to be begun after the Tower Bridge was on the point of completion; but his objection to the Bill was to what he might call the principle of the Bill—namely, the 37th clause, which was commonly called the Betterment Clause. That it was the main principle of the Bill was practically admitted by the London County Council last year when they refused to proceed with the Bill after this main principle had been taken out. He was most anxious not to trespass on the time of the House by making a Committee speech; therefore, he would briefly allude to the objections that might be made to this particular form of the Betterment Clause, such as the arbitrary way in which certain areas were scheduled for betterment, the preposterously long time during which this sword of Damocles, in the shape of a betterment charge, was kept hanging over the head of the unfortunate owner and occupier, to the preposterously short time that was allowed to him to object to the betterment charge made on him, and to the entirely new principle of denying the privilege of a jury to assess what payment was due from him instead of putting it on the ipse dixit of an arbitrator, in whose appointment he obviously had no voice whatever. He admitted that as the arbitrators were to be appointed by a Public Department they would be fairly and justly appointed; at the same time, he thought a Public Department would be rather inclined to be against an individual, and he did not think they would appoint an arbitrator who had any leaning in favour of private persons. If it were shown that some scheme could be devised by which the owner and occupier of a property, which would be improved by some scheme, should properly and justly pay their share, he would be the last man to object to it; but he contended that the present system, under which a fresh rating was made as soon as an improvement was made, so that the occupier paid as long as the property was in his possession, and then the freeholder, as long as the improvement lasted, did all that was necessary. Under the proposed system the property might be placed under a perpetual rent-charge for some improvement which appeared to benefit it, and some future improvement might leave the property high and dry, yet it would have to go on paying the same betterment charge. Moreover, he submitted, it introduced a very great and new principle which was entirely new to our law. Of course, he knew that an instance was adduced in the time of Charles II., immediately after the great fire, when a charge something in the nature of betterment was imposed, but it was only done once; it evidently did not answer, for it was never tried again; therefore he was justified in saying it was a new principle. That being so, he held that it ought to have been brought forward as a Public Bill by a Minister of the Crown, after due inquiry by a Royal Commission or something analogous. Last Session the House of Lords proposed a Joint Committee to look into this thing, but at that time Ministers were not ready to accept any suggestions made by the House of Lords, and, therefore, they pooh-poohed it. He was much obliged to the House for listening to him on this dry subject, but he thought it right that they should make some protest against this Betterment Clause in order that it might not be supposed that they, on that side of the House, were in any way agreed to it. At the same time, this clause appearing as it did in a Bill for a very desirable object, he might say tacked to the Bill, he did not propose at this time to move the Resolution that he had placed on the Paper, therefore, he should content himself with this protest, and should take a further and more convenient opportunity on some further stage of the Bill of opposing the Betterment Clause.

*MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) said, with regard to this Bill before the House he wished to emphasise the remarks that had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for the City (Mr. Alban Gibbs), but it appeared to him it would have been more desirable and better if a great change in the system of taxation had been introduced into this House by means of a Public Bill. Regarding this most beneficial improvement of the Tower Bridge, hon. Members on that side of the House per se did not wish to oppose this most useful improvement made by the City of London, but they did oppose this novel principle of betterment in the Bill that they had now to consider. They were told the improvement was to be made by the whole County of London. Why by the whole county? In the past there were valuable improvements made that were purely Metropolitan, and paid for by the Metropolis as a whole. There were other improvements made in various districts in London, which were purely parochial improvements, and paid by the individual parish concerned, and there were others that were partly Metropolitan and partly parochial, and paid for partly by the general rate over the whole of London, and partly by the parochial rate. Therefore, he would like to ask why the whole of the cost was to be paid by the County of London? It was calculated in another place, in regard to another Bill, that the amount to be received for the betterment principle, contained in the Bill now under discussion, would only be about £150 a year; but he would ask why the parish of Bermondsey, which would be greatly benefited by the bridge, should not pay its quota? The real reason, in his opinion, was this: that it would not then have made such a strong case for betterment had the parish of Bermondsey to pay its fair and just quota. Hon.

Mr. Alban Gibbs

Members opposite claimed that property did not pay when it was bettered by improvements; but he would point out to them that by the Metropolis Valuation Act of 1869, Section 46, that not every five years only, but by means of supplemental and provisional lists every year and every month, a man's rating might be put up and down according as the value of his property rose or fell. By this Bill the introduction of the betterment system meant that for all time, to the end of the world, a certain charge would be put on the property; there would be no re-valuation every five years, and there would be no power as under the existing law to re-value property every year or every month. There were many other schemes more advantageous to the ratepayers, and he was very much surprised that the London County Council had not carefully considered the recoupment system that worked so well with regard to Northumberland Avenue. The ratepayers of London, by that particular system, not only were gainers by the magnificent thoroughfare itself, but also received in aid of local taxation a sum of £250,000 or £300,000. He was willing to admit there were cases where landowners received benefit by improvements made by the Public Authorities, and he thought it would be desirable for a strong Committee to inquire into the matter, so that a Bill could be brought in which should provide that when a landowner was shown to have derived benefit from public improvements he should be called on to pay his just quota. But, at the same time, if that was admitted, they ought to consider this other fact—that if, on the other hand, an individual had his property injured by a public improvement the community ought to bear the loss with him. So far as this Bill was concerned, it appeared to him that the community was to take half the profit, if there was any, and that the individual, whether in Bermondsey or anywhere else, took the whole of the loss. In fact, to use a somewhat sporting expression, this scheme was nothing more nor less than “Heads I win, tails you lose.” Now he would not dispute the proposition that where property was specially benefited it should be specially assessed in respect of that increment. But how was that to be considered by the London County Council? It was to be in this way—that if an arbitrator appointed by themselves considered that the property had been benefited, then for all time it would be a fixed charge on that property. There was, no doubt, a sort of appeal, but it would be, as he would show later, both of an expensive and dilatory character, and it was only in reality an appeal from the surveyor of the London County Council to that of the Local Government Board. In this particular instance the London County Council had been very wise and had not attacked any very important vested interest in London; they had not attacked the brewing interest, or large manufactures, or the large and wealthy men of influence, or the residential landowners, but they had attacked a body of individuals who were, comparatively speaking, poor men, although, no doubt, amongst those properties that would be included in the betterment clauses were Messrs. Sless' vinegar works, which happened to be very close to the bridge. He understood this firm of vinegar manufacturers had a 40 years' lease on their premises, but could any reasonable man allege that a vinegar manufactory would be benefited by a road being put in proximity to these works? They had to look at the actual value of the property as it was at present and not to a prospective value. Such a valuation could only be absolutely arbitrary and speculative. Last night he attended an important discussion at the Surveyors' Institute where he heard a member of the London County Council deliver a lecture on ground rents, but he defied any of the eminent surveyors he met there to say what would be the value of property in London 40 or 50 years hence in any definite area, but that would be the duty of the surveyor in considering the question of betterment. Under the clause a surveyor would have to say what, in his opinion, the value of certain property would be 40 or 50 years hence. The system of betterment introduced a totally new system into our system of taxing the capital value of real property. That had never been the principle on which they had taxed property in this country. It was, no doubt, a principle which had been introduced into America, but it had never been the custom hitherto in the United Kingdom; and if they were going to alter the system of taxation in local municipal areas, he ventured to say they should do it by means of a Public Bill. Now what was this system of betterment? it was an objectionable expression denoting the moiety of an undefined quantity—namely, the enhanced value of property affected by the improvements of the London County Council. He ventured to think that a scheme might be devised by the London County Council which would really benefit the locality in a very much more satisfactory way than the present scheme. And what did the present scheme do? It went behind the great principle that had hitherto been one of the grand principles of the Liberal Party in this House, that representation should accompany taxation. By this betterment system they were going to tax the landowners in the various local districts of London, whilst they gave them no voting power as owners either for County Council elections or for local ones. The system by which they had hitherto carried on government with regard to local taxation was that the burden of the year should fall on the annual value of the property, but this betterment charge would remain an unvarying one for all time. With regard to one principle in this scheme—namely, the proposed “limits of deviation,” he should like to say a few words. Might it not be the fact that even on the London County Council they might have a surveyor or somebody who might be biased in regard to his action, and might it not be impossible that in selecting individuals as subjects for this arbitrary form of impost to disassociate entirely from his mind the question whether those individuals did or did not support the views of the majority of the Council? They knew also that fashions changed with regard to important districts in London. They knew that at one time that district north of the Park, including Portland Square, Russell Square, and Bedford Square was higher rented than at the present time; they knew that fashion had changed and gone further south to Grosvenor Square, and why should not fashion change equally with regard to other areas of London? Therefore, it seemed to him it would be a great injury and wrong to inflict on any landowners a tax for all time on their property by the ipse dixit of some officer of the London County Council. Some people denied that this was either a tax or a rate; he would not therefore call it either, but would describe it as an impost in the nature of a mortgage. If the payment of this charge became in arrear, the Council had power to enter and sell the property in question to satisfy their claim for so-called betterment? Up to the present time it had been the rule that only chattels, movable property, could be seized in payment of rates and taxes due by the ratepayers of the Metropolis, but by this Bill the property itself could be seized and be specially disposed of by the London County Council. In his opinion, it would be very difficult to dispose of property when for six or seven years the cloud of this betterment award might be hanging over it. It should be noticed by the House that seven years might elapse, and in some instances eight, ere the arbitrator's award for betterment of a certain property was settled; and it must, too, be borne in mind that it was a charge on the supposed capital value of a given property not at the moment, but for all time. This could only be a matter of speculation, whereas the annual value of a property, as it now existed, was a matter of fact. He was ready to admit they ought to take every step to reduce the local taxation of London, which was a very heavy burden upon the people of London. At the present time he might mention there was a local debt of no less than £40,000,000 sterling on the Metropolis, but the mode by which the London County Council wished to relieve the ratepayers was not a good or beneficial one. In the last three years the Council had spent in the Parliamentary Committee-rooms upstairs no less a sum than £30,000 in fighting various schemes that came before Parliamentary Committees, and he could not help thinking they must regret that in 1886-7 and 1888 they allowed the Coal and Wine Duties to be repealed, which, whilst their abolition had not decreased the price of coals, £300,000 a year was lost in aid of London rates and for Metropolitan improvements. In fact, the betterment system was only an idea which might enter the mind of the arbitrator as to what the enhanced value would be at some future date. They knew very well that people dreaded going to law in the country. Even the great landowners knew very well the great expense of appearing before Parliamentary Committees, and would consider long before doing so in defence of their rights; but, on the other hand, the London County Council having the whole taxpayers of London behind them, would not hesitate to bring in Bills imposing any particular system of betterment in any part of the Metropolis, and to that extent they would oppress the individual owner, more especially the least wealthy of the ratepayers. The cost the London County Council had already gone to in this betterment scheme of theirs would have paid three or four times over any sum they could ever receive by this particular proposal. He did not really believe in his heart of hearts that the hon. Members composing the London County Council were so impressed with this system as they pretended; their object was to have a good fighting question on which to attack the House of Lords. It was a remarkable fact that the members of the County Council did not see that by causing a feeling of uncertainty to arise as to the future onus of taxation on any given house or property they would increase the house rent to the individual occupier; for it was an obvious fact that the landowner had, by the contracts he had entered into, contracted himself out of any obligation with regard to taxes; he had placed that obligation on the individual taking the building lease, who had placed the obligation in his turn on the occupier, so that unless these leases were done away with—and he did not think that Parliament would, in its wisdom, go to the extreme measure of abolishing all leases and contracts made with regard to the whole of the property in London—the whole cost of this betterment would in reality fall on the occupier of the houses in the particular locality. Hon. Members opposite would hesitate before advocating, either in this House or before their constituents, any tax on food used by the working classes and yet they were apparently anxious to put on a tax that would increase the cost of house rent in London. With the exception of the precedent when a great part of London was re-built after the great fire of London, he did not think there was any analogy to the present

posal in this country. But to consider the question in all its bearings one would have to look at the obverse side of the question. Hon. Members imagined that whenever they made a new road or a street in a given locality they were always going to benefit that locality. It might benefit the locality, but it could not be said that in all cases it benefited individual proprietors in that locality. What did they find when this subject was discussed in the Committee's sittings? Mr. Field, one of the surveyors retained as a witness by the London County Council, said that no doubt street improvements occasionally created worsement, and he granted it was impossible to assess the compensation for that worsement. That being so, why was it so easy to assess compensation for the betterment? Surely the two were co-extensive. A learned counsel, who was a solicitor for the London County Council, Mr. Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., in his evidence before the Committee, granted that if two several parts of the same property were affected by alterations made by a Public Authority, one of which improved and the other worsened the several parts of the property affected, the owner ought to be allowed to set off the worsement against the betterment, pay or receive as the case might be. Mr. Saunders, who appeared for the London County Council, bound himself to insert words in the Bill to enable the owner of the various properties concerned to receive compensation for worsement, where it was caused by the alterations in question. What was the result? Withstanding, Mr. Saunders, having given this distinct pledge that words should be introduced in the Bill for the betterment principle, in the result no such words were so introduced; it passed through this House, and was sent up to the other House without those words being inserted. If, however, it was to give to a single proprietor the right to set off the worsement of his property in one part against a betterment in another, it should be equally applicable in the case where no betterment was made, and compensation should also be given for worsement. The same area would, it were needless to say, be, for obvious reasons, not inconsistent with the "limits of deviation" for betterment. He did not, however, wish to occupy the time of the House further than to say that he did not believe a proposal that would do less benefit to the ratepayers than this betterment principle could be conceived. He found that in America, where it had been tried, it had been found absolutely and completely wanting. In New York and elsewhere in America they had three or four systems, working even in one given city at the same time, all of which were found to, in many instances, work oppression on the individual, on the one hand, and cause the danger of bribery on the other, by the fact that the area of "the limits of deviation" were an unknown quantity, subject to the will of the Municipal Surveyor, or a small works committee of a given Municipal Authority, and he thought they would hesitate to copy the Americans in that respect. He found that nearly all the leading American jurists said it was a doubtful system; and one who wrote to a friend of his, Mr. Baumann, who used to be a Member of this House, said the way it occasionally worked was this. The working classes, finding themselves in a majority in a certain town, had a towns' meeting, which decided that a certain betterment system should be introduced, as in America in some townships such matters were settled by a sort of plébiscite. It was not shown that the proposed public work was required, but the result was that the inhabitants of the district had to have it, and the landowners were obliged to bow to the decision, and probably 500 or 600 of these men who voted for it received wages at the rate of two dollars a day for being employed on the works, which was a rate over the market wage in the United States—the whole cost of the so-called improvement, or the major part of it, being paid by the unfortunate landowner, for so-called "betterment," though in many instances it practically injured and decreased the value of the property. Hitherto they had carried out their local government system on very different principles to that, and he would impress upon the London County Council that if they were going to attempt to alter our principle of rating they should do so on a sounder principle than the system of betterment. Their legislation at the present time left the House in a sufficiently chaotic state, and it would be a great injury to the legislative system if this principle were introduced into Private Bills from time to time. He ventured to say that our laws would be even more chaotic than at present, for this betterment system did clumsily and arbitrarily the same thing that was done now by the ordinary operations of the market.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, he had hoped the Bill might have gone forward without being delayed by speeches which, so far from making a straight attack on a principle, wandered round about it. He should not follow the example of those hon. Members. The Bill had been introduced under somewhat peculiar circumstances. There was a Bill brought forward on which there was really no contention, except on one clause, the Betterment Clause. It went before a Committee of this House, and, having been investigated and local evidence taken which had been published to this House by that Committee, the clause referred to was twice adopted in this House by overwhelming majorities—first, of two to one; and, secondly, of nearly three to one. After the clause had been rejected by the House of Lords without consideration it was adopted and sent back to the House of Lords; but under those circumstances the House of Lords refused to introduce the clause, and the Bill fell through. Now, in the present year, in this Session of Parliament, the London County Council had re-introduced the Bill, and it was re-introduced, so far as the Tower Bridge was concerned, in exactly the same words in which it was passed by this House. The Bill was not altered in one jot or tittle; it was brought forward again, and he should almost have expected that its adoption by this House would have been regarded as a matter, more or less, of form; that it would have passed through its various stages and been sent up to the House of Lords there to receive that consideration it had not received. In respect of the action of the House of Lords in this matter the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition made the following remarkable statement. He said—

"The Lords desire to inquire whether there is any equitable machinery by which the person the value of whose property is increased by an improvement can be made to contribute to the cost of the improvement. That is my view of what the words mean, and the words are certainly capable of that construction."

The right hon. Gentleman expressed that as the desire of the House of Lords in asking for a Joint Committee at that time last Session. He did not see that was the meaning of the Resolution, but they were willing to accept that interpretation from the right hon. Gentleman. By passing this Bill through its various stages in this House as it had been already introduced the House of Commons had the opportunity of enabling the House of Lords to carry out that wish which the right hon. Gentleman expressed as the wish of the House of Lords—that was to say, to inquire into the matter. The right hon. Gentleman further said—

"I believe that the majority of gentlemen on this side of the House have only one difficulty in regard to betterment—which is, how to carry it out: and if they could see any machinery by which that end could be attained, they would be as anxious to see the principle introduced into our Private Bill legislation as anyone on the other side of the House."

And the right hon. Gentleman then said—

"It is not fair to allege that the Lords as a body, collectively or individually, are opposed to the principle of betterment."

They wished to let the Lords have the opportunity of sending it to a Committee which could make the inquiries they desired to make. He might give another quotation from Lord Morley in the other House. This was what Lord Morley said, and the quotation was taken from Hansard, as corrected by Lord Morley—

"He was inclined to agree that it would be extremely difficult by a Public Act to lay down principles which would apply to every variety of case that could occur, not only in London, but elsewhere. He was not at all sure it would be desirable or safe to lay down general principles which would be at once adopted without any experience being obtained on these grounds, and on the grounds that the application of the principle in this case depended entirely on local circumstances; he thought it was a subject that might legitimately and rightly be left to private legislation. They would then have the advantage of the application of the principle to individual cases, and by the growth of experience they would gradually get such an amount of knowledge as to be able to lay down principles for individual application."

Now that was the attitude which they called on the House of Lords to take in conformity with the declaration of their view as expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition. This Bill was introduced again to the House, and he should have thought they might have been spared a discussion on the principle of betterment. He had no intention of entering into the discussion of its general principles and that particular phase which had been already as greatly misrepresented by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken as by Lord Salisbury; and the hon. Gentleman had fallen into the same error that Lord Salisbury fell into when he spoke of the London County Council venturing to assume that, wherever there was an improvement, there betterment would arise. On the contrary, that was not the assumption of the Bill. Lord Salisbury said—

Mr. R. G. Webster

"The principle of the 41st clause of the Bill"—now the 37th—"which your Lordships declined to accept, was that proximity is the one test of improvement, and that, if you are near a public improvement, it says that your property must have improved by that public improvement. A more senseless suggestion was never put—and that is saying a good deal—into a Bill presented to Parliament."

MR. R. G. WEBSTER: There is no proposition in the Bill with regard to worsement.

MR. J. STUART said, that was a totally different question; the point he was dealing with was that the hon. Gentleman fell into the same error as Lord Salisbury when he assumed the only test of betterment was the proximity to the improvement. The essential point of the method of charging for betterment was this—that no one should be called on to contribute any part of the charge who was not clearly in receipt of betterment on which the charge was made. The hon. Gentleman, when he ventured to oppose the Bill in this House, and the late Prime Minister in the Upper House should make themselves aware by the simple perusal of the Bill of what were its contents. There were only two points in what had been said it was incumbent upon him to answer, for, as he had said, he did not intend to enter into a general discussion. The two main points were these, and they were points of misstatement. The first was as to recoupment, to which the hon. Gentleman who spoke last referred. The hon. Member referred to the method of recoupment in London as having been a satisfactory method to the ratepayers, and one that provided a large sum of money. If the hon. Member looked into the figures before the Committee upstairs, it was shown, and could not be disputed, that the recoupment system as introduced and carried out in the Metropolis had been an extreme pecuniary burden to the ratepayers, and it was owing to the failure of that system that the betterment system was substituted. The other point he wished to call attention to was one on which they had often been misrepresented in the County Council, and in this House. It had been said, with respect to this Bill and with respect to their action on the betterment section of it, that they ought to have proceeded with the Bill for the Tower Bridge approach without waiting for any Betterment Clause, because they were bound in honour to make an approach to the bridge that was made by the City of London. He understood the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Alban Gibbs) signified by his action his approval of that statement. Now, would the House believe that the main Petitions against the Bill as it stood were the Corporation of the City of London, and would the House believe that the Petition against the Bill laid on the Table by the Corporation of the City of London was not only a Petition against betterment, but against the actual improvement itself? The Petitioners went into some detail, and said the betterment system was bad and could not be applied; they put themselves in direct opposition to the great majority of this House and the Committee upstairs. Therefore, by going on without the Betterment Clause they should not be meeting what the City of London wanted. The London County Council, who had introduced the Bill again, looked on the Betterment Clause as one of the most important clauses brought before this House in any private legislation, and in regard to it they had now got the assistance of the Corporation of Manchester, whose Bill down for this day contained the same Betterment Clause. He could not doubt that the House would willingly assent to this principle as it did last year, and would send the Bill to the House of Lords, which would then have the opportunity of giving that consideration to it in Committee which they and their most trusted advisers said it ought to have, and which it would have had last year but for the complete misunderstanding of the Bill by their Lordships when it was before them.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) said, the speech of the hon. Member for Hoxton (Mr. Stuart) would have been noticed for one peculiarity, and that was that it contained no reason in support of the Betterment Code which was included in this Bill; the only reason in support of the Betterment Code in the Bill which was given was that a similar clause was in another Bill last year which was passed by this House by, as he admitted, a considerable majority. The merits of the Betterment Code had never been threshed out in this House, and the hon. Member omitted to state the important fact that when the Code got to the House of Lords the House of Lords threw the Bill out. The hon. Member might attach no importance to that, but he thought the country would attach importance to it, and desire that there should be a dispassionate discussion. Lord Hobhouse had recently accused the opponents of betterment of having never given a hint or a suggestion of any kind as to what should be the method of applying the principle. The noble Lord told them that they were met by a mere negation; but he could not have paid attention to the proceedings of three Committees of that House, on two of which he sat. He maintained that there were means under the existing law of applying the principle of betterment. He was in favour of the application of the principle under the existing machinery. The London County Council were not satisfied with the methods then in use for assessing the rates, but they considered it necessary to devise some new system, and in order to conceal as much as possible what they were doing they invented the principle of annual annuities. They did it in a more insidious manner. They provided that an annuity of £3 a year should not be redeemed or redeemable in all time except by payment of £100 in cash. It was all very well for Lord Hobhouse and hon. Gentlemen to say that the plan devised was one which should receive the unanimous support of the House, because it was a plan by which those who secured the benefit from the working of the Act would be the persons directly called upon to contribute to the expenses incurred in carrying out the improvements. It was a very well to say they had never suggested any alternative plan to secure that those who got the benefit of the improvement should pay for them; but the existing arrangement under the Valuation Act 1869 had been found to work, on the whole, very fairly; it had been in force now 25 years, and every year it was revised by means of supplemental lists. He would ask any gentleman on the opposite Bench who lived in a fashionable part of London whether he was willing that his rent should be increased, say, £60 a year, and the capital value of his house raised from £200 or £300 a year, as now, to six times that figure, because the London County Council chose to think that they had a right to assess his house, not at its present value as now, but at what they considered would be its value at a future time. It was frequently the case that the value of a house suddenly disappeared, and in such a case he would like to know if the annuity was to remain a burden on the property for ever? Yet no provision had been made for any deterioration in the living value of a house during the period over which the assessment extended. Was that a reasonable, fair, or just method of levying a tax? He would like to point out to the hon. Member for Hoxton that this one clause contained 17 sub-clauses, and a number of sections, so that it constituted a regular Code in itself. Although this was in one sense a Private Bill, in so far as it affected private taxation, yet it dealt with a matter of general public interest, and involved an alteration of a great public principle and it seemed to him, therefore, to be very inconvenient that no explanation had been given hon. Members of the grounds upon which it had been brought forward. This way of bringing in a Bill put Members who wished to oppose a measure in a difficult position, as they could only meet the questions raised in the negative, and do their utmost to show that in their opinion the proposed innovation was bad and that the existing law was good. He therefore needed make an apology to the House for entering into those particulars. He had already given his definition of the just principle of betterment. He would apply it by an enhanced rate while the enhanced value of the property continued, and no longer. But what was the system proposed to be adopted? First, the value of the property was scheduled in the document which the London County Council called "the award," Assessment Committees fixed the amount, and ratepayers and individuals were not allowed to go before the County Council itself to show cause against the award, but the authorities were entitled to say to any ratepayer, "Your property will be increased in value by this improvement to the extent of £200, or £6 annual value, and we put you in the list on that assessment." The list actually became the award, and if the ratepayer felt aggrieved the only course open to him was to resort to the expensive method of taking legal steps to have his appeal tried, not before the ordinary tribunals of the country, but before an arbitrator. Being compelled to go to law in such a matter as this was doubly serious, because not only was the result uncertain, in which case the appellant would be saddled with very heavy costs, but it was a case of a private individual having to fight a public body who were perfectly irresponsible for any expenses which they incurred. Therefore, the proposal of the Council involved a very serious innovation—indeed a violent innovation in the accepted law. He was well aware that the London County Council had no respect for Rules and Regulations held sacred by our grandfathers; but he thought they should show some kind of respect to the present laws relating to taxation, and not bring in such great innovations without giving very good and substantial reasons for so doing. The second serious innovation which this House was asked to sanction was the conferring of a power upon the London County Council to alter the incidence of taxation between owners, lessees, and occupiers of property. This innovation was also smoothed over by a statement that the tax would be levied on the landlord of the premises and not on the tenant, and that where the house was not occupied by the owner the Act would not apply. This was altogether a false cry. The present system was to assess the house and the site with everything upon it, and he maintained that they rightly assessed that at its gross value. But there were generally three persons interested in a property—the owner, the lessee, and the occupier, and now the assessment was divided between the three parties in such proportions as they might agree upon. But this Bill proposed to do away with the existing freedom of arrangement, and to differentiate between the parties. On the previous night he received an intimation from some of the members of the County Council that they intended to oppose the Instruction he had put on the Paper, and he was, therefore, unable to move it that day. But he trusted the Leader of the House and the Government generally would support the proposal he intended to make, which was to the effect that such a matter as this should be brought in as a Public Bill, and thoroughly discussed as a public measure. He hoped, also, that the Government would take steps to have full inquiries made as to whether the facts that had been put forward were really true. He wished to have ascertained the effects of these changes on the existing law of the country. The third innovation consisted in a restricted area of taxation, and the plan submitted by the County Council showed that while outside the lines of the plan certain properties would be bettered, other properties inside the lines would not be bettered. This would be manifestly a gross injustice, to be founded on an arbitrary decision in the office of the surveyor to the London County Council, into the reasons for which no outsider could inquire. So far they had never had submitted to them any reason for constituting this restricted area. Again, the existing legal remedies were abolished by the Bill. Now aggrieved persons could go before the Assessment Committee, which was fairly constituted, without counsel, solicitors, or surveyors; and from this Committee there was now an appeal to Quarter Sessions, which was simple and inexpensive. For this generally equitable tribunal there was to be substituted a Judge selected on the application of the County Council to the Local Government Board, and persons appeared before this tribunal with the peril facing them of having, in all probability, to pay costs. They were, in fact, to lose the benefit of the existing tribunal on which they could rely. The House of Commons, by two important Public Committees, in 1870 and 1889—a Committee on the subject of Local Taxation and the Committee on the Town Holdings Act of 1882—reported that if and when local taxation was so altered that the immediate and direct incidence of it fell not upon the occupier as now, and through him upon the owner, but upon the owners direct, representation must be given to the owners on the body which spent the money. But no such representation was here vouchsafed. The County Council had, moreover, abandoned the system of recoupment, the principle of which was the purchase of such land as would be bettered by the proposed improvement in order by re-sale to recover the cost of the improvement. It was, however, admitted that recoupment had been a loss, except in two cases, one of these being the Northumberland Avenue, from which a large profit was made, and the loss had been caused by every man who was worsened having to be compensated before he was turned out. Now, the County Council thought that they would escape compensations for worsement. Was this a just principle to sanction? The Council further proposed to tax vacant land and unproductive property. The first principle of our system of taxation was that the needs of the year, as regarded local expenditure, should be met out of the income of the year—an income drawn from all properties within the area. This principle it was now proposed to depart from, and by saying they would tax everything that existed, whether it produced anything or nothing, they were reverting to the crudest forms of American taxation. He should not move the Instruction to the Committee of which he had given notice, because it would occupy the House for another day; but when the Government referred the Bill to a Committee, he was anxious to ensure that they had a Report, aye or no, whether the Betterment Clause contained the inequalities which had been suggested. He wanted that in black and white before the Bill went to the House of Lords, where he hoped it would be examined on its merits. He hoped the Bill would not be referred to a Hybrid Committee, which was the worst possible Committee for a Bill of the kind, and that the House would support the Instruction to the Committee which he had placed on the Paper to report generally on the principle of “betterment,” and how far and to what extent it interfered with our existing laws of local taxation.

Mr. J. Stuart

Mr. Kimber

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, he was glad that his hon. Friend who had initiated the discussion had expressed his intention of not dividing the House. His hon. Friend spoke on this occasion rather as the representative of ancient traditions than as Member for the City, and rather as an individual than as a Conservative. Not as a Conservative, because the Manchester Corporation proposed a similar plan in a Bill which bore the name of the Leader of the Opposition; not as Member for the City, because more than one meeting had been held at the rooms of the Chamber of Commerce, where unanimous opinions had been passed urging the great importance of making the southern approaches to the Tower Bridge. Indeed, he did not understand his hon. Friend to contest the importance of the improvement, but only to object to the single clause dealing with betterment. The hon. Member who had just sat down complained of the reference of the Bill of last year to a Hybrid Committee. That was not the choice of the supporters of the Bill; and the Hybrid Committee was only agreed to to conciliate hon. Members opposite from whom the suggestion originated. The hon. Member also complained that no speech had been made on the introduction of the Bill. The Bill was introduced without a word of comment to save the time of the House, because the same discussion had already occupied the House several times. He believed that the differences between the hon. Member and the supporters of the Bill arose partly from the fact that some hon. Members did not quite understand what the Bill effected. In a pamphlet on the subject the hon. Member said that the area of betterment was arbitrarily drawn by lines on a map, and, while including property which was not bettered, included property which was very much bettered. From that statement it might be supposed that all the property within the area was to be taxed; but such was not the case. No property could be taxed unless it had been shown to be materially improved. The Member further stated in his pamphlet that the tax was imposed, not ascertained increased value, but on the basis of the County Council's own opinion that the property would be improved. This was an entire misapprehension. Truly, no claim would be made unless the County Council were of opinion that the property had been improved; but before the tax could be levied an arbitrator, appointed by the Local Government Board, must be satisfied that the claim was just. In this matter it was impossible to do absolute justice; the only thing to be done was to arrive at a system which would do the least injustice all round. Under the old system half the cost of improvements fell on the district and half on the Metropolis; and it frequently happened that property not benefited at all paid both the district and the Metropolitan rate. He could not but feel that the ratepayers of London had reason for complaint against the Government in reference to this question. The whole amount which this betterment tax was expected to raise was £5,000. The expense of promoting the Bill before the House last Session was about £5,000; the expense of the present Bill would be considerable; and the delay in opening the approaches to the Tower Bridge would inflict great inconvenience on the trade of South London. If the Government had accepted the proposal of the House of Lords for a Joint Committee on the question last year all this extra expense would have been saved and the Bill would have been passed a year sooner. The unreasoning animosity of the Government against the House of Lords had inflicted this additional expense on London and entailed great loss and inconvenience on trade and commerce.

Mr. COHEN (Islington, E.) said, that while absolutely agreeing in the last observations which fell from the right hon. Member for London University, he should like to point out to the House that he thought his right hon. Friend was under a misapprehension when he said that all that was to be done was to satisfy the Local Government Board as to the equity of the increased assessment that was proposed to be placed on certain property. If hon. Members would refer to the Bill they would observe that the Local Government Board never interfered in any way whatever. The Local Government Board had, indeed, to appoint an Inspector, who was to be satisfied with the increase in the value of the property proposed to be taxed; but that procedure was only resorted to when some intrepid, wealthy, and public-spirited individual ventured into the arena to fight the London County Council with his own money, while the County Council fought with the money of the ratepayers. In the House or elsewhere he had never neglected an opportunity of advocating the principle of betterment—a principle which he thought would have come more quickly and more efficiently into law if those in authority in the London County Council who were promoting this Bill had not for four years wasted thousands of pounds of the ratepayers in the at last successful effort to rescue £5,000. If, instead of that, they had put pressure on the Government to assent to the principle, it would have done away with controversy, it would have secured an automatic operation of the principle, which his hon. Friends and Colleagues opposite professed to advocate, though their action must in the minds of impartial persons, and certainly in the minds of the suffering ratepayers, throw doubt on the genuineness of their views.

Mr. THORNTON (Clapham) said, he would like to point out that in the Hybrid Committee the Betterment Clause was carried only by one vote, that of the hon. Member for West Fife, who had stated he had been able to find out all the arguments on the question from the Report of the Committee, and therefore did not think it worth while to be present at the discussions. He ventured to think the London County Council had made a mistake in ignoring expert individual opinion on the question such as that of Sir Whittaker Ellis.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

Mr. KIMBER: With regard to the Instruction which has been placed on the Paper by me, I do not know whether hon. Gentlemen opposite intend to oppose it.

Mr. J. STUART: Yes, Sir; we oppose the entire Instruction.

Mr. KIMBER: I am not going to subject the House to a second Debate on this question to-morrow; but perhaps the Government may suggest some means for the elucidation of this subject.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): The Government cannot accept this Instruction, because it proposes that the Committee should go into all questions which were thoroughly investigated by a Committee appointed for the purpose three years ago. I was myself a Member of that Committee; we went most carefully into the question, and though we did not report at length we came to a conclusion in the matter. Under these circumstances, the Government cannot allow this Instruction to pass.

POLICE AND SANITARY REGULATIONS.

APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, North Beds.): I understand that last week an arrangement was arrived at between the hon. Member for South Islington and Her Majesty's Government that the Motion for the Police and Sanitary Committee should be moved in the terms in which it stands on the Paper. I have only to observe that we fully agree with the view of the Association of Municipal Corporations that Standing Orders 150 and 173^a are already applicable and the Government will not move an Instruction. I beg to move—

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Committee of Selection do appoint a Committee, not exceeding Nine Members, to whom shall be committed all Private Bills promoted by Municipal and other Local Authorities, by which it is proposed to create powers relating to Police and Sanitary Regulations which deviate from, or are in extension of, or are repugnant to, the General Law.

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

That Five be the quorum of the Committee."
—(Mr. George Russell.)

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, that as some exception had been taken by Municipalities to the action of the Police and Sanitary Committee in excising and restricting certain of their Bills, he had feared it might have been necessary for him to oppose the Motion. No doubt the Committee had been controlled to a large extent by a special Instruction which had been passed by the House previously for their guidance, with the result that its operation in the last two or three years had been undoubtedly of a character to produce what was felt to be a to centralising spirit on the part of the Department in dealing with the local Private Bills of Corporations. However, the matter had been met in a very cordial and generous spirit by the Local Government Board, the Under Secretary of which had seen him, and done his best to meet the Corporations' wishes; and therefore he would not divide the House on the subject this Session. He would only express the hope that in the coming year the Committee, unfettered by an Instruction and with a greater representation of the Municipalities on it, might allow more liberty to that spirit of local legislation which had been the chief means of building up the statutes of local government such as the Public Health Act and others. In that hope he assented most readily to the Motion.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, that as he had been Chairman of this Committee during the last Session of Parliament, he might be allowed to say a few words on the Motion. He regretted that his hon. Friend the Member for Islington had not thought fit to promulgate more definitely the charge he desired to bring against the Committee because he questioned whether it would be possible for his hon. Friend to establish the central charge he had advanced—namely, that the Committee had been governed by a Departmental feeling of centralisation, and had been narrowly controlled by the Instruction of the House. Of course, it was impossible for him to say who would compose the Committee in the future, or who would be Chairman of it, and he did not know whether notice would be taken of the suggestion of his hon. Friend, that there should be a larger representation of Members representing Municipalities on the Committee; but he ventured to point out this simple fact in connection with the previous Instruction—that all the House of Commons had done hitherto, and all the Committee did last Session, was to decline to allow any changes in the law to be effected in cases where the existing Statutes had been recently passed. Undoubtedly, it would be a serious thing if the Debate had been allowed to pass without a single word being said against the impression which had been conveyed to the House, that because the Instruction moved last year and the year before was not moved this year, therefore the Committee, however composed, was to understand that it was not to be governed by that Instruction. He did not know whether his hon. Friend the Member for Islington had actually in mind what the Instruction was; but he ventured to repudiate the idea that there had been on the part of the Committee any attempt at centralisation, or any inclination to give into the representations or recommendations of Government Departments. He could show that on many occasions the Committee did give special powers to the Local Authorities, when they were able to show that their local circumstances made it absolutely necessary that there should be some small changes in the existing law; but the House would agree that it would be intolerable if a small Committee sitting upstairs were to allow the law to be extended, curtailed, or materially altered, when the House as a whole had within the four or five years dealt with the identical subject in a comprehensive way, and had declared what the intentions of the Legislature were on that subject. To allow anything like that would be throwing on a small Committee a very great and serious responsibility; and he, for one, would feel himself absolutely unable to serve on the Committee if it had to accept that very onerous task, which properly belonged to the House, and of which the House could not divest itself. He thought it his duty to say so much, because if it were his fortune to be on the Committee again this year he should not like his hon. Friend to think that, because he had allowed the matter to pass in silence, he had acquiesced in the suggestion that the action of the House in not moving an Instruction relieved the Committee from the course it had taken up last year, which was supported by every Committee, and was not desirable in the interests of well-conducted legislation. He would, however, suggest that the quorum be reduced from five to three, as on some occasions there had been a delay and inconvenience caused to witnesses through the failure of the required number of Members turning up early.

Mr. Kimber

Mr. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) thought the Committee should have access, more than hitherto, to the Reports made to the Local Government Board with regard to these particular measures when they dealt with the law as it existed. In fact, he thought all Members of the House ought to have no difficulty whatever in getting access to such Reports.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, that as he had been for six years a Member of the Sanitary and Police Committee, he might be permitted to say a few words on the Motion. His hon. Friend had made some reference to what was known as the adoptive Acts. Those Acts had been passed because in their absence the labours of the Police and Sanitary Committee had become almost crushing. The subject-matter of many of those adoptive Acts came before the Committee in a most perfect form; every one of their clauses had been fully discussed; and the body of adoptive Acts presented the result of the most careful consideration in such a form that any Local Authority might adopt one or all of those Acts, and have the advantage of that body of legislation. He was sure it would be a great injury to Public Health Bills if the whole subject were thrown again, as during former years, in a confused shape before the Committee. He was sure that legislation would be less satisfactory than at this moment, and that the duties of the Committee would become so formidable that no Committee could possibly undertake them. He hoped the Police and Sanitary Committee would act in a thoroughly independent spirit. It was their duty to stand between the Departments and the public and to investigate the recommendations of those who appeared before the Committee. Sometimes they must decide in favour of the promoters, sometimes in favour of the objectors, and sometimes in favour of the Departments, but they should proceed from first to last in a judicial spirit and, guided by the arguments, decide according to the facts as they arose. He believed good work would continue to be done by the Committee if the adoptive Acts were not interfered with, but if they were private legislation would sink into chaos.

MR. WHITELEY (Stockport) said, that with the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean and the hon. Member for South Islington he had been requested by the Association of Municipal Corporations to support their complaint on this point. He could assure the House that great injury and injustice had been done the Municipalities by the manner in which their Bills had been mutilated by the Police and Sanitary Committee. He ventured to hope that that would not occur again. It was local action which the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Long) had referred to on the part of the Municipal Corporations of the Kingdom which had resulted in the building up of the Statutes.

MR. W. LONG (interrupting) said, he had referred to proposals to deal with subjects which had been dealt with by Parliament within the past three or four years. The hon. Member's statement was based on existing Acts of Parliament passed before the general law was laid down. It did not refer to recent Acts—those of 1889 and 1892.

MR. WHITELEY said, they were the re-enactments and consolidation of the existing law.

MR. W. LONG : No, no.

MR. WHITELEY said, that at any rate he ventured to hope that Municipal Corporations would not have this injury done to them during the present Session.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that objection had been made that hon. Members had not access to the Local Government Board Reports. The Local Government Board would have no objection to the Sanitary and Police Committee having access to these Reports.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

UNDER THE WHITE ENSIGN.

MR. MUNTZ (Warwickshire, Tamworth) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, as a general rule, the wearing of the white ensign is reserved to Her Majesty's ships alone, or whether the Admiralty are in the habit of granting warrants to private persons authorising them to wear the white ensign on private ships ; whether such warrants are personal to those to whom they are granted, and whether they authorise the wearing of the white ensign by the ship in the absence therefrom of the person named in the warrant ; whether these warrants are granted to such persons on account of their personal position or public services ; or, if not, on what other grounds ; whether they are ever granted to other persons than British subjects ; whether any misapprehension or inconvenience has arisen at the Dardanelles or elsewhere abroad through the wearing of the white ensign by private ships causing them to be taken for British men of war ; and whether the Admiralty will consider the propriety of refraining henceforth from issuing warrants to private persons to wear the white ensign, and of withdrawing those warrants already issued ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe) : The white ensign is, as a general rule, reserved for Her Majesty's ships, and warrants are not granted to private persons. The exceptional privilege enjoyed by the Royal Yacht Squadron was conferred on that Club in 1829 by a general warrant, and a personal warrant is issued to each yacht owner in the Club who is a British subject for his convenience ; this warrant neither authorises nor forbids the wearing of the white ensign when the owner is not on board. As a special case, the German Emperor was granted a warrant in July, 1891, as owner of a yacht in the Royal Yacht Squadron. In 1883 Lord Annesley's yacht, the Seabird, was detained by the Turkish Authorities at the Dardanelles consequent on her wearing the white ensign, Lord Annesley being a member of the Royal Yacht Squadron. On account of this, all yacht owners were warned that should they wish to pass the Dardanelles under the white or blue ensigns they must first obtain an Imperial Iradé, otherwise they were recommended to wear the plain red ensign. There is no intention of taking action in the sense suggested by the final paragraph of the question.

OCCASIONAL LICENCES.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Dover Magistrates have been in the habit of granting occasional licences for the sale of liquor and permitting such sale after 10 p.m. on occasions other than a public dinner or ball; and that, on a recent occasion, such an occasional licence having been granted for a smoking concert, the local Inland Revenue authority took exception to the sale after 10 o'clock p.m., as being contrary to the Acts of Parliament; and, on communication with the Board of Inland Revenue, was instructed not to interfere but to fill up the licence in accordance with the Justices' consent; and, if the facts be as above stated, whether he proposes to take any action in the matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): By the Act 26 & 27 Vict., c. 33, s. 20, a person having obtained an occasional licence is permitted to sell excisable articles at any public dinner or ball during such hours as shall be allowed and specified in the consent given by the Justice of the Peace for the granting of such occasional licence. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, acting in the spirit of this section, extend this privilege to the holder of an occasional licence for any other form of entertainment or amusement upon the production of a Justice's consent specifying the hours within which it is desired to sell excisable articles. But I would suggest that this is a matter affecting the Treasury rather than the Home Office.

TITHE TROUBLES IN SOUTH WALES.

MR. GRIFFITH - BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the disorderly scenes which have recently been taking place in connection with the collection of tithe rent-charge in Cardiganshire and in other parts of South Wales; whether Mr. Robert Lewis, the County Court bailiff, was seriously assaulted on the 14th of March at Ffynonfadog, in the parish of Pembryn, when attempting to collect tithe, and whether any arrests have been made in connection with this outrage; will he explain why the police force protecting Lewis was suddenly withdrawn on the 18th of March, although the Chief Constable had undertaken to provide a force until the 23rd, and also the number of orders of the Newcastle-Emlyn County Court for tithe rent-charge which are now unexecuted; whether he is aware that a series of night attacks have been made on the vicarage of Llanfychangel Rhosycorn, in the course of which a valuable horse belonging to the vicar has been cruelly mutilated; whether any arrests have been made in connection with this outrage; and what steps he proposes to take to restore law and order to this part of the country?

MR. ASQUITH: I have received Reports from time to time on the disorderly proceedings in connection with the collection of tithe rent-charge in Cardiganshire and other parts of South Wales. Mr. Robert Lewis, County Court bailiff, was twice assaulted, but, as I am informed, not seriously, on March 14 at Ffynonfadog while attempting to collect tithe. The assailants were well known to the police, who thought it more advisable not to arrest them, but to proceed by summons. It is true that a verbal arrangement had been made with the bailiff for the continuance of police protection until March 22, but it was found necessary to withdraw the protection temporarily after the 17th, after due notice had been given, as applications had been received for protection from the bailiffs of another County Court, and the presence of an unusual number of police was required in another part of the county. The Chief Constable will shortly be again in a position to give assistance if required. There are, I am informed, 118 unexecuted orders for distress, and 87 orders under Sub-section 3 of Section 2 of the Tithe Act, 1891. I am informed that on four separate occasions damage was done by parties of men in the stables of the vicarage named, including the cutting of the hair from the tail of a horse; and although no arrests have yet been made, the offenders are believed to be known, and it is hoped will shortly be brought to justice. I understand that the village named is in Carmarthenshire, not in Cardiganshire; and I am further informed that these outrages have nothing to do with the collection of tithe rent-charge; and the vicarage is now protected. I have given a good deal of time and attention to the state of things in this county, and have endeavoured by personal interviews with the different authorities concerned to bring about a more harmonious and effective co-operation between them. I gather from the latest Reports that there has been substantial improvement in the facility with which the law is executed. The main difficulty lies, as I have often pointed out, in the defective character of the remedy which the Act of Parliament provides.

DR. GRIGSBY.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the Report of the examination of the Directors of the Solicitors Government Trust Company by the Official Receiver on 19th February; and whether Dr. Grigsby is to resume his duties as Judge in Cyprus?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The Secretary of State has carefully considered Dr. Grigsby's case; and, on a review of all the circumstances before him, he arrived at the conclusion that Dr. Grigsby should be allowed to resume his duties.

COMPULSORY RETIREMENT IN QUEEN'S COLLEGES.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of certain legal difficulties in the interpretation of the Order in Council prescribing compulsory retirement at 65, it has been decided to apply the principle of the Order to the Queen's Colleges and Queen's Letters; whether all officials now in office have been exempted from the operation of the Queen's Letters; will he explain why this exemption has been made, seeing that it is in direct conflict with the recommendation of the Royal Commission, which states that compulsory retirement at a specified age is absolutely necessary; with the Report of the Committee of Public Accounts, which states that such a Rule is absolutely necessary in the case of the Queen's Colleges; and with the opinion of the Treasury expressed in 1891, and then concurred in by the Lord-Lieutenant, that the Rule should be applied to the Colleges; and whether payments out of Parliamentary Votes have been, or will be, made to those officials disqualified by age?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The Government are anxious to prevent the Presidents and Professors of the Queen's Colleges from continuing to hold office after they have become by age or infirmity less competent for the performance of their important and responsible duties. The Law Officers of the Crown in Ireland have, however, advised that the Presidents and Professors are not within the terms of the Order in Council of August 15, 1890, and that the retirement of the present holders on the ground of age, or the discontinuance of payments from the Vote of Parliament to which they are entitled, cannot be enforced under the terms of the Order. As regards the future, the Irish Government has undertaken to make it a condition of appointment in every case that the appointee shall retire at the age of 65, with an extension of not more than five years in any case in which the Treasury is satisfied that an earlier retirement would be detrimental to the interests of the Public Service.

THE NAVAL RESERVE.

MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether Her Majesty's ships Superb and Galatea have now returned from their cruise to Shetland for the purpose of training the Naval Reserve there; what number of men of the Naval Reserve have undergone the course of training in each of these ships respectively; and what has been the cost to the country of sending these ships on this duty?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: These ships have not visited Shetland. The Galatea has returned from Lerwick, and the Superb from Stornoway. Only four men of the Naval Reserve have undergone the course of training in the Galatea, and none in the Superb. This is the first year of an experiment new to the men. Unfortunately, the season turned out to be inopportune, and the inducements offered seem not to have been considered sufficient to make the men volunteer. This service has entailed no additional expense to the country, the cost of the fuel expended being covered by the amount provided in the Estimates for the ordinary cruising of these ships.

Mr. Asquith

ACCIDENTS TO RAILWAY SERVANTS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will consider the advisability of requiring Railway Companies, in making Returns of accidents to railway servants under Section 6 of the Act of 1871, to state whether an injury arising from an accident is of a temporary or permanent character; and whether, in the latter case, he will in future direct Railway Companies to send in, after a suitable interval, further Returns showing the then condition of the injured railway servant, and stating whether the injury has resulted in permanent disablement?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): I have appointed a Committee to consider the question of the Accident Returns, and the points raised by my hon. Friend shall receive the consideration of that Committee.

THE TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he expects to receive the Report of the Departmental Committee upon the working of the Telegraph Department at an early date?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): The Committee, I am informed, are now considering their Report, and I have reason to believe that it will be in my hands in a few weeks. I ought to add, however, that the Committee, which was mainly intended to inquire into the possibility of introducing economy into the Service, will report for the information and guidance of the Department, and it is not consequently certain that their Report will be one which can properly be laid before Parliament.

PASSENGER FARES ON THE LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY.

MR. BENN (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company's ordinary first and second-class passenger maxima were raised $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per mile by the Act (Local and Personal) of 1868, c. 134; that these maxima are higher than those of the London and North-Western Railway Company and many other Companies; that the Company runs more trains without third-class carriages attached than all the other railways of England put together; and that competition with the South Eastern Railway Company is precluded by an agreement sanctioned by the Act of 1890, c. 39; and whether he will undertake to introduce a clause in the Company's Bill now before Parliament which shall provide for a return to the Company's former passenger maxima, and also for the carriage of third-class passengers by all the Company's trains?

MR. MUNDELLA: The Board of Trade have not received complaints as to the manner in which the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway manage their passenger traffic. I am not prepared to introduce a clause into a Bill of a particular Company to repeal ~~laws~~ which have already received the sanction of Parliament. To compel this Company to carry third-class passengers by all trains would impair the facilities, both as to expedition and cost, afforded by the Company to the public.

ANTHRAX.

MR. FELLOWES (Hunts, Ramsey): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the recommendation made by the Central Chamber of Agriculture last November, and by other Agricultural Bodies, that Local Authorities should be empowered, in the case of the death of an animal from anthrax, to award to the owner the market value of the carcase (not to exceed £1), has been adopted; and, if not, whether he will state the objection, if any, to its adoption as a means of securing early notice of outbreaks of the disease? At the same time, I may ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in view of the greatly-increased prevalence of anthrax and the serious consequences of the disease not only to live stock, but in some cases to human beings also, he is prepared to appoint a Departmental Committee to consider how far it is possible to adopt further measures for its prevention?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): The recommendation to which the hon. Member refers could not be carried out without legislation; but, in any case, I do not think its adoption would be of any material assistance in preventing the spreading of disease. I cannot conveniently state the objections to the proposal within the limits of an answer to a question; but if the hon. Member will communicate with me personally I shall be happy to explain them to him, and I may also refer him to the letter I addressed to the Central Chamber of Agriculture on the subject on the 22nd of November last. With regard to the suggestion for the appointment of a Departmental Committee, which the hon. Member makes in a separate question on the subject, I shall be happy to consider whether such an inquiry would be of advantage; but I wish, in the first instance, to be in possession of certain Reports for which I have called respecting the feasibility of inoculation for anthrax, and as to the measures adopted in foreign countries to prevent the spreading of the disease.

CLASSIFICATION IN THE DOCKYARDS.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he will state whether the system of classification has been abolished in Her Majesty's Dockyards?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee) (who replied) said: If the hon. Member will refer to page 5 of Parliamentary Paper, 429, he will find a list of the trades in which classification has been abolished.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: Then, is the announcement which has appeared in the papers incorrect?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: No fresh additions have been made since last year.

BANDS IN THE ROYAL PARKS.

MR. AIRD (Paddington, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if arrangements can be made for bands to play in the Royal Parks, similar to the arrangements made by the County Council in the Parks under their control, on Saturday afternoons and on general holidays?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. H. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): Arrangements have been made under which bands play at certain times in Hyde Park, Regent's Park, and Greenwich Park. The expenses are defrayed by private effort, as no public money is provided for the purpose. I am in full sympathy with the object of the hon. Member, and will see what more can be done.

BOARD OF TRADE RULES.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn, Regis): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Rules made by the Board of Trade, and laid upon the Table of this House on the 13th of March last, were prepared and advised upon by a committee of 12 persons constituted as required by "The Merchant Shipping (Life Saving Appliances) Act, 1888," or, if not, how and by whom they were prepared and advised upon?

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes, Sir.

GAME LAW PROSECUTIONS AT DINGWALL.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he is aware that, in the case of trespass for game tried on the 13th February last before Sheriff Hill, at Dingwall, in which Baron Middleton, of Applecross, was the plaintiff, and William Mackenzie, Ardneaskan, was defendant, the only witness for the prosecution was a game watcher named Macbeath, who admitted that his knowledge of English was very limited, while Sheriff Hill, who sentenced Mackenzie, had no knowledge of Gaelic; and whether there is any interpreter attached to the Court House at Dingwall; if not, whether it is proposed to engage the services of competent interpreters at those places where Sheriffs are ignorant of the language of the people?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.): I am informed that Macbeath was the only witness in this case, but that it is not the fact that his knowledge of English was very limited; that, on the contrary, he was examined and cross-examined in English—which he spoke quite easily—and that it was never suggested, either by himself or by the agent of the accused, that he should be examined in Gaelic. There is no interpreter attached to the Court House at Dingwall, but the Sheriff Clerk Depute, or some other competent person, is employed to act as interpreter in the comparatively rare cases in which an interpreter is required.

THE BLACKWATER FISHERY.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, as it is doubtful if the "culch" in the Blackwater, Essex, is Crown property, and as action calculated to lead to riot is being taken by the Tollesbury fishermen against the Burnham dredgers for removing it, he will protect the Burnham men in the exercise of rights hitherto admittedly legal, and which are necessary to them in the conduct of their trade?

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon): Could not these public fishing-grounds be protected by putting in force the Crown rights?

MR. MUNDELLA: Whatever may be the merits of the claims involved in this case, it is not within the province of the Board of Trade to determine them. The protection of those who may be disturbed in the exercise of legal rights is a matter for the police, and I understand that proceedings before Magistrates are now pending.

MR. DODD: Has the right hon. Gentleman taken the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on the subject?

MR. MUNDELLA: I believe that has been done.

CROWN ESTATES.

MR. YERBURGH (Chester): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will undertake that on the Crown Estates, so far as is consistent with the requirements of the farms, the cottages of the labourers shall be held direct from the Crown?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) (who replied) said: As stated in the Report of 1890 from the Select Committee on the Woods and Forests, the present practice of the Commissioner of Woods, &c., is to let to the farmers such cottages as are necessary for their farms, and any others not so required would be usually let by the Commissioner direct to labourers or artisans.

MR. YERBURGH gave notice that he would on another occasion address to the right hon. Gentleman a question dealing with assertions made in a certain publication on this subject.

THE SALTCOATS CROFTER SETTLEMENTS.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he has yet had an opportunity of conferring with Sir Charles Tupper on the grievances of the Saltcoats (Canada) Crofter Settlers; and, if so, will he state the result?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow Bridgeton): I have conferred with Sir Charles Tupper since his return from Canada. Sir Charles Tupper is preparing a Report on the Crofter Settlements in that country, which will be presented to Parliament in due course.

MEAT IMPORTS.

SIR H. MAXWELL (Wigton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he is now able to announce the result of his consultation with the President of the Board of Trade in regard to American and foreign meat imports; and whether any steps will be taken by these Departments to enforce the laws framed to protect British producers and consumers from fraudulent trading?

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): At the same time, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, having regard to the Report of a Committee of the House of Lords on the marking of foreign meat, Her Majesty's Government will take steps with the object of preventing the fraudulent practice of selling foreign meat as meat of home production, whereby great injustice is done to farmers, particularly to those in the North of Scotland?

MR. H. GARDNER: In reply to the hon. Baronet, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Elgin, I would say that as the result of the best consideration we have been able to give to this matter, we have come to the conclusion that the law as it stands ought to be sufficient to prevent fraudulent misrepresentation as to origin in the case of meat, and what I would suggest is that home producers should utilise their various Organisations with a view to bring under the notice of my right hon. Friend cases in which there is evidence to show that the Merchandise Marks Acts have been infringed, or themselves take action in the same way as the Bacon Curer's Association have recently done so successfully. The Board of Trade have the power to prosecute in cases in which the general interests of a section of the community or of a trade are affected; but the Board of Trade cannot exercise this power unless they are moved to do so in specific instances.

SIR H. MAXWELL: Are these recommendations intended to apply to such feeders as the crofters of the Western Highlands and the farmers of Aberdeenshire?

MR. H. GARDNER: There are such bodies as the Highland and Agricultural Society, which can take up the matter.

RAILWAY COMMUNICATION IN ROSS-SHIRE.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is now prepared to give effect to the conditional promise made by the late right hon. W. H. Smith, M.P., to provide for the development of railway communication on the western mainland of Ross-shire?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I have nothing to add to the answer which I gave on March the 9th last year.

MR. WEIR: Will the Government appoint a Committee to consider the question, as was done by the late Government?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Government see no occasion for appointing another Committee.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER.

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, considering the labours now devolving upon the Chair of this House, he will consider the desirability of appointing a Deputy Speaker in addition to the Chairman of Committees?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Government have had the matter under consideration, but have formed no opinion on it.

Mr. H. Gardner

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S): that his Motion for the appointment of a Committee to consider and report on the procedure, practice, and forms of business of the House was dictated not by party considerations but purely by business considerations. Such Committees had been previously formed, and there was an impression that their proceedings had not been of much value, but, after a careful comparison of their proposals with the present Standing Orders of the House, he had come to the conclusion that many of their suggestions had proved valuable, and he proposed to incorporate with advantage in the Standing Orders of Parliament. Moreover, time had elapsed, and some of the recommendations of such Committees, which, when they had been in advance of public opinion, might now with advantage be reconsidered in the light of more experience. And he was also of opinion that, but for what such Committees had effected, the present state of parliamentary business might have been worse than it was. Such experience showed that business in the House of Commons had become more and more congested, and one of the Committees had reported that this feature of parliamentary life would be likely to increase rather than diminish. There were more speakers, and the Session was longer; indeed, it might be said that there were practically no vacations, as Parliament had been for nearly 12 months in almost permanent session. Yet, notwithstanding this sacrifice on the part of Members, the promises of Parliament were being less and less fulfilled. The programmes of Committees on each side of the House were but slightly carried into effect. The list of promises was of performances, extremely short. In the case of non-official Members, the proportion of promises fulfilled was almost infinitesimal, inasmuch as during last Session 309 such motions were introduced, while only 23 were passed. Even for the completion financial work of the year, the Government had been dependent upon the courtesy of the Opposition, and, while such cordial relations had an excellent effect on business, they could not be relied upon amid the stress of Party feeling. Yet Governments were constantly promising what it must be known could not be performed, and thus public opinion was greatly misled and public misapprehension produced. Equally, non-official Members were encouraged by the existing Rules to what he would call trying their luck at legislation. Some hundreds ballotted for the chances, and yet it was well known that, under the circumstances of the most favourable Session, only 10 or 15 places were worth having, and this year there were not more than five. Yet Members gave their time, and the time of the public, to the ballot. They remained midnight after midnight on the off-chance of passing a Bill, notwithstanding the fact that, even if they were successful in the ballot, nevertheless, if the measure was opposed, it could not possibly pass through all its stages in the House of Commons, as was indicated in the case of the Sites for Public Worship Bills of the last Session. Hence, there was a strong and growing feeling both inside and outside the House of Commons that, if Parliamentary institutions were not to be endangered, there must be some change—some reform. The Prime Minister himself, in his recent speech at Edinburgh, frankly admitted, and, indeed, invited such proposals. The Prime Minister was, beyond doubt, sincere in this, and meant what he said. Moreover, he expressed a general public feeling, and he impressed upon the Government the duty on this occasion of following their own Prime Minister's recommendation by helping forward this Motion both in the House and in Committee. What, then, were the chief evils and their causes? They were: pressure of Parliamentary work out of all proportion to Parliamentary time, the want of business-like economy in dealing with that time, and the ever-present and all-pervading element of chance and uncertainty. It might not be possible to eliminate chance entirely, but he protested against making it, as they did, a principle of action. For instance, non-official Members' Bills and Motions, which had been useful in the past as themes of discussions, and as suggestions, and which, in many cases, had been carried into legislation with the best effect, were subjected to a series of chances and uncertainties. The first chance was the ballot itself. Was there always "a survival of the fittest" Bills? Some were good, but sometimes Wednesdays were wasted by talk on proposals which had no chance whatever of becoming law, which were even talked upon to stave off more important propositions, and which were sometimes put down with that very object, to which, unfortunately, the forms of the House too often lent themselves. This was the real origin of the Bill - Syndicates, which, though irregular, had at least the excuse of being organisations to forward the more important measures. Again, on Tuesdays and Fridays Motions were often dealt with in just the same way, and, as a result, they had those "counts-out" which often destroyed an evening's work when it was too late to devote the time to any other purpose, one remedy for which would be to count out a useless Motion, instead of the House, and then to proceed to the next Order. The second chance was the prospect that Governments might at any moment take the whole time of the House, indeed often Government work was so pressing that they must have it. Governments were always on the "pounce" for this purpose, as they were thought to be even last night. And, thirdly, when Bills came on at midnight, their being taken, even if entirely non-contentious, was still a matter of the greatest doubt. He admitted the objections to late Sitings; he himself had had no reason to complain; indeed, he acknowledged the courtesy of the House in permitting the passing of so many of his own Bills, and, personally, he was as much opposed as anyone to unduly late Sitings, except for the formal passage of unopposed, or, as he would rather call them, uncontentious Bills. If there was a real objection to them he had nothing to say, but he had gathered from a recent exclamation, as well as from Members themselves, that there were some on his side of the House who were opposed to all such legislation. He understood this feeling, though he did not share it, but, on the contrary, considered that legislation had advanced, and might more advance, the welfare of " people. Moreover, the Standing Orders contemplated the passage after 12 o'clock of uncontentious Bills, and he certainly objected to all progress being stopped by the simple words, on the part of a single Member, of "I object," especially when the objecting Member had not even read the Bill. He therefore proposed, though only suggestively, and, as in all cases, for the consideration of the Committee, that an effort should be made to reduce the elements of chance and caprice, and to secure more certainty, and that this might be effected by some system of selection in favour of the Bills which were relatively the more important and useful.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: How?

SIR A. ROLLIT: Well, it might be done in many ways, one of which was by Members undersigning the Bills which they approved upon a list in the Library, on the same principle as they now backed them. Or, by requiring more than one, say 10, Members to give notice of opposition, as had been suggested by the hon. Member for Rushcliffe, and, indeed, the Speaker had already effected an improvement, which he heartily acknowledged, in giving time to Members to disarm opposition by a few words in explanation of their Bills. And there were other ways in which time might be saved and obstacles removed. There was what was called "obstruction," which came from both sides of the House, and which he need not define. With such dilatory tactics he had no sympathy, though he had no objection whatever to deliberate discussion, for which time must be gained by the removal of obstruction. St. Paul had said, "the strength of sin is the law," and the strength of obstruction was the present law of Parliament. The remedy was to strike at inducements to, and at the motives of, obstruction. For example, even now, if the Twelve o'clock Rule were suspended, merely in terrorem, the effect was magical, because Members knew that the time must come at some period of the early morning when there must be an end of the discussion. Consequently, they obstructed no longer, and generally all was over by midnight. It was the same with that somewhat barbarous instrument the guillotine. When once applied was effective, but its application involve debate, in which time was often lost rather than gained, and in the Part struggle the merits were often wholly lost sight of. Hence, the guillotine was injurious, but there was very much to be said for producing its effect beforehand and that considerately and impartially by allotting a certain time to sections of Bill, and to the Bill itself, through the action of the Speaker, aided by a Committee, such as the Committee of Selection. By this means, discussions would be devoted to the main points of measure instead of often leaving them wholly unconsidered. But perhaps it might be necessary to take some securities for points developed during the Debate, by giving power to the Speaker to extend the time; indeed, he was in favour himself of giving much greater powers to the Chairman, as in the case of other public assemblies. Moreover, if the limitation of the time prevented some points being discussed, there were still many other stages in which this might be remedied. Again, suggestively, the carrying over and on from one Session to another of Bills in progress, upon a Resolution moved by the Minister or Member in charge, might prevent their destruction and the consequent waste of public time, and remove a great incentive to Party obstruction. The last long Session of nearly 18 months showed that Sessions were, after all, only arbitrary divisions of time, and an incidental advantage would be the limitation of the necessity for the Closure. The Chambers of Commerce had resolved 10 times in favour of thus carrying over Bills, and again this year; and they had been actuated by the yearly fate of such an important industrial measure as the Bill for Exempting Machinery and Tools from Rating, a subject which had received attention in most competing countries. This Bill had several times passed its Second Reading, and early last Session by a majority of 173, yet it never got further. Lord Salisbury had said that the practice of measures dying with each Session was as sensible as that of a business man who should annually destroy and recommence all his unfinished correspondence; and out of the 15 National Assemblies of Europe 12, and also the United States, had adopted the more modern practice he had suggested, which had vindicated itself by experience. Much, too, might be said for similarly carrying over measures from day to day, as in other public assemblies, as being likely to get more omnibuses to their journey's end instead of their jostling each other to pieces by overcrowding Temple Bar. Again, much more devolution was wanted. Private Bill legislation ought to be delegated to Commissions or to the Town and County Councils, and at the last meeting of the Chambers of Commerce—which were formed of business men and men versed in public life—the voices from every part of Ireland—from Belfast to Dublin and Cork and from all political Parties—from Scotland and from England, were universally favourable to at least this form of business-like Home Rule. These views he urged in the Debate on Scotch Committees last night, and he would now only add that the Estimates might well go to a Standing Committee. The time in Supply was greatly increasing, owing very much to the encroachments by the Government on the time of non-official Members, who were forced to take this opportunity of airing and redressing grievances. Thus, in 1869 the Civil Service Estimates were in Committee of Supply for 16 days, and in 1887 for 31 days; and this rate was progressive. True, in Supply, attention was given not only to finance, but also to points of policy and administration, and this was of value. But such discussion was desultory; the reductions of expenditure were utterly inadequate to the period expended on them; and, as the Secretary for India had said, there was a waste of public time to little or no purpose in preventing a waste of public money. Through a Committee there would be real revision of expenditure; the officials might be examined; and the saving of time in Supply would give much greater opportunities of raising Motions for redress directly, and for securing their regular and adequate discussion. There was, indeed, already a plethora of such opportunities in the various stages of Supply—on first going into Committee, on the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair, on Votes on Account—when discussion was most discursive, as it was on Supplementary Estimates and on the various stages of the Appropriation Bill, and also on Report of Supply. Surely all this was more than sufficient, if the time were economically and profitably used. And, indeed, the Committee of 1886 had recommended that every Public Bill should be referred to a Standing Committee (as was generally the case in the Lords), and that in one of such several Committees the Bills of non-official Members should have precedence, the Committees meeting on Thursdays and Fridays in the day time, and the House at 9 in the evening. These were all matters worth the consideration of a Committee, as were some of the technicalities, and what he might call the anachronisms, as well as the many anomalies, of present Parliamentary procedure. To learn that procedure was almost the work of a lifetime, which no business man could give, and the practice ought to be simplified and more closely adapted to modern life and to the procedure of other Public Bodies. For instance, there were the ancient forms in introducing Bills. These had been recently somewhat shortened and improved, but the discussion of the subject had consumed much of the time of the House, and the result had shown that there was still need for more consideration and change. After the ballot Members had to march to the Bar, just as they did two centuries ago.

Sir A. Rollit

LORD R. CHURCHILL: Hear, hear.

SIR A. ROLLIT: Yes, but in the reign of William and Mary time was more plentiful than now; and the rule was frequently broken by Members not going to the Bar at all, but only a yard or two from their places, and then countermarching to the Table. Next, the Order Paper, carefully prepared though it was by the Speaker and the Clerks, was dictated by ancient precedents. Once, no doubt from its name, it indicated the actual order of business, but now it was almost misleading to any but those who were experts in Parliamentary procedure. Then, the recent discussions of Lords Amendments showed that the system was cumbersome and restrictive of those opportunities for the adjustment of differences between the Houses which ought always to be effected, for the sake of both and of the country, f at all possible without sacrifice of principle. The reasons given for Amendments, compiled in a sham Committee meeting held behind the Chair, were often the very worst reasons, only worthy of such a mock proceeding; and the obstacles to conferences were such as to practically prevent them. Such a proceeding on Privilege as that of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington the other day—

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I raised it to test the validity of the Rules.

*SIR A. ROLLIT: I only need to say that the noble Lord raised it, not why he raised it, and I was going to thank him for having shown that the Sessional Order against Peers taking part in elections was an annual sham; as was the like Order of the House threatening Members with every severity for bribery and corruption, which was obsolete now that, by the Act of the right hon. Member for Bury, the House's judicial jurisdiction was delegated to the Judges, the annual Order being merely a relic of a procedure which was once a real one, but is no longer so, and one which could now hardly be constitutionally placed in operation. Lastly, the process as to Petitions was almost a misleading of the public. The Press even did not now notice them, as it once did. They were seldom if ever read; they were plunged into the dark profundity of a bag behind the Chair; and yet it was discovered the other night upon the Estimates that the cost of counting these Petitions was some hundreds a year, and the cost of printing what was seldom, if ever, read might be some thousands. He would be the last to propose to abrogate the ancient and once useful right of public petition, but he did propose to reform and make it real, and to put an end to an idle form and a useless expenditure. Other Committees had sat, and done good work, but experience was constantly extending. New conditions and circumstances affected the House like other institutions, and, with a view to the speedy and efficient despatch of public business—for public time was not their own, but the nation's—it was necessary that the House should possess itself of the most effective means of conducting its business and proceedings. Hon. Members were there in the performance of great public duties, at great cost of both time and money; they occupied both public time and attention; and anything in the forms and procedure which detracted from the public estimation of the services or tended to create misapprehension ought to be ended. He there asked the House, which had indulgent, to agree with him that there were grounds for inquiry, consideration and report by a Select Committee, to take the opportunity of more economically utilising public time, of lessening what might be a source even of danger to the State, and of adding usefulness and dignity of Parliamentary institutions. The hon. Member concluded by moving for a Select Committee.

Sir A. Rollit

*SIR C. W. DILKE (Forest of Dean): There was one expression which I must say I should dissent from my hon. Friend in respect of the noble Lord (Lord R. Churchill) who dissented. He said that there was a strong and general feeling in the House and outside the House with respect to the cumbersome methods of which we adopt. The noble Lord dissented, and I must say I should dissent, because I do not agree with my hon. Friend, whose Motion it is, that there is any strong feeling in this House as to our cumbersome proceedings. No one can be faulted with our way of using them as to our proceedings outside the House of Commons. It is an almost unanimous agreement that our way of using them are disgracefully bad. If we were to offer any proof of this, it would give, for example, in moving the adjournment and so bringing some subject, not however general (tended) of a sudden such as would bear postponement of the House, in lieu of being pointed for the day. It is intended when the Fortnightly meeting emergency. The consideration of the early Vote on Account every Vote on Account is far too fully, and the later Votes at all is the period of the year of the House. The theory is that we sit during the season, and Members take their houses upon that theory. The practice is beginning to be that we sit all the year round, and I venture to prophesy that in the present year, if the Government survive the Budget, we shall sit, as we did last year, throughout the autumn. There is a great deal of chance about our proceedings which gives a portion of our time to the Government, the organised opposition being able to select another portion—but only for the sterile purpose of moving Votes of Censure, while private Members are left to the chance of a chance, to individualism run mad—a single Member by the luck of the ballot obtaining the time which he may mis-spend. Our Forms are not business-like. The Assembly is less business-like than any County Council or Town Council in the country; and the democracy, or, to be precise, the new voters, enfranchised in 1867 and 1885, have never had the smallest sympathy with us in our inability to transact our work. One of their Representatives in this House, the hon. Member for Battersea, in a most able recent speech upon this subject in London, took a view which is almost exactly similar to that of the most experienced of our Chairmen of Committees, my right hon. Friend the Member for the Bodmin Division of Cornwall, and to the view taken by those very experienced gentlemen the Clerks at the Table, as expressed in the evidence of two of them before several Select Committees, and in the suggestions which have been made by Mr. Milman at various times. There was only one point in which I myself differed from my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea, as there is no point in which I differ from the gentlemen at the Table and from my right hon. Friend. I am content, in the great difficulty of selecting arbiters of our proceedings, to fully trust the Speaker of the House from time to time, as he is both the choice of the whole House and the natural protector of every minority. It is much easier, however, to point out the extent of the disease than to bring about agreement upon the remedy. The various Committees which have sat have made many suggestions which have not been adopted, besides those which have. The Committee of 1886 suggested that every Bill should go to a Standing Committee unless otherwise ordered, and accompanied this proposal to divide the whole House into Standing Committees by suggestions, which I believe had the great authority of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin, for getting rid of that private business which the House no longer transacts as well as it once did. The Committee of 1888 appeared to share the views of the Committee of 1886, but also desired that the Estimates, or at least certain Classes and certain Votes on other Classes, should go to Grand Committee. The Committee of 1890 made suggestions which were far less unanimous than those of the Committees of 1886 and 1888, for they were carried against the Liberal Party, I myself agreeing with the majority of the Committee and not with my Party upon the subject, and they were for the carrying over of Bills. Since 1890 we have had a complete breakdown of Committee Closure, which it has been found impracticable to make use of in the manner which was undoubtedly intended by the House, and I say this as a strong friend of Closure, which I have supported for a great number of years, whichever Party was in power. But here I speak for myself only. To me it seems (although holding extreme views I am generally in a minority) that the House should be looked upon as a place of business, and not as a place of display, and that the democratic constituencies are far from agreeing with those in this House who look upon it mainly as an enjoyable arena of Debate. No one, I think, who was present throughout the proceedings in Committee on the Local Government Bill can think that they were wholly satisfactory, and, from my own experience of Select Committees and of Standing Committees, I cannot have a doubt but that the Bill would have emerged from Committee and come to the House on Report in a more workable form had it been examined by such tribunals, especially if there were power (which exists in most other countries) for the direct consultation by the Committee on technical points of the Government draftsman and experts. Against the evils of chance in private Members' time the private Members of the House have been fighting by means of syndicate balloting, a practice, however, which has been condemned in the strongest terms from the Chair as a gross evasion of the Forms. This in itself seems to me a sufficient base for inquiry by a Committee. If we could agree upon nothing else than to make, on behalf of private Members of this House, practical proposals for the allocation of private Members' time by a reasonable system of preference as against chance, I think that there would be a full justification for our proceedings of to-day. The Leader of the House has declared in the House that he thinks syndicate balloting (but for the former condemnation of the Speaker) a useful means of expressing preference. We are at present working by a rough plan, and are obliged to use rough means on behalf of private Members for forcing on the Government those measures on which the largest numbers of us are agreed—such as the Miners' Eight Hours, for which we are going to obtain time this year. But surely it does not transcend the resources of our statesmanship to find apt and scientific means of doing that which we all wish to do. The Committee of 1888 dealt with this matter in its evidence, though, strictly speaking, it lay outside the scope of the Committee, which was on Estimates. The Committee went far beyond Estimates, and had placed before it plans of the gentlemen at the Table and of my right hon. Friend the Member for the Bodmin Division of Cornwall, for underwriting Motions. Perhaps this is not the best form for carrying out our end, but surely we must all concur that power ought to be given to groups rather than to mere individuals—some proportion of the time to large groups, and some to small. There is a great deal to say for the view that half-a-dozen gentlemen ought to have their chance of bringing questions before Parliament. But in these days of pressure there is not much to say for the view that a single individual, who cannot obtain the support of any other, should be able to prevent business by monopolising its time; and at the present moment not only are private Members' days themselves an uncertain quantity, but success in the ballot is a chance upon a chance. Any power of the House to exhibit preference should apply to Bills as well as Motions. Some years ago, I think at the suggestion of one of the gentlemen at the Table, I was able to induce Sir Stafford Northcote's Committee to adopt the plan which is now observed of giving preference after Whitsuntide to the Bills which have passed through their first stages. This is the concession of the principle, and could easily be extended, and I have also seen a suggestion, which I believe also has the authority of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin, that we should do well to give a certain proportion of our Wednesdays to small and uncontentious Bills which have reasonable chance of passing—Bills which would be allowed to remain in this class according to their freedom from unpopularity evinced by their not being under-written against. To sum up our suggestions, we press for the principle of preference by large groups and small groups of Members, as against the mere individual Member, and for the business aspect of the House against the show point of view.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report upon the procedure, practice, and forms of the House and Committees."
—(Sir A. Rollit.)

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.) said, that the right hon. Baronet opposite, like the hon. Member for Islington, had dealt entirely in paradox and generalities and had not descended to details. Though he had listened most attentively to the speeches just delivered he had been unable to discover that the subject had been treated by the speakers apart from generalities. He would deal for a moment, in the first place, with the statement of the hon. Member for Islington as to the private Members' Bills introduced last year. The hon. Member had stated that of 369 private Members' Bills introduced last year only about 20 had passed.

SIR A. ROLLIT: Twenty-three.

LORD R. CHURCHILL said, the hon. Member had left out a most important reason, which was the fact that the Home Rule Bill occupied 80 days, and that the rest of the Session was given up to Supply. How could 369 Bills, or any large proportion of them, have any chance in such a Session? The right hon. Baronet and the hon. Member said that the ballot operated unfavourably to legislation by private Members, and the former said that the country was largely in favour of private Members' Bills being advanced and thought that the time allotted to private Members should be enlarged.

Sir C. W. Dilke

SIR A. ROLLIT, said, he must take exception to the noble Lord's statement; he was under an entire misapprehension as to what had really been said.

SIR C. W. DILKÉ also disclaimed the purport of the remarks attributed to him. He had said nothing of the kind, but that the system of procedure was most unworkmanlike.

LORD R. CHURCHILL said that, at all events, the general tendency of the two speeches was to impress upon the House that not only the House ought to be unanimous on this point, but that there was a strong feeling in the country about it. He had gone about the country a great deal—nobody went about the country more than he did last year—and he never met with anybody, any ordinary intelligent elector, who could explain what a private Members' Bill was. It was a most absurd name to give, and the ordinary elector had never heard of such a thing. The hon. Baronet had asserted that there was a strong popular feeling in favour of a great reform in the procedure of the House of Commons; but he questioned that statement from his own experience of public opinion. The hon. Member proposed that the range of discussion on the initiative of private Members should be enlarged by some process, which, however, he did not indicate. Personally, he held that the use of Bills introduced by private Members was this—and it had been slightly hinted at by the right hon. Baronet—that subjects should be brought under the notice of the House and pressed upon its attention from year to year, until finally, if the Bills were in fact wanted, if they were really wise Bills, both parties would take them up and they would ultimately be carried. He had known several instances of that having occurred. It was absolutely impossible for the Government nowadays to afford sufficient time for the discussion of private Members' Bills, even if their Bills were excellent, and nobody could devise a scheme which would enable them to do so. The present Government would very soon be compelled by the pressure of circumstances to make the usual raid on the time of private Members, partly on account of the late period at which the Session opened, and partly on account of the immense amount of business to be got through. The hon. Member suggested that on the Opposition side of the House the feeling was unfavourable to private Members' legislation, but he would find that that statement was quite unfounded.

*SIR A. ROLLIT said, he was very reluctant to again interrupt the noble Lord, but he was not aware that he had said anything of the kind.

LORD R. CHURCHILL was alluding to the statement that an opinion was entertained on that side of the House that legislation was undesirable.

SIR A. ROLLIT assured the noble Lord that he had only said that an opinion was entertained by some Members on that side of the House. The noble Lord would, of course, accept his assurance.

LORD R. CHURCHILL would pass on. The right hon. Baronet wanted to supersede the Ballot. There was a good deal to be said for and against the Ballot, but it was rather odd that one of the most Radical Members of the House should wish to do without any system of ballot. A system of selection, however, might operate most unfairly on a minority. Whatever measures were adopted, the majority on a Committee would correspond with the majority in the House, and that majority would take care that the Bills of private Members in the minority should not proceed. That would be a very great hindrance to the equality of Members, and a great injustice; but the Ballot prevented that, for it gave everybody an equal chance; it gave the same chance to the minority as to the majority. They should not rashly and without thought adopt a proposal which would rule the House of Commons for it was impossible to say how many years. He pointed out that the procedure of the House of Commons had never been dealt with except under the Leaders of the Government, and generally with the support of the Opposition. He thought that some Committee had been appointed to consider the procedure of that House, and the character of those Committees was remarkable. They were composed of the most experienced Members of the House, but the Mover and Seconder of this Motion had given no indication whatever as to who should constitute the proposed Committee. Nothing could be more dangerous than that Members not well acquainted, as some Members of the House could not be well acquainted, with the Rules and Forms of the House and with its general procedure should decide what their new Rules, if any were adopted, should be. No man was a stronger opponent of constant alteration of the Rules of Procedure than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. That was his attitude up to last Session, when, no doubt, great alterations were made in order to pass the Home Rule Bill. Up to that time no one was more averse to the alteration of the Rules of the House than the right hon. Gentleman. When it was proposed to carry on Bills from one Session to another, the right hon. Gentleman was absolutely opposed to the suggestion. In 1881 and 1882 the right hon. Gentleman made alterations in procedure. He was Prime Minister at that time, and there was trouble with the Irish Party, who were very strong. A Coercion Bill was being passed in 1881 and certain Rules of Urgency were adopted. From an authoritative source he had received the information that those Rules were passed on the initiative of the Chair. In 1892 the Closure was passed, and that also rested on the initiative of the Speaker. The procedure of the late Government was on this wise. The late Government passed the Closure in 1887 in much the same form as it had been passed in 1882, but it rested with the Speaker as well as with the Chairman of Committees whether the Motion should be put. It never was intended, he thought, except for the great political purpose of the Party opposite of carrying the Home Rule Bill, that the Closure should be used for the purpose of oppression or tyranny, but simply when the course of business became embarrassing. The late Government also passed in 1888 15 new Rules, the best which had ever been passed for regulating their business. He protested against the theory of the right hon. Baronet with regard to dealing with little Bills. They were often more contentious than big Bills.

*SIR C. W. DILKE desired to state what he really did say. He merely endorsed a suggestion of his right hon. Friend with regard to small Bills which had met with more than a certain measure of opposition.

Lord R. Churchill

LORD R. CHURCHILL said, the interruptions showed that he was very unfortunate in his appreciation of what had been said. He protested against placing small Bills on a level with large Bills such as the Eight Hours Bill. He thought there should be a Ballot and that private Members' time should be extended as much as possible. The time was always very contracted—it was certainly never too large. He had never known a period when private Members' time was not encroached upon by the existing Government. To put the reform of procedure into the hands of private Members without the concurrence of the Leaders of the Opposition would be the gravest departure from precedent ever adopted by the House of Commons.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) said, he agreed with the noble Lord that the term "private Members" was an absurd phrase. They were all public Members, and he was glad to see that in the latest edition of Sir Erskine May's book the term used was "unofficial Members," which seemed to him to convey a much more accurate description of the position occupied by those who were not Members of the Government. He thought also that a proposal of this character should be brought forward under the aegis of the Government, and no Committee would command any confidence unless a commanding Member of the Government was its Chairman. At the same time, he did not concur with the optimistic view expressed by the noble Lord (Lord R. Churchill) of the present position. He cordially endorsed all that had fallen from the Mover and Seconder of the Motion with respect to opinion outside concerning Parliamentary procedure. He was bound to say there was a large amount of impatient bewilderment out of doors, and it seemed to him that the necessity of some further devolution of business was self-evident. The situation had become almost intolerable from its uncertainty. This matter affected the Government just as much as it affected unofficial Members. During the last eight or 10 years Queen's Speeches had always contained five or times as many measures as could possibly be carried into law. No stronger condemnation of the procedure of the use of Commons could be found as in that single fact. The case in regard to non-contentious measures was even more serious. During a Session of Parliament there were Committees appointed by the Government dealing with matters in which the House, at least, had very great interest, and which were not Party matters at all. The Committee on Railway Rates spent a great many days, and after the most exhaustive inquiry with practical unanimity adopted a Report drawn by the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre). The President of the Board of Trade had announced that a Bill, founded on the recommendation of the Committee, would be brought before the House; but everybody knew that in the present state of business, and with the present procedure, it was almost useless to expect a good Railway Rates Bill. Then the Committee on Building Societies of last Session spent six hours in maturing its Report. It was sure that in the judgment of every Member of the Committee a Bill was needed dealing reasonably, fully, but still firmly, with Building Societies throughout the country. If a notorious person happened to arrive in the country there might be such a feeling produced by the revelations which would be made at the particular trial as would almost compel the House to pass a measure on the subject. The cases of the Rating and Machinery Bill and the Eight Hours (Mines) Bill had been mentioned. Those two measures had passed a Second Reading by large majorities more than once; but unless something very unexpected happened in the Government gave facilities, either of them had the slightest chance of passing into law. It almost came to this—that in regard to non-official Members' Bills the House began each Session with an unmitigated farce. Something like 250 Members put their names in the list this Session, but even the first five of those who came out of it had very little chance indeed of seeing their measures become law in the present year. The reason for the present state of things were hard to see. There was a constant pressure from outside for new legislation, and constant promises from candidates in response to it. There was undoubtedly arising outside a feeling that an Act of Parliament could do almost everything, and cure all the ills that flesh was heir to. Accompanied by this the House had to contend with the fact that it had very much less time in which to transact its business. The alterations made in procedure in 1888 created an enormous revolution. A certain hour was fixed when business should stop, and this put for the first time in the power of persons who desired to obstruct or delay particular business the opportunity of doing so. It also put it in the power of one man out of 670 to stop all business after a particular time. Such a state of things would not be tolerated for a single moment in a Town Council or a County Council, or in any other body. Mr. Speaker had, much to the gratification and admiration of Members, mitigated the operation of the Rule in some respects, but he thought that before long the House ought to take the matter into its own hands. The real remedy for the present state of things was, after all, to bring the Standing Orders into harmony with the requirements of the moment. What he thought was most required was certainty in the way in which business was conducted. The Committee of 1861 quoted Mr. Speaker Shaw-Lefevre as saying in 1854—

"In all the improvements that we have yet made in the conduct of Public Business we have endeavoured as much as possible to let the House understand exactly what questions they have to discuss to prevent surprises and to give some certainty to our proceedings."

Mr. Speaker Denison, speaking in 1861, said that the most important thing to which the attention of the House could be directed was certainty in the business of the House from day to day, and that certainty was to be regarded as the primary object. At the present time one did not know in the morning what would be done in the evening, or on one day what would be done the next. Who was responsible? Primarily, of course, the Government of the day was responsible. The appropriation of the time of the House by the Standing Orders was antiquated and obsolete. The Government had only two days out of five in which to conduct their business, and even the most inveterate non-official Member would agree that this was absolutely too small an amount of time for the Government to have at its disposal. One might see how absurd the Standing Orders were on this subject by looking at the annual Return respecting the manner in which the Government made inroads upon the time of the House. It was not well that the Government should so frequently have to alter the Standing Orders. It had been stated that Standing Committees had never been used for the purpose of considering non-official Members' Bills. This was an error. Twice last Session Bills which had no connection with the Government whatever were submitted to the Committee on Law. The Committee of Lord Hartington in 1886 specially contemplated their being so referred. As to the discussions in Committee of Supply, driven as they were almost universally now until after the last day of July, these were becoming of very little practical use, and he agreed with the suggestion of Lord Hartington's Committee that the actual financial examination of the figures might very well be regulated elsewhere. Some plan was needed whereby the volume of opinion with respect to particular Bills should be able to make itself felt. He thought also the valuable principle of classification of Bills, which was already recognised in the Standing Orders, should be adopted after Easter in place of after Whitsuntide. He was not sure that the question of carrying over did not involve much graver considerations than appeared from what was said either by the Mover or Secunder of the Motion. The Report of the Committee of 1890, and especially the Report brought up by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), raised the very gravest Constitutional questions on the subject. There were a great many recommendations strewn through the Reports of the various Committees to which time did not permit reference; but he was one of those who had always felt that there had been, on the part of the predecessors of the present Members of the House, the very wisest caution in dealing with the Standing Orders. The Report of 1861 said that the maintenance of the old Rules was preferable to new but speculative Amendments. In the present Parliament some experiments had been made that had not been altogether successful, and he did not desire to rush into any rash experiments. The Secunder of the Motion had alluded to the Closure. He thought its use should be very carefully adjusted to the requirements of the business before the House. During the last Parliament he had seen the Closure used in a way which he thought was detrimental to the efficiency of the House and to the dignity of its Leaders. He had always held the opinion expressed by Sir Stafford Northcote that there should be limit opportunities of debate rather than restrict freedom of discussion, and he agreed entirely with what had been said by the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) that the House of Commons must not be judged, like a mine, by the output. Whether the time had come for the appointment of a Select Committee was for the House to decide; but he thought that the Mover and Secunder of the Motion might be well satisfied with the manner in which the proposal had been received by the House. He was sure the discussion would be useful, and that sooner or later the House of Commons would have to reform its procedure, and do its business in a businesslike way.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, he thought the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Islington (Sir A. Rollit) was a most interesting and strong speech as far as it consisted of a denunciation of the present system, but that there was a great falling-off in it when it came to the suggestion of remedies. That, he thought, had been the defect of the whole of the present Debate. His hon. Friend had made one suggestion which immediately had cold water thrown upon it by the right hon. Baronet (Sir C. W. Dilke), and that was about "syndicating Bills" or "underwriting."

*SIR C. W. DILKE said, the hon. Member was mistaken. He had said, in passing, that possibly underwriting might not be the best form of carrying out the intention, but, with regard to general principles, he had entirely endorsed the view expressed by his right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney.)

MR. HANBURY said, that hitherto, at all events, the House had set its face against that method. It had been one of the great complaints of private Members that all the Wednesdays had been taken up by the Irish Members. The right hon. Baronet admitted that in the House itself the feeling against the present system was not very strong, but said that a strong feeling existed outside. Of course, people outside could not know what the difficulties were; they could not know how difficult it was to frame Rules which would enable the hundreds of thousands of subjects that had to be discussed by Parliament to be brought before the House. He (Mr. Hanbury) agreed that a good deal of the private legislation of the House might be done locally. Even if it were not devolved upon Local Bodies it would no doubt be more economically done if done on the spot. No doubt a great many reckless promises were made by Members as to the legislation that was going to be passed, and constituents were naturally disappointed when those promises were not fulfilled. Reference had been made to a variety of the most useful Party measures, such as the measure arising out of the Report of the Railway Rates Committee. There was no doubt, however, that all Governments unfortunately gave too great a precedence to mere political measures over the measures which were supported by Members on both sides. His hon. Friend (Sir A. Rollit) had said there were some Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House who objected to legislation altogether. He (Mr. Hanbury) did not think there were any who went so far as that. There was, however, a strong opinion amongst many that it was better that a few measures should be passed after having been properly considered than that a whole host of measures should pass without much discussion, especially when they were passed after 12 o'clock at night. So far as he understood the suggestions of his hon. Friend, the result of all of them would be that they would sit later at night; that they would begin the Sitting earlier in the morning, and that they would sit during a longer period of the year. A great distinction ought to be drawn between Government Bills and private Members' Bills after 12 o'clock at night. He had always objected to Government Bills coming on after 12 o'clock, because the Government were the masters of their own time, but he was opposed to the blocking of private Members' Bills of a good and useful character. But they must recollect that if the suggestions of his hon. Friend were carried out they would every night have private Members' Bills discussed after 12 o'clock until 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, and thus, if at the same time they extended the Committee system, they would be lengthening the time of the House at both ends. The House was becoming more and more a House of business men, and it was utterly impossible for those men to sit there regularly on Committees at 12 o'clock in the morning. They had already gone too far in the matter of Committees. Queen's counsel and barristers and other Members were excused from attendance, and the result was that pretty much the same Members were found sitting on every one of the Committees. Therefore, if the suggestions of the hon. Member were carried out they would have fewer and fewer of the most useful Members coming to the House, and the work of the House would be thrown into the hands of a set of professional politicians. He entirely agreed that it would be well if there were more certainty as to Government Business, because at present they never knew what was coming on. Therefore, while he sympathised with the object of his hon. Friend, he could not see that any reasonable suggestion had been made as yet to meet the difficulty, and he was bound to say that he feared his hon. Friend's suggestions would rather increase than decrease the evil.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, he was afraid that the present state of the House justified the observations which had been made by his right hon. Friend the Member for the Forest of Dean, that this was a subject in which Members themselves did not feel very strongly interested. There was no doubt, on the part of the older Members of the House, a constant tendency to make idols of the Forms of business, and he was afraid they thought that there existed the best possible arrangements for the despatch of business. He was, however, quite satisfied that his right hon. Friend was right when he said that in the country there was a strong feeling that somehow or other they did not do as much business as their constituents had a right to expect. Work was not done. They talked about things, but somehow or other consumed their time without performing, not all that was required, but even a very moderate portion of what was expected of them. On the balance of argument, he thought the Leader of the House would see that there was a very strong case for a Grand Committee. There were only three ways of improving their position. They must enlarge their time, or diminish their work, or economise their time. As to enlarging their time, no doubt, as had been shown, their recent experience had been that it was curtailed. The recent experiment made of closing contentious business at 12 o'clock had very materially shortened the time at their disposal, and lessened to a very great degree the amount of work formerly done after that hour; but by reducing their work and economising their time they might still recover a great deal of lost ground. If the House were relieved of Private Business they would be able to devote much more time to Public Business without increasing the demand made on the time of hon. Members. If they also referred the Committee stage of Bills and certain branches of the Estimates to Committees outside the House, and got a considerable portion of work discharged concurrently by three or four Grand Committees, they would be able to get through much more Government Business. A good deal of time was now lost on Friday nights, and to save it he suggested that they should permanently adopt the practice of holding on that day a Morning Sitting from 2 to 7 o'clock for Government Business, and an Evening Sitting from 9 to 12 o'clock for private Members' Motions. That would be no waste of time, because a great many hon. Members who were not interested in the subjects to be brought on might go way into the country on the Friday night, after the Government Business was brought to a close for the day. With regard to private Members' time, there was a much greater power of economising that time which was at their disposal. A "system of voice" might be arranged by which the majority and the minority of private Members might each in turn proportionately get an opportunity of bringing forward their measures. They could, by an easy arrangement, secure that the time at the disposal of private Members might be so arranged that it could be devoted to subjects which they had at heart. This would facilitate legislation by private Members, especially if the measures, after reaching a certain stage were allowed to be taken up again that stage the following Session. No doubt under such a system the majority of the private Members would obtain the pull in the first instance, but the minority would also obtain their fair share of the time of the House. Reference had been made to some Members who appeared to think that all legislation on the part of private Members might be dropped, but he did not think that anybody of experience would approve that. Bills introduced by private Members had been largely instrumental in influencing the legislation of this House. In some cases private Members had succeeded in passing their Bills: in other cases they had brought them on year after year until the Government had been bound to take them up and carry them through. He would refer to one of the most recent cases—the Cruelty to Children Act, which had been carried by the exertions of a private Member. The experience of the working of that Act must convince everybody who had any doubt about it before of the extreme necessity there was for passing such a measure. It had brought to light the most horrible cases of cruelty to children on the part of parents and others, and much evil had been redressed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London and other private Members had been able to pass Bills which were of great interest to the community at large. It had been owing to the action of private Members on Wednesday afternoon that church rates had been abolished, the Burials Act carried, and many vexed questions of a similar character settled. The Deceased Wife's Sister question also, although not yet settled, had been dealt with on a Wednesday. By the proposal he had made many measures that were much desired by different sections of the House might be carried through. It had been suggested that an hour might be set apart once a week or once a fortnight for carrying measures to which there was little or no opposition. He entirely approved of that proposal. Of course, in such a case, if a sufficient number of hon. Members were to signify their opposition to any measure of the kind in writing it would come on in the ordinary way. These were all measures which might well be taken into consideration by a Committee without the Government being called upon to express any opinion with regard to them at the present moment. They said that there was a case for submission to a Committee, as public time was not now used as efficiently as it might be. Both in respect of Public and Private Business there was a case for examination, and for practical suggestions to be inquired into, and he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer, despite the comparatively small attendance at this Debate, would see his way to granting the Committee asked for.

Mr. Courtney

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, that when he first read the terms of the Motion he felt very much inclined to support it by his vote, but every speech he had heard had made him less inclined to do so, and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin had finally decided him to vote against the Motion. The speech of the Member for the Forest of Dean did not greatly affect his opinion of the Motion one way or the other, because the right hon. Gentleman had confined himself to generalities. The hon. Member for South Islington, who moved the Motion, was, he was bound to say, the Member who began the impression on his mind which induced him to vote against the Motion; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin had clearly shown, in that magisterial manner with which he was wont to address the House, that the Motion should not further be proceeded with. The right hon. Gentleman, who was a man of great authority, had shown that two things only could be done to improve the forms of procedure of the House—namely, that Private Business, or business connected with Private Bills, should be delegated to some other authority; and that the Estimates, instead of being thrown, as it were, on the floor of the House in their thousands and left to the industry, or want of industry, of Members to go through them in order to acquire the knowledge necessary for discussing them even in a most cursory fashion, should be referred for examination to a Committee upstairs. There was something to be said for both these points. Private legislation undoubtedly partook of a judicial character, and it would be an advantage to remove all judicial business from the Chamber, which was nothing if not legislative. Again, the reference of the Estimates to a Committee would be an advantage if the Committee were empowered to have before it the permanent officials responsible for the Estimates. The difficulty in dealing with the Estimates was that the Treasury Bench was occupied by a number of gentlemen who really knew little or nothing about them, and who, when they were asked a question about them, could not answer until they had consulted their prompters who sat under the Gallery, or else could only say that the matter was under consideration, or give some other sort of unsatisfactory reply. It would, therefore, be of considerable advantage to have the Estimates examined by a Committee, who would have the officials who prepared the Estimates before them, instead of Ministers who knew nothing, and could know nothing, about the details. But, at the same time, he should be sorry to see the Estimates taken outside the purview of the House altogether, and he did claim that the right of examination of the Estimates, and of cross-examination of the Ministers upon them, was a right most essential to the performance of the most important duties of the Committees of the House. The hon. Member for Islington talked of discussion on the Estimates as a waste of time. He knew not from what fount the hon. Gentleman got his Constitutional knowledge; but he had always understood that one of the most important functions of the House was the guardianship of the Public Purse, and he did not see how the Public Purse was to be guarded unless the Estimates were duly discussed. The hon. Member for Islington had also used words that shocked him with regard to the Rules and Forms of the House. The hon. Gentleman said they were cumbersome, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean added that the outside world was convinced they were cumbersome. He challenged that assertion. He believed that no such feeling existed outside the House. There was a strong feeling outside the House that people did not understand the Rules and Forms of the House, and that was only natural; but he had never found any widespread public feeling that the Rules of .t

House were too cumbersome. He used the word "too" advisedly. Having regard to the great complexity of the business which came before the House, it was inevitable that the Rules should appear cumbersome to those not acquainted with them, but he denied that they were cumbersome as a matter of fact. Instead of being cumbersome, he considered that the Rules of the House were admirably good Rules. Undoubtedly, he had come across Rules which seemed to him at first to be without good reason, but he soon came to understand that there was excellent and sufficient reason for the Rules, and that without them the business of the House could not be well conducted. He would cite as an example of what seemed a trifling Rule the Rule which said that no Member might stand above the Bar. If that Rule had been strictly observed the scene which took place in the House last Session, and which they all regretted, would not have occurred. He should strongly condemn the hon. Member for Islington for presuming to tell the House that its Rules were cumbersome; and he had been pained to find that even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin was inclined to adopt the same tone, and cast ridicule and contempt on some of the Rules of the House, which were entitled to great respect. The Australian Parliament was, like all Parliaments worthy of the name, based upon our Parliament, and an Australian Minister recently writing on the subject had said that they had thought they could improve on some of the Rules that had been adopted from the House of Commons; but when they had changed the Rules, they found that things did not go so well; they saw that there was good reason and sound principle at the bottom of the Rules they had abandoned, and so they quickly re-adopted the Rules again. That was a very strong testimony of the value of the Rules of the House. He believed that the Rules were admirable. They had grown up from the experience of a thousand years, and if and when they were bad it was because they had been subjected to hasty, unreflecting, and inconsiderate Amendments, contrived to meet the supposed exigencies of the moment or the imagined convenience of a Party. The Rules were good, and all that was required was that they should be understood and properly carried out. The Debate had turned the point of the allocation of the time to the House. He ventured to say that it was impossible to read attentively the Rules and understand the Rules of the House without seeing that the ordinary allocation of time was most excellent as between Ministers and non-official or unopposed Members. The allocation of the time to the House as between the unpaid Members and the placemen was good. But what had happened? The Session was begun when the Government appropriated nearly all the time for their measures, and there was very little opportunity left for any other business. The offenders against the Rules of the House, the purloiners of its time, were not private Members, but the Government, and so long as private Members neglected to combine together, irrespective of Party, to maintain their rights and to refuse the Government permission to take up all the time of the House in this unconstitutional fashion, so long would the House suffer from what was the great complaint of the present time. The Member for Islington had also declared that the results obtained under the Rules had not pleased him. There were enough Acts of Parliament passed. The hon. Member complained that only 27 of 357 Bills introduced last Session passed. His own opinion was that there were rather more than ought to have been passed. The remaining 330 were extremely bad, haphazard, ill-considered Bills, which ought never to have been introduced at all. The Member for Islington wanted more Acts of Parliament and less consideration. He, on the other hand, wanted more consideration and fewer Acts of Parliament. The Member for Islington had his pocket full of Bills, some Conservative and some Radical, but other Members took a more prosaic view of their duty. They were there to see that the business of the country was well conducted, and to prevent the hon. Gentlemen opposite from spending too much money. He also considered that the Twelve o'Clock Rule was a good Rule and required no alteration. It was not reasonable to ask the House to accept Bills after 12 o'clock unless they were of a non-contentious character, and it was perfectly right that Members with sufficient public spirit should object to Bills being considered in such an hour, when there was no time full and free discussion. It was suggested that they should have a system of underwriting Bills ; but if Bills were to be underwritten, they must also have underwriting against Bills. That was only a natural corollary ; and consequently they would have Members in charge of Bills occupying the whole of their time getting Members to back their Bills, while their opponents would be running about on the other side getting other Members to underwrite against the Bills. Then he presumed that there must be a quorum of underwriters. What would be the quorum, 50, or 90, or 120 ? He thought that half the House would not be too large a quorum. Therefore, it would be necessary to get 335 Members to back a Bill before it could be taken out of its turn and considered. He thought such a suggestion might be dismissed without further attention. Technicalities and Forms had been treated with great contempt by various Members who had spoken in the Debate. He defended the technicalities and Forms of the House as being a protection of the weak against the strong. He would remind the House that the Form of requiring a Member introducing a Bill to appear at the Bar of the House was taken from the ancient practice of Bills being brought into the House from outside, and when agreed to by the Parliament, becoming Acts. The time taken in this operation was extremely small, and it seemed to him that it was a Form to which meaning and traditions attached which ought not to be cast aside, but should be preserved. He was not prepared to deny that there were directions in which the Rules of the House might possibly be amended ; but if there were, it was rather in reversion to old principles and forms and the language of old Rules than by—if he might use the term—getting into back parlours and inventing new Rules to fit particular occasions. There was a time when placemen were not allowed to sit in the House. There was a time when, according to Prynne, 40 was not considered a quorum except for Prayers and unimportant business ; and when for the consideration of grave and serious Public Business it was held necessary that the whole or greater part of the House should be present. That Rule had been not invented, but borrowed from this House by the United States, so that while this House had gone back through the usurpation of the Long Parliament to a quorum of 40, the United States House of Representatives required that, before serious business could be considered, there should be half the House, plus one, present. That might be a reform worthy of consideration. Again, there was the “call of the House,” such as was made in 1628, moved by Sir G. Moore—

“That any Members of the House being in town and not attending here the Serjeant to be sent for them. The Serjeant to be sent for all the Members of the House now in town as well lawyers as others”

There was no privilege for lawyers then. No ; the country wanted them—

“to be here presently and to attend every day.”

Again, next year, this was placed on the Journals of the House—

“Ordered, No Member of this House shall go out of town till this great business is ended without special leave of the House.”

In 1628 it was ordered—

“The House shall be called upon Thursday next week, and every Member of the House then to attend upon pain of £10, to be disposed of as the House shall appoint, besides such further forfeiture as the House shall inflict.”

That “call” enforced in that manner was one which might conceivably be reverted to by Members jealous of the honour and dignity of the House. Again, he was informed, there was a practice which consisted in an arrangement between two Members that one should vote one way and the other the other without hearing the question. That was a practice he did not indulge in. He was told, however, that it existed to a large extent, lasting sometimes over several months. That seemed to him to be a practice that might be mended by the Rules of the House. He had ventured to make a few criticisms on the Motion. He had set forward the grounds on which he found it impossible to vote for it, and he submitted, in conclusion, that the Rules of the House as they existed were extremely good, if only the Government would not use its majority to prevent their observance ; and, if they required alteration in any way at all, this should rather be in the direction of reverting to some of the ancient Forms and Regulations than by the adoption of crude, unreflected, and unconsidered Motions such as that presented to the House upon the present occasion.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 41 ; Noes 136.—(Division List, No. 11.)

HOME RULE (SCOTLAND).

RESOLUTION.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) : I rise to move—

“That it is desirable, while retaining intact the power and supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, to establish a Legislature in Scotland for dealing with purely Scottish affairs.”

I am not unconscious of the fact that, having regard to the proposal submitted yesterday by the Government, closely affecting the position and character of Scotch business, there may be a disposition in some quarters to regard my proposal as somewhat unnecessary and inopportune. That is not my view. On the contrary, I doubt whether, if I had been privileged to select my own time, I could have chosen a moment more calculated to bring home to the mind of the House and the country the force of my Resolution, and the expediency of adopting the principle which it involves. What are the circumstances? Yesterday and to-day two proposals have been made for Committees—one by the Government, and the other by an influential Member of the Tory Party. The proposals differ in character and in detail ; but they are alike in this—that they proceed upon the assumption that the state of business in the House has arrived at the point when, if the Parliamentary machine is to discharge all the functions that are properly expected of it, some new and bold departure will have to be undertaken. We are agreed that the disease from which the patient is suffering is congestion. We only differ as to the remedy that is to be applied. If there was any doubt about the nature of the disease, I would mention one fact, and call one witness. Having taken pains to ascertain the number of Bills introduced last Session, I find that there are no fewer than 386, and that, putting aside purely Departmental Bills, only 58 come under the consideration of the House. I do not claim that that is an absolutely reliable test, but it is fair to assume that every one of the 386 Bills embodied a proposal desired by a certain section of the community, and the fact that only 58 of them were even discussed is an indication that further time is necessary for the Debates in this House. The witness

I will call will not be thought to violently enthusiastic on behalf of reform. It is The Scotsman newspaper. So three years ago a pamphlet was published from The Scotsman office putting before Scotland and the country a proposal what was termed a local National Assembly, and I have no hesitation saying that it is one of the most markable contributions that have been made to the Home Rule controversy. What did the writer say? He said—

“The Imperial Parliament cannot adequately cope with the legislative requirements of the different parts of the United Kingdom. The Imperial Parliament has admitted its own incapacity to deal with all the subjects it once used to take in hand. It has parted with some of its work from time to time, delegating it to other hands. Still the pressure increases, and it is simple fatuity to suppose the question of further and wider delegation can be long delayed.”

That is a Unionist opinion, certainly not tainted with any Radical fallacy. As a Scotch Member, I am grateful to the Government for having, even at this late hour, arrived at the decision that something must be done in order to carry through Scotch legislation. But it is four or five years since my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries Burghs (Mr. R. T. Reid) put forward the proposal for a Grand Committee. It was again brought forward on the day on which the present Parliament assembled by the Member for North Aberdeen. Being then supported with a requisition by an overwhelming majority of the Scotch Liberal Members, the Government were asked to give one or two nights in order to set up a Scotch Grand Committee, and I think there is some reason to wonder that the Government did not see the force of the proposition that was then made. The best that can be said of the Grand Committee is that it is one stage, and one stage only. All that we should be able to save by it would be the Committee stage; and we have to face the possibility of the other stages being in consequence considerably prolonged. I accept the proposal for the Grand Committee in the spirit in which I am sure it is offered by the Government, that is as a temporary makeshift, and not as an integral part of the fabric of the Scottish Government. It is fashionable in some quarters to suggest that there really is no solid demand in Scotland for the principle embodied in my Resolution. The hon. Baronet the Member for Wigtonshire (Sir H. Maxwell) took upon himself the responsibility of saying that there is no demand on the part of Scotland for Home Rule. I wish to ask, by what means are we to test the feelings of the Scottish people upon public questions? Are we to take the opinion of the hon. Baronet, who is identified with a Party which has only a minority out of the whole representation of Scotland? The legitimate way to find out the opinion of the people of Scotland is to look to their Representatives in the House of Commons, and the Representatives of Scotland, by an overwhelming majority, voted on the last occasion this Motion was before the House for the principle of Home Rule. The demand in Scotland is a growing demand, and is formed upon the solid opinion that in the direction of Home Rule lies the only possible way in which the judgment of the people of Scotland, as expressed at the polls, can be translated into legislative action. The progress of this movement has been remarkable. In 1889, when the Motion for Home Rule was brought forward by the Member for Caithness, it was rejected by 121 votes. In 1890 it was rejected by 40. In 1892 it was rejected by 20; and in 1893 it was rejected by 18. This Resolution is not brought forward in any spirit of enmity or resentment against England, and, if it were, ruin and disaster would be immediately brought upon the cause. The proposal is offered to the House as a practical solution of the difficulty that has arisen through the neglect of Scottish business in the House of Commons. I will quote two authorities, to give an idea of the general feeling that has existed with regard to the treatment of Scotland in the Imperial Parliament. Professor Aytoun, writing in 1853, said—

"The form in which our affairs have been administered for well-nigh 100 years is quite inadequate for the purpose for which it was originally intended, and the rapid development of the wealth and population of the country ought long ago to have suggested the propriety of a more rational arrangement. The case is a very clear one, founded upon justice and public policy; and if properly argued no Government can venture to treat it lightly."

The late Prime Minister, when receiving the freedom of Aberdeen 23 years ago, said—

"I admit without the least hesitation that the present condition of the action of Parliament with regard to Scotch business is unsatisfactory. You have much more reason to complain that we have not been able to deal with several subjects interesting to the people of Scotland, and material to its welfare, with the promptitude that we should all have desired."

But it is on what has happened since 1886 that I desire to base the demand which I put before the House. In that year the Local Government Bill was brought in. It was a Bill which did not raise any great Constitutional question. It was approached in a non-Party spirit by the great majority of the Representatives for Scotland; and yet I find that on every vital feature of the Bill the opinion of the majority of the Scottish people was practically set aside. On the question of the control of the police, 48 Members for Scotland desired that that should be given to the County Councils, and 18 were against it. With respect to giving the County Councils the same licensing power as the burghs, 48 were in favour and 12 against. On the question of the compulsory acquisition of land 46 were in favour of giving power to the County Councils and 12 were against. And there was practically the same unequal division with respect to the question of rights of way. In face of facts such as these it is beside the question to pretend that Scottish opinion is fairly considered or even receives any respect at all in this House. To pass from Government Bills, I come to other questions which have been brought forward, or attempted to be brought forward, in this House. There is the question of access to mountains. That is a question to which a great deal of importance is attached by a large section of the people of Scotland, and yet the Chancellor of the Duchy, year after year, for nine different years, brought the question before the House, and it was only through what, I think, was an inadvertence on the part of the Conservative Government, that another Member was able to secure a majority in favour of that proposal. The year afterwards the Conservative Government brought forward a Bill dealing with the question, but I think I may fairly claim that it was not considered a satisfactory measure by the great body of Scotch Members. I take next the question of the Local Veto Bill—a question of some importance. Apart altogether from the merits or demerits of that question, we must admit that in Scotland the local veto question receives the support of a very large and influential section of the population. For 10 years Mr. M'Lagan, recently a Member of this House, attempted to get a settlement of that question, but he was never able to do so. There is another question of equal importance—the question of the amendment of the Crofters Act. That Act was passed some six or seven years since, and the most important flaw in it, from the point of view of the crofters' Representatives, is that it does not apply to leaseholders. Every year since that Act was passed an attempt has been made by the Member for Caithness and other crofters' Representatives to obtain an opportunity for amending that Act in the direction of the inclusion of leaseholders. They have never been successful, and there is not the slightest hope that the question will be dealt with during the present Session, or even during the present Parliament. Coming to last Session, there was the Fatal Accidents Bill. That was a Bill, again, of a non-Party character, and it was sent to a Grand Committee, I believe, without a Division. It passed through the Grand Committee, and was brought into the House, and because what I consider a perfectly legitimate Amendment, suggesting that juries should be called in case of injury, was put in the Bill it was withdrawn by the Lord Advocate on the ground that it was impossible to get the two or three hours necessary in order to discuss that Amendment. The result was that that Bill, which was supported by every Representative Working Class Organisation in Scotland, by every Trades Union, and by every Representative Association, was lost. In the face of facts such as these it is idle to pretend that Scottish desires and Scottish opinion can ever be properly considered in this House. It is agreed by Parties on both sides of the House that, so far as the financial relations between the two countries are concerned, Scotland has a very great deal to complain of, and I am glad that the Government has, after several years, seen their way to promise that an inquiry will take place into the matter. I would just remind the House, in considering the general position of Scotland, that by general consent it admitted that Scotland is overtaxed the present time to the extent £1,000,000 or £1,500,000 per year. Not only so, but Scotland is not treated in the same liberal way with regard to Imperial grants as the other parts of the Kingdom are, or have been in the past. I would also remind the House that from the point of view of population the average contribution per head in Ireland is £1 11s. 3d.; in England it is £2 2s. 3d. and in Scotland it is £2 5s. 8d., so that in that respect we have something to complain of. Then there is the question of Private Bill legislation. That is a very old complaint of Scotland. It was brought forward in 1876, and it has been renewed in almost every successive year. I will give the House just one or two figures as to the cost of Private Bill legislation. I have had supplied to me by the Treasurer of Glasgow a statement which shows that from 1865 to 1892 no less than £283,028 14s. 6d. were spent in the promotion of and opposition to Private Bills. From Edinburgh I learn that from 1872 to 1893 £75,000 were spent in the same fashion. In Dundee, since 1871, upwards of £60,000 were spent in connection with Private Bill legislation, and I believe the full total for Scotland for the 14 years from 1872 to 1885 is not less than £1,294,812. [Cheers.] I understand the cheers from gentlemen opposite. I suppose their reply to me on this point will be that they introduced a Bill when they were in Office, and that if that Bill had been allowed to pass the whole question would have been properly settled. But the Government was in Office for six years, and how was it they could not find time to pass the measure? I am aware that it was opposed by certain Members, but that is no answer to the complaint that if it was a good Bill time ought to have been found to pass it. I think that Bill was an excellent Bill as far as it went, and I would like to see a Bill of the same character introduced again, but I hope it will be a more thorough-going and complete measure, and will deal with Unopposed as well as Opposed Private Bills. What is the Tory position on this question? Are they going to oppose all ideas of decentralisation? I do not think I am justified in assuming anything of the d. The Leader of the Opposition brought forward last night one of the most revolutionary proposals which I ever heard. The Government brought forward a proposal that Scotch Members should be supreme so far as Scotch affairs were concerned, and what was the attitude of gentlemen opposite? They complained that the proposal did not go far enough. They said they wanted it for England, for Ireland, and for Wales. I think if they go that length they will very soon be prepared to go a little further, and to recognise that if it was good for Scotch, for English, and for Welsh Members to be supreme on their local questions in this House it is, perhaps, a little better that they should discuss the questions in the localities where particularly concerned. It is no longer a question of whether Home Rule is to be granted, but it is a question how that decentralisation can be applied. Therefore, the conclusion which I arrive at is, in the first place, that Parliament is overburdened, and that relief is necessary; secondly, that Scottish interests have been neglected in the past, and that there is no prospect that they will be better attended to in the future; thirdly, that the principles of representative government demand that Scotch opinion should be supreme in Scottish affairs, and this is only possible by the establishment of a Scottish Legislature; fourthly, that Scotland presents an ideal field for a great experiment in local self-government. [Laughter and cheers.] I can hardly suppose that those Members opposite who are Scotchmen will take up the view that Scotland does not possess an ideal field for local self-government. I am in favour of Home Rule all round. I believe that is the only possible way in which we can properly carry forward the legislation of the country. My idea is that this House will have to undergo a very great and material change so far as the business which is before it is concerned. We are too much occupied in discussing purely local questions which can be better settled in the localities concerned. Let this House devote itself—first, to the consideration of all the great questions which have the same application to all portions of the Kingdom; and, in the second place, to the consideration of the great Colonial, Indian, and Imperial questions which ought to engage more than they do at present the close attention of the House. It is because I believe my Resolution is a step in that direction that I submit it to the House.

Mr. Dalziel

MR. BIRRELL (Fife, W.) said, he desired to second the Motion. He did not suppose there would be many persons within the House found to disagree upon its merits, or with the proposition that if they were given a geographical area—he used the words “geographical area” because he preferred to avoid the word “nation,” which always excited the worst possible passion in this House—with a separate Judicature of its own, with separate laws of its own, the best, and he should suppose the most obvious, mode of legislating for such an area would be a Representative Assembly within the jurisdiction itself. It was a great disadvantage for any country to be separated by a distance from the seat of Government, and he believed the newly-awakened interest in regard to London legislation was due to the Metropolis possessing an admirable Local Body to look after its affairs, and to the fact that they were surrounded by a horde of London Members within easy cab fare of their constituencies, and who were able to bring to bear upon this House a constant pressure which those constituencies at a distance were unable to do. He had no doubt that a Legislative Assembly of Scotsmen sitting in Edinburgh would develop a most useful representative activity in many fields which were at present unexplored. There were numberless law reforms and land reforms which, he was sure, if there was a Legislature in Edinburgh, would engage the attention of Scottish lawyers which did not engage them at present, when Scottish legislative reform was a hopeless dream. There was public health, which engaged much public attention in a country largely inhabited by doctors. They complained of the very inferior and obsolete weapon which the old Public Health Act had put into their hands to wage warfare against insanitary conditions, which were not altogether undeserving of attention. There were questions of right-of-way, liquor traffic, and educational questions, and the last, if Scotland was to maintain her pre-eminence, would certainly require great consideration. He believed a Scottish Legislative Assembly would deal with these questions in a grave and useful spirit. Then there was the crucial question of the Scottish Church. He believed that there were some Imperialists of such a complexion that they really believed that the Scottish people should not deal with their own Church without first taking the opinion of the Calvinists of Wales and other parts of the Kingdom. His view was that the question was purely one for the Scottish people. It was idle to talk of a referendum, or to suppose that the United Kingdom would ever consent to a General Election which would turn simply on the question whether one section of the Presbyterian Body should have an Establishment or not. They might wish to confine people's thoughts to the restricted area, but in practice they would find it perfectly impossible. He did not believe that even in a Scottish Legislative Assembly they would be able to do it, but a General Election there which did turn on that question would practically amount to a referendum on that question, because the Scottish people would recognise the importance of the question, and give it precedence over all others. Although a Disestablisher to the backbone, and baptised into the spirit of the Disruption, he still believed it was a monstrous thing that the Scottish Church should be disestablished by the votes of English Nonconformists, who might be giving their vote simply with an eye to the disestablishment of the English Church at home. Here was an opportunity for Tory Members who had been so active on platforms during the last few weeks in making the assertion that Disestablishment was a question for the Scottish people. They had now an opportunity to assent to a proposal which would remit that question to a Scottish Assembly. The objections to Scottish Home Rule were not serious in character. There were no Fenians in Scotland and no Orangemen. Though some miserable and cowardly attempts had lately been made to fan the dying embers of religious bigotry in Scotland into a flame, they had miserably failed, as they deserved. The objections were not serious. They were mainly of a personal character. Scottish Members opposite had a great objection to what they regarded as a one-horse Legislature sitting in Scotland. The Member for Buteshire (Mr. Graham Murray) on the last occasion when the subject was before the House wound an eloquent speech by declaring his unwillingness to barter the heritage of an Imperial Parliament for any miserable Parliament that might be offered in its stead, and he would never forget the expression on the face of that distinguished man, now the Lord President, when as Lord Advocate he contemplated the bare possibility of the existence of a Scotch Legislature. The hon. Member had said it would be a bleak and barren prospect. But, after all, a Representative Assembly existed not simply as a playground, and for the amusement and edification of its Members, however distinguished, but for the purpose of attending to the legislative needs of the country in whose service it was summoned. If by any chance even a dull Scotch Assembly transacted Scotch business better than that House—and he admitted that many of the local Scotch Assemblies were dull indeed, though he could not speak with the authority of the late Lord Advocate—then he could quite imagine that Scotland would prefer a Parliament of its own in Edinburgh, although its proceedings would be enlivened by those flashes of wit and philosophic discourses which made a seat in the Imperial Chamber at once a liberal education and a round of cheap amusement. Scotch electors had given their Representative no mandate to be witty—if they had it might be discharged, at all events, to their own satisfaction—but they sent them to Westminster, in the first place, to look after the affairs of the Empire; and, in the second place, to pass laws for Scotland. As a matter of fact, they had very little time for either of those duties. The interests of the Empire were almost entirely overlooked, and the affairs of Scotland were neglected, while Members were kept there month after month engaged in pursuits in which their constituents certainly took no interest whatever. He would point out that there was no need for those gentlemen who had such an unconquerable objection to appear in a Local Assembly in Edinburgh to sit there at all. The difficulty arose, he supposed, from a feeling that the grant of Scotch Home Rule would necessitate the same grant for England, and that the latter would seriously interfere with the present system of Cabinet Government. But that would not necessarily follow at all, even assuming there were an English Administration apart from the Imperial Government. He did not think that Scotch Members were in the least degree anxious to interfere in matters purely English, and, having regard to the condition of Scotch business and also to the common-sense reasons of the case, he thought that the time had come when devolution should be allowed to take its natural course. All purely Scotch legislative business in which Englishmen really did not take any interest should be left in the hands of Scotchmen, who, he submitted, had a right to demand that they should be allowed to pass those laws which only operated within the jurisdiction of Scotland. Those were some of the reasons why he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is desirable, while retaining intact the power and supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, to establish a Legislature in Scotland for dealing with purely Scottish affairs."
—(Mr. Dalziel.)

*MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.) said, he must congratulate the hon. Member on his witty speech, but, at the same time, he could not help thinking that it had been intended to be delivered last night. He could not agree with the remarks of the hon. Gentleman that Scotland was an "ideal" field for an experimental Home Rule Bill, and he would be exceedingly sorry to think that Scotchmen should have Home Rule or any other measure forced upon them against their will. He was a Scotchman himself, and it was only natural, therefore, that he should object entirely to apply the old maxim Fiat experimentum in corpore vili when such a question as that was raised, and he regretted to hear that the hon. Member considered Scotland to be an "ideally vile body" for such an experiment. The speech of the hon. Member for West Fife was clearly intended to be delivered last night, for he actually told the House at the commencement of it that he "rose to support the appointment of this Committee." The hon. Member had said that there were no Orangemen in Scotland. That was not the case, for if he would investigate the matter he would find that there were many of them, and that, too, in Lanarkshire, the greatest county of Scotland. Having spoken at considerable length last evening on a cognate subject, he would not detain the House by offering any extended observations then. The Highlanders from Blackheath and the patriots of Putney had been putting on their kilts, and it was only right that those who were not real Scotchmen should take a leading part in that pseudo-patriotic Debate. He would like all those gentlemen to be allowed to have their Highland fling to their hearts' content. He was sure that the real Scottish Members were all anxious to hear the Englishman who happened to be Home Secretary as well as a Fifeshire Member explain his pseudo-patriotic views, and to hear the English Solicitor General explain why he went to Forfarshire at the behest of the English wirepullers in order to secure what was supposed to be a safe seat to advance his professional career. Above all, they were anxious to hear their English Secretary for Scotland, who last year supported Home Rule for Scotland, and who was subsequently "hauled over the coals," ridiculed, and scorned in the other House by the Scottish nobleman who was now Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. There was, indeed, one movement in which, like his hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy, he, too, took the deepest interest—the movement in favour of an improvement in the Private Bill legislation for Scotland. He was certain that the Scottish Members on the Opposition Benches were unanimous on this point. A Bill had been brought forward by the late Government, but it was obstructed and destroyed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs, who was now Secretary for War. Personally, he (Mr. Hozier) could only say he would do all he could to promote such a measure. He denied that Scottish constituencies had declared in favour of Home Rule for Scotland, and the fact that the present Gladstonian Members supported it did not show that that was the case. In the vast majority of instances Home Rule for Scotland had never been before the constituencies at all. Practically, all Unionists were opposed to a separate Parliament for Scotland; the Unionist vote was solid against Home Rule for Scotland, and no one pretended that even the Gladstonians were unanimously in favour of it. In most of the Gladstonian constituencies Scottish Home Rulers were a very small minority, even among Gladstonians, but that small minority was like the mosquito—it made a very great deal of noise for its size, and it was able to make its presence felt. This small minority, for example, could make its presence felt in the selection of a Gladstonian candidate; and, again, even after a candidate had been selected, he might still be “heckled” into shape by the Home Rule minority. He wished to put a question to the hon. Member for Caithness, who was the President of the Scottish Home Rule Association, and to the Secretary for Scotland. If a separate Parliament were granted to Scotland tomorrow, would the question of the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland be handed over to it? Perhaps the Secretary for Scotland would kindly either nod or shake his head in answer to that question. He was going to Scotland soon, and he would like to be able to take back an answer. As the right hon. Gentleman made no response, perhaps the hon. Member for Caithness would answer. There was no answer given to that question. An election was going to take place in a few days in a constituency neighbouring his own, and he had every right to know the opinion of the Government. He should also like to know whether the Secretary for Scotland “homologated,” to use the Scotch term, and concurred in the statement made last week by Mr. Caldwell, the Gladstonian candidate for Mid Lanark, when the President of the Scottish Home Rule Association, the hon. Member for Caithness, was on the platform? Mr. Caldwell said—

“Disestablishment is a matter of principle with the Liberal Party, and the Liberal Party having denied, or intending to deny, the right to Ireland, has no right whatever to leave the matter” (of the Established Church) “to be determined by a vote of Scotland, even although there should be a majority of the people of Scotland in favour of the Established Church.”

That was a curious statement to be made by a Scotch Home Ruler. If these words meant anything they meant that, even if a separate Parliament were given to Scotland, it would not be competent to deal with the Church question; and that even if a General Election were to be held on the question of Disestablishment in Scotland, and a majority in favour of maintaining the “auld Kirk” were returned, the Government would still be bound, as a matter of principle, to disestablish and disendow the Church of Scotland in spite of the strongest protests of the people of Scotland.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint, &c.)—entirely agreed with the hon. Member's statement that the cause of Home Rule for Scotland was rapidly gaining ground and had been doing so year by year. It was quite evident that the Scotch people had made up their minds on the question and when Scotland made up her mind on any particular subject she generally succeeded in attaining it. The certainty of her doing so in this instance was in the not very distant future. He wished to explain his attitude on this Motion to the Welsh Member. Home Rule for Scotland was, as he had said, a certainty by no distant date; and he would impress on the House that Home Rule for Wales must not be left out of the question. Not much had been said of the neglect of Welsh business, though Wales had waited Session after Session for her legislation, until weariness had almost ripened into disgust with the lumbering and clogged machine called Imperial Parliament. Last year a Local Veto Bill for Wales passed its Second Reading, and only one Welsh Member opposed it, while 26 supported it. Yet there was not the least hope of that Bill passing into law. A large number of Bills in which Wales was interested were pending, but, with one single exception, there was no chance of their being passed this Session. The same might be said with regard to this Session, because they knew they would have no opportunity of passing that Bill into law. There were two principal objections to Home Rule for Wales. The first one denied the nationhood of the country, and the other was founded upon the small population of Wales. With regard to the first objection, he should imagine that there was hardly anyone in the House who would nature seriously to assert that the Welsh were not a nation. The people of Wales were becoming more and more a National Body; separate acts of legislation were being continually passed for the Principality. He did not know whether Scotch or Irish Members were accustomed to hear the vernacular spoken in their countries, but he might say that there were a considerable number of Welsh Members sitting in that House who used it in Wales as the usual mode of communication. He would now come to the objection that Wales was too small for Home Rule.

Mr. Hozier

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman must remember that this Motion applies to Scotland only. He is entitled to use the case of Wales as an illustration, but he is not entitled to go into the whole question of Home Rule for Wales.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS said, he could only mention the case of Wales in reference to its bearing upon Home Rule for Scotland. With regard to the objection that Wales was too small for Home Rule, he had only to remind the House of what was the case with regard to other legislatures all over the world. Canada had nine Parliaments, and Australasia, with a population of 4,000,000, had also a large number of Parliaments, while Germany, with a population of 26,000,000, had 22 separate Parliaments. He entirely agreed that the arguments against Home Rule for Ireland did not apply to Scotland. The case of Wales was similar to that of Scotland in several respects, and the arguments against Home Rule for Ireland did not apply to Wales. Both Scotland and Wales were, at all events, willing to be made the subjects of a Home Rule experiment. He could not go into the case of Wales because of the Speaker's ruling, and he simply wished to say that, knowing something of Wales, and that the circumstances of that country were in many respects identical with those of Scotland, he hoped as an adoption of the principle of Home Rule this Motion would be carried by the House.

*SIR C. PEARSON (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) said, he would not follow the hon. Member at any great length into the analogy, which no Scottish Member would for a moment grudge, between the cases of Wales and of Scotland in this matter, although he did not agree with him that there were so many points of similarity between the two countries as the hon. Member seemed to imagine. Nor did he think that there was really the rivalry between the two countries to present the body politic for any anatomical experiment which the Government might wish to make in the direction of the Resolution. Nor would he examine the theory which he presented upon the reproductive powers of Parliaments. He desired to look at the subject mainly from a Scottish point of view. This subject evidently demanded very careful treatment, and no subject could have been treated more dissimilarly than it was by the Mover and Secondor. They had the "sovere" and the "lively," and he was glad that the Member for West Fife, in the course of a most entertaining speech, at last recognised that this was a subject which had its difficulties. What were the grounds on which this Motion was made at the present time? They might have expected to hear some new aspect of the case—some development of the circumstances, some stronger arguments than had previously been put forward. But they only had the old arguments. They had the old assertion about the neglect of Scottish business in the House, and that they would get rid of that neglect only by applying this ridiculous specific of Home Rule as the remedy. He was disposed to dispute both these propositions. He would remind the House that this proposal was to have a Legislature in Scotland for purely Scottish affairs, while retaining intact the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. Upon the latter part they had heard nothing. Yet it was the more important, and they all knew how it was felt to be most difficult—practically impossible—to reconcile the existence of a separate Legislature and Executive with the supremacy of an Imperial Parliament in the Debates on a measure relating to another part of the Kingdom in the present Parliament. And yet this abstract Resolution was moved without any allusion whatever to this most difficult subject. They would notice further that as usual England was not in it. They were getting accustomed to the idea of Federation with the omission of the predominant partner. But it was felt throughout the country that any such scheme should be disclosed on the responsibility of a Government and submitted as a whole for the discussion of, and consideration by, the House. He was not surprised to find that the Mover experienced a difficulty in discussing the Resolution apart from the discussion of the previous night. But he was yet to learn that certain statements then made committed gentlemen on the Conservative side of the House to certain views as to the propriety of Federation. That was a suggestion which was utterly baseless. He asserted, in the first place, that there was no demand whatever in Scotland which ought for a moment to move the House in the direction of this Resolution. He went further, and said that the cause which had been championed by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy was, so far as indications enabled them to judge, a back-going cause in Scotland. He observed the hon. Gentleman omitted the year 1891 in his Parliamentary history of this matter. That happened to be the only year in which a Bill was tabled embodying anything approaching to the details pointed at in this Resolution; and what happened to it? The discussion upon it was set down for a particular evening, and the keenness of the interest which hon. Members for Scotland felt in the subject, and the urgency of the demand in Scotland, were set forth by the simple fact that the House was counted out.

MR. DALZIEL: I did not include that, because it is well-known that the Bill came on quite unexpectedly, almost at the end of the Sitting. The Scottish Members did not expect it to come on, and I did not think it was worthy of being considered an important factor.

*SIR C. PEARSON said, he should have assented to the hon. Member's view of the matter had it not been for the use which had been made of the fact in Scotland as representing the way in which Scottish business was neglected in the House of Commons. So far as he could judge, the Association which had already been mentioned, and of which the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark), he believed, was still the President, had been largely availed of—he did not say created—by Members of this House for what he might call English consumption. He did not know how many Members were Vice Presidents of it. He thought the time had come when they must protest against the use which was attempted to be made of such an Association—on the one hand, holding out to the people of England that it expressed the views of Scotland on the matter; and, on the other hand, in Scotland assuming the position of renouncing the Association and all its works, and severing connection with it. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy said Scottish business had been neglected for a long series of years, and was still neglected. The hon. Member made two quotations upon the first point—one 20 years old, and the other 40, the latter being, if he (Sir C. Pearson) took note, a complaint which pointed in the direction of this Resolution, rather in the direction of the restriction of the ancient office of Secretary for Scotland, which had been done. The other part of the hon. Member's remarks on the neglect of Scottish business led him to say that the words "neglect of Scottish business" hardly expressed the truth of the case. It appeared to him they were all, or nearly all, agreed in regretting that Scottish business did not get faster through the House, but, at the same time, it was not absolutely exceptional in that particular. He was not aware that English business got on any faster. But it was not a case of neglect, nor did he regard it as a case of the machinery of the House breaking down except up to a certain point. He regarded the persons primarily chargeable, not for neglect, but for mismanagement in delaying the progress of Scottish legislation, as the Government of the day, that delay had happened. They were the parties responsible for the division and appropriation of the time of the House. He pointed to the fact that he did not think it would be disputed, whatever might be thought opposite of the conduct of business all round by the late Unionist Government, that during the six years that that Government was in Office Scottish business showed in least as good a proportion relative to the legislation for England, Wales, and Ireland. That demonstrated to his mind, at all events, that there was something not inherent in the machinery of Parliament which was primarily sponsible for the present state of matters. There were, he admitted, two limitations under which all Governments must approach this question. One was the great difficulty, both as regards the House as a whole, and individual Members of it, which was brought about by the enormous increase of Private Bills. He could only say that the late Unionist Government did their very best, by the introduction of Bills, to remove that difficulty. If the proposals were bad, they might have been amended by fair criticism. The other direction in which they were all agreed that this House could be relieved was by devolution of powers to Local Bodies. Local government had been awarded both to England and Scotland. The bodies thus created were bodies upon whom large administrative or executive powers might be, and no doubt would be, devolved to the relief of the necessity of legislation in this House in certain directions. To say that English votes overbore Scottish opinion was simply one mode of saying that this was a united Parliament, and that England was the predominant partner. They did not in one sense object to English votes overriding, as was said, Scottish opinion, because, if it was a price to be paid, it was one they were willing to pay for membership of an Imperial Parliament, and it was astonishing to him to find Scottish Members taking objections to the Divisions on the Scottish Local Government Bill when not so many months ago they had welcomed Welsh and Irish votes, not to speak of Scottish votes, to vote down the English majority on purely English questions. Another consideration ought to make this House throw out the Resolution. This Legislature was proposed to sit in Scotland to deal with purely Scottish affairs. Passing by the difficulty of drawing a distinction between affairs that were purely Scottish and those which were not, was it not too much for any hon. Member to move such a Resolution without even telling them what he proposed as to the relation between the membership of the Scottish Legislative Body and the membership of the Imperial Parliament? Were the Members of the proposed domestic Legislature to attend the Imperial Legislature at Westminster or not? If the Members of the Scottish Legislature were not required to attend at Westminster the scheme would bear separation on the face of it, and, not only so, but would deprive Scotland of her fair share of the management and control of Imperial concerns. On the other hand, if they were required to attend at Westminster, was it not plain that the difficulty which was expounded at length last year would arise—namely, that either the Scotch Members, besides having a Legislature of their own, would turn the balance in the Imperial Parliament on Irish or English affairs, or else that they must walk in or out according to the subject-matter of discussion? The Bill of 1891 enacted that they should be ipso facto Members of the Imperial Parliament, or rather that the Members of the Imperial Parliament should be ipso facto Members of the Scottish Legislature. The present Prime Minister (Lord Rosebery), speaking in Edinburgh in 1892, said—

Sir C. Pearson

“I am far from being one of those who would throw any discredit on the simple and elementary proposition that to discuss distinctly Scottish affairs the best persons are elected Scottish Representatives, but I will say in all seriousness I have great doubts as to whether that obvious proposition is best carried out by making them Scottish Members of the House of Commons. I believe that you elect your Representatives to go to Westminster on one footing, and that if you had to elect your Representatives to a local Parliament you would choose them from a more large and a more restricted point of view.”

The noble Lord added that it would be necessary to draw a clear line between the persons elected as Imperial Representatives and those elected for local purposes. Until a repudiation of that position was forthcoming from someone who was responsible for the only Bill on the subject that had yet been put in, he must assume that that Bill represented the views of average Scottish Home Rulers, and, if so, he must leave them to settle their accounts with their chief, Lord Rosebery. The situation in which the House had been placed by this Motion was one of extreme interest. The Motion had been introduced, of course not intentionally, in the middle of a discussion upon—he did not like to say an alternative scheme of Home Rule—but, at all events, a proposition which was supported last night upon some such grounds. What he was anxious to get at was the position of the Government upon the Motion now before the House. Which of the two proposals did the Government mean to support? Did it mean to say, "We desire a Scottish Legislature sitting in Edinburgh, and also a Scottish Grand Committee sitting upstairs?" He thought it was too late for the Government to say, as they had done on previous occasions, that the matter was one on which they had no views and no policy. Did they mean business on the present occasion, and, if so, did they mean business upon their own Grand Committee Resolution, or were they still in the frame of mind in which the Prime Minister was about nine months ago in another place, when he said, referring to a Scottish Home Rule Motion—

"Is this fatal Motion to become a precedent for future deliberations? If so, I can see what will happen. Some noble Lord will rise and ask Her Majesty's Government what are their views about the Creed of St. Athanasius. No one will deny that that deals with subjects much more vital, and much more important, and on which it is much more imperative to form an opinion than on the question of Scottish Home Rule."

What had the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland (Sir G. Trevelyan) to say to this? A Government which had pledged itself, first, to give Home Rule to Ireland, and, secondly, to give nothing to Ireland which it was not ready to give to Scotland, was bound to answer the question, and not to put it off as they had done on a previous occasion by a statement that they had no policy upon the subject.

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): Mr. Speaker, last year I took part in a Debate on this Resolution, and I then made a speech in support of it. Certainly, I am very unwilling to repeat a speech of that length to-night; but I know that there may be some hon. Members present now who were not present then, and I certainly am unwilling to give a silent vote upon this occasion. My vote will be given in favour of the Resolution of my two hon. Friends who, like the hon. Friend I supported last year, ask for a separate Legislature for Scotland. [Ironical Opposition cheers.] Oh, I do not mind any scoffs or hard words that come from the Opposition. I have learnt by the experience of yesterday that it is not necessary to bring forward a sweeping change and to accompany it with violent, subversive, and revolutionary language in order to be charged with subverting the Constitution of the country. Yesterday I brought forward a practical and workmanlike proposal for adding a third to the two existing Grand Committees of this House. [Opposition laughter and ironical cheers.] I think, Sir, that, considering how the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down was listened to by gentlemen opposite might give me a fair hearing. Well, that was a proposal enabling Scottish business to be better done in this House and English business to be better and more easily done. At that occasion I was denounced in language which would have been quite strong enough if the Government had then and there proposed to separate the two Kingdoms. That proposal represents what the Government, as a Government, intended to do in order to meet the great demands of Scotch business and the great and growing national feeling in Scotland. They believe that in making that proposal of a Grand Committee they have done a really useful work for Scotland, and they are more confirmed in that belief by the opposition which it has aroused, and which shows that something has clearly been done for the great principle of devolution and for the great principle of management of national affairs in accordance with national opinions. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir C. Pearson) asks me whether the Government mean business in this matter. They do mean business.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: In which matter?

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: In the matter of the Grand Committee. They intend to carry the Grand Committee through by every means which they can possibly employ, and by staking everything upon it, and up to that extent they are prepared to pledge and bind themselves to the Scotch Members. Further than that on this occasion the Government, as a Government, do not intend to go. As regards individual Members whether on this Bench or elsewhere, they must use their own judgment and their own way of looking at the public interest in order to determine in what direction they should vote. For my own part I am very glad that this question has been brought forward. There is very great use in an abstract Resolution for the purpose of promoting public questions, and there is very great use in taking a Division in order to show what real, solid backing of public opinion, represented as we believe that public opinion is, by the balance of Parliamentary opinion, there is in the country. It was the opinion of the late Professor Fawcett that there is no means by which a great public question can be pushed forward with such certainty as by the advocates of that question showing their belief in it by supporting their opinion in the Lobby. This question is going forward, although the right hon. Gentleman opposite thinks it is going backward. In the last Parliament 30 Scotch Members voted for a separate Legislative Assembly in Scotland; 40 Scotch Members voted in favour of it in this Parliament, and we shall see how many will vote for it to-night. I believe the question has progressed. Another 12 months have gone by, and there has been another 12 months' block of Scotch business. There is great unanimity in Scotland in favour of the measures they cannot get, and a greater determination to have them. The right hon. Gentleman opposite gave other reasons for the block in Scotch business than those which were given in the two excellent speeches in which this Resolution was moved and seconded. The right hon. Gentleman said the Government were responsible for the appropriation and division of the time of the House. I thoroughly allow that, but they are not responsible for the amount of the time. The time is limited in amount; and the Government, as Napoleon at the Battle of Waterloo said when he was asked for more infantry, cannot make time which does not exist. There is no way of making time except by the received method of developing the work of the Committee of the whole House upon Committees upstairs, and by the more heroic remedy proposed by my hon. Friend below the Gangway, of devolving the business of the House upon Local Bodies of sufficient dignity. The right hon. Gentleman opposite says he is in favour of devolution to Local Bodies. I did not quite catch the full meaning of his argument, but he spoke of County Councils and, I presume, District Councils, Parish Councils, and Municipal Councils, and said that we could devolve the work of Parliament upon them. Well, Sir, there is very little of the legislative work of Parliament that you can devolve upon any body unless it be to a Committee or a genuine local Parliament. But I must own that whenever we tried in the last Parliament to devolve on Local Bodies some little part of our own duties, we met with very small success. We proposed to devolve on the County Councils the power of acquiring land for public purposes instead of obliging them to come to Parliament for Provisional Orders. Forty-six Scotch Members were in favour of that change and 12 against it, but unfortunately the Scotch Members were not allowed to have their own way. We proposed that County Councils should have power to protect rights of way—power of a sort which in some degree is at present held by them. Forty-three Scotch Members were in favour of and 12 against that proposal, but the Scotch Members were not allowed to have their own way. We proposed that the County Councils should be allowed to regulate their own duties of health. Forty Scotch Members were in favour of that proposal and 12 against it, but again the Scotch Members were not allowed to have their own way. The right hon. Gentleman told us that those who had spoken up to this time in support of the Motion had only used the old arguments. Well, after a reform has been for some time before the country you may be pretty certain of one thing, and that is that if you have a good argument in its favour it probably will be an old one, because the arguments in favour of a reform are few, simple, and strong, whilst those against it, if it is a good reform, are many, new, and ingenious. In what respect, I would ask, has it been shown that it would be dangerous to have a Parliament for Scotland? Have we been told that the country is too small and unimportant, when it has a population as large as a second-class Kingdom, and is a country with manners, customs, and laws of its own, and an administration of its own? Have we been shown that the population to which these powers are asked to be entrusted is a population that cannot be trusted with them? Have we been shown that the Scotch people are a people in which classes are divided by deep and bitter differences, and cannot be allowed to fight their own battle within their own confines without being kept in order by a Parliament sitting in Westminster? Have we been shown that Scotchmen do not understand and are unfit to manage their own education, their own Universities, their own municipal affairs, their own local traffic, and all the other matters which concern the morality, the welfare, and the prosperity of the country? No, Sir; let hon. Gentlemen show that Scotchmen are not fit to have that self-government which is enjoyed by many smaller, poorer, and much less intelligent nations, or let them allow that we have indeed a good case. My belief is, that this feeling in Scotland in favour of Scottish self-government is growing and will grow, and I hope the Division to-night will show that many Scotchmen want it and that many Englishmen, Irishmen, and Welshmen are willing to help them to get it.

Sir C. Pearson

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I am inclined to think that the speech we have just listened to from the right hon. Gentleman is a unique performance in our Parliamentary annals. The Prime Minister of the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman is a Member, speaking upon this very question of Home Rule for Scotland not long ago, said—

“I have not the gift of enthusiasm possessed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary for Scotland, which carries him a great deal further than that, and I am not responsible for all his opinions.”

I do not think that when the Prime Minister delivered himself of that interesting verdict upon his own colleague he could have foreseen the performance upon this very subject which that colleague was destined to execute within a few months of the time at which that utterance was made in the House of Lords. For what is it the right hon. Gentleman has just done? On Monday, the 2nd of April, he comes down to this House and makes a speech in favour of Scotch Grand Committees which will have the effect of handing over to Scotchmen a power over the legislation dealing with Scotland not possessed by Englishmen, Welshmen, or Irishmen. That proposal is discussed, but is not divided upon. Some of the most important criticisms on it have yet to be delivered. But on one of the days of the week sandwiched in between the day on which that proposal is made, and the day on which it has to be decided upon, the same right hon. Gentleman comes down to this House and tells us that he, though an Englishman, is so enamoured of Scotch liberties that, not content with getting Scotchmen privileges in this House which no other nationality possesses, he desires in addition to give Scotland a separate Legislature! Sir, was there ever such a comedy performed in this House; was ever legislation made more ridiculous? Have we ever seen—has the oldest Member in this House ever seen—a performance like this in which the same Minister proposes on two successive days these two inconsistent schemes, and on the second day when he himself is advocating a change which will rend in pieces the Constitution of this country, finds himself supported during his speech upon the Bench by three Law Officers, two Under Secretaries, and no Cabinet Minister at all. The Secretary for War (Mr. Campbell Bannerman) and the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) are present, but they only came in for the peroration. During the progress of his speech I anxiously watched to see who were the supporters on the Bench of this second edition of the right hon. Gentleman's proposal for expediting Scotch legislation, and I am accurate in saying that they consisted of two Scotch Law Officers, one English Law Officer, and two Under Secretaries. Sir, this is to make the House of Commons ridiculous. I did not hear the speech of the hon. Gentleman who proposed this Motion, and I am ready to believe everything good of it; but I have heard all the other speeches, and the idea that we are to sanction a change which will fundamentally alter the Constitution of this country and which will reverse in its most essential particulars the Act of Union passed some 180 odd years ago—that we are to reverse that legislation after a Debate of this kind, in which my countrymen have evidently set it before them as an object that they are to prove to the world at large that they can appreciate a joke—is really too absurd. Now, Sir, I listened to the admirable literary exhibition of that English Member for Fife, whose books we have all read with delight and whose speech to-night was very interesting and amusing; but it was not a speech, if I may venture to criticise the hon. Gentleman, which was an adequate preface for a great Constitutional change. The humorous treatment of Scotch legislation is a very good pastime for the House of Commons in its more wearied moments, but it is not, I venture to say, a proper preface for passing a Resolution which, if acted upon—and I believe it never will be acted upon—would make a revolution in our affairs which hardly any patriotic Scotchman has contemplated without horror for the last 100 years. The element of comedy, the elements contributing to this Parliamentary farce which we have been listening to to-night, have not been contributed by my own countrymen alone. A Member for Wales intervened in the earlier part of the Debate, and that hon. Gentleman, the Member for Flintshire, was only stopped by your intervention, Mr. Speaker, from giving us his views on Welsh Home Rule, and although he was not permitted to develop at length his argument upon that great theme, he made it perfectly clear to the House that there was no argument to be advanced in favour of Scotch Home Rule which could not be advanced with equal force in favour of Welsh Home Rule; not only with equal force but with greater force, for whereas about half the Scotch electors who voted at the last Election were strongly opposed to Scotch Home Rule, I believe, though I have not verified the figures, that the proportions who supported Members holding the political views of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Flintshire are probably greater. But even Wales does not stand alone in this appetite for a separate Legislature, which is gradually growing up in every part of the Kingdom. [Ministerial cheers.] London wants one. Why is that not cheered by hon. Gentlemen opposite? Why are they going to refuse to London what they want to give to Wales and long to give to Scotland? London is larger in population than Scotland, a very great deal larger than Wales, and I believe even larger than Ireland, and I cannot conceive any argument that can be advanced in favour of Home Rule for Scotland, Wales, or Ireland that cannot be advanced in favour of Home Rule for London. If there be such an argument I desire to hear it. It has not been advanced in this House, and I wait for it. If we are to have Welsh, Scotch, Irish, and London Home Rule, why may I not, as a Lancashire Member, claim Lancashire Home Rule? The population of Lancashire is not inferior to the population of Scotland. Certainly, Lancashire and Yorkshire together are far in excess of the population of Wales, and I do not know that they are inferior in intellect and in the power to manage their own affairs. Do you propose to have a separate Parliament for Lancashire and Yorkshire? If not, why do you not propose it? Why are we to be put off with this futile and inconsequent treatment of a great Constitutional question? Why are we to be dragged down here at the fag-end of a Tuesday evening in order to hear Scotch jokes upon Scotch business, but not to hear one single argument worthy of the great subject which hon. Gentlemen in their more flippant hours appear anxious to treat of? Is the constitution of this country a matter to be treated upon in this House in the absence of the Leader of the House—in the absence of every Cabinet colleague of the Leader of the House, except one Scotch Member and the President of the Local Government Board; are we actually to be asked to come to a decision on questions like this when our natural guides have chosen the better part and gone to bed? It is turning, if I may venture to say it, the privileges of private Members into a farce when they ask us to come to these momentous decisions under circumstances and upon grounds like these. Neither the arguments that they have advanced nor the circumstances under which they have been advanced nor, if I may say it with respect, the men by whom the arguments have been advanced are of a kind to command the assent of the House of Commons in a controversy which touches nearly in its issues the greatest topics which this House can deal with. I have abstained, as the House will see—and it is only following the example of every speaker who preceded me—from touching upon the real merits of this question, because I consider that the circumstances under which it is brought forward have rendered discussion of the merits absolutely absurd. In no speech that has been delivered to-night, neither in the speech of the Seconder—I did not hear that of the Mover—nor in the speeches of those who have supported him, nor in the speech of the Minister for Scotland himself, has this topic been treated on its merits; and the idea that the Act of 1707 is to be reversed on a Tuesday night between half-past 9 and 12 upon such speeches as we have heard is to say that this House has repudiated its main functions. I think before the Secretary for Scotland asks us to accept the Motion for which he is going to vote he ought to induce at least a moiety of his own Cabinet to support him by their presence; but in the absence of the Government, and in the absence of any argument urged from any quarter of the House adequate to the great theme on which we are nominally engaged, I trust the House will show its contempt for the proposal and the manner in which the proposal is introduced by rejecting it without ceremony in the Lobby.

Sir G. Trevelyan

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 180; Noes 170.—(Division List, No. 12.)

Resolved, That it is desirable, while retaining intact the power and supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, to establish a Legislature in Scotland for dealing with purely Scottish affairs.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Am I in Order, Sir, in asking the Government whether they propose to bring in a Bill?

[No reply was given.]

PUBLIC BUILDINGS (LONDON) BILL. (No. 79.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) moved the Second Reading of this Bill, the object of which, he explained, was to give Local Authorities the same powers of acquiring lands for public buildings as was possessed by every Local Board under the Act of 1875. The President of the Local Government Board, the hon. Member for the West Derby Division of Liverpool, and others, who had seen the Bill, all agreed that it was a non-contentious measure which should not be opposed. He did not, therefore, anticipate any opposition from any quarter of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Colonel Hughes.)

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) had looked carefully into the Bill, and he did not see why these powers should not be conferred on the Local Authorities.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 2) BILL.

Read a second time, and committed.

MOTIONS.

SOLICITORS (IRELAND) (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Carson, Bill to amend and consolidate the Laws relating to Solicitors and to the service of Indentured Apprentices in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Carson, Sir Albert Rollit, Mr. O'Neill, Mr. Maurice Healy, Mr. William Kenny, Mr. Barton, Mr. O'Keeffe, and Mr. Macartney.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 133.]

WILD BIRDS' PROTECTION ACT (1880) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bill to amend "The Wild Birds' Protection Act, 1880," ordered to be brought in by Sir Herbert Maxwell, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Joseph Pease, Mr. Loder, Sir William Ingram, and Captain Bagot.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 134.]

BOARDS OF CONCILIATION BILL.

On Motion of Sir John Lubbock, Bill to confer additional powers on Boards of Conciliation and Arbitration, ordered to be brought in by Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Charles Fenwick, Mr. Howell, Mr. Mather, Mr. Montagu, Sir Francis Powell, and Sir Albert Rollit.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 135.]

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (COUNTY OF LONDON SATURDAY POLL BILL.)

On Motion of Captain Norton, Bill to provide that at Parliamentary Elections in the county of London the Poll shall take place on a Saturday, ordered to be brought in by Captain Norton, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. James Stuart, and Mr. John Burns.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 136.]

HOURS OF LABOUR (LOCAL AUTHORITIES, &C., SERVANTS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Macdonald, Bill to limit Labour in the service of Local Authorities and of Railway Companies to Eight Hours a day, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Macdonald, Mr. Beaufoy, Mr. John Burns, Mr. Samuel Evans, and Mr. Keir-Hardie.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 137.]

TEACHERS' REGISTRATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Macdonald, Bill to provide for the Registration of Teachers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Macdonald, Mr. Bousfield, Mr. Grove, Mr. Henry Hobhouse, and Mr. Henry J. Wilson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 138.]

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Seton-Karr, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Liability of Employers for injuries to their workmen, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Seton-Karr, Mr. Walter M'Laren, and Sir William Houldsworth.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 139.]

House adjourned at two minutes before Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 4th April 1894.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

OLD AGE PROVIDENT PENSIONS BILL.
(No. 9.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

COLONEL DAMPIER, PALMER (Gravesend): Mr. Speaker, I believe the House of Commons never refuses to extend a full measure of indulgence to a new Member when he addresses it for the first time, and had I not felt that I might hope for such indulgence being extended to me I should hardly have had the courage to propose the Bill of which it is my duty to move the Second Reading to-day. Greatness is sometimes thrust upon Members who neither desire nor deserve it, and the position I occupy to-day is entirely owing to the good fortune I had in the Ballot of private Members. This old age pension question is no new thing, and this is not the first time on which the House has been called upon to deal with it. As long ago as the year 1773 a Bill, perhaps not of the same name as that now before the House, but, at any rate, having a similar object in view, was passed by this House, and went up to the House of Lords, where it was rejected. A similar Bill was introduced and passed in 1789. In 1796 Mr. Pitt proposed a Parochial Fund, and in 1817 a Committee of this House recommended that the Benefit Societies should be able to offer greater facilities for provision for old age. That is the position which the question has occupied up to recent times. In recent years it has very much come to the front, and it is an extraordinary fact that at the last General Election there was hardly a platform throughout the length and breadth of the country in which some alteration was not suggested and recommended by candidates for this House, no matter what Party they represented.

It is peculiar to notice that since the General Election legislation, which was sympathised with and which was so much discussed upon public platforms, has been heard very little of. It may crop up now and then, principally at bye-elections, and it will inevitably be found on such occasions that the two candidates compete with one another in the sympathy which they express towards the persons who will be benefited by the passing of a Bill of this nature, and endeavour to obtain votes based upon the sympathy thus expressed. Well, Sir, if that be the case—and I do not think there is any question that it is the case—the country has a right to expect that something shall be done by Members when they get into this House to carry out the pledges they have made on the hustings with the object of obtaining a seat in it. It is the desire to carry out my pledges that animates me to a great extent in my advocacy of the measure now before the House. There appears to me to have been a general consensus of opinion as to the disease which has to be remedied, but there is, unfortunately, not the same agreement in regard to the cure which should be applied to the disease. The position of the old age pension question reminds me of a patient who, stricken with a serious illness, calls in two eminent professional men, who prescribe differently, with the result that the patient is left very much where he was. I will first mention those points in relation to the matter on which there is general unanimity. There is general unanimity, I think, in the feeling that there should be some place for an aged member of the community who has done his duty in that state of life to which it has pleased God to call him—a place in which his career might have a more fitting termination than in the work-house, which carries with it personal humiliation and political disqualification. There is also a general feeling that any scheme having for its object the removal of these disabilities should be one which tends towards thrift, and that we should not, by any measure which might be passed by this House, take away or minimise in any shape or form the self-reliance and thrifty habits of those people whom it is our desire to serve. So far we are all in complete agreement. I think we may go a little further, and say we are agreed that there are no agencies in existence at the present time which enable a poor man to provide for his declining years. I do not for a moment forget the Friendly Societies. I am perfectly well aware of the enormous amount of good they have done; but it is an extraordinary thing with regard to the Friendly Societies that the benefits they confer and the good they do are almost entirely limited to that period of a workman's life when he is in full possession of his energies, and that the money he subscribes is subscribed principally for the purpose of securing some provision in the case of the sickness or death either of himself or some member of his family. But that branch of the Friendly Societies Bill which suggests to a man that in his youth or early manhood he should set aside a sum of money for the purpose of making provision when he reaches the age of 65 years has only been taken up by the working classes to such a small extent that it may almost be left out of consideration. That is very much the position in which we find this question to-day. This is not the only country in which schemes of this description have been considered, and in some countries not only considered, but passed into law. They have been discussed in various countries on the Continent, but I will only mention the two cases in which the discussions I have alluded to have resulted in legislation. I refer first to Germany, which passed a law in 1889; but the provisions of the law, I think I may say, would not be applicable to the circumstances of this Empire. The German law, quoting it roughly, is something to this effect—that the workmen should subscribe a certain amount from week to week of their weekly wages; that to that amount an equivalent should be added by the master, and that those two sums together should be supplemented by an addition from the State. The great objection to the scheme is that the provision made is altogether inadequate to sustain a man when he arrives at an age when he desires to avail himself of a pension. The pension is divided into four classes, and in these the payment varies from 2s. to 4s. 6d. a week, totally inadequate to maintain a man in any degree of comfort. There are other objections to this scheme. In Germany the collecting card passes from hand to hand, and upon it is marked contributions that are made, so that such a card carries on the face of it the amount of work done, so that it implies a sort of character, and appears to me to be an inquisitorial system that would not be tolerated by the working classes of this country. Then one can hardly leave out of count, in taking into consideration the different state of affairs here and one of the large Continental countries of Europe, that upon the Continent there is a law which does not affect us here, namely, the law of conscription, that law which takes away from the early manhood of the men a considerable part of their time, and their duty to the State in that way, perhaps, renders it necessary for the Government of a country in which such a law exists to take such different methods to those which apply in this country where such a law does not exist. I then pass to Italy and France, but I will not detain the House with discussing the suggestions made in those countries, as at present no law has resulted from them. But in Denmark the position is somewhat different; and in speaking of the laws and regulations which exist in Denmark, I would, with the permission of the House, like to go a little more closely into them, because any Member who has read the Bill now before the House will be aware that in this Bill those who are responsible for it have to a certain extent altered and cut out certain portions which are not suitable to this country, but that in the main there is no doubt the provisions now in existence in Denmark are to a considerable extent incorporated in this Bill. In the Danish scheme, which varies altogether from that in force in Germany, we find these salient features. First of all, there is no contribution whatever from the recipients; that the funds that are necessary to carry out this scheme are provided in equal proportions by the State and the Poor Law Authorities. And here there is a difference in the suggestion we make. I am well aware of the great diversity of opinion that exists as to the method by which the requisite sum should be raised for dealing with this pension question and also, I believe, as to the amount. Whatever suggestion might be made undoubtedly there would be a host of objections to it. Then, again, in Denmark the age is

Colonel Dampier Palmer

which a pensioner becomes entitled to a pension is the age of 60 years. We in our Bill fixed the period at 65 years, and we have fixed that period bearing in mind the recommendations of the Committee of this House, which suggested that as the right age. One object in connection with this fixing of the limit of age will strike every hon. Member who has had any experience of the working classes, both in the country and the towns, and it is this—that undoubtedly the time when a man requires the use of the pension scheme comes earlier in life to the artisan who works in great cities and manufactories than to the man who works in the country as an agricultural labourer under most favourable conditions as to health. Though we appreciate the difficulty, we do not see our way to differentiate it; and, therefore, we have in our Bill adopted the age suggested by a Committee of this House. Then the regulation in the Danish Bill which to me, and those who think with me, commends itself most strongly is this—that in this Bill the sharpest possible distinction is drawn between the deserving and the undeserving. I, for one, think that is a very right and proper measure. I think it is most unfair and unjust that a man who has done his duty through a long life, not only to his family but to his country—it is unjust that in the evening of his life he should be treated in precisely the same way as the drunkard, the criminal, or the improvident; that the better fate should be reserved for him, and on that basis we have drawn a sharp distinction between the deserving and the undeserving. Then there is another point which I think is a right one in the Danish measure, and that is, that there is no taint of pauperism attached to the recipients of the pension. I think that is quite right, because pensions are not unknown in this country, for they are granted from the Lord Chancellor down to the postman, and I do not see why a humble member of the State who has done his duty should not be entitled to claim a pension. I do not think there ought to be the slightest stigma of pauperism attaching to the receipt of that pension, and I do not think there should be any legal or personal disqualification attached. Under the Danish law the funds are distributed by the Poor Law Authorities; but in our Bill we expressly exclude the Poor Law Authorities from dealing with these pensions, and we do it for this reason—on the ground that the Poor Law Authorities are intensely unpopular, and it would be almost impossible for any pension scheme to escape that limit of pauperism to which we have such strong objections, if it were administered by the Poor Law Authorities. Well, Sir, those are the main features of the Danish Bill. I am quite aware that in regard to this Bill the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain)—who has done so much to bring this question to the front, and to whom on many of the points which I have mentioned I am bound to admit my indebtedness—in works of his has dealt with this question. I find that in an article of his in The National Review of February, 1892, he subjects it to a most scathing criticism. What he says is practically this—that the Danish law, as it stands, is a provision for outdoor relief in all cases over 60 years of age, the effect being to check thrift and provident provision, and to discourage it. I hope, however, that such alterations may be made as will enable the right hon. Gentleman to alter or modify that view. We believe that, so far from diminishing, this will encourage thrift and providence; we believe that, so far from doing injury to Friendly Societies, we shall render assistance to them, because there is one clause in the Bill which gives a claim to a pension to a man who has made some provision for old age through the means of a Friendly Society, and if he has done this he will receive a larger share of the pension; therefore, I cannot help thinking that members of Friendly Societies may rely upon it that this Bill looks with favour on their Societies; and when the State offers to a man a pension if he has made provision for himself to some extent, it is an inducement to every working man to belong to one or other of the Friendly Societies in the country. I pass now to the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). I will not detain the House by going into the details of that scheme, but it practically means this: Supposing a man of 25 years of age will save £5, and will deposit that in the Post Office Savings Bank, the State will add to that £15 more, and then, in consideration of the man paying £1 annually up to the age of 65, thereafter he shall be entitled to a pension of 5s. a week. Of course, suggestions have been made for a man's wife and children, or his successors, if he should die, sharing in the provision he has made. But these are methods that have been discussed on the public platforms and in the Press throughout the country, and I submit to this House that the country itself expects something more than the pious opinions that have been expressed. I believe the country not only expects, but has a right to demand, that we who have on public platforms discussed this question and expressed our sympathy with it, should not in the House of Commons sit down and wait for the next Election, but should make some practical effort to carry into law those changes which we have expressed ourselves so favourable to. I know there will be innumerable objections to this or any other Bill. Some hon. Gentlemen may say the Bill does not go far enough; but what I would say is that on this question, as on any other where there are such strong differences of opinion, it is necessary to walk first and run afterwards, and it is possible, if we can only set the legislative machine going, we may be able to amend it from time to time hereafter. Then there are those who regard pensions as another form of Poor Law relief. I do not think that that is so; but, at the same time, I recognise this—that even under the existing law of the land we have to keep a man who cannot keep himself after 65 years of age, or even before that age; therefore I do not think it any great strain to alter the law to this extent—that we pension every man who has subscribed to certain conditions, while we should not keep him in a state that does not make him submit himself to the personal disqualification and moral degradation of going into the poorhouse. Before resuming my seat I would express a hope that the Government would favourably consider this Bill. I am afraid they may consider it is impossible to consider a Bill of this description at the time the Royal Commission is sitting on this subject, but from my small experience of this House it appears to me that on many occasions the appointment of a Royal Commission did not mean that the subject is to be dealt with. In several instances the establishment of a Royal Commission is nothing more than a dilatory Motion. I do hope the Government will permit this Bill to be read a second time, because I believe that the subject with which it deals is regarded with the gravest and deepest interest throughout the country, and I believe it would strengthen the hands of those members of the Royal Commission who are honestly desirous of forwarding legislation in this matter. I have only to say now, I feel deeply indebted to the House for the courtesy with which they have listened to me, and to recall at this moment a criticism I saw in the Press which was to this effect: that a Bill such as this now before the House was an admirable Bill in itself, but that they were of opinion, having read it through, that it was such a very admirable Bill that it so thoroughly fulfilled the requirements which the country looked for that they had no doubt it would commend itself to the House and the country, notwithstanding the indifference with which it was supported. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Colonel Dampier Palmer

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Colonel Dampier Palmer.)

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, he had taken great interest in this subject, and especially the Bill his hon. Friend had so ably brought before the consideration of the House. The hon. Member was to be congratulated upon his speech, which was one that all sides of the House would consider to have been interesting in itself, and to have brought this matter fairly before this Assembly. He had been interested in this Bill for many years. He had had the honour of introducing it several times, and he advocated the scheme on which the Bill was framed so long ago as 1871 in a Paper that he read before the Society of Arts called Pensions for Old Age as a National Question. This Bill and the Bill now on the Paper, entitled "Outdoor Provident Relief," formed the basis of the Paper he read, and the principles involved in that paper were really the basis on which this Bill was framed. His hon. Friend had referred to the Royal Commission. It was true that if they could accomplish all that they could wish they would have been ready to postpone this discussion; but the lucky accident of the Ballot was not to be despised. He had for several years been balloting to get a place for this Bill, and he might have had to go on balloting for many years more but for the good fortune of his hon. Friend. The present Poor Law, they might fairly say, was based on the fear of punishment. The old Poor Law said that if people were not careful, were not provident, if they did not provide for themselves, the law would come in and provide for them, but that it would do that in the most miserable manner possible in order to discourage them from requiring the services of the Poor Law. In 1832, when the Poor Law was first established, there was a deal to be said from that standpoint, for they must remember that previous to the new Poor Law some 90 per cent. of the agricultural population were on the Poor Law, and it was necessary to take drastic measures for an alteration. Now, owing to wiser and kinder administration, that state of things had been altered, and the number had been reduced to 5 per cent. of the population. It seemed to him that by a system of rewards they might reduce this 5 per cent., that they might introduce a system of encouragement to the thrifty, and that was really the basis on which this Bill was founded. As his hon. Friend had said, there were two main principles that underlay the whole of this Bill. First, there was the idea of providing a brighter old age for the deserving poor, that they should have a brighter old age than was the case at present. The second principle was quite as essential as the first—namely, that they should provide this brighter old age in such a way as to encourage, bring out, foster, and stimulate habits of thrift and self-reliance, and, in short, to produce those habits of self-reliance and thrift which were so essential to the prosperity of any nation. Taking those two main ideas, he wished to refer to each in a few words. As regarded the first, supplying a brighter old age to the deserving poor, his hon. Friend had referred to that in a very touching and effective manner. They all agreed that the old age of a man or woman who had worked well all his life should not end with the workhouse, that somehow or other they should be provided for, and their old age made brighter and happier than was now the case; that a person who had laboured throughout life should be secured against want. His hon. Friend had stated truly that at the present time the State provided for old age, and even for the youth of men and women, for the indolent, lazy, and vicious. They provided for these; they did not allow the Mosaic law—that a man who would not work should not eat—to be carried out; even for the lazy who would not work they found food and clothing. The old who had been known to be vicious, thriftless, and even criminal in life were kept in old age; and it was, therefore, still more reasonable that the thrifty and the careful, who had worked hard all their lives, and added to the wealth of the country, should be kept in some degree of comfort at the public cost when they were too old longer to work. But the sting of their assistance was that they did not discriminate between the persons—they were all provided for alike in a way which, to the improvident and careless, was not a bad sort of arrangement—to the idle and lazy might even be pleasant, but to those who had really worked and done their best, to end their days in the workhouse was miserable in the extreme; and the more miserable and degrading it was to them, the more worthy they had been throughout their lives. All would agree that was a sad ending to a useful though, it might be, a humble life. The question they had to answer was whether they could not find some plan by which, inasmuch as they did provide for old age at the present time, they might provide for the aged in such a way that the deserving and the careful should have an eventide of life brighter and more worthy of a useful life, and at the same time provided on such a system that the system should throughout the whole of life tend to raise and elevate and bring out the best instincts and habits of the people. This Bill attempted to do that, and, from a study of the question, he considered the Bill to be framed on lines which would have that result. The Bill first of all laid down who were country on arriving at 65 was to get a pension of 7s. a week because throughout the whole of his working life he had never received any relief, surely it must be obvious to the House and to everybody else what an immense difference that would make in the whole system of relief. What an incalculable benefit that would be to the poor themselves! What a totally different spirit it would infuse throughout the life of these poor people! They would go through life never knowing any Poor Law relief, and at 65 they would come to the community and ask for a pension because they had during their lives saved themselves from any relief by the Poor Law. The same remark applied to those who asked for a smaller pension of 5s. 3d. because they had been able to save by their own exertions the sum of 1s. 9d. The difference would be immense. They would come at 65 claiming that they had done something for themselves, and the effect on their working life would be totally different to what it was at present, and the whole system of relief and the thinking and habits of the people would be immensely changed. But there was more in this. If this spirit was instilled the very fact that people had got into the habit of living without the aid of the Poor Law relief, and of providing for themselves, and the non-receipt of relief being required as a qualification for a pension, would ensure such habits and qualities throughout life as to enable them to dispense with a pension in many cases, whilst it might be hoped that some day the great bulk of the people would be able to provide for themselves. He had seen many cases in which people beginning to save by very small sums had achieved results not thought possible. Our present system of giving relief tended rather to thriftlessness than to the encouragement of thrift. The system advocated would tend altogether in the other direction to that of our Poor Law. Whilst the Poor Law system gave little, if any, encouragement to thrift and self-effort it absolutely encouraged the reverse. A labourer on 15s. a week, who had always kept himself and family, was treated just the same as the man who had had 20s. or 40s. a week, and who had been of drunken and improvident habits, and had not provided for himself or family even when in the receipt of his full wages. Why should the labourer, therefore, make an effort to provide for the future, knowing as he did that when old age came upon him he would be treated exactly the same as others, whether he were careful or not? He knew as well as they that he could save very little. Yet the only chance of the people really progressing was that they should make an effort to do something. However little this was it was of essential importance if they were to promote their own happiness in the future. The only way in which a nation could be really prosperous was by all classes making an effort to provide for themselves, and a nation's prosperity and strength were largely measured by the way in which the smaller and poorer persons had made this provision. If from sentimental motives, from political cowardice, or worse, they ignored this principle of self-reliance, including that for old age, they destroyed the very fibre upon which society must exist. The principle of this Bill was to develop and make it obviously in the interest of the humblest to try and do something for himself. It promoted thrift and self-reliance by natural means of self-interest, and although he should say a few words in a moment on the cost of the scheme, and show it would be absolutely more economical than our present system, yet he might here state that the more money that was paid under this Bill the greater would be the evidence of prosperity at the bottom of the social ladder, whereas under our present Poor Law the greater the cost the greater the misery. There were some details of importance in the Bill which, however, he would only just touch on. In the first place, it was proposed that this Bill should not be worked by the Poor Law Authorities in the districts. They did not at all want to introduce the Poor Law in dealing with the cases of deserving people who had worked well all their lives. In the second place, the pension was not to disfranchise; and, in the third place, the whole amount required was to come from special rates levied in the district. Some people thought that these funds should be provided out of the Imperial expenditure, but these pensions would be much more local than Imperial, and should, in his opinion, be provided for by means of rates, but this was, of course, a matter of detail. Another very important point was that the scheme did not involve a system of bookkeeping throughout the life for each of the 33,000,000 persons in the country. Those who had had no practical knowledge of the working of such schemes could have no idea what the bookkeeping of millions of accounts meant. It was his good fortune to be connected with a small institution with only 100,000 accounts, and his experience there showed him that if they were to have accounts and bookkeeping for 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 of people making periodical payments for old age the machinery would be so enormous as to break down the whole scheme. The Bill proposed to allow the people to manage in their own way until they were 65, and then when they were 65 the Local Authority looked into the facts and ascertained whether the cases were those in which pensions should be granted. The question of cost was an important matter, and the absolute cost of this system would diminish in proportion as it was taken up. If it were largely adopted the cost would be less than if it were only partially taken up. Roughly speaking, there were about 1,300,000 persons of 65 years and upwards in England and Wales. He did not exclude Ireland and Scotland from this scheme, but simply gave the numbers for England and Wales because they had the statistics at hand. Of these 1,300,000 there were about 245,000 now over 65, who were in receipt of Poor Law relief at a cost of £2,500,000. They knew perfectly well that by a more careful administration of relief these numbers had been greatly reduced in certain places, and he believed if they would carefully administer relief as they proposed to do by this Bill, the tendency would be largely to reduce the number who would need pensions. For argument's sake he would suppose that the whole of the 245,000 over 65 and upwards who now received relief received pensions. He would take the three classes. Suppose they all received the highest pension the Bill gave them—namely, 7s. a week, because none of them had ever received relief during their lifetime, the result of that would be that they would receive about £4,500,000. From that, however, would have to be deducted the £2,500,000 which they now received, leaving a net expenditure of £2,000,000. But they must remember if they supposed that all persons over 65 years of age who now received relief sought to obtain a pension in the future because they had never received outdoor relief, they might take it as a corollary on that that during the whole period of their lives all the others who were before 65 would never have received relief also. The broad fact that the Government had built up a system which led to the result that all persons who arrived at the age of 65 had not received relief during life would be a fair indication that all others would practically be in the same position; therefore taking the whole cost of this proposal at the highest rate they would really and truly have a reduction of expenditure, because the whole cost of relief at the present time was £8,500,000, so that even if this scheme only promoted pensions for those who now received relief after 65, and they were to double the number, the cost to the community would be practically the same as it was at present for Poor Law relief, with this difference: that the whole working class of the community would have given up all sorts of relief, and at 65 would receive a pension. That was, of course, the extreme and ultimate point. He did not say it would be reached, but he was taking the maximum cost to show how the Bill would work if everybody took the highest pension. If all took the second pension the cost would be even less, and there would be a considerable reduction in Poor Law relief, which was an important consideration. If they were to carry the Bill at once the immediate effect would be to produce some increase, because there were many persons in the workhouses now who were deserving of pensions. But the ultimate result of the measure would be that the larger the number of persons who adopted the bigger pensions the better it would be for the community, because the smaller would have been the expenditure throughout their lives upon the relief, which they all wished to see reduced. If the scheme were adopted the ultimate result would be rather a saving than a loss to the community in the rates, and although he was very keenly interested in reducing rates, he said that the rates were of no importance whatever in comparison with the main principle of the Bill, which was to do nothing to foster habits of thrift and re among the people, and thus reduce poverty to a minimum in this country. I should like to say a word or two as to the objections raised against the scheme. First, there was the objection that there would be trouble and difficulty in tracing the history and antecedents of each applicant for a pension at the age of 65. I granted that there would be some difficulty, but that difficulty was essential to any scheme of sound aid. The sense of relief of the people must be based upon careful investigation, and though in this case some difficulty must arise, still they must remember that at the age of 65 it would be done with once and for all, and, again, the investigation was not so serious as some might think. There were, roughly speaking, 100,000 persons who arrived at the age of 65 every year in this country, and about one-fifth of these went on the Poor Law. There would be 20,000 cases to investigate, but there were about 15,000 parishes, so that it would only be a little more than one case in each parish. No doubt there would be more cases in some parishes than in others. The second objection was that the poor could not do anything for their old age, and that to ask them, particularly by those who were better off, was a mockery. It was very easy, no doubt, to be popular and say these sort of things in these times, but the fact remained, whether trimming politicians liked it or not, that the people could and must do something for themselves, and it was kinder and more patriotic to ask them to do something than to say everything was to be done for them. Conceal it as they might, whatever was done for the people ultimately cost them far more than they received, in some way or other, such as by increased rates, reduction of wages, and employment, and other things, so that actually they did ultimately pay more than they received from any system of relief. The people could do something for themselves; they were willing to do something, and the greater facilities they gave them the more readily they would avail themselves of these advantages. He had seen many instances of what self-effort in pence might do, for the poorest accounts beginning with pence became many pounds. Could anybody say that one bowl of tobacco a day, or one glass of beer, or one ounce of tea a week might not be spared by even the very poorest? And to sacrifice so little of any one of these articles he had mentioned, from the age of 20 to 65, would enable people to obtain the largest pension referred to in this Bill. They must, in considering this question, look at what the people had done for themselves. Look at the old Trustees Savings Banks with their £40,000,000; the Post Office Savings Bank with £80,000,000 or £90,000,000; the Co-operative, Building, and Friendly Societies, numbering hundreds of thousands, and even millions, of members, a total capital altogether of £200,000,000 or £300,000,000 sterling. A few years ago it would have been said it was impossible for the people to do these things, but they had done them, and were prepared to do more if facilities were given them. In his judgment, persons who had helped to found those institutions for thrift had done more good than many of those who promised to give old age pensions to everybody, whatever their qualifications. Parliament was bound to foster those habits of thrift which the people of this country had developed to so large an extent for themselves and which were so essential to their welfare. His hon. and gallant Friend talked of the malady of old age. It was really a malady, and should be treated like a broken leg. A man with a broken leg was not able to walk; and the only way in which the broken leg could be mended was by carefully bandaging it round at first and allowing its strength to return by degrees, and by their encouraging it to make a gradual effort itself to walk. It could not be disputed that there was something wrong about our present system of old age relief, because it ought to be impossible for any man who had spent a long life honourably to be compelled to seek relief in his old age in the workhouse. It was the broken leg in our social system. We must give it support in such a way that the support could be reduced, so that ultimately by the person's own efforts the leg would be restored as strong as before. No doubt the aim of every person ought to be to provide for their old age. That was the object which our legislation should have in view. But there was a great deal in our social system which could not be mended by any plan. It would take generations before the existing blot as to old age upon our social institutions could be wiped out by any scheme that could be devised, but the cure was certain in time, if only the scheme was based on the right principle. He apologised to the House for having occupied so much of their time upon that occasion, but he had devoted many years of his life to the consideration of this very difficult subject, and he hoped that that would be his excuse for having spoken at such great length. It ought to be the duty of that House to inculcate upon the people of this country the necessity for preserving their own self-respect, their self-reliance, and their independence, and all legislation in regard to old age pensions should proceed on that basis.

Mr. Bartley

*MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge) said, he had to congratulate the hon. and gallant Member opposite on the temperate and admirable speech with which he introduced his Bill. The hon. and gallant Member had rightly told the House that this subject was not only great in the numbers it affected, great in the consequences that would follow in its train, but great also in the interest that it excited. The movement of public opinion in the direction of providing some better system of dealing with the relief of old age was one of the most remarkable—one of the most hopeful movements of their time. He took it that the expression of that feeling was one fruit of the great enfranchisement of the people which had taken place during recent years. The poor people had long felt, just as they felt to-day, the inadequacy and the cruelty of the present system of dealing with old age and poverty; while they were unenfranchised they had not the voice, but now that they had got votes they had found their voice and used it. At the last General Election there were few platforms on which this subject was not discussed, and he knew that in the part of the country from which he came there was not a single county address, so far as he saw, which did not contain some allusion to the subject, and a promise—he believed a thoroughly honest and genuine promise on the part of the candidate—to give his attention, if he arrived at the House, to some well-considered scheme of dealing with this great question. It was a great question as regarded the number that it affected. He imagined that the question could not be looked at from the point of view of one part of the United Kingdom only, and if they dealt with those who were 65 in the whole of the United Kingdom they came to the number that was, he believed, in round figures about 2,000,000 of old men and old women. Of these, now some 30. or 40 per cent. were compelled to obtain Poor Law relief in some form before they died, and a very large number indeed were in great stress just on the other side of the border, which actually compelled application for relief. Of the people who were under 65, only, he believed, something like 4 per cent. came on the public rates for relief, while over that age it was between 30 or 40 per cent.—a very striking and remarkable difference—and when they remembered that of those who reached the age of 25 the half would attain the age of 65, they saw how large a proportion of the existing population had an interest in what should be done in dealing with this question. The condition under which the great multitude of people lived, they must admit, was one of hard struggle, hard to most of them during the days of their manly or womanly vigour—and a very large number, in spite of their best efforts, were able to do but very little towards providing for old age, and to those who did make an effort in this direction, misfortune, sickness, and calamities of one kind or another, such as the failure of the Liberator Society, for instance, came and swept away the provision which, through the self-denying efforts of long years, they had made. Nothing was more pathetic in village life than the position of old men and women who had subscribed to various small Societies for many years, and who found when misfortune and sickness came upon them that those Societies were bankrupt. The system of pensions was not unknown in this country. It had long been a custom to pension their fighting men and the men who drove the pen in the Civil Service, but for his part it appeared to him that the men of the plough, of the hammer, and of the loom, had an equally large claim upon the nation as the men—nec-

Mr. Bartley

cry, he admitted—who wielded the word and drove the pen—and when they thought that it was the men of industry who contributed the incomes of these people, and afterwards their pensions, it did seem to him very unreasonable that in a nation they should pension their servants while they (the masters) should be left without any pensions for themselves. To treat servants liberally and well was an honour to any master, whether private or public, but to treat their servants better than themselves was not right, so far as he knew, by any law, human or divine, and there was nothing in sense or reason to justify such conduct. He knew there was a strong feeling among the poor people when they saw the pensions that were paid to the thousands and tens of thousands who were employed in the Public Service, and when in many cases these pensions went to men who had had very large incomes indeed, it was very hard lines that those who had found this money pay these salaries and pensions could have no better provision than the workhouse at last. It did appear to him that in attempting, in some way, wisely and prudently to deal with provision for old age, they were doing what which had everything to justify and to authorise it. There were three ways of dealing with this question. The one was to deal with it by purely voluntary means; the second was to deal with it, as the Bill before them proposed, by State-aided Organisations; and the third was to deal with it entirely on national lines. The first two schemes, it appeared to him, had this against them—that they would always leave outside of any voluntary agency a large number of people left unprovided for. If they helped a great many, which in every respect was certainly better than helping none, they would not anything like cover the whole ground. And then there was the difficulty of existing old age, which none of the voluntary schemes that he had seen were able to grapple with. He considered that on those grounds the scheme which was most deserving of their support, which had most to recommend it, was the scheme of a National Provident Society—that was to say, that the nation itself should be the area, and the agency by which provision should be made for the old age of all. He would point out what appeared to him to be the overwhelming advantages of a system such as that. The basis of it would be that out of the Treasury, into which everybody paid, everybody should be entitled to receive, when he or she reached the age of, say, 65. They knew that at present every person in this country, from the time he or she was 15 to the time he or she was 65—that was, half a century—was paying taxes. Our taxes were so laid that they caught everybody. What we drank or what we smoked returned something like half of the whole taxation of the country, and if we had been paying for 50 years into this Treasury, then it was certainly not an unreasonable thing that a certain proportion of what went into the Treasury should be, so to speak, “ear-marked” for our benefit, when we reached a time of life when we must ease off our work and call upon some outside assistance to give us help. The obvious advantage of a national system was that it would cover everybody—it would not leave a single man or woman in the nation unprovided with assistance. Again, they would be perfectly sure they would be insuring in a fund which could not fail, as alas! so many insurance funds did fail people at the present time. It would also be perfectly simple, and the blessings would be immediate. Directly the House passed a measure of this kind, every old man and every old woman would be entitled to receive the blessings of the funds, and in every village and hamlet, in every street of every town and city, the heart of the widow would sing for joy, and the old man would feel a burden of fear lifted off his shoulders that would gladden his heart as no act of this Legislature had ever gladdened it in times past. Then the scheme would be perfectly fair, because everybody would pay. By such a scheme as he was advocating and defending the rich, too, would pay more than the poor. Our taxes were laid for that purpose. And there was no way in which the poor could be enabled to share in the benefits of the rich in a more equitable manner than this, and since in this country riches grew faster than the population it did seem a reasonable thing that out of the increasing riches provision should be made for those with whom the battle of life had gone more hardly than with their more fortunate brethren. It would also introduce a kind of Christian brotherhood amongst us. It would recognise that we were children of one Father, citizens of one nation, that we owed something to one another, and that the strong should help the weak. We had recently extended our national care to education. We had taken child-life in hand, and had made provision for the free education of all children. Well, the next natural step was to go to the other end of life, and by a national provision to help the aged. Of course he was perfectly conscious that the scheme he was advocating was one which entailed enormous cost. If there were 2,000,000 of the population at the age of 65, and if 4s. a week were provided for them, that would entail an amount of something like £20,000,000 every year. Let not that, however, frighten them. It would be admitted that it would be a good thing if everybody in this country were insured against old age. But the people would have to pay for that insurance, and it would not cost one farthing more to have this money straight out of the Treasury than it would to pay it out of the exchequers of Friendly Societies. Besides, the national administration would be very much more economical than any other administration. Under their complete apparatus for local government they would have agencies all over the country which, he was sure, would be glad, by voluntary unpaid arrangements, to provide for the paying out of this national pension to those entitled to it in their respective districts. They would have an administration practically without cost, and he believed—in fact, he was sure—that the taxpayers of England were perfectly willing to pay the extra taxes to carry out this great privilege and boon. He believed also that, instead of discouraging, it would encourage thrift. Under the existing system the thrifty man had to pay for the thriftless; but under his proposal both classes would benefit equally, and he believed it would encourage thrift, because people would feel that they would have comfortable provision in their closing days in proportion as they were able to supplement by their own savings the amount granted them by the State. A national scheme would have a patriotic influence, too, because it would tend to make people value the privileges of their citizenship. To the great bulk of the people the law was an instrument for taxing and restraining them, and the benefits they received were not very manifest. But if they had a direct interest in the taxes they paid they would have much more reason to appreciate the benefits of being British citizens than they had at the present time. Without being pauperised they would, under his proposal, be enabled to spend the closing years of life in comparative ease and comfort. He would suggest that there were several sources of income that might be laid under contribution to help this fund and ease the taxes. There was, of course, obviously the large cost—probably some £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 sterling—of the present Poor Law system aiding the aged that would be saved. Then the existing almshouses might be incorporated and made part of a national system, and also the present pension funds of some millions—for it certainly seemed to him that if they went in for national pensions they should treat all pensioners upon the same scale, and they should pay salaries for current work in proportion to its deserts, and that as regarded pensions all citizens should stand upon the same equal footing. Then, besides, there was an amount of several millions a year which was received under the name of tithes, and which everybody expected would at no very distant date be diverted from its present use, and to what better use in these modern and changed times could a great deal of that money be put than to the assistance of making happy and more comfortable the latter days of the veterans of industry? He firmly believed that some day, and that no distant day, as this subject was thoroughly discussed in the nation, the nation would desire its Representatives to carry into effect some such national system of universal public insurance as he had sketched to the House.

*MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) said, they had all, he was sure, listened with great pleasure to the eloquent speech of the hon. Member for the Woodbridge Division of Suffolk, but whilst listening to him they had, he thought, almost forgotten that the matter they had to consider was the particular Bill before the House. There had been, as the House ll knew, a great variety of schemes committed to the public dealing with old e pensions. They differed in almost their details, and gave rise to many difficulties and contentions. The ballot on this occasion had, he thought, ayed them rather an ill-turn in bringing his measure forward on this particular y under the circumstances of the pre-ent time, because, as the House was ware, a Royal Commission had been tting for some time considering the uestion of old age provident pensions. hat Commission had been taking evidence ith regard not merely to the scheme abodied in the Bill, but with regard the various schemes proposed by umerous gentlemen. Coming forward this particular moment the Bill was bject to the difficulty that they had t now before them the other schemes as to enable the House to compare em with that embodied in the Bill. e thought it would have been fortunate they had had to-day to deal not with a articular Bill, but with a Motion in pport of a general principle of ensions for old age. He was glad to ink that in the House there was no iffERENCE amongst them as to the rinciple of old age pensions. No hon. Gentleman who had spoken had said a word against the general principle of old age pensions, and he thought the subject might be said now to have entered upon a new phase. He thought it might be said that the House of Commons was prepared to accept and did accept the principle of old age pensions. He took it that what was meant by "the principle of old age pensions" was that where citizens of this country had arrived at a time of life when they were unable any longer by their work to support themselves, it was the duty of the State towards those citizens, if they had conducted themselves throughout a long life respectably, to provide for them something which was at any rate sufficient to maintain life and keep body and soul together and prevent them being obliged o have recourse to the provision of the Poor Law. Though he did not altogether agree with the hon. Member for slington that the Poor Law was niversally unpopular, yet he was aware hat some obloquy did in some districts ttach to the Poor Law, and what he nderstood was meant was that the people who lived under conditions that gave rise to pensions were to have the pensions paid irrespective of the Poor Law—through the Post Office, or in some other way. As they were all agreed on the principle of old age pensions, he need not detain the House by making observations in regard to that. He would turn to the scheme embodied in the particular Bill before the House. He as an unfortunate ratepayer naturally turned, first of all, to the section of the Bill which provided the mode in which the funds were to be raised. There was considerable discrepancy in the estimates made by the hon. Members who had spoken as to the amount that would be required to carry out a scheme of old age pensions. The hon. Member for the Woodbridge Division had talked in a somewhat airy way of £20,000,000 being required. The hon. Member for South Islington was more moderate, £4,000,000 being the amount of his estimate.

*MR. EVERETT said, the scheme he had propounded would establish a national system, under which every person in the nation over 65 years of age would be entitled to a pension.

*MR. DODD said, he was glad to hear that the £20,000,000 had no relation to the particular Bill, the subject before the House. It was probably not worth while going into arithmetical problems when the figures were so much in the air. There was as yet no agreement as to the method of providing such pensions. In the Bill before them it was proposed that the rates should be increased for the purpose. As the Representative of an agricultural constituency he was bound to protest against this proposal, for agriculture was not in a position to bear any additional rate. He thought it would be found that every person connected with agriculture would say that if there was an interest in the country entitled to be saved from an increase of the present rates it was the agricultural industry. He was not one of those who looked for a moment to protection. All he asked for agriculture was that it should pay its fair share of expense. He did not ask for more than that, and to put this new burden upon the farmer and the occupier of land would be to bring them nearer to bankruptcy. The mode in which it was suggested that the money should be provided made this Bill impossible of acceptance. He did not, however, say that because this scheme was impossible, therefore, all schemes were impossible. All he did venture to say was that this particular Bill was not the most satisfactory scheme that could be proposed. It was not in itself a satisfactory Bill. No doubt it was difficult to say what should be done with the Bill under the circumstances. It might be said that if the Bill were read a second time there would be ways and means found of removing some of the difficulties and deficiencies of the Bill. There were other points, besides the mode adopted of raising the money by increased rates, on which he objected to the Bill as drawn. For instance, in the distinction made so sharply between deserving and undeserving; and though he would not say some discrimination should not be shown, he would like to see the line not quite so sharply drawn as it was in the Bill. Certainly, if read a second time, it would have to be amended in that respect. None of us were, perhaps, very deserving—even the best—and the very worst were not always altogether undeserving. Coming to the practical point of what was to be done with the Bill at present, first of all, it needed to be amended in regard to the strong line drawn between the deserving and undeserving, and, secondly, it needed to be amended also so as not to interfere with the Foresters, Odd Fellows, Hearts of Oak, Ancient Buffaloes, and various other Orders of Friendly Societies. He would like to see the Bill adjourned until the Royal Commission had reported on the various schemes before it, and then brought forward in competition with other Bills. It was always ungracious to appear to stand in the way of anything good, and he regretted very much to appear to be putting difficulties in the way of any scheme for old age pensions. He hoped the discussion might prove of use. The House was evidently of opinion that old-age pensions should be provided by the State under some scheme carried out under reasonable conditions, and with that he agreed, but this Bill seemed to him so unsatisfactory that he would be unable to vote for the Second Reading.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR - LEYLAND (Colchester) agreed that it would be very much better to postpone this and all other Bills dealing with the question until the Royal Commission had reported, and he had a certain amount of interest in the matter, as he happened to be pilot of one of the Bills before the House, differing very much, however, from the one before it. He had listened with great interest to the speeches delivered in order to learn the reasons for this proposal being made. With regard to the question of cost, the hon. Gentleman who moved the Second Reading had not stated what the maximum cost of such a scheme would be. On that subject the various authorities widely disagreed; but there was no doubt, assuming that all the benefits promised by the Bill in relief of pauperism were to be conferred, the capitalised value of the sum of money that would have to be expended every year under such a scheme would be over £500,000,000 sterling. For England and Wales, taking the average expenditure at 5s. each person all over the country, the maximum cost of the Bill would be £16,900,000 a year, from which must be deducted £2,500,000 now expended in relief to aged poor over 65. The proposal before them, therefore, was to increase the burdens of the country by that sum, which he submitted was rather a large proposal for a Wednesday afternoon. The Mover and Seconder of the Second Reading of the Bill spoke of the stigma attaching to pensions coming from the Poor Law Authority. No doubt such a stigma did attach in the minds of some people to those who received Poor Law relief; but he thought the House ought to be informed what authority was to be substituted for the Poor Law Authority for the purpose of making the necessary investigations in the 18,000 parishes throughout the country. If a separate and special authority was to be set up, the expense of administration would at once be enormously added to, probably to the extent of £200,000 a year. There were certain conditions which ought to be contained in any old age pension scheme. In the first place, it was laid down by a Committee some years ago, over which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham presided, that in any scheme the pension should begin to be paid at the age of 65. That was the most important point, for by every year that the age was reduced the cost would be enormously added to. This Bill, he observed, did lay down that proposition. Again, no scheme should, either directly or indirectly, in any sense go back upon the principles laid down in the reformed Poor Law of 1834. It was well-known to hon. Members what was the object of that reform. It was, briefly, to reduce the enormous amount of outdoor relief, and only to give that form of relief in very special circumstances. But if they gave people pensions, the recipients would be in receipt of outdoor relief, whatever the House might choose to call it. He therefore laid down the principle that in no sense must they do anything to increase the area over which outdoor relief was now distributed. This Bill proposed to give pensions ranging from 3s. to 7s. to people who had never contributed towards those pensions, and, therefore, the people who would have to pay the pensions would be largely the industrial classes. Those who would really have to pay pensions to these would be the classes just above them, and really the poorest classes in the country would provide this tax quite as much as the classes above them. Thus the aim of the Bill was in direct contradiction to the principle laid down by the Committees to which he had referred. Another general proposition laid down by the voluntary committee he had referred to was that no scheme of this description ought to run counter to the great Friendly Societies of the country. According to the terms of the Bill, its author was going to give pensions to 300,000 people at the very least, without asking them to pay for the pensions. At this very moment the Friendly Societies were dealing with this question, and the two great Societies—the Foresters and the Oddfellows—had lately started a system of old age pensions, under which a person who was promised a pension undertook to pay for it; but if under this Bill pensions were to be given to persons who did not pay for them, was there any probability that the members of those Societies would continue to pay for their pensions? The Bill would, therefore, disregarding the proposition of the voluntary committee, compete with the Friendly Societies in the strongest possible way. Politicians in that House and wise people of all kinds talked about the desirability of reforms and about the excellence of thrift and its value to the nation; but while politicians were talking, the great Friendly Societies had taken the matter in hand and had done more for the promotion of thrift than all the speech-making that had gone on inside that House or out of it. His own view of the subject was that the State should add an equal sum to the amount, whether it be a penny or £100, put away by a person to purchase a deferred annuity at the age of 65, and those annuities might easily be issued at post offices all over the country to persons who were willing to contribute in that way a certain sum of money annually for the purpose. Whatever the House did he hoped it would not do anything to record its approval of the scheme now presented, which was designed to pauperise, and to do nothing else. He rejoiced that they should have employed a Wednesday afternoon in discussing a great social question, for in that way only could light be thrown upon it and some satisfactory scheme evolved which might eventually become law.

Mr. Dodd

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said, he had listened with some regret to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, who had considerably exaggerated the cost of the system proposed. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman would take the whole of those who were likely to come under any pension scheme at the age of 65 he would find that they numbered something like 250,000, and, allowing about 5s. a week for each person, that would give a total of £3,000,000 or £4,000,000, instead of £16,000,000, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman suggested. At the same time, there would be in addition a positive saving in our extravagant workhouse system, a system which might have answered its purpose very well in 1834 and later, but which at the present moment was nothing more nor less than an insult to the civilisation of a nation of such enormous wealth as our own. Of course the cost of carrying out any scheme of this kind must be great, but the same thing could be said of the work of any large Department of the State—the Army, Navy, or Civil Service—which the nation thought it necessary to maintain. It was all very well to say such a scheme involved granting outdoor relief, and that people should be left to make provision for themselves ; and it was all very well for hon. Members and those who possessed all the comforts of life to which they were as accustomed as to the alteration of day and night, but they were dealing here with altogether a different class. He was tired of this perpetual preaching down to people, and if hon. Members were in their position they would find how difficult it was to make any provision for old age. He regretted what the hon. and gallant Gentleman had said as to the effect of the pension system being to pauperise, and hoped the House would not accept the opinion that any such scheme must bear the stamp of outdoor relief. The main objects of Friendly Societies were quite distinct from those of the measure the House was now discussing. Friendly Societies were intended to provide for sickness, loss of work, and almost every kind of misfortune except old age. If the provisions of the Bill were confined to old age pensions, the Friendly Societies would prove helpers in that work rather than otherwise. The hon. and gallant Member who brought in the Bill might rely upon it that thrift was not likely to be secured either by offer of reward or fear of punishment. If a man was unthrifty at 30 he could never be made thrifty by fear of what would happen to him when he was 60 or 70. Thrift really was a result of education, and the hon. and gallant Member, who he knew sympathised with the poor, must remember he was dealing not with inanimate forms, but with human beings whose lack of thrift had tended to increase their sufferings in old age. The question under consideration was an all-important and a truly national question. A man who had honourably spent a long life in honourable labour, and had done his best, though that best might not be much, should have some other prospect in his old age than the workhouse. Many among themselves, perhaps, if they had been placed in the position of having to travel through a hard life with the element of hope taken out of it, might not have been so thrifty, so brave, and so enduring as large numbers of the class of people whose interests they were now considering. Much was said about drunkenness, but probably some of the Members of the House would seek relief from the public-house if they had no other prospect before them. We had educated the masses of our fellow-men and had thereby enlarged their wants and desires ; and, therefore, it all the more became the duty of Parliament to see that means were placed within their reach for reasonable fulfilment of those wants and desires. Society owed a duty to those who had laboured the whole of their lives. Instead of pointing to the workhouse as a refuge to such men in old age, he would place a medal on the breast of each of them as a knight of labour who had added to the wealth of his country, and make provision for him in his old age when he had not been able to make it for himself. It was quite true, as had been remarked, that the Poor Law was regarded by a large proportion of the working classes as a degradation. It was not only a degradation to the men, but it was expensive to the community, and, therefore, alike on economical, social, and humanitarian grounds, the system was bad. He knew there were eminent men, whose opinions were entitled to great respect, among them a former Member of the House, Mr. Albert Pell, who thought the evil of pauperism might be cured by the denial of outdoor relief. It might be done by killing off the paupers or by other means, but he contended that the adoption of such a system would be unworthy of the country and could not be carried out without inflicting a great amount of suffering. The hon. and gallant Member who moved the Second Reading was to be complimented on the fair and moderate claims he made on behalf of the Bill. He seemed to fully recognise the enormous difficulties that surrounded the question, and he wisely claimed no more for the Bill than an attempt to solve some of those difficulties. The main points urged by the hon. Member for North Islington in favour of the Bill were, in his opinion, serious blows upon it. The restrictions in it were too great. The burden to be placed on the administrators of the Bill, to distinguish the deserving from the undeserving, would be really an impossible task. There was, it seemed, to be an inquisitorial term of 10 or 15 years, and it was to be ascertained whether during that time a man had through crime, drunkenness, or in other ways made himself undeserving of assistance. But who was to decide that point? He had known men and women who, having started well in life with fine mental qualifications and high courage, and having struggled on for a long time, had at last been beaten down to low health and a degraded state by adversity and the hopelessness of their position. Yet they could be called neither drunken, criminal, nor undeserving. They must have no Bill which sat in judgment on those poor people. He would, therefore, discard all inquisitorial conditions as to whether a man had received poor relief, or had saved anything for himself, or had in various ways made himself undeserving of assistance. Large numbers, if not the majority, of working men and women were unable to make any provision for old age out of their scanty earnings. Very frequently the 10s. or 15s. a week earned by the labouring man did not represent more than 1d. per meal per day for his family. Men of that kind he had remonstrated with for saving a shilling a week, pointing out that the money would be better expended on milk or boots, or something of that kind. A man might be doing the greatest harm by saving that shilling, because it might not be a superfluity, but a dire need. It was not always by scraping and cheeseparing possible to save a shilling, and the man who saved it was not always as much to be commended as the man who spent all his wages on necessaries for his children. There were large numbers of men who subscribed thousands and tens of thousands of pounds to clubs for aid in time of sickness or want of employment. For instance, there was the fund of the National Agricultural Labourers' Union, into which hundreds of men had been paying for 13, 14, or 15 years in the hope of getting some assistance in sickness and in old age, and now were coolly told "there is nothing for them." Were they to be told "You have saved nothing for yourselves?"

Mr. Jesse Collings

MR. BARTLEY said that was specially provided for under the scheme.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, he was glad to hear it, but the case of the man with a family, earning 10s. or 15s. a week, to whom he had referred was not provided for under the Bill as he understood it. It had been urged by the hon.

Member for Mid Lincoln that a universal pension system would be destructive of thrift, and on the same ground it was said that the payments under the Bill should come out of local rates and not Imperial funds. He held, however, that this was not a local question at all, but one that affected every man of the well-to-do classes, and all right-thinking and reasonable people belonging to those classes would be willing to pay for it. How much more valuable would a rich or even moderately rich man's possessions be to-morrow if he could feel that every man above 65 in this country was in reasonable comfort! He would feel that he had an undoubted right to all his accumulated property—a thing about which, at present, there was some doubt. If he could feel in the winter time, or in times of special hardship, that all his fellow-men above a certain age were in reasonable comfort, how much sweeter would be his own enjoyments! That was the sentimental aspect of the question. As to the justice of it, the present condition of things, as the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had said at St. James's Hall, was a blot upon our civilisation. If the funds were levied on the local rates, the burden would fall on a particular class; but this was a matter in which the rich should help the poor, and the rich district the poor one, and that could only be done by means of Imperial taxation. He had only one view of the case to urge, and he thought it important. He asked the hon. Gentlemen opposite who were connected with the land, and capitalists and manufacturers who sat on the Ministerial side, to remember the origin of the present state of things. They had a proletariat such as existed in no other country of the world, and that to a large extent was the cause of the state of things which had made the remedy they were now considering necessary. By the processes through which the land had passed during the last 200 years—processes which had been of great economic value to the nation—the labourers, whose case especially they were now considering, had been reduced to the condition of mere wage-receivers; and although they could not go back on that which had been so beneficial to the nation as a whole, yet the facts constituted a claim upon the nation as a whole, which had benefited by changes that had at the same time inflicted hardship upon a particular class. The labouring classes had been deprived of property left to them by pious donors in former times, and on all these grounds he urged the acceptance of the Bill on the general question of the public good. He hoped the Second Reading of the Bill would not be deferred until the Royal Commission had reported. That would mean the hanging-up of the question for another year. It was an urgent question, at any rate so far as the initial steps to be taken were concerned, and he hoped, therefore, that the hon. Member would carry the Bill to a Division. He (Mr. Collings) should vote with him with a better heart and with more pleasure than he thought he had ever felt in regard to any vote he had recorded in the House before.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): I think it is to be regretted that a Bill dealing with such great and important interests, and which has given rise to large expectations in the country, should not have been postponed for a few weeks until the Report of the Royal Commission was before the House. The hon. Member for Islington admitted himself in the speech he made in seconding the Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill that it would have been far better if this Debate could have been postponed. He said, however, that he had trusted to the ballot, and that if he had not availed himself of his privilege the probability is that he would not have secured another opportunity of bringing the Bill on. I admit the force of his plea, but nevertheless it has rendered our discussion somewhat unfortunate and difficult by the knowledge that the matters in question are being investigated by the Royal Commission at the present moment. One of the first acts of the Government on coming into power was to appoint this Royal Commission. We felt that the subject was one well worthy of investigation. I have great sympathy with the demands made for some alleviation of the condition of the aged poor, and recognise fully what was said by the hon. Member for Gravesend in his very interesting speech. The Commission was appointed, has set to work and nearly completed its labours in as short a time as almost any Commission I have ever known, and I believe it will in the course of a few weeks present its Report to the House. It has had before it, I understand, different schemes for old age pensions. There is the scheme propounded by Mr. Charles Booth, a scheme of a very philosophical character and wide-reaching nature. There is also the scheme which was founded by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, and which has been lately adopted by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. It has also had before it the very scheme which is now under discussion, and I believe I am right in saying that the whole merits and demerits of the measure, whatever they may be, were fully laid before the Commission in all their economic and financial aspects. There are also other schemes which are well-known to hon. Members who, like the hon. Members opposite, have devoted a great deal of attention to this matter, and which are being considered. As a result of this investigation we shall have when the Report comes out a full description of all the schemes, the possibilities of dealing with them, and the benefit likely to arise by their adoption. Under these circumstances, hon. Members must see that I have considerable difficulty in dealing with the question immediately before the House. I think the House will perceive that it is almost impossible that I, on behalf of the Government, should accept this scheme which the hon. and gallant Member has presented to us. Apart from the difficulty of the matter it would hardly be right that while a Royal Commission is sitting upon the subject we should adopt a scheme without having information put before us by this Report as to the details of the schemes which they have had under consideration. Without that information it is not to be expected that I should pronounce definitely in favour of any one scheme. The House will admit that there would be great difficulty in dealing with the financial and economic details of the Bill without having before us all the facts laid before the Royal Commission, and all the financial considerations involved in the subject. What I venture to suggest to the House, and to the supporters of this Bill, is that they should be content with the discussion which has arisen to-day, and that they should adjourn further discussion on the Bill to a future day after the House has had an opportunity of reading and considering the Report of the Commission. That I believe, on the whole, to be the wisest course to adopt. As I am not in a position to affirm the principle of the scheme laid before the House now, I cannot ask the House to agree with it, nor, on the other hand, should I feel justified in asking the House to disagree with it. I think the best course is an adjournment of the matter. In saying this, however, I want to express thorough sympathy for the hon. Member for Gravesend, and with the hon. Member for Islington in the object they have in view. We know how much the hon. Member for Islington has done in the encouragement and promotion of thrift, and we can all sympathise with his object in propounding the scheme which is the outcome of his desire to contribute more to the welfare of the class for whom he has done so much. At the same time, I must say that it is easy to draw up plans for pension schemes; it is fascinating work, and perhaps many of us have attempted it; but it is difficult to draw up a scheme which will not be open to financial and other objections. Anybody who has taken the pains to make an examination of the scheme embodied in the Bill will know that there are many very great difficulties connected with it. The Bill before us provides that there are to be three classes of persons entitled to pensions. In the first place, the proposal is that all persons over the age of 65, who have committed no crime within 15 years of that age, and who have not been convicted of drunkenness within 10 years—that is to say, all persons who are unable to earn wages, and who declare themselves to be in need of a pension—are to be entitled, on reaching the age of 65, to a pension of 7s. a week.

Mr. Jesse Collings

*MR. BARTLEY: Entitled to a pension; not necessarily a pension of 7s. per week.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: A pension of 7s. per week, I take it.

MR. BARTLEY: A pension not exceeding 7s. per week.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: At all events, I understand they have a right to a pension—that is a vital portion of the Bill.

MR. BARTLEY: This applies equally to the other pensions named in the Bill.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: The hon. Member for North Islington considers that these conditions offer a strong inducement to the practice of thrift up to the age of 65. Now, I would venture to point out one effect of that provision. A single man who during the whole of his working life has regularly spent his wages without saving anything, but who has never had occasion to apply for poor relief, is entitled at 65 years of age to a pension of 7s. a week. On the other hand, a man with a large family, and with the heavy burden arising therefrom, and perhaps earning only low wages, if in the course of his life, up to 65 years of age, he once applies for relief either for himself or his children he will not be entitled to the pension.

MR. BARTLEY: Not of that class.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: Now, I ask, can that distinction be justified? Now, take the case of a widow with children, who, after a hard-working life, may have upon one occasion to apply for relief. Is that to disqualify her absolutely for the receipt of the pension of 7s. a week, when a man who has been receiving £2 or £3 a week, out of which he has saved nothing, would be entitled to a pension of 7s. a week? I venture to think that comparisons of that kind would become so odious that the position could not be maintained. Let me quote another case. It is a condition provided in the Bill that a person convicted of drunkenness within 10 years before reaching the age of 65 shall not be qualified for the pension. Under this part of the Bill it would be possible for a man who has spent a large amount of his wages on drink, but who happens never to have fallen into the hands of the police, to get his pension at the age of 65; but, on the other hand, a prudent man, ordinarily sober, and who for the most part of his life has lived a regular life and spent very little in drink—if, upon one occasion, he should get drunk, and fall into the hands of the police and be convicted, he absolutely loses all his qualifications for pension. Again I say that distinctions of that kind cannot be maintained. Again, I observe that all applicants under the Bill as it stands must say that they are unable to earn wages, and are in need. It is possible that a man may be in need at 65, and afterwards become possessed of means or be assisted by relatives; but under the Bill he would still be qualified for a pension of 7s. a week. I do not find in the Bill any provision to meet the case of persons who, having obtained pensions, ought, for some reason or another, be called upon to give them up afterwards. That appears to me to be a matter which cannot altogether be excluded from any pension scheme. Then there is the question of what constitutes residence—the residence that entitles a man to his pension. There are no provisions in the Bill as to domicile, and as the Bill stands, persons coming to England from the Colonies or from foreign countries, or Jews who may come to England from Russia, would be entitled to a pension. Then there are no provisions to secure uniformity in the decisions of the Local Authorities nor fixing the length of residence which should give a local claim. I come to the argument as to the promotion of thrift, which I know to be an object that the promoters of this Bill have deeply at heart. Will it promote thrift, or encourage a man not to spend his wages, if he knows that at 65 he will have a pension of a certain amount reducible by the income to be derived from what he has saved? Will not that condition stimulate a man to get rid of what he has saved as he approaches the age of 65? Again, the Bill appears to contemplate persons receiving the same amount of pension in every part of the country irrespective of the varying conditions of life in different parts. A pension of 7s. a week to a man and similar pension to his wife would in some parts of the country be a considerable endowment. There are parts the Highlands and the western coast of Ireland where 14s. a week is far in advance of the average earnings. On the other hand, in some of the great towns, and especially in London, 14s. a week would not do more than support life. That a person who has received Poor Law relief should not be entitled to a pension on reaching the age of 65 unless he has laid by something is an encouragement to thrift. But there is also a provision that, instead of laying by something week by week, a sum of £10 paid at any time to the Local Authority should entitle to a pension of 3s. 6d. a week at the age of 65. That is equivalent to about £9 a year, and on those interesting terms people may be found to pay the necessary £10 for the applicant. It is in connection with the question of finance that I feel the greatest difficulty about the Bill. The hon. Member for Islington, who went into this part of the case, appears to think that the number of persons who would obtain pensions under the Bill would be the same as the number over 65 years of age now receiving Poor Law relief. That would be in England and Wales about 240,000. But I cannot accept that view of the case. A large number of persons who have never received Poor Law relief would be entitled to pensions on the larger scale (7s. a week), and that number it is impossible to predict. The Bill applies to England, Ireland, and Scotland; and the number of persons above 65 in the United Kingdom is 1,800,000. Of that number, adopting the calculation of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, two-thirds belong to the wage-earning class. Of those, one-half have at some time received Poor Law relief, and therefore the remaining portion are mainly composed of those entitled to claim pensions at 7s. a week. A considerable number of people also will be entitled to pensions on the reduced scale, and according to my calculation the total charge which would accrue to the Local Authorities would be something like £14,000,000 a year, £11,000,000 being the cost of the first-class, and £3,000,000 the cost of the second and third class of pensions. I shall, however, be glad to have the evidence given before the Royal Commission bearing upon these figures. It is impossible to expect the Local Authorities to bear such a burden, knowing what the feeling of the country is with regard to rates. The charge, therefore, would have to be incurred in the name of the Imperial Exchequer. Further, the scheme would require a very large staff of officials for its administration. The County Councils and Town Councils at present have no machinery for investigating into the antecedents of applicants for pensions. It would be an almost impossible duty for the London County Council to inquire into the case of every person in London over 65 years of age. I make these criticisms in no hostile spirit, but to show the difficulties which must be inherent in any such scheme, and to suggest that the subject requires the most careful consideration before determining which scheme is the best. I have every sympathy with the hon. Member's object, which is to alleviate the condition of the aged poor; but the present scheme is so full of difficulties that I cannot ask the House to accept it. I would suggest that the best course to adopt is to adjourn the discussion until after the Royal Commission has reported. If after that it appears that the Report is favourable to this particular scheme, on behalf of the Government I will promise to give time for the further consideration of the Bill.

Mr. Shaw-Lefevre

COLONEL DAMPIER PALMER : Will the Government give us a day after the Report of the Commission or the further consideration of this Bill?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : I said that, if the Royal Commission reported in favour of this scheme, then I would undertake, on the part of the Government, that time should be given for the further consideration of the measure.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.) : I am myself a member of the Royal Commission to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, and upon those shoulders he is inclined to place the responsibility of the inconclusive termination of this Debate. Now, on general grounds, I think that an inconclusive termination of this Debate would be a matter very greatly to be regretted. We are dealing with a subject which, I believe, creates in men's minds a popular interest, in a subject which is quite ripe for further legislation, and in regard to which, at any rate, I think it would be a great advantage not only to the public at large, but also to the hon. Members of the Royal Commission, that some indication, at any rate, of the feeling of this House should be given. Everyone must share the feelings of the right hon. Gentleman that it would have been convenient if we had received the Report of the Royal Commission before this discussion came on. But my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Gravesend (Colonel Palmer) has obtained an opportunity which comes very rarely to private Members, and I do not think, under those circumstances, that he is to be blamed for having taken this opportunity for introducing the subject to the consideration and careful attention of the House. The right hon. Gentleman suggests that, in the event of the hon. and gallant Gentleman consenting to the adjournment of the present Debate, he would, on behalf of the Government, offer him another day if the Royal Commission reported in favour of this precise proposal. The right hon. Gentleman has told the House that the Royal Commission has had before it an immense number of schemes, some of which he has entirely omitted to mention, and others of which he has, in my opinion, inaccurately described, but as to which it would be impossible for me to say much to-day because, as a member of the Commission, my tongue is tied. It is quite true that the Commission has had before them an immense number of schemes, and if I consider merely the ordinary law of chance, I should say the chances are about ten to one against the Commission accepting in its entirety any one of those schemes. Under these circumstances, therefore, the promise which the right hon. Gentleman makes us is one which my hon. and gallant Friend will, I suspect, consider to be of but very slight value. The right hon. Gentleman tells the House that he is speaking on behalf of the Government, and that he is personally friendly to the object of the Bill; but then he proceeds to lay down an elaborate series of criticisms, which, if they are accepted, I do not hesitate to say, are not only absolutely fatal to this particular Bill, but absolutely fatal to any other proposal which can by any possibility hereafter be made either by the Royal Commission or anybody else. Because what are his arguments? They can be easily reduced to two. In the first place, he says that any scheme for providing old age pensions will be expensive, which is admitted. In the second place, he believes that any scheme for providing pensions will raise a number of anomalies. The right hon. Gentleman has dealt with a great number of anomalies which he finds in this Bill. Sir, we do not deny that, but I say it is absolutely necessary. It is impossible that the State or any Local Authority can so deal with all the various conditions of the life of the poor as to measure out an equitable concession exactly equal in every case. The whole idea of a pension is that, at all events, it is not to go above a certain income, or below a certain condition. Then it will be at once said that all above or below that line are unjustly treated, and it would be most illogical to deny the truth of the statement. What is the case now? Is it possible to find a greater anomaly than the present anomaly, which treats the industrious poor exactly in the same fashion as it treats the poor who are utterly and entirely undeserving, which measures out to the man whose whole sensibilities are at stake exactly the same treatment of the common workhouse as to the man who had been an idler and a ruffian pretty nearly the whole course of his existence? There is an anomaly, indeed! and I defy anyone to find any worse anomaly in connection with any scheme for old age pensions. It is perfectly absurd for the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to say he and his Government are friendly to old age pensions, when his whole argument cuts at the root of the thing itself. The right hon. Gentleman dealt with the schemes which are before the Royal Commission. The present scheme is one of them, and, therefore, cannot enter upon it. But, curious enough, the right hon. Gentleman did not deal with another scheme which has not been brought before the Royal Commission, and with which, therefore, I am perfectly free to deal. Why has not the scheme been brought before the Royal Commission? It would have come before us well recommended. It was brought before the House in the Session before last, when there was a great deal of discussion about the scheme of old age pensions which had become connected with my name. It was brought in as a competitive and opposing scheme to mine, and the Bill in which it was introduced to the House bore upon its back a great number of influential names. It bore the name of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board (Sir W. Foster). Surely the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, whilst speaking about anomalies of schemes, might have paid a little attention to the scheme which owed its origin entirely to the Parliamentary Secretary of his own Department—a scheme which was brought in when it served an election purpose, which was dropped when the hon. Gentleman got Office, and which neither the hon. Gentleman, nor any of his Friends, has taken the trouble to bring before the Royal Commission. If you want anomalies, here is a scheme which is not only full of them, but which will be more expensive than the one which the President of the Local Government Board has just criticised. Here is a scheme which provides a pension for everybody with the exception of persons—and here come in the anomalies to which the right hon. Gentleman referred—who have ever been convicted of drunkenness. The Mover of the present Bill only proposes that a person shall be excluded from the benefits of the scheme if he should have been convicted of drunkenness within 10 years, but the Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board proposes to exclude a man if he has been convicted of drunkenness in his early youth. There is an anomaly. It may be that that is the reason why the Bill was not introduced to the consideration of the Royal Commission. Almost every single anomaly to which the President of the Local Government Board has referred can be found in the Bill of his colleague, and I venture to say that that Bill cannot be carried into effect without an expenditure of £15,000,000 a year. It is perfect nonsense for those who are professed friends of old age pensions to meet the Bill before the House with petty criticisms of details. If the House is to deal with the subject in that way we shall never see old age pensions at all. The House is now considering the Second Reading of this Bill. It is not customary to reject a Bill at this stage because details are objected to. The House is not now dealing with details, but with principle; and this is the first time the House of Commons has ever been enabled to deal with the principle embodied in this Bill, and to say "Aye" or "No" should a preference and advantage be in the future given to those of the aged poor who can show behind them an industrious and fairly thrifty and honourable life over the wastrel who now has precisely the same treatment as they have. This is the principle which we are called upon to affirm. Does the Government accept the principle? Did they accept it at the time they appointed the Royal Commission? If so, I wish they had shown it in the Reference to that Commission, because then the Commission would have been a very different one—certainly the Report must have been, by the necessities of the case, a different Report. But the whole question was referred to the Commission, and we shall have to say, in the first instance, whether any scheme at all is desirable. There is all the difference in the world between appointing a Commission to inquire into a question generally and between a Commission appointed to carry out a previously settled principle. It is important to know whether there has been any change in public opinion recently on this question. If we knew that, it might materially assist our future deliberations. My opinion is, that no scheme that has been suggested—I speak of those which were published and were well-known before the Royal Commission was appointed—can be considered as a complete and adequate settlement of the question. The scheme of Mr. Charles Booth is no doubt a complete scheme, because it provides that everybody shall have a pension of 5s. after 65, but he readily admits that the State must find £27,000,000 a year. There is a good deal to be said for it, because it is, after all, largely a question of the transfer of taxation; but, as practical men, are we prepared to waste our time in considering a scheme of that magnitude, and would any Chancellor of the Exchequer undertake to make such an enormous addition to the taxation of the country even for so good an object? If that be granted, it follows that anything we do must be done gradually, experimentally, and step by step. It is not enough to bring forward petty criticisms and objections; to say that a scheme is not complete and does not meet every conceivable case. We must be content to do as we did with the education question, to start gradually, and go on as experience justifies further progress. I look upon the education question as our great example in this matter. We began with a grant of £25,000. There were those who advocated that grant who knew well that so great would be the usefulness and popularity of the system that the country would willingly expend even the £9,000,000 a year to which it has now grown. But any man who had proposed to take £9,000,000 for education when that first grant was made would have been a madman, for the scheme would have been laughed out of court, and no good would have come from proposing it. I look forward to the time when some Minister will be found bold enough to propose to lay aside experimentally what may be considered a reasonable sum towards the commencement of a system of old age pensions, and if that is satisfactory I am not disposed to place any limit on its ultimate development. Without pronouncing any opinion as to the details of this Bill, I may say that I am, and I was before I was appointed a member of the Commission, in favour of the principle of old age pensions, and I am glad to have an opportunity of saying so on this Bill. There is only one offer, it seems to me, which can be made by the Government which ought to prevent the hon. Member who brought in this Bill from carrying it to a Division, and that is that they will give another day for the discussion of the whole question, or, if you like, for the discussion of this Bill, without making any conditions as to what the Report of the Royal Commission may be. But the actual offer which has been made is absolutely illusory, and the only result, if my hon. and gallant Friend accepts it, would be that the matter will be shelved for the rest of the Session, and the House will not have an opportunity of expressing its opinion on this most important question.

Mr. J. Chamberlain

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I think it desirable that the House should understand what the Government are doing in this matter. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) has said justly that it would be premature for the House to come to a decision upon this Bill or any other Bills of the same character until it has the advantage of the instruction to be derived from the Report of the Royal Commission. I think that is a proposition which will meet with general acceptance. But the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain) has complained of the condition we affix. We do not wish to impose any strict limitation. We are satisfied that after the Report of that Commission there ought to be a discussion on the principle of old age pensions generally, or on this particular Bill as embodying that principle. The Government would have no objection to that. Nobody doubts whatever that the object is a desirable one, and the only question is, what are the methods by which it would be possible to carry it into effect? I imagine that that describes the feeling of everybody on both sides of the House, and therefore I have no hesitation in saying that on a question of this vast consequence the Government would feel it their duty, after the Report of the Commission, to give an opportunity for the discussion of the principles applicable either in some other form or in the form of this particular Bill. I am quite sure the House will feel it would be premature to-day to determine on this Bill. I can imagine great objections to be raised on the part of those who object to charging the cost of such a scheme on the rates. I entirely sympathise with the observations of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) as to the feelings with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would contemplate a demand for £27,000,000, and I conceive that there are gentlemen opposite who would not be more favourable to placing such a charge on the Exchequer. But there are other matters which eminently deserve to be considered, and I would venture to suggest to the House that, with the promise on the part of the Government that there shall be an opportunity of discussing this matter on a future date, it should not come this evening to what would be a premature conclusion as to a particular Bill or a particular method.

Mr. J. Chamberlain

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was no doubt very practical, and was, on the whole, advice which a great many Members would no doubt be very glad to follow. He (Mr. Long) would, however, point out to the right hon. Gentleman that his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Palmer), who had brought this Bill forward in a manner which had commended itself so thoroughly to all who had heard him, was in a rather difficult position. His hon. and gallant Friend had been able to introduce his Bill at a very early period of the Session, and it had been received with almost universal commendation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had now somewhat altered the position, because up to a few minutes ago it was only by the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) that any criticism of anything like a serious character had been directed against the Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer now said that the Government would pledge themselves to give another day for the discussion of the question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) had suggested that a day might be given either for the discussion of the question as a whole, or for the further discussion of this Bill. That, no doubt, would meet the view of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and of all those who were generally interested in the question, but it could hardly be expected that it would meet the views of his hon. and gallant Friend, who was entitled to reap the fruits of the labours of himself and those with whom he acted, and who was also entitled to benefit by the fortunate position which he had acquired by the ballot. If the Debate were adjourned for an indefinite period without a distinct promise that when an additional day was given it would be devoted to the discussion of the Bill, it would be possible for the Government or for one of their supporters to bring forward a Motion in another form, and the Bill would be in consequence absolutely and completely excluded from any further consideration. It was perfectly true that gentlemen in all quarters of the House would find objections to the special proposals of his hon. and gallant Friend; but it was to be remembered that his hon. and gallant Friend, in the excellent speech he made in moving the Second Reading, told the House that he did not bind himself to the exact provisions and conditions of the measure. On the contrary, he placed the Bill in the hands of the House, and in the most temperate terms invited full discussion of its provisions, and he plainly indicated that if the House would accept the Second Reading he would be willing to deal with its future stages in the most generous spirit, only providing that any alterations that were introduced should provide for the establishment of old age pensions on a sound and economical principle. He (Mr. Long) was extremely anxious to meet the views of the Government, whose difficulty he fully appreciated, but, at the same time, he thought they must appreciate the difficulty in which his hon. and gallant Friend found himself. His hon. and gallant Friend now had the opportunity of asking the House to affirm the principle that pensions should be granted under certain conditions. There was nothing to prevent amendments being introduced into the Bill which would alter its details respecting the source from which pensions were to be provided. Unless the Second Reading were postponed by a Motion for Adjournment there was little doubt that the House would give a practically unanimous assent to the principle of the measure. Under these circumstances, he did not think his hon. and gallant Friend would be justified in assenting to the postponement of the question now that he had the opportunity of asking the House to say aye or nay upon the question of the Second Reading. Something was said about the attitude taken on this question by candidates for Parliament in the country, and he was bound to say that, from his experience of elections, that from whatever political Party candidates might be drawn, their views on this particular question varied only in the degree that they were favourable to those who received these pensions. There was no doubt whatever that since the question had been brought to its present position by the labours of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), who took it up long before it was popular, Parliamentary candidates invariably introduced into their speeches and addresses old age pensions, and told the working classes that it was the one thing they would endeavour to secure. The labouring poor had become very impatient; and they did not understand the Parliamentary etiquette which compelled the question to be shelved because a Royal Commission was sitting. If when the question was brought before the House it was postponed with the consent of his hon. Friend, his hon. Friend would be blamed. He was far from binding himself to all the details of the Bill. It would be easy to improve it by alteration and elimination. But were hon. Gentlemen opposite, when in opposition, restrained from pressing Bills and forcing them to Divisions by the fact that they were immature and unfit for acceptance? How often was the late Conservative Government attacked because they could not accept a Bill which was unripe for consideration or improperly drawn! Hon.

ers then argued, "This is a splendid plan; affirm that; and then, if you alter every word of the Bill." The present Bill was the result of the careful consideration, as was shown in the speech of the hon. Member for South Islington (Mr. Bartley), who had devoted his life to the subject. Much was fit for acceptance, and as to the authority to administer the provision, and the incidence of the cost, these questions could be settled at a subsequent stage. Because those details were objectionable in the Bill as it stood it was not necessary that its consideration should be indefinitely postponed. If the Report of the Commission would be in the hands of Members within a month, he should, but with great reluctance, advise the postponement of the Bill. But if the Bill were now postponed without any conditions, it would undoubtedly be lost for the present Session—probably for next Session, and in all probability until some other private Member was able to obtain the same good fortune his hon. Friend had got to-day. That being the case, would his hon. Friend be justified in assenting to an adjournment unless it was clearly explained that adjournment was to be subject to a limited time; that it was to be in the hope that the Royal Commission might present its Report within that period of time, and subject to the condition that the Government should give a day to the adjourned Debate on the Bill of his hon. and gallant Friend? That would not throw any difficulty in the way of discussing the Report, which could be discussed on the adjourned Debate of the Second Reading of the Bill. The Report could be presented either for or against the Bill, and if the Report supported the principle of the Bill so much the better for his hon. Friend. He did not wish to add to the difficulties of the Government in dealing with this question; he did not want to suggest they were not absolutely sincere in the statement they had made to-day; but he could not forget that when they were in Office hon. Members who were now sitting opposite seemed to revel in pressing Motions of this character to a Division at improper times; and since then hon. Members opposite had not forgotten to remind the country that those Divisions and Debates had taken place. Therefore he thought they were entitled, if they thought fit, to press on the Government that they should show their sincerity by giving a vote to-day. They did not wish to make any suggestion of the kind: all they said was that they had got—through their own energy and not that of the Government—through the good fortune that had overtaken one of their own Members, and not one of the supporters of the Government—they had got a position enabling the Bill to be in an important position to-day; and if it was to be adjourned, could only be on the understanding that the Government would afford an opportunity for reconsideration within a reasonable time, and that it should be for the consideration of the Bill and not merely the Report of the Committee. If the Government made it clear that was their object, he would be inclined to advise his hon. and gallant Friend to accept the offer; and, if not, his hon. and gallant Friend should ask that the decision of the House should be taken.

SIR W. HARCOURT: By the indulgence of the House I may say one word in regard to what the hon. Member for the West Derby Division of Liverpool (Mr. Long) asks for. What the hon. Gentleman is pressing for is precisely the thing that the President of the Local Government Board has offered. [Cries of "No!"] I understand that the day to be given shall be given to the discussion of this particular Bill. The hon. Member fears that he and his hon. Friends might be deprived of the patent right in this Bill. We have no objection to that proposal. I understood that the general discussion of the subject was in deference to the opinions of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). If it is desired that the discussion should be confined to this particular Bill I have no objection. But this is far grave a question to make it simply subject of a complimentary Second Reading. I cannot agree that the question who is to pay is a secondary question. But if it is desired that the day which the Government are prepared to give:

Mr. W. Long

given to this particular Bill, we have objection at all.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) said, could not help expressing his regret at a tone that had been adopted by the hon. member for the West Derby Division. It is most amusing to find hon. Gentlemen positive claiming a monopoly of interest in this question, which he was the first to press upon the attention of Parliament. But he should be perfectly willing to give them credit for all possible patent rights only they would do what he thought they were now willing to do—namely, the work that was required to be done. He had read the Bill carefully, but he could not discover what its principle was. If its principle was that the workhouse was not a fit place for the hard-working man to spend his days, that principle could not be separated from the details of its application. After the challenge which had been thrown out, he must express his opinion of the Bill. While he agreed with its object, and to a large extent with the lines on which it was drawn, he believed that it was so badly-conceived and ill-drafted that it would be perfectly idle to consider it in Committee. There was no reason why the House should not have an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon the subject of old age pensions at the proper time. He thought that the offer of the Government entirely met the case, because when hon. Members read the Report of the Commission which had sat to consider the subject, they would find that the discussion of that day had merely touched the fringe of the subject. The Bill now under consideration would enormously increase the burden upon the ratepayers, and, in his opinion, when the Report of the Commission was before them the House would find some other means whereby the object of the present measure might be accomplished at far less cost. He therefore begged to move the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Debate be now adjourned.—Mr. Hunter.)

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) said, he wished to point out one inconvenience that would result if the Motion for the Adjournment were carried. The object of the Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate was that the subject should be more fully discussed after the Report of the Royal Commission had been presented. But, unless the House accepted the proposal to read the Bill a second time upon that occasion, they would be deprived of the views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of his right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), and others who had spoken on this Bill on the subject of old age pensions. If, however, the House were to accept the Second Reading now, there would be no restriction upon hon. Gentlemen. If the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were adopted, everyone who had spoken to-day would be excluded.

SIR W. HARCOURT : It is not my suggestion.

SIR H. JAMES said, the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman was that the question should be adjourned until the Report of the Royal Commission was presented. If that was not the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, then he must be asking them to reject the Bill. The position of the right hon. Gentleman was either to take the Second Reading or reject it. He was not going into detail, but merely wanted to point out that if the adjournment took place it would be impossible for them to discuss the matter.

COLONEL DAMPIER PALMER said, that those who supported the measure having the opportunity of taking the opinion of the House upon the subject of old age pensions were not going to relinquish it. With regard to the offer of the Government to give a day for the resumption of the discussion on the subject after the Report of the Royal Commission had been presented, they had no idea when that Report would be laid before the House. In his view, the Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate was a dilatory one. The question had been thoroughly discussed at the last General Election, and every hon. Member was pledged to do his best to promote some such measure as this. They had better divide upon the question of the Adjournment at once, so that they might, before half-past 5 o'clock, have an opportunity of dividing on the Main Question.

Mr. FENWICK (Northumberland Wansbeck) said, he wished to take this opportunity of appealing to his friends, and those with whom he had any influence, to reject the Second Reading of the Bill. They had had the wonderful spectacle in the Debate this afternoon—

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Debate is now confined to reasons for or against the Adjournment.

Mr. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) could not quite agree with the hon. Member who had said this was an opportunity of deciding on the question of old age pensions, because the question was what pensions, and how they were to be given? On the Adjournment he wished it to be clearly understood that those who might vote for the Adjournment of this Bill were in no sense whatever to be classed as persons opposed to old age pensions.

*Mr. BARTLEY said, that on the Question of the Adjournment he should like to give a strong reason against it. He had had charge of this Bill for four years, having drafted it four years ago, and having balloted every year to bring it on, and since then they had had a General Election, when almost everyone had announced his intention to support some sort of old age pension scheme. If they waited now they might not get another chance for many years, because it was clear to those who understood the Rules of the House that an Adjournment could come to nothing. Supposing the Report of the Royal Commission was issued in a month, it would take another month to consider it, so that they would really lose all the benefit they had got out of their position to-day; therefore they must vote on the question. Though it was a vote on the Adjournment, it amounted to a vote upon the principle of the Bill.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, that when the House was unanimously agreed with regard to the principle of a measure, the usual course was to read the Bill a second time, and to discuss its details on its subsequent stages. The House was asked to wait for a Report which might never be presented. It was all nonsense for hon. Members to pretend that the vote upon the Question of the Adjournment of the Debate was not a vote upon the principle of the Bill. He hoped the Motion for Adjournment would be resisted.

Colonel Dampier Palmer

Mr. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) appealed to the Government to allow the House to come to a decision upon the principle instead of taking a fruitless Division upon the Question of the Adjournment of the Debate. The Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate had been made simply and solely with the view of shelving the whole question. The consideration of the principle of the Bill would be greatly facilitated by the measure being read a second time now, because it could then be referred to a Select Committee, who would consider it in connection with the Report of the Royal Commission when it was presented.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.) said, he should like to make one remark of a practically historical character as to the reasons that would lead the Government to vote for an Adjournment now. It would be in the memory of most hon. Members that his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board made an offer as to the Adjournment of the Debate which was thought somewhat too limited. The Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) then followed, and indicated that he would take it as a satisfactory arrangement if the Government agreed to an Adjournment of this question at the present time, provided they would offer a day either for the discussion of the whole question or the discussion of this Bill after the Report of the Royal Commission was presented. He hoped he was not incorrect in making that statement. The right hon. Gentleman, who was the most important Member of the Royal Commission which was dealing with this question, and who was well known throughout the country in connection with the subject of old age pensions, suggested that a day should be given by the Government for the resumption of the discussion after the Report of the Commission was presented. That suggestion was accepted, and they were going to act upon that agreement.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 205 ; Noes 136.—(Division List, No. 13.)

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

PATENT AGENTS BILL.—(No. 18.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ALBAN GIBBS (London) moved the Second Reading of this Bill, the object of which, he explained, was to amend the law respecting the registration of patent agents and to provide for the appointment of a Council, elected by the whole body of registered patent agents, to make bye-laws for them, keep the Register, and receive the registration fees. A similar Act, which was passed in 1888, ordered that no persons should describe themselves as patent agents without being registered, but he was given to understand that that Act had been evaded by gentlemen who had not described themselves as patent agents but who had acted as such, and he understood a decision had been obtained that they were entitled to do so. At present, under the Act of 1888, the Register was kept by the Institute of Patent Agents, who were a very respectable body of gentlemen, high up in their professional calling, but they were only 60, and there were 241 patent agents, so they could not represent the whole body. It was proposed that the Council should be elected by the whole body of patent agents, and that the Council should receive the fees which should be for the profit of all patent agents and not, as at present, for the small body belonging to the Institute. That Institute had received a Royal Charter and had made bye-laws which, however, had not obtained the assent of the Privy Council, and were, therefore, practically nugatory. The new Council would obtain power subject to proper assent being given to them to make bye-laws. He understood the hon. Member for Monmouthshire had brought in another Patent Agents Bill, and he should be happy to assent to that being referred to the same Select Committee as this Bill. He understood the President of the Board of Trade would offer no objection to the Second Reading of this Bill provided it was referred to a Select Committee, and for his part he should be happy to consent to such reference.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Alban Gibbs.)

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. A. J. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) said, he should not object to the Second Reading of this Bill provided the hon. Gentleman fulfilled the engagement he had just entered into with the House that this Bill, and the one about to be submitted by the hon. Member for Monmouthshire were both sent to the same Select Committee for the purpose of investigation. He could not accept this Bill as it stood, but he did not want to enter into any criticism upon it, because he thought the whole question must be thoroughly investigated by the Committee upstairs. No doubt under the Act of 1888 Rules and bye-laws were laid down, which had proved a source of embarrassment and litigation, and it was desirable that the whole question should be thoroughly investigated. He should assent to the Second Reading on the understanding that this and the other Bill were then referred to a Select Committee.

*SIR J. LENG (Dundee) said, if it had not been for the very late period of the Sitting at which the hon. Member had had an opportunity of introducing this Bill he should certainly have complained of the inadequacy of his statement respecting it, and he should, under other instances, also have opposed the Second Reading. It seemed to him there were points in it seriously objectionable to two important classes—namely, the poor inventors, and those who had been practising as patent agents, whose interests were seriously affected by the Bill. However, he agreed with the President of the Board of Trade that these matters could be more thoroughly discussed and decided in a Committee, and on the understanding that had been entered into he should not oppose the Bill, but should take an opportunity of raising his objections in Committee.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) said, that anyone who had a personal acquaintance with this matter would be of opinion that some legislation was necessary. The Rules made under the Act of 1888 worked very well to a certain extent, but it was found necessary that there should be some means of charging fees, and at present it was doubtful whether these fees could be legally charged. He must say it was impossible for anybody to assent to the Second Reading of this Bill without a clear understanding that the whole matter should be considered by a Select Committee, unfettered by any expression of opinion with respect to the status of the existing patent agents and the Institute of Patent Agents, who had done most useful work. It required very careful consideration whether any second body should be allowed to be set up, and whether the proper course would not be to modify the Regulations which at present affected the Institute of Patent Agents so that justice might be done to all parties. He should not have supported the Bill but for the statement that this and the other kindred measure should be referred to a Select Committee with an absolutely free hand, so that the Committee might do what they considered the best in the circumstances.

MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.) said, he accepted the offer of the hon. Gentleman opposite with regard to referring his (Mr. Warmington's) Bill, together with that of the hon. Gentleman, to a Select Committee. He did not want the House to be fettered, and he desired that the Select Committee should have the freest possible powers in dealing with these measures.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) objected to the Bill to some extent, and although he should not, under the circumstances, object to the Second Reading, it must be clearly understood that in taking this course he did not vote for anything beyond this—that after the Second Reading, this, together with the other Bill, should be referred to a Select Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

MUSIC AND DANCING LICENCES (MIDDLESEX) BILL.—(No. 26.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HOWARD (Middlesex, Tottenham) moved that the Bill be read a second time. He explained that the Bill was of a non-contentious character, and its object was to place Middlesex in the same position with regard to the granting of these licences as other districts outside a radius of 20 miles from London. Under the law as it at present stood the County Council could not give licences except at the annual meeting in November, which very often led to considerable inconvenience. The Bill proposed to incorporate the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1890, Part IV., and to apply them to Middlesex. Under these provisions licences could be granted at any time, the only alteration being that in Middlesex the Licensing Authority was the County Council, whilst in the districts 20 miles outside London it was the Justices. It was proposed by the Bill to continue the County Council of Middlesex as the Licensing Authority. The passing of this measure would be great convenience to the Licensing Committee of the County Council, and would facilitate very much the administration of the law. He therefore begged to move that the Bill be read a second time.

Sir J. Leng

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Howard.)

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, North Beds.) said, there was no objection on the part of the Home Office to this Bill, which would be a salutary addition to the disciplinary powers of the Middlesex County Council.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday next.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO CHILDREN BILL.—(No. 44.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR R. WEBSTER moved the Second Reading of this Bill, which he said had been printed and circulated for two Sessions. It was, practically speaking, an extension of the law passed with so much benefit to little children some three or four years ago, and its main object was to remove certain doubts which had arisen, to extend the age in the case of boys from 14 to 16, to enable fresh remedial measures to be taken in cases where there had been actual assaults on children, and to enable the Secretary of State to sanction the emigration of children whom it was desired to place under the care of persons willing to take charge of them. The Bill was certainly not a Party question, and he trusted the House would accord it a Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir R. Webster.)

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.) said, he fully sympathised with the objects of the Bill, but as it was proposed to extend it to Scotland, he must point out that a good deal of adaptation would be necessary for that purpose.

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, that although the Home Office did not object to the Second Reading of the Bill, the Home Secretary reserved to himself discretion to introduce certain Amendments hereafter.

MR. HOPWOOD (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton) said, he could assure the House that it was with a proper spirit of his responsibility that he opposed the Second Reading of this Bill. His object was not to delay but to secure that a measure of this sort should be brought in and carried through by the responsible Government, and not be submitted, as it was during the last Session night after night, on the chance of slipping through a number of Amendments at a late hour of the night. This Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, and if it were he would be glad to serve on that Committee, and thus to bring the measure within the range of practical legislation. He did not deny that they had an Act of Parliament which had done considerable good, but, on the other hand, there had been grave exaggeration and a great deal of sensational dealing with it, and the danger was that the law was now being intensified in a manner that should not be. All this required a proper check on the part of the Executive, and unless he had a definite assurance in that direction, he should certainly, up to the latest hour he could, prevent this Bill from passing the Second Reading. He did not wish to talk it out, and if the understanding be given to him that the Bill should be properly watched in every stage on the part of the Government he should withdraw his opposition.

MR. MUNDELLA signifying assent,

MR. HOPWOOD withdrew his objection.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL MEAT (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 45.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, it was impossible for him to allow the Bill to be read a second time when they had less than two minutes in which to consider it. It had protection written all over it, and he was told it would be quite impossible to carry out its provisions in London, and in that case it would deceive consumers, besides which there were other objections.

It being half-past Five of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

POLICE (METROPOLIS) BILL
(No. 78).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Objection being taken.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday, 6th June.

MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it is right to put down a Bill for Second Reading which has not been printed?

*MR. SPEAKER: It is for the House to judge of this question in view of the circumstances under which it is put down.

MOTIONS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (NO. 4) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. J. Morley, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Local Government Board for Ireland under "The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878," relating to the urban sanitary district of Lisburn, ordered to be brought in by Mr. J. Morley and Sir J. T. Hibbert.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 140.]

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT (1875), &C., AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir Charles Cameron, Bill to amend "The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875," and "The Margarine Act," 1887, ordered to be brought in by Sir Charles Cameron, Mr. Frederick Frye, Mr. Kearley, Dr. Farquharson, and Mr. Channing.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 141.]

CROFTERS' HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND) ACTS AMENDMENT (COUNTY OF BUTE) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Charles Cameron, Bill to extend to the county of Bute the provisions of "The Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act and any Acts amending the same, ordered brought in by Sir Charles Cameron, Dr. Sir Leonard Lyell, Mr. Weir, Sir Donald Farlane, Mr. Beith, and Mr. Angus Sutcliffe.

Bill presented, and read first time. [B

PATENT AGENTS REGISTRATION

On Motion of Mr. Warmington, Bill to for the Registration of Patent Agents, to be brought in by Mr. Warmington, David Thomas, and Mr. Bryne.

Bill presented, and read first time. [B

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE

First Report brought up, and read; lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

CLOSURE OF DEBATE (STANDARD ORDER, 25).

Paper laid upon the Table by the Clerk of the House:—Return thereto (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 313, of Session [ordered 17th August 1893; Mr. Ellis]; to be printed. [No. 57.]

AMERICAN MAIL SERVICE.

Return ordered, "showing the number of days, hours, and minutes occupied in the transit of Her Majesty's Mails, outward and inward, carried during the year 1893 by steamships between Queenstown and New York, and also between Southampton and New York; to turn to specify the names of the steamships, and to indicate by asterisks or other marks those not carrying the Mails under contract (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 170, of Session 1893) (Sir J. Leng.)

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed:—"That this House do now adjourn."

SUSPENSION OF THE TWELVE O'CLOCK RULE.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I wish to mention to the House that we propose to move to-morrow the suspension of the Twelve o'Clock Rule, with the view of concluding the Debate on the proposed Bill for a Scottish Grand Committee.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Six o'clock.

OF COMMONS,

day, 5th April 1894.

THE BUSINESS.

ON WATER BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Second Reading read.

ade, and Question proposed,
Bill be now read a second (Furquharson.)

STUART (Shoreditch,
l, he proposed to move as an that the Bill be read a that day six months. He is briefly as he could. This entically the same as was the House on the Second months ago, and the reasons tion on that occasion by a majority were twofold: First, unnecessary and not urgent;
y, that it tended to prejudge of the future water supply

On the present occasion
ents applied with intensified se the Royal Commission sat on the London Water stion had reported—and in t would be found abundant this Water Company had adequate supply of water for and for many years to was actually able to supply needs subject to the which were proposed to upon it by the Royal Com-would be for him to make ents good, and he was able referring to the evidence as the Report. If the House Bill the effect would be to future Water Authority of l the neighbourhood, and t practically the rate-h a very large amount of capital which really was not required, as he would be able to show to the House, in the event of the water supply of London in the future being taken not from the Lea and from the Thames, but from outside sources. This was a very serious question. Already a very considerable amount of capital had been expended on the development of the water supply from the Lea and the Thames. The London County Council, in opposing this Bill, was not seeking to decide against the supply being taken from those sources, for he would remind the House that the Royal Commission had stated that, under certain circumstances with respect to storage and purification, the Thames and the Lea together were sufficient to provide a sufficient water supply for any probable extension of population. That might be so or not, but it was simply a contribution to the main question which would have to be settled before they could come to a decision as to in what form the London water supply was in the future to be secured.

The Royal Commission was called upon to decide first whether the areas of the Thames and Lea Valleys were sufficient, and it was only in event of their coming to the conclusion that they were insufficient that they were to go into the question of other sources of supply.
But, as a matter of fact, they came to the conclusion that the areas would be sufficient for all practical purposes. Although the London County Council did not, by opposing this Bill at the present moment, seek to prejudge the question, he felt that that body would fall exceedingly far short in its duty if it allowed any steps to be taken which would ignore the natural desire of the people of London to have outside sources of supply. The interests of the London County Council, and of London generally, were as a matter of fact identical with the interests of the inhabitants of Essex, Middlesex, and neighbouring counties. When this Bill was before the House on a previous occasion a member of the Essex County Council, the member who in this House represented North Somerset, spoke very strongly in regard to the matter.
What was the position as it then stood?
There was no doubt a clause in the Bill as originally brought in respecting the fittings of the Water Company, but the clause had been withdrawn by the Company. They indicated their intention to withdraw it before the Bill came on for discussion on the Second Reading. The London County Council were not taking this step in their own interest as against the interests of Essex or against any other county. All they desired was to oppose the granting of unnecessary capital to the Companies which the Water Authorities for various districts would have eventually, with the consent of the House, to acquire. They objected to giving them capital for undertakings which were not at this moment urgent, and which would prejudice the great question likely to arise in the immediate future. There was a point in connection with the Bill which had nothing to do with the important question of supply. He referred to the question of mains, and he would state at once to hon. Gentlemen who supported the Bill that if they desired to have new mains laid down in order to supply their districts, and if they could show before a Committee of this House that it was desirable to have those mains, then if the Bill were, as he hoped it would be, thrown out, and if those who represented the East London Company chose to introduce a Bill dealing with the question of mains they would find no opposition raised, and on the contrary every assistance afforded them in the direction of the suspension of Standing Orders, so that they might carry that particular portion of their scheme to a Committee. But the amount of additional capital proposed to be raised under this Bill was £500,000, of which only about £20,000 annually for seven years was asked for for mains and similar purposes. He proposed now to deal with the argument contained in the statement sent out by the promoters of the Bill. The first thing to which he had to draw attention was the statement in Clause 5, that unless they obtained the powers they were now seeking the new districts which were being developed would, for an indefinite period, run a serious risk in sanitary matters by reason of the insufficiency of the water supply. That he ventured to flatly deny, and he hoped he would be able to prove to the House that this was a misapprehension of the existing state of things. He asserted that not only had the East London Company water enough to supply all their mains, but that it had been proved by their own witnesses before the Royal Commission that the supply was ample. The promoters asserted that if these new populations which were growing up were to be supplied with wholesome water, new mains and pipes would have to be at once laid down in the new districts, large reservoirs would have to be established, and the necessary machinery fixed. He repeated, as to new mains and pipes, that was a very small matter indeed, and again he offered if hon. Gentlemen opposite would withdraw the rest of the Bill, he, on the part of the London County Council, would offer no objection to that portion of the scheme receiving legislative sanction, providing, of course, that the investigation of a Committee of this House proved the existence of the necessity for these extensions. But the Bill generally involved a very important question—namely, the water supply of London for the next 40 years, and this was a matter which he ventured to suggest was fit to be decided not by a Committee of the House, but by the House itself. What he hoped he would be able to show hon. Members was that the question of the sufficiency of the sources of supply from the Lea and the Thames was not one of which it was necessary to come to any decision at the present time. According to the evidence given by the promoters of the Bill before the Royal Commission, the East London Company were at present supplying an average of 40,000,000 gallons daily, and the engineer to the Company stated that whereas that was, at the time he was giving his evidence, the present requirement of the Company, five years hence it would be necessary to supply 42,000,000 gallons daily, and 10 years hence—namely, in 1901, the quantity required would be 44,000,000 gallons. Thus in 10 years there would be an increase of 10 per cent. in the requirements of the Company. These statements by the engineer were subjected to a close examination, as would be found on reference to the evidence. Now, he ventured to suggest, there was nothing alarming in the growth which the officials of the Company estimated would have to be provided for. The Company at present supplied 40,000,000 gallons daily; 10 years hence they would be required to supply 44,000,000. But what was the amount of water the Company was able, if necessary, to supply? In the first place, they admitted that they had supplied, and could supply, 37,000,000 gallons per day from the River Lea. They also admitted that they had consecutively for weeks supplied from the River Thames 10,000,000 gallons per day, and they further admitted in their evidence that for weeks successively on different occasions they had supplied from their own wells 7,000,000 gallons per day. These statements were contained in evidence given in 1892, and they showed that the Company had the absolute power of supplying from these different sources 54,000,000 gallons daily without finding it necessary to make any additional provision. That being so, and their sources of supply being so much in excess of what they estimated would be their daily requirements 10 years hence, he did venture to submit to the House that it was undesirable by passing this Bill to prejudge the whole question of the future supply of London, and he thought he had made it quite clear that the Bill did prejudge that question, because all the Company had to do to get what they required was to use the powers which they at present possessed of pumping from their wells and of taking water from the Thames. The Royal Commission had reported that the Company ought not to take more than 30,000,000 gallons of water daily from the Lea, and they had suggested that increased storage accommodation was desirable. The promoters stated that the storage works which the Bill proposed to authorise were being provided on the recommendation of the Royal Commission and were immediately necessary; but that was not a fair statement of the case; and if the Company would take its full supply from the Thames and the wells, which amounted to 17,000,000 gallons, they need not abstract more than 27,000,000 gallons from the Lea, and even then they would have an absolutely sufficient supply for the next 10 years. Besides the water capacity they had, they had the power of inter-sale between the various Companies that existed, and they could increase the quantity of water they could get from the Thames to an almost indefinite extent by the exercise of that power. There was accessible to the East London Water Company an amount of 10,000,000 gallons more than their immediate requirements without any extra capital being laid out, and it might proceed to supply all its needs for the next 10 years, and yet diminish very considerably its supply from the Lea. Again, it was quite obvious that greater storage capacity was not required by the Company. Its storage was the largest, with one exception, of any Company in London. It had storage capacity for 910,000,000 gallons, equal to 14 or 15 days' supply, whereas the average storage was something like six days' supply. There was only one other point he wished to put to the House respecting Clause 3, and it related to machinery. It might be said that the Company required further machinery, but the evidence given before the Royal Commission showed very clearly that they had abundant engine supplies. In the Report of the Royal Commission, in Questions 660 and 661, there was a statement of the enormous amount of machinery possessed by the Company for pumping purposes, and it appeared that they had more than 50 per cent. of stand-by or surplus power in all of their different districts. The Chairman of the Commission asked—

“We may take it that your present machinery is modern high-class machinery doing good duty?”

To which the reply was—

“Splendid duty. All our new engines are triple expansion engines.”

So much for the points in respect of the third clause of the statement of the promoters. He would turn to one other point. It was stated in the evidence before the Commission itself that the reservoirs proposed in this Bill were not to provide water for what was needed now, but for very distant and future requirements. The engineer and secretary to the Company had laid before the Royal Commission a statement as to what the Company could supply, and how it could meet all present and prospective needs. They were summoned back to deal with the point of additional provisional supply, because the Commission felt it would still investigate how the additional supply could be provided, and that additional supply was what was referred to in this Bill. Here was what passed on this subject before the Royal Commission—

“The Chairman: You have already taken, I think, about 37,000,000 gallons daily from the Lea?—Yes.

“Then do you think if you raise the race-course reservoir and make the two projected reservoirs”

—that was what was proposed to be done by this Bill—

“you can get 40,000,000 gallons a day without making the new compensation reservoirs?—Speaking from my experience at the present time we can do so.”

It would be seen, therefore, that the provision of these reservoirs which were proposed in this Bill was to make arrangements for the supply of 40,000,000 gallons in place of 30,000,000, but he had shown that by even a much less amount than 30,000,000 gallons daily taken from the River Lea—although they were taking much more than that—the East London Company could supply all that was required. It was necessary for those who opposed the Bill to show how very dangerous and doubtful were the sources of supply from which the East London Water Company proposed to take this extra quantity, because if it was no matter where the supply came from, they might as well let them take it from there as elsewhere. The Royal Commission reported as follows about the supplies from the Thames and the Lea, which were proposed to be taken for the next 40 years by the Company:—

“Having regard to the experience of London during the last 30 years and to the evidence given on the subject, we do not believe that any danger exists of the spread of disease by the use of this water provided there is no adequate storage, and that the water is sufficiently filtered before being delivered to consumers.”

It was exactly that adequate storage and the additional filterage which required the expenditure of very large sums of money. But what did the Royal Commissioners themselves say on the subject? Mr. Mausergh himself, one of the Royal Commissioners, was examined before a Royal Commission of this House on behalf of the Birmingham Corporation, and on that occasion he said that any river flowing through an enormous tract of agricultural country must produce water which nowadays they would not think of supplying. He knew (said Mr. Mansergh) that many districts would not have water from such a source; and he knew of places which had had to abandon costly works simply because of the water procurable from such a source being gradually polluted, and they did not want to repeat that in Birmingham. It was because they did not want to repeat that in London, and at any rate because they did not want to be forced into repeating it unnecessarily, that he raised opposition to the Bill at the present moment, and the House would see that there were many considerations about the supply from the Lea and the Thames. The Commission did not investigate any other supplies; they did not bring out what would be the relative expenses of supplying London from these and from external sources. They who opposed this Bill believed the Company would supply inferior water from the Thames and the Lea at a much greater cost than would be entailed by bringing water from external districts. They had also the important question of the impurity of the water from an agricultural district to take into account, and, on these grounds, they opposed the Bill being read a second time, because, as he had shown, it unnecessarily endeavoured to prejudge the question. The London County Council was perfectly willing to make overtures for itself becoming the Water Authority. It had got these powers under the Act of 1892; it was willing to take this responsibility itself, and it had offered by resolution passed some time ago to treat with the Water Companies for taking over their undertakings on fair and reasonable terms. It had applied to this very Company, and to the other Company which had a Bill down, and they had refused to negotiate with the Council. [“No, no!”] Well, they did not accept the basis of negotiations which the County Council proposed, but they made no counter proposal. The County Council had passed a further resolution to the effect that, if the Company would not come to terms, the Council ought to move this House to determine the question. He might appeal confidently to Members on both sides of the House who represented great Municipalities to say that it was a fair and right thing for the County Council to endeavour to acquire these various Companies; but they did not want to acquire them with a dead limb of capital attached to them at this moment, when it was unnecessary, and which prejudged the question of whether they were going to get their supply through them or through other sources. Even if the County Council did not become the Water Authority, the body which did become such authority ought to be able to decide where the future supplies ought to come from; and even if it came from the valley of the Thames and Lea, it did not at all stand to reason that the first step in the undertaking should be more capital expended on a reservoir for the Lea when they considered the circumstances of the Thames. He contended that this Bill was absolutely unnecessary from the point of the supply of the quantity or quality of water, because it had been shown before the Royal Commission that there was ability in this Company to get vastly more than it required for the next 10 years from sources which the Royal Commission approved of, and which needed no further expenditure for works. The expenditure proposed by this Bill on reservoirs, filters, and pumping, was an expenditure for a far distant period, which should be incurred only if they required to get a supply for 40 years, or for a very long period of time, from the Lea. The other districts of London, Essex, and the borders of the London County Council district, were equally interested with the London County Council in securing that there should not be this dead limit of capital attached. This was a matter of vital importance to the health of the people of London and the surrounding neighbourhoods, and he asked this House to defend them against such a prejudging of this question as would take place if the present Bill be sent up to a Committee at the present time. If the Bill were thrown out—as he hoped it might be—he and his friends had no objection to its being brought up again so far as it related to the provision of mains, but they could not allow the Bill to prejudge the all-important question of where the London water supplies were to come from. He begged to move “That the Bill be read a second time upon this day six months.”

Mr. J. Stuart

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. J. Stuart.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

*MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.) did not propose to follow the hon. Member for Hoxton in the details which he had presented to the House upon this Bill, and indeed he looked upon the hon. Gentleman positively as an advocate for reading the Bill a second time and sending it to a Committee, because it was clearly evident to the House that it was quite impossible they could master the details which the hon. Member had put before them, and which were essentially matters for the ordinary Committee of this House to deal with. There were one or two principles involved in this question which he must shortly place before the House. Of course, it was quite impossible upon this occasion to dissociate the two Companies whose Bills were before the House to-day, because the statement issued by the London County Council not only classed these two Bills together, but went so far as to include a third, which was not even down for Second Reading. The position of these Water Companies applying now to Parliament for further capital and an extension of powers was shortly this: They had come to the end of their tether as far as money was concerned, and if they were to fulfil their statutory obligations to supply water they must have more money, because to supply the water they must have more reservoirs and more filtering power. Last year this Company applied to Parliament for further powers, the Bill being thrown out on the Second Reading, and the main reason then given by the hon. Member for Hoxton, who led the attack, was that there was a Royal Commission sitting, and it was quite premature for the Water Company to ask for further powers until such Commission had reported. That argument could no longer be urged. The Royal Commission had reported favourably as far as the London water was concerned, and it was, indeed, entirely in consequence of the Report of the Royal Commission that these Water Companies sought further powers. The House would permit him to read one paragraph from the Report of the Royal Commission, which was perhaps the most important in the whole Report.

The Commissioners stated they were strongly of opinion that the water as supplied to the consumer in London was of a very high standard of excellence and purity, and that it was suitable in quality for all household purposes. The Commissioners further stated that they were aware that a certain prejudice existed against drinking water supplied from the Thames and the Lea, but they did not believe that there was any danger of the spread of disease from the use of such water, provided there was adequate storage for it, and that the water was efficiently filtered before it was delivered to the consumers. It was because of the desire to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission, to provide adequate reservoirs and means to filter the water properly, that the Companies now came for further powers. The Water Companies in the last four or five years had been applied to from time to time by the Local Government Board with reference particularly to storage. He held in his hand a letter from the Local Government Board to one of the Water Companies, written at the close of the year 1891, which said—

"I am directed by the Local Government Board to draw the attention of the Company to Dr. Frankland's Report for October, from which it appears evident that the Company are unable to deal satisfactorily with the water when the Thames is in flood, and I am to state that the Metropolitan Water Examiner reports to them that it is now necessary that the Company should consider the question of making such sufficient addition to their works as will enable them to supply water of better quality than is now done when the circumstances are as above stated."

To that the Company promptly replied, pointing out, in reference to the state of the water when the Thames was in flood, that it was due at that time to the exceptionally heavy rains which had been of long duration, and they went on to say—

"The Directors are fully alive to the importance of ample storage, and the desirability of increasing the present reservoir capacity would have been considered before this had it not been for the manner in which the Companies had been hampered by recent proceedings in Parliament. They are, however, quite prepared to entertain the question and to seek powers from the Legislature to raise fresh capital for the purpose, and I am instructed to ask if, on such an application being made, the Directors may hope that it will receive the support of the Local Government Board."

Mr. Boulnois

So much for the Local Government Board and its application to the Water Companies to increase their storage and filter power. What happened at the London County Council in consequence of the Report of the Royal Commission? The subject had been very fully considered by the Water Committee of the London County Council. It was all very well for the Member for Hoxton to say that they wanted more time, but they had already considered and reported on the question very fully. He had with him extracts from the most important Reports which had been made to the London County Council. The first was the statement made by the Chairman of the Water Committee, Mr. Bassett Hopkins, an able gentleman who had taken a great interest in the question, and this was what he said—

"The paramount necessity of acceding to an well-grounded demand for augmented supply may make such a demand irresistible, and in this case the policy of the Council is, while opposing the demand (within the strict limits of what is required), to prevent its being accompanied by the inconvenience just referred to."

Then there was a short paragraph from the Report of Mr. Binnie, the chief engineer to the London County Council, who was himself a very eminent water engineer, and who clearly was not in favour of the supply of London being drawn from the Thames. Mr. Binnie said—

"Mere opposition"—

and that was what they had to-day—

"Mere opposition to the applications of the Companies by the Council must be followed by certain and ignominious defeat, for the whole drift of the evidence placed before the Royal Commissioners by the witnesses for the Council went to show that London requires more water and extended works; and if the Companies are to continue to perform the duties imposed upon them further powers of some kind must be conferred."

These were strong words, and if the Water Company were to base their case on no other they would be justified in coming to Parliament. Mr. Cripps, the able Parliamentary agent of the London County Council, said—

"... It would have been difficult to resist the contention of the Water Companies, those being the statutory bodies authorised to supply water in London; they ought to be furnished with ample capital powers to meet not only the present, but the prospective, demands upon them. The inquiry before the Royal Commission has now elicited and afforded to the Council probably all the best information available upon this subject. When, therefore, the Council opposes, as I think they should oppose, the large increase of capital, and possibly the new works proposed under the present Bills, it is, I think, obvious that the absence of any definite conclusion as to general policy may render it less easy to justify withholding from the Companies the powers which they are now seeking."

He had quoted these Reports of the officials of the London County Council in order to show that the Council had come to Parliament to oppose these Bills with their eyes wide open and practically against the advice of those responsible to them for giving advice. The London County Council claimed to act for the County of London, and he did not deny them the right to do so, but he did not think they had any mandate to take any part for those outside the County of London—either in the Counties of Essex or Middlesex, both of which counties were touched by these Bills. The West Middlesex Water Company had 27 square miles of mains, $9\frac{1}{2}$ of which only were in the County of London and $17\frac{1}{2}$ outside, and yet the London County Council came down and said not only that the people of London, but the unfortunate people outside the area of London, were to go without water, because that was what it would come to if this Bill were rejected. The London County Council themselves admitted that it would take from 15 to 20 years before they could mature a scheme for what they considered an adequate and proper supply of water for London, and he did not know what might happen in the meantime if the London County Council, year after year, came down to oppose those who, by Act of Parliament, were now the Water Authorities of London—especially if they had such a summer as they had last year—because these works, though authorised by Parliament, could not be undertaken immediately, and could not be carried to fruition without a considerable lapse of time. The hon. Member for Hoxton referred to the fact that the London County Council were in treaty with the Water Companies. It was true that the London County Council made application to the Water Companies to know whether they would come to terms, but they attached such impossible conditions and terms to their application that it was quite impossible that the Water Companies could accede to them. In the statement of the London County Council which had been circulated the bold assertion was made that the London County Council applied to the Water Companies to sell their undertaking to the County Council on fair and reasonable terms, but that the Companies had combined together and declined to negotiate. So far as these two Companies before the House were concerned, that statement was absolutely untrue. The Companies had not declined to negotiate, but they had said very properly, as any Water Company directors would do who acted in the interests of their shareholders, that they had a fine property which they did not wish to sell, but that if any proposition were put before them it should receive their best consideration. No proposition of any sort or kind had ever been put before the Water Companies by the London County Council. Until the County Council put their proposal in a definite shape and gave some figures which the Water Companies could deal with it was not likely they would come to terms with the Water Companies, and it was extremely unfair to say they had offered to negotiate, and that the Companies had declined negotiation. He would point out that in these applications which were made for further capital and extended powers the shareholders would derive no benefit whatever. There was only one more point which, though a small one, should not be entirely lost sight of, and that was, that the London County Council were adopting what he might term a selfish and dog-in-the-manger policy in this matter. They themselves would do nothing, and they asked Parliament to prevent the Water Companies doing anything, which was very much on all fours with their improvement schemes. The County Council then came to Parliament and said they would do nothing in the way of improvements unless they gave them "betterment," and now they said to the Water Companies they would prevent such Companies getting any further powers unless they were willing to sell their undertakings to the Council practically at the price of old iron. That was a selfish policy which, he was sure, would not commend itself to this House. It must be recollected that this money which it was proposed to expend would give employment to thousands of working-men of the labouring class during the winter months when employment was difficult to get. He maintained that these Bills ought to go to a Select Committee in the ordinary way, so that the details could be threshed out. The London County Council would have a full opportunity of putting their case before the Committee, and they could ask the Committee to deal with all the questions which had been raised by the hon. Member for Hoxton as to whether the expenditure should be confined to mains, reservoirs, or filter beds, or whether less money should be given to these Companies. It was quite impossible for this House—especially with so much business before it—to enter into details of this kind. Even if the Select Committee upstairs passed this Bill as it was, or with amendment, the London County Council were even then not estopped from coming and asking the House to reject the Bill on the Third Reading. He threw aside altogether the suggestion dropped at the last moment by the hon. Member for Hoxton, that if the Water Companies would bow down to the London County Council and take out the essential part of the Bill and confine their application to mains for new districts, then the Council would not oppose them. He would remind the hon. Member and the House that mains alone were not of any use to a Water Company. They could not turn the water straight from the Thames or the Lea into these mains, and then distribute it to consumers. They must manufacture the water, store it for a reasonable period before use, and then filter it before it passed to the mains for distribution. He asked the House to adopt the usual course of sending these Bills to a Committee upstairs, which was the only tribunal recognised by this House as capable of dealing with such questions.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): It will, perhaps, be to the convenience of the House if I rise somewhat early in this discussion for the purpose of stating what my opinion is as to the course the House should take in regard to the Bill before us. The Bill is one of three Water Bills which have been promoted by the Water Companies of London for the purpose of providing themselves with capital for the erection of very extensive works to increase the supply of water. The London County Council oppose this Bill on the ground, in the first place, that they have not yet had time fully to consider the Report of the Royal Commission of last year; that they ought to have time fully to consider that Report, with a view to determining what shall be the policy in regard to the future; and, secondly, that they will be prejudiced by the passing of this Bill in their negotiations with the Water Companies. I have carefully considered the subject at the Local Government Board, and I have come to the conclusion that there is a good deal of force in the objection of the London County Council. This Bill is identical with the Bill which was presented last year—[“No, no!”]—or almost identical. The Bill was rejected last year on the ground that the Royal Commission was then sitting, and it was not expedient to increase the powers of the Water Companies pending the Report of the Commission. The Commission, no doubt, has reported in the interval, but it only reported at the end of September last, and there was not time after that Report of the Commission was in hand for the London County Council to come to a decision as to what should be done upon it, to frame proposals upon it and give notice to this House in the ordinary course. In these circumstances, it appears to me that the same policy ought to prevail this year as last year, and that this Bill ought not to be proceeded with at the present moment, but that further time ought to be given to the London County Council to deal with the whole subject. The fact is, that the Report of the Royal Commission has made a new position in the matter. The Royal Commission recommended, no doubt, that the Thames and Lea Valley water, with a sufficient storage and adequate provision for filtration, would be suited for many years to come for the supply of London, but they also made some further important recommendations. They recommended that a very large reservoir should be erected in the Thames Valley near to Staines. They recommended that further great reservoirs should be made in the Lea Valley; that further inspection powers should be given to the authorities for the purpose of securing that the water supplied by the Companies was properly filtered. A further recommendation of the Royal Commission was that there should be an inspection of all the tributaries of the Thames to secure the water from being polluted. On the other hand, the Royal Commission did not report as to the cost of these works. They did not give any indication as to what it would cost to provide reservoirs, and they did not consider any of the schemes which have been suggested as alternative to those now recommended. The schemes which are before us in the shape of the proposals of the Water Companies are not in accordance with the scheme of the Royal Commission. ["Oh!"] I believe I am fully justified in saying that. The East London Company, no doubt, proposes to make a reservoir in the Lea Valley, but the two other Companies, although they propose to add to the storage works, do not propose to add to them in the manner indicated by the Royal Commission. One would have expected that the Water Companies, after the Report of the Royal Commission, would have combined together for the purpose of propounding a scheme in exact accordance with the Report of the Royal Commission. They have not done so, but they have each come to Parliament with their separate schemes for their own works on their own lines without any joint action with regard to the long future; without making provision for these extensive reservoirs which were contemplated by the Royal Commission, without any method for increasing the extension of their water and for ensuring the purity of the water in the tributaries of the Thames. They have simply proposed to act upon the old lines of each Water Company extending its own works without any joint or combined action and without any reference to the great scheme of the Royal Commission. I think, under these circumstances, it is well worthy the consideration of the House whether these Bills should be proceeded with this year. In my opinion, further time ought to be given for the consideration of the whole subject. There can be no doubt, in my opinion, that if these Bills are passed the position of the Water Companies will be greatly strengthened. They will be independent of the County Council, and will be in a position to refuse to negotiate with them. ["How?"] Under these circumstances, I think the London County Council are justified in asking for further delay, and the only question is whether that delay will be prejudicial to the interests of the London people. That is no doubt a very serious question, but I cannot bring myself to believe that a delay of one year will make any great difference in this respect. ["Two years!"] I have had some hesitation in coming to a conclusion on this point. But, after all, the London County Council should be the best judge in these matters. They must know the wants of their own people, and it appears to me when a great Municipality like London comes before this House and asks for delay in coming to a conclusion upon a matter so vitally affecting their interests—when they come to this House and ask that they may have another year before a measure of this kind is passed and before further concessions are made to the London Water Companies, they are entitled to the patient and careful hearing of this House, and on the whole I am inclined to advise the House to listen to the demand in that respect of the London County Council and not allow this Bill to be further proceeded with this year. After all, it will amount only to a delay of a single year. In the interval the London County Council will be in a position to make the further inquiries which they contemplate, and for my part, while I advise this course to the House, I think it must be with this reservation: I think we ought to expect that next year the London County Council will come before Parliament with a definite scheme for dealing with this question—with a definite policy and definite scheme which will be elaborated in the interval. On the other hand, I think that the Water Companies ought on their part to take advantage of the interval for the purpose of combining together to produce a joint scheme to carry out the recommendation of the Royal Commission of last year, for the purpose of providing these increased reservoirs for the supply of water for London, and also for the purpose of carrying out all these further recommendations of the Royal Commission for the better securing the purity and improving generally the condition of the water supply of London. It is in this view, and considering that a delay of one year cannot make a serious difference in the supply of water to London, that I am of opinion that the House should follow the same course which it adopted last year, and postpone the consideration of this important and vital question for another year, and not proceed with these three Water Bills in the current year.

Mr. Boulnois

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): I should have been astonished at the course which the Government have taken upon this occasion if anything which the Government does were likely now to cause astonishment. The right hon. Gentleman says that on the whole he is prepared to recommend the House to vote against these two Bills, but there was a certain amount of timidity in the way in which he uttered the sentence, and I am not surprised at it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to represent a London constituency of consumers of water, and I maintain that they are as much entitled to be heard as either the Water Companies or the London County Council. The right hon. Gentleman speaks as if the matter is one which affects the London County Council alone. But the Chairman of the Essex County Council is imploring the authorities to proceed with this Bill; and is Essex to be starved of water and a dangerous delay to be incurred in order that the London County Council may be given more time to elaborate a scheme for the purchase of the Water Companies? I am not thinking of the Water Companies, but rather of the consumers of water. What is the situation? What evidence does the House possess that this delay is justified? Unless the right hon. Gentleman is prepared with a stronger conviction than he appears to entertain as to the propriety of rejecting this Bill he ought not to run the serious risk of delaying these operations. A year is of enormous importance when works of this kind are to be undertaken, and I protest, on behalf of the Metropolitan consumers of water, against the delay of another year in a matter of this importance. Let it be remembered that the question is not whether the Bills are to be carried or not, but whether they are to be examined or not. If the right hon. Gentleman has got a case let it go to the Select Committee. Let them go to a Hybrid Committee, and let the whole matter be examined. The hon. Member for Hoxton, who represents the London County Council, gave us a good deal of detailed information. I wonder whether any one single Member of the House was able to follow the mass of details. It is eminently a question which must be examined by a Select Committee. The Select Committee would examine the question of capital; it would examine the question of whether there is to be a dead limb attached to the purchase by the County Council, as was suggested in picturesque terms by the hon. Member who opposes this Bill. But do hon. Members oppose and does the Government not trust a Committee? This might be not a Committee of Metropolitan Members, not a Committee composed of those acquainted with these matters, but representing probably what might be described as a microcosm, a miniature of the House? Is it not preposterous that a Government which makes speech after speech in favour of devolution should encourage a Debate of this kind, which consumes valuable time, because it fears to have the question relegated for inquiry to a Select Committee? The Government would have saved time if they had accepted this proposition and allowed a Select Committee to deal with the matter. Can we suspect that one of their motives is that a vote of this House will be different to what it will be on the Select Committee, and, at this moment, when we are asked that Scotchmen should be allowed to manage their own affairs, are Scotch and Irish votes to deprive the Metropolis of the power of having their water for another year? I would remind the House that the Chairman of the Select Committee last year appealed to the House that the matter should be referred to a Select Committee, and I think that, even then, neither the Government nor the majority listened to the Chairman of the Select Committee. No, it was to be referred to a Committee upstairs. If we are to be dealt with in this manner, if at the bidding of the County Council — because do not let us disguise the fact that otherwise the Government would have allowed these two Bills to go to a Committee—if this be so, may I ask those hon. Members for Scotland who think that Scotchmen ought to manage their own affairs to abstain from taking part in the coming Division, which is on a purely Metropolitan question? By their action we shall see the sincerity of their desire that each locality should manage its own affairs in which they have interest. I make the same appeal to the Welsh Members and to the Irish Members. Let the Metropolis decide this matter for itself, and if it is so allowed I am pretty certain how the Metropolis will decide. The Metropolis will ask for the water supply, and if it cannot get the water, at all events we wish that a Committee of this House should thoroughly inquire into the whole of this matter, and then they would be prepared to accept the verdict of such Committee. The ratepayers are interested on the one hand and the consumers of water on the other. They would have perfect confidence in the ordinary Forms of this House, and these Bills above all others are not Bills which ought to be rejected upon the Second Reading, but which should be read a second time and then referred to Committee.

Mr. Shaw-Lefevre

MR. J. STEWART WALLACE (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) said, that his constituency considered there was no urgent need in this matter whatever, and their chief reason for so thinking was that the storage supply of this particular Company was almost double that of the average storage of other London Water Companies. Whilst the storage was almost double, the daily supply was over 20 per cent. per head higher than the average of the other Water Companies. His constituents, therefore, said there was no urgency whatever in the matter; and seeing that the Report of the Royal Commission had only been printed so recently the matter should not be pressed further, because no public interest would be endangered or imperilled by the delay. They considered that the time was most inopportune for bringing forward such a Bill, and seeing that the London County Council would probably come to Parliament and ask for powers to enable it to be the Water Authority for London, no possible increase to the charge of the ratepayers should be incurred at present. The case was not of such urgency that the Company should be empowered to raise this additional capital, seeing that in a comparatively short time the County Council might be seeking to purchase the property. He therefore hoped that the House would oppose the Second Reading of the Bill. He would like, in conclusion, to say a few words in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, who had gone out of his way to introduce much irrelevant matter. The right hon. Gentleman had said that if several parties in the House were sincere in their convictions, they would refrain from voting on this question; and he further declared that if the matter were left to London, there was no doubt what the voice of London would be. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman, Was not the London County Council the voice of London? and the London County Council had in the most unmistakable manner entered their protest against the passing of the Bill.

*MR. B A N B U R Y (Camberwell, Peckham) said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had stated that he opposed the Second Reading of the Bill on behalf of his constituency. But the Bill would not affect that district. Limehouse was already freely supplied with water by the particular Company in question; and the district that would be affected was a division in Essex which was not under the London County Council at all. The Chairman of the Essex County Council wrote to The Times the other day condemning the London County Council opposition to the Bill, and expressing the hope that the Bill would pass. He did not deny the adequacy of the water supply of the East London Water Company; but the Bill was not to increase the source of the supply of water, but to provide additional facilities for distributing the water; it was to increase the storage, the reservoirs, the mains, and the agencies for filtration and pumping. Out of the £500,000, £40,000 were to be expended on the extension of the high service reservoirs; £140,000 on the extension of the mains; £80,000 on the pumping arrangements; £45,000 on the filtration beds; £145,000 on additional reservoirs; and the balance of £50,000 was applicable to the various needs of the Company. The hon. Member for Limehouse had also stated that if the £500,000 were raised by the Company it would be added to the purchase money in the event of the London County Council buying out the Water Companies. But the hon. Member did not know his case well. He forgot that new works could not be reproductive at once, and that there was a clause in another Act, applicable to this Bill, which compelled the Company to give the profits earned in the debenture issue to the Corporation of London, the Corporation to hold them for the benefit of the consumers, or towards providing funds for purchasing the Company if necessary. The profits did not go to the Company at all, and therefore that argument fell to the ground. The hon. Member for Hoxton also said that the London County Council, when they purchased the Company, would not require those new works, and, as the hon. Member put it, would be purchasing "a dead limb." But if the County Council did purchase the Company, they would have to distribute the water, and they could not distribute the water, from whatever source it was supplied, without mains, or without engines for pumping; they could not depend on a single main, which might burst; and they must have reservoirs to store the water, to take advantage of the rainy seasons, and to guard against drought. He presumed that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hoxton would not contend that the County Council would give more for two Water Companies than was proposed under the late Mr. Smith's scheme? Very well. The late Mr. Smith, in his proposal for purchase, in 1880, suggested that the debenture-holders of the different Water Companies should receive their income in Stocks of the Purchasing Authority. The Purchasing Authority in this case would be the London County Council. The County Council could raise money at a rate per annum of £2 14s. The East London Water Company could raise money on the Debenture Stock at a rate per annum of 3 per cent. The difference between that amount was 6s. per annum, and that on £500,000 was £1,500 per year, equal to 2d. per annum per house over the whole of the Company's district, or, on 30 years' purchase, capitalised £45,000. That was to say, that in the event of the London County Council purchasing the East London Water Company's business, they would be buying the actual works which would be created under the powers of this Bill at the actual cost of the works plus 9 per cent. or £45,000 for compulsory purchase. The hon. Member for Hoxton had said the district affected was not increasing. As a matter of fact, its present increase was at the rate of 4,150 houses per annum.

Mr. Banbury

MR. J. STUART : I said the district was not increasing, and I gave the exact figures of the engineers of the Company.

MR. BANBURY said, that the exact figures which the hon. Gentleman gave applied to the whole of the district over which the money was not going to be spent. The money was to be spent on the division in Essex, where the number of houses was increasing at the rate of 4,000 per annum. He hoped the House would pass the Bill—first, because water was one of the first necessities of life, and the Company was bound by its Act of Parliament to supply every house in the district with water; and, secondly, because, if the Company was not permitted to enlarge its works in order to carry out its obligations to Parliament, its stock would be depreciated, and the London County Council would be able to buy out the Company cheaply, which was the real motive at the bottom of this opposition.

MR. BENN (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had given away the case with regard to the cry of a water famine, when he said that the proposal of the Bill was not to increase the water supply. If the Bill was not to increase the supply of water—

MR. BANBURY : I said it was not to increase the source of the supply.

MR. BENN said, he must have misheard the hon. Gentleman. But with regard to the question of a water famine, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, complained that the hon. Member for Hoxton had not gone into details with regard to that very important point. The Company in their Report to the Royal Commission made a statement which effectually disposed of the cry of a water famine. They stated that they had made every allowance for a possible increase of supply in their district; and could fur-a water adequate in supply and extent in quality for a period of 40 years, with a large surplus margin. Nevertheless, it might look like an unreasonable thing for the London County Council to ask the House to throw out

Bill. He would, therefore, ask the House to listen to the story of the London County Council's action in the matter. After the Report of the Royal Commission, the County Council decided to approach the Water Companies in a businesslike way in order to solve the great question of the London water supply. They adopted the following resolution, which contained the terms on which they were prepared to buy out the Water Companies—

"That negotiations be entered into for the purchase of the undertakings of the Water Companies, or one or more of them, at a fair and reasonable price, on the basis of a desire to purchase and willingness to sell; having regard to any circumstances and statutory provisions affecting the present and prospective position, income, expenditure, liabilities, obligations, and value of the Companies respectively, and their undertakings, including any present and probable future demands for improvements and extensions of works, and new or additional sources of supply, and on the understanding that if satisfactory terms cannot be mutually agreed upon, an application will be made to Parliament to determine in what manner and on what condition a transfer to the Council shall be arranged, provided that no monopoly right on the part of the Water Companies be recognised."

He submitted that that was a very fair basis of negotiations between the London County Council and the Water Companies. He challenged the hon. Member for Peckham to produce the reply of the East London Water Company to that application.

MR. BANBURY: I am ready to reply. The answer is as follows:—

"St. Helen's Place, March 10th, 1894.

"Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, setting out the resolution recently passed by the London County Council which has been fully deliberated upon by the Directors of this Company, and in reply to the question you ask, I am to state that the Directors do not see their way to enter into negotiations for the sale of their undertaking to the London County Council on the basis dictated in the resolution. The Directors, however, desire me to add that if any definite and practicable proposals are made for the purchase of their undertaking, they will be prepared to give them very careful consideration."

MR. BENN said, it must be obvious to the House that the London County Council suggested a counter-proposal from the Water Company. The County Council definitely and clearly stated their views, and if those views were not thought sufficiently reasonable by the Water Company the Company ought to have consented to the arbitration that was suggested. The London County Council tried to do what other County Councils had successfully done—namely, in making agreements with the Water Companies, which agreements had been subsequently ratified by the House. The London County Council tried to bring the Water Companies to terms, but the Water Companies seemed determined to have nothing to do with the London County Council. Therefore, the London County Council came to the House and asked the House to take the extreme measure of rejecting the Bill of the East London Water Company. The policy of the London County Council was summed up in the words used by Mr. Speaker 15 years ago, when the great question of the London water supply was introduced by the late Mr. Henry Fawcett—

"The supply of such a necessity of life as water should be maintained by a Public Body, and that that Public Body should not be subject to the caprice of commercial considerations, or the requirements of shareholders, &c., and to the fluctuations of policy to which such requirements would lead."

The object of the Bill was to promote a commercial undertaking, to serve the interests of the shareholders, and not to improve the water supply of London. It aimed at enhancing the value of the Company with a view to the ultimate purchase by the London County Council. That was quite a common thing in the experience of the London County Council. If a new street was to be opened, it was wonderful with what facility buildings were added to buildings in order that the compensation might be as large as possible. He wished also to emphasise the point that if the Company were allowed to make this expenditure, and if the County Council afterwards purchased the Water Companies, an amalgamation would, of course, ensue, with the result that many of those works would be useless. In conclusion, he would quote the words uttered in 1879 by the late Mr. Henry Fawcett, who was a citizen of London—

"If you place insuperable difficulties in the way of a great reform being carried out, we will carry out that reform in spite of you ; at any rate, we are determined that the people of London shall not for ever be afflicted with the evils connected with the present system of water supply."

MR. GROVE (West Ham, N.) said that, as the Representative of an East London constituency, he felt bound to support the Second Reading of the Bill. It was with regret he ventured to oppose such a body as the London County Council, for whom he had the most profound respect, inasmuch as he considered they had done for the poor of London, for the dignity of the Metropolis, and even for the beautifying of our great capital, more than any other Public Body, not only in this Kingdom, but throughout the whole of Europe. Therefore, it was with regret that he opposed the London County Council, but he did it now with thoroughness as equal as his reluctance. It was a curious thing that the result of Water Company Bills seemed to turn the stream of popular opinion entirely. The Progressive Party became reactionary, and the Reactionary Party became progressive. The effect of the water was to wash black white—he did not object to that—but it also washed white black very often. He thought the tactics of the London County Council were governed by a bad and harmful principle. They did not come forward and say resolutely that they would not have this Bill. They first said that when the Royal Commission had terminated they would deal with the question of purchase. But the Royal Commission had now reported that we had got no "forrider" with the London County Council. They still delayed. He appealed to the common sense of the House, were his constituents to go thirsty because the London County Council could not make up its mind? Were his constituents also to go dirty? This was the second year of a great drought, and if there was a continuation of droughts, which was not at all unlikely, there would be a great danger to the health of his constituency, which numbered nearly 224,000 people, if the supply of water was not adequate and ample. They had heard a great deal of theory from the London County Council. Let him give one ounce of practice. As the Representative of the constituency, West Ham, North, he frequently heard not only from the traders and manufacturers that the supply of water was not sufficient to carry on trade and business but he heard from the poor, whom he was proud to represent, that they were also in danger of being starved. He thought that statement of fact ought to go a long way against the arguments of the London County Council. He was glad to see that the introduction of the Bill had had a good effect. It had made the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, a thorough Home Ruler. He would point out also that West Ham was outside the area of the London County Council. They should not presume to dictate to the London County Council, controlled as it was by eminent men—[A laugh—]—he spoke seriously—if the London County Council confined themselves to the area of their own jurisdiction. What right had the London County Council to go to a place like Essex, and to West Ham, North and South, and say, "We shall manage your water affairs as well as the water affairs of the Metropolis?" Let the London County Council manage their own affairs in the Metropolis as brilliantly and ably as in the past, but let them not interfere in the concerns of areas over which they had no jurisdiction. He would put it to hon. Members from the Sister Island, who may possibly cast their vote against the East London Water Company, how would they like it if the London County Council went to Dublin and said, "We shall manage your water affairs in such and such a way"? That was the case of the people of West Ham, and they insisted that they should have the right to manage their own affairs unintruded upon by the London County Council. It was because he looked upon the action of the London County Council as an unjust usurpation that he supported the Bill. He spoke entirely in the interest of his constituents, numbering 224,000, and not in the interest of the East London Water Company. In fact, if the Bill were read a second time, he intended, if in Order, to move as an Instruction to the Committee that in the event of the purchase of the Water Company by the London County Council—which he hoped would come to pass—the shares now issued should be purchased at par and not at an increased value. That would remove many of the objections which the London County Council had brought forward. He felt it to be a matter of importance that a Company which might possibly be purchased on behalf of the people should not be overloaded with capital; but because he also felt that the London County Council was encroaching on the rights of bodies over which they had no control, he would cast his vote in favour of the Second Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Benn

*COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) said, he sympathised with the notion of the Water Companies being purchased by a Water Trust representative of the County Councils concerned, and he had no doubt that some day that object would be effected. The point however was, what was to be done in the meantime? The hon. Member for Hoxton had said they must march with the times; but in that march not even Water Companies must stand still. For fear of damaging the public interest concerned, and the supply of water, he thought the whole matter should be referred to a Select Committee, where the London County Council could oppose as much as they liked, and probably with success; and there would be an opportunity for considering whether too much power was being given to the Company, or too large an addition made to the capital of the Company. On the other hand, to deprive a Private Company of the right of placing their case before a Select Committee would be to defeat the Constitutional principle that everybody should be able to put their case before a proper tribunal. It was all very well for the London County Council to say that they were only going to oppose the Bill for a year: but this matter would probably go on for 10 years. It involved so many County Councils and such large water schemes that it could not be settled in 12 months. Therefore, to prevent injustice to the Company and any danger to the public water supply, the matter should go before a Select Committee.

*MR. CAINE (Bradford, E.) said, the authority which was responsible for the supply of water to the Metropolis was the various Water Companies. These Companies might be all that had been said of them, but the fact was that London was going to get its water from them in the immediate future, and there was no other source of supply. If the County Council had brought forward a scheme, or if there was a scheme which the House could look upon as sound and practical, he would vote for its consideration. He had voted against this Bill last year, but he should now vote for it being sent upstairs, as the Report of the Commission was known. The Water Companies who were responsible for the supply of water must from time to time send to Parliament for sanction of schemes, otherwise water could not be supplied. Therefore, he thought that, whatever might be the faults of the Bill—and there were a great many, no doubt, in it—the Water Companies were entitled to the opportunity of showing before a Committee whether the scheme they brought forward was right and necessary. The London County Council could be heard before the Committee. They could bring forward all the evidence they had brought forward to-day—careful and deliberate evidence, not mere statements. It would be hard on the Water Companies if the powers they desired, rightly or wrongly, to acquire should be refused at the dictum of the London County Council. He trusted that before long either the London County Council or the Government would mature a scheme; but, unfortunately, the Government does not seem to have made up its mind, and the County Council has also failed to make up its mind. Therefore, he thought it hard that the only powers which now existed for supplying London with water should be put a stop to by the London County Council. When the Committee had considered the Bill, and had put into it powers for obtaining capital, an opportunity would be afforded to the County Council for bringing the subject again before the House when the Bill came up for Third Reading.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar) said, that the hon. Member who had just sat down, although perhaps not directly interested in this particular Bill, spoke as a Director of the New River Company.

*MR. CAINE said, it was true he was a Director of the New River Company, but he only sat upon the Board as representing an Insurance Company. He had no personal interest whatever in the New River Company, and he might say that whatever fees he had received he had parted with to his Insurance Company.

MR. S. BUXTON said, that in regard to these matters they wanted Water Companies and Insurance Companies, and all interests represented in Debate in the House. He had only intended the House to understand that his hon. Friend was connected with one of the interests represented in the Debate. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, especially the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, did not quite appreciate the position taken up by hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House. They argued the case for the Bill as a question of detail, as a matter for examination by a Committee. That was entirely contrary to the position which he, in common with the other opponents of the Bill, took up. They contended that this was not a question of the merits of the particular scheme, but a question of principle, as to whether, before there had been an opportunity of the County Council considering the water supply as a whole, these somewhat smaller matters should be dealt with and decided by a Committee of the House. What was the actual position of the Bill before the House? The Water Companies were coming for powers for a further capital expenditure of £1,750,000, and the House was entitled to say that before such an enormous additional expenditure was sanctioned there should be a proper opportunity of considering the whole question of the London water supply. The Royal Commission had been appointed to report whether any fresh water supply was required for London, and as to the best way of providing it. The case stood in much the same position as last year, for the Commission had only recently reported, and the County Council had not yet had an opportunity of considering the question as a whole. Until the Council had had that opportunity, it was only right that no large expenditure should be carried out to the prejudice of the ultimate settlement. All that was asked was that until that opportunity was afforded — an opportunity which the appointment of the Royal Commission was intended to give — no large expenditure of the kind contemplated in the Bill should take place to prejudice the ultimate settlement of the question of the London water supply.

Mr. Caine

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) said, the storage works proposed in the Bill were recommended by the Royal Commissioners as immediately necessary.

MR. S. BUXTON said, that what the Royal Commissioners recommended was that extended storage works, mains, and so on, were required in London, a thing which no one for a moment denied. He did not think, however, that the Royal Commission specifically stated that the particular storage works to which the hon. Member referred were required. It seemed to him that the object of the consideration of the subject by a Royal Commission was to give an opportunity for the consideration of the subject as a whole. He understood that the Council were ready to consent to any reasonable proposal with regard to mains and reservoirs shown to be urgent, but that they were not ready to assent to such an enormous expenditure as that proposed in the Bill, believing that it would have the result of prejudicing the general question. He did not think that the delay of a year would matter, and if the Bill came up next year and the County Council were not then in a position to say what they would do, not having decided upon a line of policy, he, for one, would support the Bill. If the Companies had been able to carry on for 25 years without coming to Parliament, they could surely wait another 12 months. He appealed to the House if any great Corporation in the Kingdom, representing a large body of ratepayers, asked for a year's delay in such an important matter, would the House for a moment deny the claim?

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) said, he would not trouble the House long. He would not have troubled it at all had it not been for an extraordinary observation made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He could not help saying that the reference made by the hon. Member for Tower Hamlets — he might call it the sneering reference — to the hon. Member for Bradford was most uncalled for. Coming from the Government Bench and spoken on behalf of the Government, and when the hon. Member for Bradford had told them but a few minutes before that he had voted against the Second Reading of the Bill last year, such a reference was unworthy, suggesting as it had done that the hon.

Member's vote was influenced by his connection with the New River Company. He would point out, after the details of the Bill had been considered in the Committee upstairs, the Preamble would have to be proved. What said the right hon. Gentleman? He suggested that this Bill was really promoted in order to inflate the value of the shares of the Company in view of possible purchase. What was the expenditure proposed under the Bill?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: No, no.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that he thought the right hon. Gentleman had adopted the suggestion. If he had not, he (Sir R. Webster) withdrew the statement. The hon. Member for St. George's (Mr. Benn) had made a distinct statement that the proposed expenditure was not required in order to enable the Water Company to fulfil its statutory obligations, but to inflate the value of the shares. No doubt the hon. Member would be candid enough to stand to his guns when that fact was stated. What was the expenditure which would take place under the Bill? It involved three things—reservoirs, filtration, and mains. How possibly could reservoirs, filtration, and mains inflate the capital of the Company? He spoke with some knowledge on this subject, although he regretted to say he had not 6d. in any Water Company in London. Anyone who said that, in a drought such as that of last summer, if a Water Company found itself unable to supply sufficient water to its consumers it could go and obtain it from its source of supply, knew very little about this business, however learned he might be in other matters. No one must imagine that a Water Company could dispense with ample storage reservoirs. He ventured to say that if any Water Company did not maintain an ample and increasing surplus of storage reservoirs, it did not do its duty to its constituents, judging from the experience of the past. Then, as to mains, expenditure in this direction did not mean putting money into the earth which would not earn a return. The Directors were not such fools as to do a thing of that sort. It meant that in those districts growing by their thousands it was absolutely essential that mains and supply pipes should be laid down, so that the consumers could get a proper supply. But the burning question had been whether or not there had been sufficient and proper filtration; and in order to keep the supply of water in proper condition it was only the duty of the Water Companies to maintain filtration in the highest state of efficiency. These were the questions on which the Water Company had to justify their proposals before the Committee. If the County Council had any real case against the Company, the proper place to examine into it was before a Select Committee, where the witnesses who supported it could be cross-examined. A point which had been overlooked was this: He should like to know on what ground, either of principle or otherwise, the London County Council had a right to say to the inhabitants of Essex they should not have the improved water supply they desired, and which this Bill proposed to give them? What had been the principle which had been recognised over and over again? Why, that each locality should supply itself with water and have control over its water supply. They had had that at Stockton, Middlesbrough, and at Birmingham, and in regard to this Bill the London County Council were arrogating to themselves a position they had no right to assume, and for which there was no precedent. He trusted that, whatever might be done in Committee and when the Bill came back to the House, in the name of fair-play and justice it would now be read a second time. Otherwise an impression would go forth that Her Majesty's Government opposed the Second Reading because they could count on a majority in the House which they could not count upon after the Bill had been examined. Under the circumstances, he hoped the House would see that the whole question was examined and sifted, and this could only take place before a competent Committee, constituted as they liked, where witnesses were examined.

MR. CAINE said that, with the indulgence of the House, he would observe that he had not taken the remark of his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. S. Buxton) in the sense in which it had been understood by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Wight (Sir R. Webster).

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said, he desired to say a word or two in reply to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for West Ham. The hon. Member had made an appeal well calculated to impress the House on behalf of his constituents, whom, he said, suffered from a scanty supply of water. The hon. Member had asked if his constituents were to be thirsty and dirty because the London County Council could not make up its mind. It was quite true that the people of West Ham had suffered wrong, and had complained of their water supply. The London County Council knew the reason. Complaints having been made to the Council as to the mysterious scantiness of water, they made investigation into the matter, and found that it had been the practice of the East London Water Company to insert a plug in the pipe supplying the cisterns so that the water merely dribbled into them. In individual cases where complaint was made the Company removed the plugs, but had the unparalleled impudence to charge the customer with the cost of the removal.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he should like to say a word or two from the point of view of his constituents the inhabitants of Essex. He failed to understand the interest taken in the water supply of his constituents by the hon. Member for Hoxton, seeing that for every 100 persons within the jurisdiction of the London County Council supplied by this Water Company there were 1,000 people supplied outside that jurisdiction.

MR. J. STUART said, the hon. Member was mistaken. For every one person supplied in the Essex district two were supplied in the district of the London County Council.

MAJOR RASCH said, that his information was exactly the reverse. They all knew that the object—the plan of campaign—of the County Council in taking so much interest in the water supply of the people of Essex was to cripple the Water Company, so as to be able to buy it up at half-price. The Company had been prohibited from taking any more water from the Lea, and they could not construct reservoirs without further capital. He had been Chairman of a Water Company for 10 years, and had some intimate knowledge of the subject. The matter was very simple. The Royal Commission had interdicted the East London Water Company from taking more water from the River Lea, and therefore the Company had to construct fresh storage reservoirs. That they could not do without raising fresh capital. Even the London County Council would be unable to do so. What with betterment, worsement, taxation of land values, and looking after the morality of music halls the people of Essex thought the London County Council had their hands too full already, and that they would do well to mix their own business and leave the County of Essex alone. He should vote for the Bill.

MR. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said, he should support the Bill. He felt some difficulty in taking that course, as he should naturally be inclined to support the County Council. He also found it a difficulty in supporting a cause championed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's (Mr. Goschen), who had said that he thought Scotch Members—and, he supposed, Irish Members—should not interfere in this matter.

MR. GOSCHEN was understood to say that he had no objection to their voting on this Bill, but that he thought there should be reciprocity.

MR. A. O'CONNOR said, that when English Members left Irish business alone, Irish Members would leave English business alone. He could only regret that the right hon. Gentleman made it so difficult for an Irishman to support a cause which he advocated. He (Mr. O'Connor) would wish to help the London County Council within the sphere of their jurisdiction, but he could not follow them into Essex, when he found that the Council for that county were supporting the other side. As an Irish Member he might remind the House that there was a larger Irish population in London than in Dublin, and that a large portion of that population was in the district affected by this Bill. It was for the sake of the poor who lived in the small houses of the district to whom a good and a prompt supply of water was of the first importance that he supported the Bill.

MR. JOHN BURNS said, it was hardly worth while going into the merit of the arguments which had been advanced, or even into the details of the Bill. But he would like to reply to the observations of the hon. Member for North West Ham, who had suggested that the London County Council were in four of dilatory tactics in this matter, and that they had not submitted any scheme to the Water Companies. Now I ventured to deny that, and to assert that the hon. Member in this matter did not represent his constituency: he simply spoke the views of a few officials who happened to agree with the views of the Water Companies. What were the facts? At the end of a long and exhaustive inquiry the Royal Commission reported in September last. That Report did not reach the London County Council until November, and practically was not submitted to the Council until the beginning of the present year. Thereupon a Committee, assisted by the able engineer of the Council and other officials, drew up a counter Report, which had just been circulated, and which would be found to deal with the matter on fair and reasonable lines. In the circumstances, it did not seem to him that it was unreasonable to ask that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months. The Essex people had compelled the London County Council to take over a large part of their main drainage system, and now apparently wished to dictate the conditions under which the water works should be purchased. The attitude of the Government was, in his opinion, right. The House ought not to allow the Members for Essex to dictate to 5,000,000 people the conditions for the purchase of these water works. The hon. Member for North West Ham had no right to ask the London County Council to be the servant of Essex in respect of the unpleasant parts of its municipal work, and to deny it equal rights in determining under what conditions the water works should be purchased. If the London County Council were to pay the piper they ought at any rate to be allowed to call the tune. He thought the Government had adopted a sensible and correct view. They said that the London County Council, representing as it did an overwhelming majority of the people of London, was not unreasonable in asking that the Bill should be rejected, being that as yet it had had no time to consider the Report of the Royal Commission, and that until a definite decision had been arrived at the Directors of the Water Companies and a few Members for Essex ought not to be allowed to dictate to 5,000,000 of people as to the conditions under which they would purchase the water works.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I will not detain the House many minutes, but I wish to say a word or two on the general principle involved. Perhaps I should preface my observations by saying that I am not a shareholder in any Water Company, and that I speak merely as a ratepayer of London who has learned very much from provincial experience. What is the position of affairs? Sooner or later the London County Council are bound to decide whether or not they will purchase the property of the Water Companies, and I hope that they will purchase. Up to the present, however, they have not come to any decision, neither is there any power which can force them to come to a decision within a reasonable period, and the question for consideration is whether, until they shall have arrived at a final determination, no Water Company in London is to be permitted to increase its capital? The London County Council does put forward a most exaggerated claim in regard to the water question. The Under Secretary for the Colonies says a similar demand by a Provincial Corporation has never been refused. I say unhesitatingly that never has a similar demand for delay been granted on the application of any Municipality. Birmingham has some knowledge of the ways of the London County Council. When Birmingham asked for power to obtain a supply of water from the Welsh hills, saying that within a short time the town would probably suffer from drought, the London County Council opposed the scheme, and averred that the statement was untrue. They said there would be no drought, but there was, which showed how little reliance could be placed on their scientific knowledge. The County Council opposed the scheme, asking for time to enable them to decide whether they might not themselves require the particular water supply which Birmingham had selected. The County Council should make up their minds to deal with the matter now under consideration fairly and speedily. Their demand for delay is monstrous. The hon. Member referred to the experience of Birmingham. Has he taken the trouble to find out what that experience was? I negotiated the purchase of the water works there. What did we do? We (the Corporation) asked them to come to terms. We were unable to do so. We then stated what price we were prepared to give, and asked the House for compulsory powers of purchase on those terms. That application was refused. We were told to go before an arbitrator, and by agreeing to terms we saved the expenses of an arbitrator.

MR. BENN: That is precisely the course the London County Council propose. I think the right hon. Gentleman will find our terms are identical with those adopted at Birmingham.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I think I have been unnecessarily interrupted. I undertake to say that if the representatives of the London County Council are prepared to make the East London Water Company the same offer that was made to the Birmingham Water Company by the Municipality it will be accepted. The right course is for the London County Council to make up their minds as to what is the fair value of the property of the East London Water Company, and to make an offer accordingly. If the terms are refused by the Water Company let the County Council then come to Parliament and ask for official powers. If they do that I will support the Second Reading of the Bill. I think it is monstrous that before taking this course they should seek to interfere with every scheme for the extension of the water supply. I think they have had time to make up their minds. I have never known a Bill to be dealt with in this way before. I must say that it is a most dangerous precedent that a Private Bill should be dealt with in this House upon political considerations.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 228; Noes 227.—(Division List, No. 14.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

THAMES CONSERVANCY BILL.

(By Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge), in moving the Second

Mr. J. Chamberlain

Reading, said, the Bill sought to extend the jurisdiction of the Conservators of the Thames. The condition had been imposed upon them that if they did not in a Bill this year the London County Council would bring in one next, and the result of the compromise adopted had been that the Thames Conservators had brought in the Bill of which he had the honour of moving the Second Reading. The great point in its favour was that it would do away with not more than 32 existing Acts by which the conservators were governed, going back as far as the reign of James I. The Bill, though not approved by the London County Council, deals with the representation on the Board of the Conservancy, which the London County Council desired to have a larger proportion on the ground that the representation should be in proportion to the population. The promoters of the Bill considered that the riparian owners and others in the upper part of the river had as great an interest in the Thames as those in the lower part, and the Bill would commend itself to all fair-minded people, because it gave fair representation to those who were interested in the upper and lower portions of the Thames. A great many Petitions had been presented against the Bill, and many of them were in reference to the representation on the Board. It was recognised that the Board had been well-managed by their Chairman; but he ventured to say in reference to the suggestion that the Board should consist of 100 members that it would be practically unworkable if the representation upon it were increased beyond from 25 to 30. Then, in regard to pollution of the river, there was no doubt they asked for powers in that respect; but he thought those clauses in the Bill were of a rather too arbitrary character and ought to be modified. The larger proportion of Petitions lodged against the Bill referred to the question of pollution, and sufficient powers in that respect must be given, but he hoped that the clause for that purpose would be made satisfactory alike to the agricultural interest and the public. Strong objection had been taken to the inclusion of the tributaries of the Thames. The powers of the Sanitary Authorities would be brought into operation in regard to tion of the River Thames where the Conservators had not considered that to part of their duty, the surrounding County Councils having hitherto held back from the Conservancy. Those reasons the Conservators were quite willing to have threshed out in Committee, and they hoped the result would be that the water of the river would be kept quite pure, yet without interfering with the agricultural counties and interests in the future more than they had in the past. The great point was that the powers proposed to be given with regard to pollution were larger than they were before; but if it were desired, the Conservators were willing to give up the proposal mentioned, and the course taken by them would, he believed, to a great extent disarm opposition to the Bill. With regard to finance, the proposal was for amalgamation in reference to the upper and lower portions of the Thames, so that the whole river would be under one system of finance, and power would be given to issue £300,000 Debenture Stock, which he thought would be a sufficient sum to put into the hands of the Conservators for carrying out the purposes of the Bill. As to the Water Companies, he hoped they would think better of their threatened opposition to the Bill. They had statutory powers for taking certain quantities of water from the river; but they had been approached in this matter by the Conservancy, and it had been arranged that they should be allowed to take a certain quantity of water out of the Thames under agreement, in order to provide for the increased consumption of their consumers, and the question had been raised whether their claims in that respect were valid or not. The London County Council, no doubt, desired to treat them as invalid, so that they might buy up the Water Companies at a cheaper rate than was possible at present. The promoters considered that this question ought to be dealt with separately, and they had therefore come to an arrangement that whatever powers the Water Companies had should remain as at present. They would not break faith with the Water Companies, but this Bill did not propose to give those bodies greater statutory powers than they now possessed. The House would see, therefore, that the Conservators, while keeping faith with the Water Companies, were acting in the interests of the public. At present the Companies took 110,000,000 gallons daily from the river with power to increase the quantity to 130,000,000. For many years the Conservators had done all they could to preserve the purity and improve the navigation of the Thames, and nobody could have done its duty better, and the clearest testimony had been given that they had fully done their duty towards the public. They had not sold their water to the Water Companies. They had spent certain sums for the benefit of those Companies, but had in return received money from them for carrying out necessary works. The Conservators had certainly prevented a large amount of pollution; had equalised the flow of the river; and had secured a constant supply in summer by widening and deepening the reaches, and by other works. This Bill ought, in the circumstances, to be read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee for thorough examination and amendment rather than be thrown out now on Second Reading. The Conservators had no wish whatever to oppose the provisions of the Bill being thoroughly threshed out; on the contrary, they only desired to carry it through for the good of all who were interested in the Thames, considering not only the interests of the people of London, but those of the populations of Richmond, Reading, Oxford, and other places upon its banks. It must not be forgotten that the Counties of Gloucester, Wilts, Berks, and Bucks were equally interested with Middlesex in this matter, and the Conservators considered that the acceptance by the House of such a scheme as this would do equal justice to all. It would throw enormous work upon the Conservators, but he hoped it would be accorded a Second Reading, and that on reaching Committee it would be put in a shape which would be satisfactory to all.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir F. Dixon-Hartland.)

*MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, he would not oppose the Second Reading, because, as the hon. Member in charge of the Bill had explained, the reasons which had led to the proposed opposition had been removed by the arrangement come to between the London County Council and the promoters of the Bill. The grounds of the opposition were that it was proposed to give larger statutable powers to the Water Companies than they had at present in reference to drawing water from the Thames. Those Companies had lately claimed increased rights under agreements of which the validity was disputed. However, he would not then go into the questions either of the validity of those agreements or the statutable rights of the Companies. Whatever their legal rights might be, they would not be interfered with in any sense by the Bill. That was the understanding arrived at with the promoters, and an Instruction to the Committee had been drawn up. If this Bill were not passed the bringing in of another would devolve on the London County Council, and it was therefore not their desire that it should be prevented from going to a Committee. But though not opposing the Second Reading, it must not be understood that the County Council approved of the Bill. On the contrary, there was a great deal in it of which they entirely disapproved. However, the framework was there, although he feared it was incapable of being made in Committee into a Bill which would carry their support, and they therefore desired to reserve power to themselves to oppose it if necessary on the Report stage or Third Reading if the various provisions to which the County Council objected were not amended in Committee. Many questions would arise, and, among others, that of the money which the Conservators required. As in the other respect referred to, the Bill left everything absolutely in statu quo, he would withdraw the opposition to the Second Reading, and move the Instruction which had been agreed upon between the promoters of the Bill and those whom he represented.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) wished, as a Surrey man, to be allowed to say a few words. He was very glad the hon. Member for Hoxton had been good enough to withdraw his opposition to the Bill in which the Division of the County of Surrey that he had the honour to represent was greatly interested. The people there had come to the conclusion that in matters of this kind they ought to object to representation going by population instead of according to area, for by the application of that doctrine they would have greater authority and would prevent others having an undue amount of control over the lower Thames. Though they were profoundly concerned and somewhat anxious in this matter, they nevertheless desired to refrain at present from criticising this measure, because they had an honourable understanding with the promoters of the Bill that various Amendments would be accepted in Committee. In that expectation they had instructed him to recommend to the House that the Bill should be allowed a Second Reading.

MR. ALBAN GIBBS (London), upon the question of representation on the Board, said, the shipowners of London paid in dues about £46,000, which was about half the whole sum expended on the River Thames between Staines and the estuary, and their interest certainly was inferior to none. They had no desire to oppose the Bill on Second Reading, but would appear before the Committee and do their best to amend it, and put it in a more suitable shape. He was instructed to explain to the House that they did not accept the Bill as a settlement. He hoped a Bill would be brought in at some future time which would give to the merchants and the shipowners of the Port of London a predominant control over the lower Thames. He considered that the City of London had a predominating interest in this matter, and should have a corresponding influence upon any Board of Control. Emphasising that they did not regard this by any means as a final settlement, he would not then trouble the House further or oppose the Second Reading.

SIR W. HART-DYKE (Kent, Dartford) said, his constituents were much exercised with regard to their future under the Bill. To millowners the question of the Companies taking water from the river was of extreme importance. As the Bill now stood very harsh measures might be meted out to millowners and others. With every desire to prevent undue pollution, he was sure no Member of the House would wish to injure their vested interests unnecessarily in any shape or way, and he would urge that, assuming the Bill went to a Comittee, his constituents and others who are interested as respondents should have the power of modifying certain of the provisions as far as they deemed necessary consistently with carrying out the main objects of the Bill.

Mr. J. Stuart

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND said, it was desired to increase the flow of water rather than to diminish it, and the promoters had no wish to interfere with the interests of the millowners. Some of the conditions appeared very hard indeed, and, so far as he was concerned, he would be prepared to do his best to assist millowners and the interests connected with agriculture. He could only say he would do all he properly could to have the Bill modified in those respects in Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

MR. J. STUART moved—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill that no further powers of taking water from the River Thames than may now be legally exercised be given by the Bill to the Water Companies, and that, as far as necessary, the Bill be amended to give effect to this Instruction."—(Mr. J. Stuart.)

Motion agreed to.

WEST MIDDLESEX WATER BILL.

(By Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. J. STUART intimated that, as a sense of the House had been taken on the East London Water Bill, he did not now propose to offer any opposition to the Second Reading of this measure, considering it proper, after the close division, to allow this Bill also to go before the Committee. The circumstances of this Bill, however, distinctly differed from those of the East London Water Bill. He had a very strong case against the West Middlesex Bill, for he held in his hand a statement issued by the Company in April, 1892, in which they described their works as in a thoroughly good condition, and capable of meeting all demands for the present and in the future without extension from time to time. Since then there had been only an increase of 10 per cent. in the demand for water, and the Company's capital was not yet exhausted. Thus the case against the Bill was a strong one, but the House being so evenly divided it would be as well to let this Bill also proceed to a Committee. He would, however, reserve the right on a future day to place before the House certain Instructions to the Committee on this and the other Bills.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

LONDON STREETS AND BUILDINGS BILL.

BILL COMMITTED TO A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) said, he had to move that the Order for the committal of this Bill should be discharged, and that the Bill should be committed to a Select Committee of 11 Members, six to be nominated by the House, and five by the Committee of Selection. If hon. Members examined the Bill they would see that it affected a large number of interests and was of wide extent, and he thought they would agree with him it was one which should be dealt with as a Public rather than a Private Bill. He had to complain of the comparative secrecy with which Bills of this kind were dealt with, and he might point out in reference to this Bill that had he not taken the present course of moving to refer it to a large Committee very few of those affected by this Bill would have known anything of its existence. He wished to make known a fact that might surprise the House as much as it surprised him. The Bill was read a second time on March 22, the day before Good Friday, when very few hon. Members were present. The Vestry of Chelsea had made application for a copy of the Bill, and were told that it was under revision, and that a copy would not serve their purpose at that particular time. A second application having been made, the clerk of the London County Council, in a reply dated on the very day on which the Second Reading was taken, stated that the revision of the Bill was not sufficiently advanced to enable a copy to be furnished to the Vestry. That he held to be a very serious statement. The importance of the measure might be estimated by the fact that it repealed 10 Public Acts, including Metropolitan Building Acts and Metropolis Management Acts. It professed to be a Consolidation Act. Hon. Members were aware that he was a strong advocate of consolidation, but this was a Consolidation Bill of a very peculiar character, changing the whole aspect of the law in relation to the matters to which he had referred. That being so, and looking to its wide-reaching nature, he wished to see the Bill referred to a large Committee. He appealed to his friends on the London County Council to support the Motion. It would be remembered that last April they had to call in question Acts relating to Eastbourne, Ower Darwen, and Reading, and to complain that in Private Bills legislation was introduced dealing with Public Acts. The tendency of late years in the House had been to minimise Private Bill legislation and to maximise legislation by Public Act, and it was in pursuance of that policy he asked for the appointment of this Committee. Hon. Members very seldom saw the Bills which were submitted to the House. Although they very properly trusted the Committees upstairs, they had a perfect right to see the Bill, and, having examined this measure, he had come to the conclusion that in consequence of its far-reaching character this was not one which should be left in the hands of an ordinary Committee. He appealed to the House not only to pass this Motion, but also to be always on the alert to see that private legislation was not allowed to overshadow public laws.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Order for Committal be read, and discharged.

That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of Eleven Members, Six to be nominated by the House and Five by the Committee of Selection.

That all Petitions against the Bill presented six clear days before the meeting of the Committee be referred to the Committee; and that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, Agents, or Witnesses, be heard on their Petitions against the Bill, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill against such Petitioners.

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

That Seven be the quorum."—(Mr. Howell.)

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.) said, he had only a word or two in supporting the Motion. He wished to state that he had had communications from different parts of the Metropolis pointing out the objections urged by his hon. Friend, and he hoped the House would see fit to support the Motion.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) said, he did not intend to oppose the Motion; but while sympathising with the general objections against attempts to alter public law by means of Private Bills, he submitted that in this case it was not only right, but almost the duty of the County Council to proceed in this matter by Private Bill. He had not been an advocate of the action of the London County Council in attempting to pass measures by means of private procedure, but he did fear that this Bill, which contained many valuable provisions affecting the health of the inhabitants of the Metropolis, would not have had the remotest chance of being passed if left to struggle in the crowd of public measures. He did appeal to hon. Members opposite to be a little consistent in these matters, and he would remind them that only this week the House decided that a Bill embodying very novel principles should go through by private procedure. Why should not this Bill have been treated in the same way. They had been told that in the last Parliament there were plenty of means of getting Bills like this through in the form of public legislation, and it was claimed that what was done by the last Parliament could be done by this. But he would reply to that that they now had not only a new Parliament but a new Government which was literally besieged by competitive claimants for Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, and it was probable that in the competition Bills to which nobody could object would lose all chance of becoming law. It was for this unfortunate but irresistible reason that he believed the London County Council were right in proceeding with that urgent measure by means of Private Bill legislation. Still, he welcomed the Motion of the hon. Member opposite, because he wished to see carefully examined some objectionable clauses which were contained in the Bill.

*MR. J. STUART said, he was sure the House would be glad to hear he had no opposition to offer to that proposal. He was only sorry that advantage had been taken of that occasion to find fault with the action of the London County Council in their procedure in this matter, being a difficult question to decide whether this ought to be a Public or a Private Bill. In making the present Motion his hon. Friend had only anticipated a step which the County Council themselves were prepared to take, as he had intended to move a Motion which would have secured the result aimed at by his hon. Friend. Under the circumstances, however, he would accept the Motion now moved.

Mr. Howell

Motion agreed to.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

Alfred Money Wigram, esquire, for County of Essex (Southern or Romford Division).

The Hon. Arthur George Brand, for County of Cambridge (Northern or Wisbech Division).

QUESTIONS.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH VENEZUELA.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if it is a fact that Her Majesty has had no Minister in Venezuela since 1887, owing to the action of the then President of the Republic ; and if he can cause an unofficial representation to be made to the new President, General Crespo, by the friendly offices of Count Kleist, the German Minister, who extends his courtesies to British residents at Caracas, that Her Majesty would be willing to resume diplomatic relations should a wish to that effect be expressed by the Government of the Republic and a friendly reception assured to Her Majesty's Envoy ?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick) : Diplomatic relations with Venezuela were suspended on the 21st of March, 1887, and have not yet been resumed. Her Majesty's Government are desirous of a friendly and equitable settlement of the questions at issue between the two countries, and their views on this matter have on more than one occasion been communicated to the Venezuelan Government. As recently as last year negotiations were carried on with a special Venezuelan Envoy who visited England, but they proved unsuccessful. As the Venezuelan Government are already aware of the views of Her Majesty's Government, it is not considered necessary to make a special representation to General Crespo on the subject.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

MAJOR DARWIN (Staffordshire, Lichfield) : On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for North St. Pancras, I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether any Report has been obtained by the Governors of Christ's Hospital as to the suitability, or otherwise, of the site purchased by them at Horsham for the erection of the new school buildings ; what is the nature of such Report ; whether the site fulfils all sanitary requirements ; when, and by whom, was the Report made ; and will it be laid upon the Table of the House ?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) : The question relates to a transaction completed more than a year ago by the Council of Almoners of Christ's Hospital, in the course of carrying into effect the scheme established under the Endowed Schools Acts for the regulation of the Hospital on the 15th of August, 1890. No such Report as is mentioned in the question has been communicated to the Charity Commissioners, and they are, therefore, unable to give the information asked.

LUNATICS IN BELFAST WORKHOUSE.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the number of additional nurses and officials appointed to the lunatic department of the Belfast Workhouse since 1st November last ; also the number of deaths in the lunatic department since that date, and the number on which inquests have been held ; whether the epileptics are still kept in the lunatic department, and if the Local Government Board has instructed the epileptics to be so kept there ; whether, at a recent inquest on an epileptic who died in that department, held in Belfast, the coroner's jury strongly protested against this practice ; whether he will state by what authority epileptics are placed there, or lunatics kept under restraint in the workhouse; whether he is aware of the practice of exchanging patients carried on between the workhouse authorities and the Governors of the asylum at Belfast; and if some inquiry will be made into the whole system in relief of these helpless afflicted persons?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): At the same time, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman when he proposes to introduce his promised Bill dealing with the detention of pauper lunatics in Irish workhouses?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): (1) A medical officer and six male and female attendants have been appointed to the lunatic department of the Belfast Workhouse since November 1 last; 41 deaths have taken place in the lunatic department since that date, and the number of inquests held was 10. (2) Epileptics, I am informed, are still kept in the lunatic department, but the Local Government Board have not directed that they should be placed or kept there. The matter is one appertaining to medical administration, and rests solely with the responsible medical officer. I understand, however, that the epileptics occupy separate dormitories, day-rooms, and sick wards, and are only associated with the lunatics in the dining-hall. (3) The reply to the third paragraph is in the affirmative. (4) The authority for the employment of restraint in this, as in all civil hospitals, is the order of the responsible medical officer, who directs that it shall be imposed when he deems it necessary for the safety of the patient or those about him. (5) The practice referred to in paragraph 5 did exist prior to March, when it was terminated by the Guardians. As regards the concluding paragraph, and the question which stands in the name of the hon. Member for South Tyrone; just before the Autumn Recess I stated that the whole question of lunacy administration was receiving my careful attention, and that I hoped to confer at an early date with the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums on the subject. In consequence of communications which afterwards passed between me and the Inspectors, I have caused a Bill to be prepared dealing with the whole question of lunacy reform, including the particular branch of the question referred to by the hon. Member for South Tyrone. The Bill, however, inevitably contains matter which I fear might be regarded as contentious, and in the present state of public business I see so little prospect of carrying it into law this Session that I do not think it worth while to include it. On the other hand the object aimed at by the question of the hon. Member for South Tyrone should not, I conceive, be regarded as controversial, and I shall see whether it is possible to introduce a separate Bill dealing with this branch of the subject.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I may explain to the right hon. Gentleman that the question was intended to refer only to pauper lunatics.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): Would the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman change the incidence of the charge from the poor rate to the county rate? Such a Bill would be most contentious.

MR. J. MORLEY: I think the hon. Member had better wait till he sees the Bill.

TOWN PARKS IN IRELAND.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the general dissatisfaction in Ireland, particularly in Ulster, with reference to the present state of the law relating to town parks; whether his attention has been called to the decision of the Land Commission in the case of Mrs. Letitia M'Cann, tenant, and the Marquess of Downshire, landlord, recently heard at Belfast, wherein the village of Dundrum, County Down, which had a population of only 372 in 1881, was decided to be a town to which the exemption from the benefits of the Land Acts applied; is he aware that the Land Commission had previously decided that Dundrum was not such a town at the passing of the Act; whether he is aware that the Cowper Commission recommended that the exemption should not apply to any town under a population of 5,000, and that the late Government accepted in the House of Commons, in the Land Bill of 1887, an Amendment providing that the exemption should not apply where the population was under 2,000; and whether some steps will be taken to preserve to tenants in towns in Ireland their property in such lands held outside the towns.

Mr. M'Cartan

MR. J. MORLEY : In reply to the first paragraph, it is very probable that some dissatisfaction is felt as alleged. My attention has been called to the matters stated in the second and third paragraphs of the question, and I am informed that the facts are as indicated by my hon. friend. I am aware that the Cowper Commission made a recommendation to the effect stated. I am not aware, though I have no reason to doubt, that my hon. friend is correctly informed as to the proceedings in Committee on the Bill of 1887. In reply to the last paragraph, I think it will be open to the Select Committee which I am proposing to appoint to suggest improvements in the law in respect to the matter alluded to in this question.

MR. M'CARTAN : The right hon. gentleman is probably aware that the amendment adopted by this House regarding the limit of population was thrown out in another place.

MR. KNOX : Can the right hon. gentleman give any reason why a place which was not a town 10 years ago and has not increased in size in the interval is to be deemed to be a town now?

MR. J. MORLEY : I cannot answer that question without notice.

TENANTS' IMPROVEMENTS IN IRELAND.

MR. M'CARTAN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the large number of tenants in Ireland whose holdings have been exempted from the benefits of the Land Acts; whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. John Robb, of Belfast, tenant, and the Marquess of Downshire, landlord, where the Land Commission decided to fix an extra rent on the improvements made by the tenant, without any contribution from the landlord, on the ground that such improvements were too good for the holding; and whether the terms of Reference to the proposed Committee will be so extended as to include inquiry into the cases now excluded by the defects of the Land Acts, but which are equally entitled to the benefits which these Acts were intended to confer on all the farmers of Ireland?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am not aware of the actual number of the holdings excluded from the operation of the Acts. In reply to the second part of the question, the Land Acts do not entitle a tenant to exemption from rent in respect of improvements which are unsuitable to the holding, and I am informed that the Land Commission decided in this particular case that the improvements in question should not be exempted from rent because they were not suitable to the holding, treating it as an agricultural or pastoral holding. In reply to the third paragraph, I am not prepared to admit that the provisions above mentioned do constitute a defect in these Acts, or that the Legislature intended that these Acts should confer such benefits as the question refers to.

EXAMINATIONS FOR IRISH MONITORS.

MR. BODKIN (Roscommon, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in what cases, and for what periods, are schools deprived of the teaching services of monitors by reason of the failure of such monitors to pass the 1st of July examination; and will he recommend that for the future the appointment or apportionment of monitors to schools for each year shall take place after the monitors have passed these examinations, so that the schools may run no risk of being deprived of the assistance to which their attendance entitles them?

MR. J. MORLEY : I would refer the hon. gentleman to the reply given by me to this question on the 1st of March?

LESSON BOOKS IN IRISH SCHOOLS.

MR. BODKIN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can furnish the particulars of any case in which the application of the manager of a national school for permission to use in such school lesson books other than those published and supplied by the Board of National Education in Ireland was complied with, and of the arrangements made in such case for the protection of the monitors and children in such school in regard to the examinations usually held in the special lesson books provided by the Board from the use of which such school had been exempted?

MR. J. MORLEY : The Commissioners of National Education report that there were numerous cases in which the managers of national schools applied for permission to use lesson books other than those supplied by the Board, but in none of these cases was exemption claimed for either pupils or monitors from examination in the Board's lesson books. In cases where other books were permitted, it was open to the Inspectors to arrange with managers and teachers as to the examination of the pupils. Monitors must be examined in the books prescribed in the official programme.

MR. BODKIN: Can the right hon. Gentleman give me particulars of any cases in which permission was granted?

MR. J. MORLEY: I think the cases referred to will be contained in a Return recently granted by this House, and now in course of preparation. It will be presented probably by the end of the month.

MR. BODKIN: Am I to understand that in all cases in which permission was granted, the monitors, although allowed to use lesson books other than those supplied by the Board, were compelled to be examined in the books prescribed by the National Board?

MR. J. MORLEY: I cannot add anything to the answer I have already given.

HABITUAL OFFENDERS.

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he has received a Memorial from a Conference attended by representatives of the Town Councils of Edinburgh, Dundee, Aberdeen, Greenock, and Perth, the Convention of Royal Burghs, the Parochial Boards of Edinburgh, and a number of philanthropic societies in Scotland, praying for a Royal Commission to inquire into the best means of dealing, by means more effective than now exist, with habitual offenders, vagrants, beggars, and inebriates; and whether Her Majesty's Government will in the public interest issue such a Commission as prayed?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): I have received the Memorial referred to. The question of dealing with habitual drunkards was considered and reported upon in 1893 by a Departmental Committee appointed by the late Home Secretary. There was no Representative of Scotland upon the committee, which is matter for regret; but witnesses from Scotland were examined before it. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary proposes to bring in a measure, in accordance with the recommendations of that Committee, which will contain provisions applicable to Scotland, as well as England. It would, therefore, seem desirable to await the consideration of the terms of this measure before deciding whether a further Committee should be appointed to inquire into the mode of dealing with inebriates in Scotland. I will, however, consider whether a kindred inquiry of the same character might be conducted in Scotland into the important question of habitual offenders.

THE FAILURE OF GEORGE BARKER AND COMPANY.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that, although the estate of the firm of George Barker and Company has been in liquidation for nearly two years, only one dividend of 1s. has at present been paid to the creditors; and whether, considering that a large number of poor persons are interested in the winding up of the estate, the Board of Trade can take action to bring about a speedy settlement of its affairs?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): I am aware that only one dividend of 1s. in the £1 has at present been paid to the creditors in the joint estate of George Barker & Co., and 20s. in the £1 on the separate estates. The estate has been administered by two trustees and a Committee of Inspection elected by the creditors. The Board of Trade, in consequence of certain facts which were brought to their notice, removed the two trustees of the 6th ultimo, and the estate is now vested in the Senior Official Receiver of the High Court as Trustee. It is hoped that a further dividend will shortly be distributed.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Can the Official Receiver act quite independently of the Committee of Inspection? If not, can the power to do so possibly be granted him, in view of the grave charges made against the Committee?

MR. MUNDELLA: The trustees having been removed, the Committee of Inspection will come under the orders of the Court.

Mr. J. Morley

ENFIELD AND SPARKBROOK FATORIES.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any alteration in the orders to be given to the Enfield Small Arms Factory for Navy rifles has been made since the Ordnance Vote was taken in March?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hanley) (who replied) said: No alterations in the allocation of rifles to be manufactured during the financial year have been made since the Ordnance Factory Vote was taken on March 16. It was then explained by the Secretary of State that Enfield and Birmingham would be worked as part of one establishment, and that it had been arranged that 15,000 rifles required by the Admiralty should be allocated to Sparkbrook, the completion of rifles in hand, the manufacture of cavalry carbines, and the conversion of Martini-Henry rifles for the Artillery, with other demands for the now current year, providing work at Enfield for a number of hands not less, I hope, than those employed at the present time.

MR. BENN (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Will the sum voted for wages still stand?

MR. WOODALL: Yes, the only change is that the two factories are now to be worked as part of one establishment.

MR. A. C. MORTON: Is it not a fact that it costs 25 per cent. more to manufacture the rifles at Sparkbrook than at Enfield?

MR. WOODALL: No, Sir.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): Then how much more does it cost?

MR. WOODALL: If the hon. Member will give notice of the question I will come prepared with an answer.

EASTERN PONDOLAND.

MR. WHITELEY (Stockport): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if the Government has further information as to whether the Colony of Natal will have any voice in the terms of annexation of Eastern Pondoland so far as relates to the trade carried on between the two countries; and seeing that the trade of Eastern Pondoland has hitherto been carried on through Natal, and Natal merchants and traders have invested capital in the country and upon the borders, whether the Government will provide that no restrictions shall be placed on the importation of goods from Natal, so as to divert the trade to the Cape Colony?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I am afraid it would be inexpedient for me, at the present moment, to add anything to the answer I gave on the 20th of March to the hon. Member for the Kirkdale Division of Liverpool.

THE DUM-DUM MURDER.

MR. CAINE (Bradford, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if his attention has been called to the finding of a Court Martial, presided over by Colonel Steevens at Ahmedabad on the 13th of March last, when Private O'Hara, of the Leinster Regiment, was accused, and found guilty of shooting three comrades, two of whom were killed, when under the influence of liquor; and is this the same Private O'Hara who was condemned to be hung at Calcutta by Justice Norris and a British jury for the murder of Sheik Soleim at Dum-Dum, but who was afterwards re-tried before a Commission of Judges and acquitted, the Bench holding that Judge Norris committed a technical error in his Charge to the jury, although the evidence was clear with regard to O'Hara's guilt, and no doubt was attempted to be thrown on the justice of his sentence; and, if so, is it in accordance with the Rules of the British Army in India, that a man who has been proved guilty of the murder of a Native should return to his regiment, and continue in the Queen's service?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.) (who replied) said: I have seen in the newspapers a report of the Court Martial at Ahmedabad on Private O'Hara, but not of the finding and sentence of the Court. The Private O'Hara referred to in the second paragraph of my hon. Friend's question was tried and convicted for a murder committed at Dum-Dum. In India, as in this country, power is reserved to refer questions of law to a Court of Appeal. This was done in the present instance, and the Court, with the express concurrence of the Judge who tried the case, decided that the conviction was wrong and must be quashed. I am informed that the soldier O'Hara, who was the subject of these proceedings, was discharged from the Army.

THE STAMPING OF WEIGHING MACHINES.

MR. CAINE: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if an Inspector is justified in seizing any weighing instrument which is not stamped in the county where it is discovered, though it has been stamped by the Inspector of another county; is it the duty of Inspectors under such circumstances to point out to the owner the special requirements of his own County Council, and so give him, before taking any proceedings, the opportunity of getting it altered so as to comply with their interpretation of the Act; if it is possible for the Board of Trade, without legislation, so to assimilate the various and differing requirements of County Councils with regard to the stamping of weighing machines as to obviate the frequent proceedings which are now inevitable; and, if not, will he introduce a Bill for the purpose; will he reduce the Inspector's fee from 5s. to 1s.; and will he arrange for costs to be borne by the parties sustaining the adverse verdict?

MR. MUNDELLA: Weighing instruments, although stamped in the district of one Local Authority, may, under existing law, have to be re-stamped if used in trade in the district of another Local Authority. It rests with the County Councils who appoint the Inspectors to give owners of weighing instruments reasonable opportunity for complying with the provisions of the Act. It is undesirable to interfere with the discretion of County Councils in making requirements with regard to stamping weighing machines, as the administration of the law has been placed in their hands by Parliament. The Board of Trade have no power to alter the fees, which are fixed by Statute, or to amend the legal procedure as to payment of costs.

REGISTRARS OF BIRTHS AS POLITICAL AGENTS.

MR. WOODS (Lancashire, Ince): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that Robert Halliwell, the present Registrar of Births, Marriages, and Deaths in Wigan, is the agent of a political Party in the town, and was a surety for the recent political Petition case in Wigan, and that he is now a political candidate for one of the wards in the town; whether these are permitted to any person holding such an office under the Government; and, if the conduct of the Registrar is contrary to the Rules of the Service, what course will be pursued by Government?

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): I learn from the Registrar General that Mr. Halliwell has held the office of Registrar of Births and Deaths for more than 26 years. He is also a Registrar of Marriages. The Registrar General has no knowledge as to the political views of Mr. Halliwell, or as to his being an agent of a political party. Registrars of Births and Deaths are appointed by the Guardians. They are not salaried officers of the Government, but derive their emoluments from fees. There is nothing in the Regulations which would prevent their undertaking any duties which do not clash with their duties as Registrars, and the Registrar General considers that he has no power to interfere with the officers in respect of the work which they may undertake out of office hours.

INDIAN COTTON GOODS IMPORTS.

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he can state what proportion of the total imports of British cotton goods into India consist of coloured and printed goods which are not manufactured in that country; and whether, in the case of the goods referred to, the Government of India would be permitted to impose such duties as were necessary for Revenue purposes?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (MR. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): On the average of the last three years about 21 per cent. of the cotton goods imported into India consist of coloured or printed goods. The Tariff Act has been passed, and there is at present no proposal on the subject of Indian Import Duties before Her Majesty's Government.

R. WHITELEY : Are we to understand the 21 per cent. are all British goods ?

R. H. H. FOWLER : I should not like to say that.

R. D. MACFARLANE : Is it the intention of Her Majesty's Government to allow the Government of India a free hand in dealing with these imported goods ?

R. H. H. FOWLER : I do not quite understand the hon. Member's question.

Tariff Bill has passed into law, and there is no proposal before the Government with reference to the imposition of Import Duties.

R. D. MACFARLANE : I understood the objection was, that native goods were to be protected at the expense of British goods. I take it that that will be the case.

IRISH POST OFFICE CLOTHING CONTRACTS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) : I wish to ask the Postmaster General whether he can now state whether it would be possible to have a condition inserted in the contract for the supply of clothing to the Irish Postal Service that, assuming price and quality to be equal, the material shall be of Irish manufacture ?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.) : A new contract for finished garments is about to be made for one year on the terms of the old contract, and it will contain no stipulation as to the place where the contractors are to obtain the materials. It is proposed next year to separate the contracts for materials and for making ; and then it will be open to British manufacturers to tender for the supply of cloth.

THE REV. JOHN HERKLESS.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE (Ipswich) : I wish to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether the Rev. John Herkless, who has been appointed to the Chair of Ecclesiastical History in the University of St. Andrews, has taken a degree at any university, or whether he has otherwise acquired distinction in literature, divinity, or general scholarship as a qualification for a Professorial Chair ? Since I placed this question on the Paper I have discovered that I have been misinformed as to the facts ; but, as the question appears, I think it only right to put it.

SIR G. TREVELYAN : Mr. Herkless, to use the words of the Very Reverend the Principal of the University of Glasgow, was one of the most distinguished students of his time at that University. Dr. Caird writes—

“ Seldom, if ever, has it fallen to any student as in his case, to be equally eminent in the Faculties of Arts, of Theology, and of Medicine. He is, as this University record indicates, a man of wide and varied knowledge ; and any productions from his pen which I have seen show him to be possessed of no little literary faculty.”

His book on Cardinal Beaton, according to the Reverend Herbert Storey, Professor of Church History in the University of Glasgow, is marked by “ great historical accuracy, critical acuteness, and freshness of presentment.”

The Reverend Alexander Mitchell, the predecessor of Mr. Herkless in the Chair of St. Andrews, writes—

“ I have always heard from my friends in Glasgow University that Mr. John Herkless was one of the very foremost students of his time, and carried off an amount of University honours in Philosophy, Science, and Theology such as falls to the lot of few. In the Class of Biblical Criticism he especially distinguished himself, and since leaving Glasgow University he has had ample opportunities of prosecuting that and other favourite studies, first by residence at the German Universities, and latterly in his quiet country manse.”

I do not think that the House would expect me to read a long list of testimonials from men admirably capable of judging, of which these are a specimen. When at Glasgow Mr. Herkless obtained by way of University honours :—The Cleland Gold Medal in Theology, the Rae Wilson Gold Medal in Theology, the University Medal in Mental Philosophy, the John Hunter Medal in Science, the Henderson Prize in Theology (equal), the Marshall Bursary in Divinity, the Smith Prize, given to the best student of the year in the Glasgow Presbytery, and in class work he won seven highest prizes in Divinity, four highest prizes and one second prize in Church History, four highest prizes in Biblical Criticism, three prizes in Moral Philosophy, and others which I need not recapitulate. I do not very well see how Mr. Herkless could have had a more distinguished University career. I have written to ask him what his degree is. He is not, I think, a Doctor of Divinity.

THE DEFENCES OF COLOMBO.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has had his attention drawn to the opinions of Royal Engineer officers and other experts, in condemnation of the sites upon which the two batteries already constructed for the defence of the harbour of Colombo (Ceylon) have been located; whether, in view of that condemnation, the War Department will delay the further construction of similar works until such time as the new harbour extensions resolved upon have been so far proceeded with as to enable a correct judgment to be formed as to the best positions in which such new batteries should be placed to ensure the defence of the harbour; and whether the War Department will send out qualified officers, independently of the present staff at Colombo, to consider the whole subject of these defences, and to report upon the alleged unsatisfactory position of the sites already occupied and of those proposed?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No Reports condemnatory of the sites on which batteries have been erected at Colombo have been brought to my notice. The sites are the best available, taking into account the other necessities of the Colonial Government in the locality, and they are sufficient for the defence of the harbour. The harbour extensions may, perhaps, involve some readjustment, but I see no present occasion for any special inquiry.

ROYAL NAVAL ENGINEERING EXAMINATIONS.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether, as Manchester is now a seaport, he would cause examinations of the Royal Naval Engineering College to be held there, as is done in certain other ports in the United Kingdom, and in view of the very suitable material to be found amongst the population of the district, of which Manchester is the centre, for adding to the engineering strength of the Navy?

*THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (MR. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): I am happy to inform my hon. Friend that the proposal has been made by the Civil Service Commissioners that Manchester and Birmingham should be made centres for the examination of candidates for entry into the Training School for Engineer Students at Keyham.

CEYLON RIFLE RANGE.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is acquainted with the fact of the insufficient length of the present rifle range at Mount Lavinia, Ceylon, and that, as a consequence, the men of the Royal Warwickshire Regiment, although supplied with the Lee-Metford rifle, have to be practised in rifle-firing with the obsolete Martini-Henry rifle; and whether instructions have been sent out to push forward the establishment of adequate ranges at Bandarawella and elsewhere in Ceylon?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The facts are as stated in the first paragraph of the question. We are in correspondence with the Government of Ceylon as to the establishment of proper ranges for the Lee-Metford Rifle.

"PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES" IN MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) beg to ask the Secretary to the Library when the Index of The Parliamentary Debates for Session will be ready?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LIBRARY (SIR J. T. HIBBERT): The contractor assures me that they are being spared to finish the referred to, but he cannot precisely when it will be ready. My hon. Friend will appreciate the exceptional character of the work, the length of last Session almost double the usual volumes, and the fact that for the present Session proceeded with concurrently.

MR. BARTLEY: Is my hon. Friend aware that the Debates are really out an Index? Would the firm have made up the time?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: A month since the Secretary may remind my hon. Friend that the number of volumes has gone we must make some allowance for contractor under the circumstances.

BOURS OF REFUGE ON THE EAST COAST OF YORKSHIRE.

M. HOLDEN (York, E.R., Bucks.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received notice of a Resolution, passed by the County Council of East Yorkshire, regarding the disastrous storm which struck the coast on the 18th, 19th, and 20th of November last, and urging the expediency of the construction on the East Coast of Yorkshire of a harbour of refuge; and whether he is prepared to take any steps in response to this petition?

M. MUNDELLA : Yes, Sir; I have received the Resolution referred to, and have replied to the County Council that the Board of Trade cannot encourage the idea that the Government will construct Bours of refuge at the public expense, an idea which has been repeatedly discredited by successive Governments.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES.

M. RICHARDSON (Durham, S.E.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can now fix the date on which he will bring in a Bill to amend the law with regard to railway rates and charges?

M. MUNDELLA : I hope to introduce this Bill very shortly, but I cannot say the day at present.

M. J. WHITEHEAD (Leicester) : Will the right hon. Gentleman give an approximate time?

M. MUNDELLA : I cannot say more than that I hope it will be very soon.

LICENCE FEES.

M. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can state by what authority, whether statutory or otherwise, fees are levied by the Home Office on various licences and instruments; whether the same fee of £7 13s. 6d. is charged for a licence to grant a footway, for a licence to establish a street, for a grant of Quarter Sessions, for a suffragan bishop or prebendary; whether he can state on what principle this exact sum is fixed in such similar cases?

L. XXII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.) : Various non-statutory fees are taken at the Home Office in pursuance of very ancient usage. Such fees are all paid into the Exchequer. The sum of £7 13s. 6d. has been charged in regard to all the cases mentioned, all of which were carried out by Letters Patent. The principle would appear to be that the same fee is charged in respect of all such Letters Patent, irrespective of the purpose for which they were required. Such charges were sanctioned by the Treasury in 1881. As regards a footway, no application for Letters Patent appear to have been received since 1874.

ALDERSHOT POLICE STATION.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Hampshire County Council sent plans for additional cells to the police station at Aldershot and for a new police station at Farnborough some six months ago to the Home Office for approval, and that the County Council has not yet received any answer to that application; whether he is aware that additional accommodation is greatly required in the above-named places; and whether he will use his influence to prevent any further delay?

MR. ASQUITH : In the event of a Local Authority desiring to raise a loan to defray the cost of the erection or improvement of a police station it is necessary to obtain the approval not only of the Secretary of State, but also that of the Local Government Board. The plans in question having been received from the Hampshire County Council in August, 1893, by the Secretary of State for the Home Department were, after consideration by the Surveyor General of Prisons, forwarded to the Local Government Board, and the final approval of the suggested alterations has been deferred pending the usual inquiry by the Local Government Board, and such inquiry has been delayed owing to the omission of the clerk of the county to supply the Local Government Board with the information asked for in repeated communications from that Department.

RELIGIOUS IMPARTIALITY IN INDIA.

SIR W. WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to a notification, dated 9th December, 1892, in The Sindh Official Gazette, under which an educational qualification, including a knowledge of English, is required from Hindu candidates for Government Service, while a lower qualification, not including a knowledge of English, is required from Mahomedan candidates; whether such difference of treatment, depending on difference of creed, is in accordance with the requirement of the Queen's Proclamation of 1858; and whether he will disallow this notification as being inconsistent with such requirement?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: My attention has been called to the notification to which my hon. Friend refers. I am not prepared upon such information as I have received to express any opinion as to this particular case, but I will bring it under the notice of the Government of India.

*SIR W. WEDDERBURN: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiry from the Government of India as to whether similar notifications have been issued in other parts of India infringing religious impartiality?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I am not prepared to order an inquiry. I think, if such a notification is carried out, it would be unfair, as it would seem to bear the complexion of religious partiality in favour of one portion of Her Majesty's subjects.

TEXT BOOKS IN INDIAN SCHOOLS.

SIR W. WEDDERBURN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether it is the case that a large portion of the text books, both English and Vernacular, prescribed for use in the Government and aided schools in the North-West Provinces, have been compiled, as a private enterprise, by Mr. Nesfield, the Director of Public Instruction for the North-West Provinces; and whether such arrangement operates to create a monopoly, and to exclude other text books from those schools?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I have no information on the subject of my hon. Friend's question. The matter is one for the Local Government to consider, and would seem to be a proper subject for question in the Local Legislative Council.

DISTRICT COUNCILS.

COLONEL GUNTER (York, W.R. Barkstone Ash): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, in a case where a man is elected by co-optation a member of a Board of Guardians, does he also become by such election a member of the District Council?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: The question as I understand refers to persons who are elected by Guardians from outside their own body under the provisions of section 20 (7) of the Local Government Act of last Session. Persons who are so elected by the Guardians do not thereby become members of either the Urban or Rural District Council.

THE VOLUNTEER DECORATION.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that a Volunteer decoration is to be given to all Volunteer non-commissioned officers and privates, as it has already been given to all Volunteer officers, of 20 years' service and upwards, he will consider the possibility of making some adjustment of the Regulations to qualify those officers for a decoration who, although they have served for more than 20 years, are eligible for neither decoration, owing to the fact that part of their service has been in the commissioned and part in the non-commissioned ranks?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is not advisable to alter the conditions laid down by Warrant for the officers' decoration, but the new decoration will be open to any officer whose total service as a Volunteer entitles him to it, but who has not received the officers' decoration.

SIR C. FREEMANTLE'S COMMITTEE.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of Sir C. Freemantle's Committee on the conditions of service and remuneration of office-keepers, managers, &c., in the Public Departments, with the Treasury Minute thereon of the 19th of February, 1894?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The Report was that of a Departmental Committee,

, as such, a confidential document, and before I should not feel justified in bringing it upon the Table, but I will at once lay the Treasury Minute of the 11th of February, 1894, referred to.

EDINBURGH CASTLE ROCK.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what arrangement has been come to between Treasury and the Town Council of Edinburgh to repay to the City of Edinburgh the £2,000 paid last year to the Treasury by the North British Railway Company in compensation for loss of the Castle rock taken for the improvement of the Company's lines?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am informed that the Corporation of Edinburgh have received a sum of £2,000 for their interest in the lands in question held by them from the Crown, and I do not understand what supposed arrangement is referred to, there being nothing left to arrange so far as the Woods and Forests are concerned. The compensation received by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests for the Town's interest was carried to the capital account of the Land Revenue.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: Is it not the case that the Council of the City of Edinburgh have applied for repayment of the sum?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Yes; but they have no claim to it.

EDINBURGH COMMISSARY OFFICE.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he has yet been able to examine the case of the staff of the Commissary Office, Edinburgh, as he undertook to do during the discussion on the Estimates last year; and, if so, whether he can state to the House the conclusion he has arrived at?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: In accordance with the promise I gave the hon. Member, I have again considered the position of the staff of the Commissary Office in Edinburgh, and referred it for their consideration to the Treasury; their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the question of placing these clerks upon the establishment of the Civil Service cannot be regarded by itself, as their case is practically the same as that of the numerous body of employés who constitute the staff of the offices of Government Solicitors and of other legal or quasi-legal Departments. I may add that the views of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury were fully communicated by me to the Head of the Commissary Office in December last; but that, on receipt of his reply, I did not feel that it would serve any useful purpose to again re-open the question with the Treasury.

THE BURIAL ACTS.

MR. G. ALLSOPP (Worcester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any Memorials have been received at the Home Office with reference to an amendment of the Burial Acts similar to the Memorial forwarded by the Corporation of Worcester; and, if so, to mention the towns that have forwarded such Memorials?

MR. ASQUITH: About 34 Burial Boards, out of probably 1,100 or 1,200, have presented Memorials on the subject referred to. A list of them would exceed the ordinary limits of an answer, but I have given directions that a list shall be sent to the hon. Member.

INSTRUCTION FOR DOCKYARD APPRENTICES.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that apprentices in the shipwrights' and fitters' trades in Sheerness Dockyard receive 11 hours' instruction per week, while in 10 other trades only four hours is given; and whether he can see his way to return to the old system—namely, all apprentices to attend the same school and receive the same instruction?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The attendance at the dockyard schools, as quoted by the hon. Member, is in accordance with existing Regulations. The whole subject of the future management of these schools is now being inquired into by a Committee recently appointed by the Admiralty.

MILITARY VERSUS CIVILIAN LABOUR.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been directed to the fact that soldiers are being employed by a contractor at daily wages unloading coals at Spike Island, County Cork, thus depriving the Queenstown coalporters of work ; and whether, in the interest of free labour, he will take immediate steps to put a stop to this practice ?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I have caused inquiries to be addressed to the General Officer commanding in Cork, but have not yet received a definite reply. Meanwhile, any help the soldiers were giving has ceased.

DELAGOA BAY RAILWAY.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when the arbitration award on the Delagoa Bay Railway is likely to be promulgated ; and, if not yet made, what is the cause of the delay ; and whether the dispute was submitted to the three jurists at Berne, Switzerland, in August, 1891 ?

*SIR E. GREY : It is impossible to say when the award will be given. The Rules of Procedure were not finally fixed till February, 1892, and the British case was communicated to the Portuguese Government by the Tribunal of Arbitration in April, 1892. Several extensions of time have since been granted for the delivery of the counter case, the rejoinder and the reply, at the request of each of the parties respectively, and this has been the cause of the delay hitherto. The term fixed for the delivery of the Portuguese reply is now the 27th of next July.

LISMORE AGRARIAN TROUBLES.

MR. W. KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to speeches made at Lismore, County Waterford, by, amongst others, an hon. Member of this House, on the 18th February last, at a meeting held for the purpose of denouncing a person resident in the locality who had taken a farm from which a tenant had been evicted 12 years previously ; whether the police refused to allow the meeting to be held beside or on the farm in question, but allowed it to take place at a distance of one mile off ; if the police have orders to permit such meetings provided they are not held in the immediate vicinity of the evicted farms ; whether he has been advised that the meeting was an illegal assembly, and that the language made use of by the speakers was sufficient to maintain a criminal prosecution ; and if he will state why such a meeting is permitted, and no step taken to prevent the use of such denunciations ?

Captain Donelan

MR. J. MORLEY : My attention was drawn to the speeches made at the meeting referred to, and the statement in the second paragraph of the question is accurate. As to the third paragraph, the police have no general instructions in the matter ; each case is dealt with, as it arises, on its merits. I have not been advised that the meeting was an illegal assembly ; and as regards the speeches made, I was advised they were not of a sufficiently violent character to sustain a criminal prosecution for conspiracy or otherwise.

PUBLICANS AND MILITARY PENSIONERS.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will direct the police of the A Division to prevent the publicans in Great Peter Street and district, notably the proprietors of the "Star and Garter" and "Elephant and Castle," from selling liquor to drunken pensioners and reservists, and so prevent the scenes that regularly take place, and which on Monday and Tuesday of this week were particularly conspicuous ?

MR. JEFFREYS : Before the question is answered, I wish to ask Mr. Speaker whether it is in Order to insert in the question the words "drunken pensioners and reservists," which, I submit, implies an unfounded charge against a body of honourable and respectable men ?

*MR. SPEAKER : Under the Rules of the House the hon. Member who put down the question is responsible for the statement as to the condition of those persons at that time.

MR. ASQUITH : I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that in the immediate neighbourhood to which my hon. Friend refers there are five registered common lodging-houses, which accommodate about 1,200 men. Immediately opposite the "Star and Garter" and "Elephant" public-houses there is a registered lodging-house with accommodation for 400 men, many of whom reservists and pensioners from the Army. At pension time (which occurred on Monday last) these men spend their money very freely in drink, and frequent quarrels take place. The attention of the police is at all times drawn to the locality, especially on pension days, but no serious disturbances have been noticed, and the people generally disperse when called on to do so. The Inspector who passed through Great Peter Street on Monday and Tuesday last, and the other officers engaged there, state that, although several persons were seen who were more or less drunk in the streets, they did not notice any irregularity in the public-houses, or it would have been at once reported. Publicans have been summoned from time to time for permitting drunkenness on their licensed premises, one so recently as the 3rd instant, when a fine of 40s. and costs were inflicted. The police are at times called by the landlords to eject drunken people, but they were not appealed to on Monday or Tuesday, and what quarrels there were occurred in the streets.

MR. BARTLEY: Has the attention of the Secretary of State for War been drawn to the fact that pensioners are paid in comparatively large sums; and would it not be much better to pay them in smaller sums at shorter intervals?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: If the hon. Member will put that question down on the Paper I will endeavour to answer it.

CANADIAN ELECTION DISPUTES.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government have received telegraphic information from Newfoundland to the effect that the Election Judges, having disqualified a portion of the Government majority on principles which are thought likely to apply to a large number of seats, including those held by the Government themselves, the supporters of the Government have petitioned the Governor to dissolve the Legislature elected last November; at the elections which the large number of Petitions against Government Members apply, while, on the other hand, the Opposition have offered to form a Government; and whether there is any objection to at once lay upon the Table, for the information of the House, the Papers which have been transmitted to the Colonial Office by cable telegraph?

MR. S. BUXTON: The Governor has reported by telegraph that a Deputation of the supporters of the Government in the Assembly introduced by the Prime Minister had petitioned him to dissolve. Last night a further telegram was received stating that the Governor had received a strong protest from the Opposition Members against this course. The Governor is in communication with his responsible advisers, and no further statement can be made at present on the subject.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE IRISH LAND ACTS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is now in a position to say when the Motion for the appointment of the Select Committee on the Irish Land Acts will be made?

MR. J. MORLEY: I very much regret to say, in answer to the hon. Member, that I am still not in a position to say when this appointment will be effectively made. I have, as the hon. Member is aware, done my best to meet the objections taken to the form of Reference by hon. Members opposite, and I have altered it to that end. I understand that the alterations do not meet all the objections that are taken, I believe, as to the Committee making land purchase the first head of Reference. My own view is that the inquiry would probably extend through the whole of the present Session. The Committee, therefore, would have to be re-appointed, if the House thought fit, next Session, and that would be the time at which it would be perfectly open to gentlemen who object to this Order of Reference to state their objections. But I am not prepared, in face of the large interest that I know is taken by all classes and by all parties in Ireland in the whole length and breadth of the Reference, to alter it further. I do not feel I would be doing my duty if I altered the form of it.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: May I ask whether, in view of the opposition to the Reference as it stands, the right hon. Gentleman will take an opportunity of allowing the House to discuss it, and come to a judgment on the matter, as every day lost is of the utmost importance?

MR. J. MORLEY: I quite agree with the hon. Member that every day lost is a loss of great importance, but I cannot at the present moment—considering the time now at our disposal, and the very heavy charges upon that time—I cannot at the moment think of allowing a day for its discussion.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University): Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman does he think it would be possible to report even within the time of three or four Sessions on this matter, and whether he would not take the first portion first as being the most urgent?

MR. J. MORLEY: We shall take the first portion first as a matter of course, but I do not agree with the hon. Member that it would take the time of three or four Sessions to cover the whole inquiry. I may say that no doubt if the hon. and learned Gentleman were there and exerted his ingenuity that it would take some little time. But I assume that the Select Committee will follow the ordinary practical habits of Committees of this House, and I do not think in that case it will take so long.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would consider the propriety of restricting the Reference in this year to the first part of the Reference which is on the Paper? That is a portion which, I think, would meet with universal approval. Then next year we could consider the question of an augmented Reference, as he himself admits that the augmented Reference cannot be dealt with this year.

MR. J. MORLEY: We do not know what accidents may occur, and I think the right hon. Gentleman himself will admit that it would be very rash for any Government to narrow the scope of an inquiry which they deem of the highest importance, and which the people of Ireland, of both Parties, generally desire to have instituted in as wide a form as possible.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that the Representatives of the great majority of the people of Ireland think that there are questions connected with the purchase of land quite as urgent as any connected with rent, and whether he would receive a suggestion that it would be well to go forward with what he considers urgent, and not waste time in endeavouring to conciliate an irreconcilable opposition?

Mr. T. W. Russell

MR. J. MORLEY: No doubt in a very important part of Ireland the purchase part of the question is quite as important as any other.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON (Armagh, Mid): Might I ask whether the inquiry would not be expedited if the portion relating to the Landed Estates Court were postponed, as that raises the question of incumbrances?

MR. J. MORLEY: I think we are rather conducting a discussion upon this subject. In answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman, I will say this—that the Committee, as a practical body, would deal with the land purchase before they proceeded to the question of incumbrances.

LUNATICS IN IRELAND.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has yet decided to issue a small Commission of experts to inquire into the circumstances and causes of the great increase in the number of lunatics in Ireland?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums have not so far satisfied themselves or me that a new Commission of Inquiry is necessary, but I am giving the matter further and special consideration, and meanwhile, as the hon. Baronet is doubtless aware, I have laid on the Table of the House within the last few days a special Report which I had called for from the Inspectors on the subject of the alleged increasing prevalence of insanity in Ireland.

GERMAN EXPORT TRADE.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the report of the foreign trade of Germany given in the last issue of The Statist and to the increase it shows in German exports in 1893, compared with 1892, in every line but one, and to a total amount of £8,525,000, even iron showing an increase of 12 per cent.; and if, having regard to the decline in British exports by £8,500,000 in the same periods, and by £45,000,000 between 1890 and 1893,

Her Majesty's Government propose to take any steps to relieve the depression in the trade?

MR. MUNDELLA: The full particulars of German exports for 1892 and 1893 will be found in The Board of Trade Journal for March, and they show an increase in 1893 over 1892 of about £1,500,000. 1892 was the lowest year for German exports since 1885, whereas British exports in that year were £4,000,000 in excess of 1885. British exports in 1890 were £50,000,000 in excess of 1885, whereas German exports have not risen in any year to anything like the same extent as our own. It is impossible, therefore, to make comparisons of the rise or fall of a single year. There can be no doubt that German trade proceeded to some extent by the dispute in the coal trade last year, and the Government are anxious, as far as possible, to prevent such disputes, but they have no intention of changing the commercial policy of the country.

THE BEHRING SEA AWARD BILL.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether the terms of the Behring Sea Award Bill have received the specific approval of the Government of the Canadian Dominion; and whether the Bill is identical, so far as can be, with the Bill on the same subject now before the Legislature of the United States?

MR. S. BUXTON (who replied) said: (1) The Dominion Government are in general agreement with Her Majesty's Government as to the terms of the Bill, but have raised objections in regard to one or two points of detail, which will receive due consideration. (2) The American Bill differs in form from the Bill before this House, but it is understood to be substantially in accordance with the Bill which stands for Second Reading to-day.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: Will those points with which the Canadian Government disagree be considered before the House finally decides on the shape of the Bill?

MR. S. BUXTON: I understand the points to which I have referred will arrive by mail either to-day or to-morrow, and they will therefore be in time for the Committee stage of the measure on Monday.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Was the agreement of the Canadian Government to this Bill given unconditionally, or as in the modus vivendi conditionally on compensation being given to the Canadian sealers?

MR. S. BUXTON: The Canadian Government are in general agreement with Her Majesty's Government as to the terms of the Bill, and I do not understand that they attach any conditions.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: They have not asked for compensation?

MR. S. BUXTON: Please give notice.

LABOUR IN GERMAN CONVICT PRISONS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to an article in The Hardwareman of the 3rd March last, purporting to be the description by a Special Commissioner (who had been sent to Germany for the purpose) of the concessionaire system now obtaining in some 20 or more of the German convict prisons; whether he is aware that, under this system, English goods and English patterns are pirated and copied by the German Prison Authorities, and turned out in tons by the convicts at a labour cost of 3d. to 1s. per day; that this convict labour is let out to a concessionaire or gaol manufacturer, who has only to supply the necessary plant and raw material, and who exports to England, as British-made goods, the articles made by the prisoners from pirated English designs; and that the higher class German dealers refuse to touch these prison-made goods, while the inferior tradesman who deals with them tries to conceal their origin; whether the above facts are generally known to the British public; and, if not, whether he will take steps to warn the public against them in The Labour Gazette, or otherwise; and also make representations to the German Government on the subject; and whether he can explain why it is that the Merchandise Marks Act is powerless to stop such fraudulent misrepresentation?

MR. MUNDELLA: Probably the hon. Member has not seen my reply to a similar question put by the hon. and gallant Member for Central Sheffield. I am making inquiry as to the alleged importation of these goods. The provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act are sufficient to prevent goods coming into this country with false trade descriptions attached.

THE EVICTIONS IN ARRAN ISLANDS.

MR. SEXTON : I wish to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the evictions now proceeding on the Arran Islands, and to ask him whether he is aware that the Islands are eight miles from the nearest land, and 40 miles from the nearest Courthouse ; and whether owing to the failure of the fishing the people on these Islands have been left so destitute that appeals to public charity have been made on their behalf ? In the second place, I wish to ask whether, owing to the evictions, a number of people, including aged persons and children, have been left without shelter, as well as without food, and what steps the Government have taken, or what steps they intend to take, to ensure the safety of the lives of the destitute people ?

MR. J. MORLEY : In answer to my hon. Friend, it is true, as he has already stated, that these Islands are some distance off, and that communication with them is not easy. My information is this—that yesterday six evictions were carried out, and that in three of the cases the people were re-admitted as caretakers. To-day two tenants settled with the agent, and eight evictions were carried out. Two of the eight persons were re-instated as caretakers. I have no information, as yet, as to the condition of the people yesterday and to-day ; but I am perfectly sure that if the story which my hon. Friend states were true, and that any such persons had been evicted and cast out on the bleak hillside, the officers on the spot would have informed me of that fact. As to the condition of the poor people, I was informed some fortnight ago that they were likely to suffer extreme distress, independent of the evictions. We at once despatched an Inspector of the Local Government Board to make inquiries. He did so, and reported that the people were weather bound. He made exhaustive inquiry into the case of the South Island, which is the worst and poorest of the three, and his Report was that in his opinion the relieving officer had means at his disposal for dealing with any cases of emergency that might arise. This Inspector is to-day in Galway, and he has been directed to pay close attention to the circumstances of the people of Arran, and if necessary, to go over there at once. Meantime, the relieving officer has been told (a fortnight ago) the exact steps he is to take in case any circumstances of emergency arise.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question with reference to the business down on the Paper for Monday. I may remind the Government of the pledge given before Easter to put down the Navy Building Vote for Monday, and I presume that the idea of the Government is that the general discussion which has been promised shall be taken on the Vote. I wish now to call the attention of the Government to a decision given by the Chairman which greatly restricted the scope of that discussion, and to ask, whether they have in contemplation any method by which that Debate shall at least have the extension promised by the Government, and which I am sure the Government intend to allow ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I was not aware of any recent decision which would narrow the discussion. On the contrary, I understood that there was a general consent in all parts of the House that for convenience of business the discussion should be extended beyond the ordinary scope of the Vote. This has always been done in special cases and in special circumstances under the authority of the Chair.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : Perhaps the Chief Secretary can say whether in the event, which seems to be probable, of the Debate on the Scottish Standing Committee not concluding this night—["Oh, oh !"]—I will go further and say that it is absolutely impossible—will the Government make any change in the arrangements for Monday, or will the Navy Estimates still be taken on Monday ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I regret that, owing to the absence of the Leader of the House from circumstances of domestic affliction, I cannot answer the question

Mr. Mundella

, but I cannot hold out any here will be an alteration in ment for Monday, whatever fortunes of the Debate this

SOUTH AFRICAN MAILS.

NYBEARE: I beg to ask Master General if it is the case Union mail steamer Athenian Plymouth at 4 o'clock on st, and that none of the letters red in the City till the next although they were delivered steru District the same day? ght hon. Gentleman explain f the delay?

MORLEY: The Athenian Plymouth Sound at 4.20 a.m. d instant, and her mails, for of which an hour to an hour would be required, were by the first train from at 8.45 a.m. The corre- for the Western District was the delivery commencing at and that for the Eastern istrict by the delivery com- 5.5 p.m.

MOTION.

OF THE HOUSE (EXEMPTION THE STANDING ORDER).

nade, and Question proposed, proceedings on the Motion for the t of a Standing Committee on , if under discussion at Twelve ight, be not interrupted under the ler Sitings of the House."—(Mr.

put.

ouse divided :—Ayes 203 ;
—(Division List, No. 15.)

ERS OF THE DAY.

SEA AWARD BILL.—(No. 123.)

SECOND READING.

Second Reading read.

TORNEY GENERAL (Sir L, Hackney, S.) rose to move

Reading of this Bill. He ve now to ask the House to Second Reading of what is led the Behring Sea Award

Bill, although that perhaps scarcely describes it, because the use of the Bill extends far beyond that. It might more properly be described as a Bill for carrying into effect the award of the Tribunal of Arbitration constituted under the Treaty between Her Majesty and the United States. Mr. Speaker, from indications made to me by hon. Members sitting in different parts of the House, I gather it is expected that I should—although I do not think it necessary to do so at any great length—recall to the attention of the House the circumstances which led to the Treaty upon which this Bill is founded, to the character of that Treaty, to the Award based upon it, and finally to the provisions in the Bill now submitted to give effect to that Award. In August, 1886, several seizures of vessels engaged in fur sealing were effected in the Behring Sea by cruisers of the United States, the vessels so seized belonging principally to British subjects, being Canadians. On the facts coming to the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government of the day, the late Lord Iddesleigh, who was then at the Foreign Office, addressed, on the 30th of October, 1886, an important Despatch to the then Representative of the Queen at Washington, in which he called attention to the fact that three schooners had been seized in that part of the North Pacific Ocean called the Behring Sea, and that the crews of two of these vessels had been detained. At that time, as it appeared when the full facts became known to the Foreign Office, one of the vessels had already been brought before a Court of the United States, and the Judge of that Court had condemned that vessel on the ground that she was pursuing the industry of pelagic sealing within the territorial limits of the United States, those territorial limits being claimed under the terms of the concession from Russia to the United States in 1867, which included Alaska and the islands in Behring Sea. The learned Judge who tried the case decided that the ship was properly seized and properly condemned on the ground that she was violating the municipal legislation of the United States, and was so violating that municipal legislation within the United States territory. Lord Iddesleigh then proceeded to complain that in these circumstances the authorities of the United States had interfered with the lawful occupation of Canadian citizens on the high seas, and had taken possession of their ships, subjected their property to forfeiture, and visited upon their persons the indignity of imprisonment. That was the position assumed as early as October, 1886, by Lord Iddesleigh, and which has never since been departed from by those who represent the Government of the Queen. Following upon this expostulation of Lord Iddesleigh the vessels that had been seized were released and the proceedings stayed by the order of the then Secretary of State at Washington, Mr. Baird; accordingly, the vessels were released. At a later period further seizures followed. By March, 1889, there had been a change of Government in the United States, and the late Mr. Blaine had succeeded Mr. Baird in the position of Secretary of State, and there had followed a long diplomatic discussion between the Representatives of the Queen and the Secretary of State, the correspondence from Great Britain being conducted by Lord Salisbury, who had by that time succeeded to the Office of Foreign Secretary. On the part of the United States, in that correspondence it was sought to justify the action of their authorities in these seizures on the ground that the United States possessed territorial dominion in the Behring Sea under the cession of 1867 from Russia, and on the ground that their legislation applied to foreigners in the area where the seizures were effected, and finally, at a later development of the controversy, on the ground that the United States had property in the fur seal and in the industry founded on its pursuit, and in effect that their law was in the nature of properly protected Regulations for the safeguard of their property and interests. This position was combated—and I need not say ably combated—by Lord Salisbury in his correspondence. He maintained the position originally taken up by Lord Iddesleigh, and he complained that the rights of sovereignty of Great Britain had been violated by these seizures—that there had been a violation of International Treaty and the law thereby affected, but professed his willingness to submit the question to a properly-constituted Court of Arbitration. The questions of alleged property and of alleged jurisdiction set up by the United States Lord Salisbury also professed his readiness to submit to arbitration, and also the further question if and what Regulations were necessary for the preservation of the seal fishery in the Behring Sea. The answer to the latter question was one which was not exclusively of interest to the United States—although as the owner of the islands, that country had a special interest with regard to it—but was of common interest. I do not think that any one can doubt the wisdom of the policy pursued by Lord Salisbury in advising that reference to arbitration. I think we must all agree that it would have been a deplorable thing if two great nations, sprung from the common stock, speaking the same language, living under systems of law largely alike, and having enormous interests in common bound up in the interests of peace, should have resorted to the rude arbitrament of force to settle the differences between them. Accordingly, on February 29, 1892, the Treaty from which this Bill took its origin was agreed to between the United States Government and the Government of the Queen, and that Treaty was ratified at a later date. It is necessary that I should call the attention of the House to some of the leading provisions of that Treaty. It recites that differences had arisen, and that both Governments were desirous of providing for an amicable settlement of those differences, concerning the jurisdiction and rights claimed by the United States in the waters of the Behring Sea, and also concerning the preservation of the fur seal fisheries in those waters and the rights of the subjects of either country as regards the taking of fur seals in and habitually resorting to those waters. The Court of Arbitration was thus constituted. Two arbitrators were to be named and were named by the President of the United States—namely, Mr. Justice Harlan, a distinguished Judge of the Supreme Court, and Mr. Senator Morgan, also a gentleman of high reputation; one was to be named and was named by the President of the French Republic, who nominated the Baron de Courcel, Senator and Ambassador of France; one was to be named and was named by the King of Italy, who named the Marquis Visconti Venosta, a distinguished Minister; and one was to be named and was named by

Sir C. Russell

ing of Sweden and Norway, who ated Mr. Gram, a statesman and a guished lawyer. The Representa-of Great Britain were, as the House s, that distinguished man who has passed away from amongst us,
Hannen, and Sir John Thompson, rime Minister of Canada. I hope House will allow me to say one in reference to Lord Hannen.

Britain owes a great debt to very distinguished man. I do not se to add one word to the eulogium him as a Judge which has been pronounced by more than one of brethren on the Bench. But in on to this arbitration I may perhaps mitted to say that in conjunction his distinguished colleague he ably with impressive dignity represented terests of Great Britain. He dis-ed the weighty obligations cast upon with unfailing zeal and with un-ng patience, and while he guarded terests of Great Britain he never e moment forgot the fact that he resent in a judicial character, and e was, as it were, still clothed with rmine of a Judge. The tribunal a Paris, and I think it right that I l publicly acknowledge the remark-courtesy and hospitality that were yed by the great Republic of France at occasion. We have to thank the lent of the French Republic in two ts—first, for naming as one of the ators on behalf of France a most plished and courteous gentleman, aron de Courcel, to whose judgtact, and courtesy the result arrived s largely due. As the House is , after a protracted hearing, the d of the majority of the arbitrators nally delivered on August 15, 1893.

was the effect of that Award?
state its effect in general language in few words. Two groups of ons were submitted to the arbi-s which were essentially different ir character and having different erations applicable to each of

One set of questions related to rial jurisdiction and the rights of ty, and of protection in regard to property, and the second set of ons related entirely to what were oper Regulations which should be ised to give effect to that which ne of the objects of the Treaty—namely, the preservation of the fur seal.

As regards the first group of questions—those which touched territorial sovereignty, jurisdiction and rights of property—the position taken up by Lord Iddesleigh and Lord Salisbury was thoroughly and completely vindicated, and each one of these questions was decided in favour of the views advanced by those who represented the interests of Great Britain before that Tribunal.
One result of the decision on this group of questions was that it stamped the seizures that had been effected as not justified by International Law, and therefore illegal and unjustifiable, thereby establishing the claim of British subjects injured to legitimate redress. I am glad to say, as one would expect from the Government of a great Power like the United States, that the President has not been slow to recognise these claims for redress, and when the legislation necessary to carry out this Award shall have been completed, it is arranged that a Convention shall be signed for the examination and adjustment of those claims with a view to the just redress of those concerned. I must now call the attention of the House a little more in detail to one part of the Award—namely, that relating to Regulations. I have already stated with sufficient fulness the effect of the Award as regards questions of territorial jurisdiction and of property.
But, after determining these questions, the Award proceeds to say that the determination of these questions has left the subject in such a position that the concurrence of Great Britain is necessary to the establishment of Regulations for the proper protection and preservation of fur seals in or resorting to the Behring Sea, and Articles 1 to 9 inclusive all lay down these Regulations. The first is that the Governments of the two Powers shall forbid their citizens and subjects to kill, capture, or pursue fur seals within a zone of 60 miles around the Pribyloff Islands, including the territorial waters. That is a permanent zone, and is unquestionably for the purpose of this Award an extension of the protected zone, as to which, apart from this Award, the Power in whose favour it is given would have no International rights. In the next Article the Award creates a close season from May 1 to July 31, that close season extending over the space included within the 35th degree of north latitude and eastward of the 180th degree of longitude from Greenwich till it strikes the water boundary described in Article 1 of the Treaty of 1867 between the United States and Russia, and following that line up to the Behring Straits. There are then some minor provisions as to the character of the vessels and their equipments, and it requires special licences and distinctive flags to be prescribed by each Government. These are broadly the provisions of the Award. I have to say further in this regard, that there is an addendum to the Award, which is to this effect—

“The Arbitrators declare, moreover, that, in their opinion, the carrying out of the Regulations determined upon by the Tribunal of Arbitration should be assured by a system of stipulations and measures to be enacted by the two Powers, and that the Tribunal must, in consequence, leave it to the two Powers to decide upon the means for giving effect to the Regulations determined upon by it.”

Mr. Speaker, we are here to present this Bill as an attempt to discharge the obligation, which every one in this House I am sure will recognise, to loyally and thoroughly give effect to the provisions of that Award. Had the Award been less favourable to us we should equally, having agreed to abide by the decision of the Tribunal, have been bound and equally have been ready to give loyal and complete effect to it. I have read the Award at sufficient length to render it unnecessary to state the provisions of the Bill in detail. Not only have the Government had the advantage of the assistance of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight before the Arbitration, but he has also been good enough to give his assistance in framing the outline of the provisions of the Bill to give effect to the Award. The provisions of the Bill are shortly these: The measure is practically upon the lines of the modus vivendi Act of 1893, but the area over which it extends is, as I have said, wider. It sets out the mandatory provisions of the Award, and it constitutes the violation of these provisions a legal offence punishable by seizure or fine, or in some cases by imprisonment. It is in its operation, I wish the House to understand, a Bill which applies only to British subjects. It does not affect to bind, nor could it properly bind,

Sir C. Russell

American subjects any more than a Bill of the United States could properly affect to bind British subjects. But power is taken under it to authorise the officers of the American Navy to seize British ships under conditions conformable to the provisions of the Award, providing reciprocal power is given by the United States to British naval officers in regard to American ships. I may inform the House that the Senate of the United States have already passed their Bill for giving effect to the Award, and in that Bill similar powers are taken in order to give reciprocal advantages. I have had an opportunity of seeing a somewhat detailed statement of the United States Bill, and I am able to say that, although in form it is somewhat different, it in no substantial respect that I am aware of differs from the Bill now submitted to the House. Further, the House will desire to know what are the Courts by which the seizure of American vessels or British vessels is to be dealt with. In each case it is by the Courts of the country to which the ship belongs. If a British cruiser seizes an American vessel it will be our duty to hand over that vessel to the American authorities to be dealt with in the American Courts. If, on the other hand, a United States cruiser seizes British vessels they will be under a corresponding obligation to hand them over to the British Authorities to be dealt with in British Courts. I hope the provisions are ample to give loyal and thorough effect to the Award. It would be a thing greatly to be regretted if one single utterance by any Member of the House should for a moment lead to the possibility of the suggestion that we were not all most anxious with despatch and with thoroughness to discharge the obligations which undoubtedly internationally rest upon us to abide by the Award which has been made, and to give loyal effect to it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(The Attorney General.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I rise not for the purpose of contributing to the Debate more than to say that the course which the Government have pursued seems to me to be a wise one. They have lost not one single moment in bringing in a Bill to carry out the obligations this country ; and in doing that piece of International justice they shall have the hearty support of all of us on this bench and of all our friends.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) said, that those of them who were present had listened with pleasure and satisfaction to the extremely candid and able speech made by the Attorney General ; but he did think that many Members would regret with him that that speech was not one of greater length. The Debate on the Second Reading of this Bill was an historic occasion in this House. It was the first time in history that certain rights and claims to the harvest of the sea were put to International agreement by means of arbitration. Although the remarks of the Attorney General had a great deal to do with, and did describe, the Behring Sea Arbitration, he (Sir G. Baden-Powell) ventured very humbly to submit that the speech the hon. and learned Gentleman delivered did not refer to the real principle and matter of the present Bill, which was altogether outside the main Award. It was a Bill connected with certain technicalities, but all reference to technicalities were conspicuous by their absence from the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech. He (Sir G. Baden-Powell) did not for one moment speak in any sense against, or stand in the way of, this Parliament, or this country loyally adhering to the carrying out of the decision come to by arbitration ; but they had now before the House a Bill which did not—although its title said it did—in any way legalise or authorise the main awards of that arbitration. He wished, in reference to the Bill and dealing with its principles, to criticise them in the light of certain knowledge he happened to possess and which he did not think any other Member of the House possessed or could possess. He was about to make certain statements, and he was confident that both the Attorney General and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Wight would agree with the truth of the statement he advanced and with the deductions to be made from that statement. But he regretted to say that in making that statement—which he would presently do—the House would see that this particular Bill was certainly not all that it should be. He did not wish that anyone should imagine that he was going against the decision of the arbitrators. Before he sat down he thought he should have shown that this Bill as it stood did not carry out the results of the arbitration. It was difficult for him in his position to avoid mentioning the theories and even the facts that had come to his knowledge officially, but at the same time he thought it was his duty, in the interest of a maritime industry connected with the Canadian Dominion, which he believed in the future as in the present would be of inestimable value to them in the Pacific, and to the seafaring populations on the western shores of Canada, to draw attention to certain faults in the Bill. First, in addition to the acknowledgment made by the Attorney General to the French nation, he would on behalf of himself and those with him cordially thank the United States for the great and liberal hospitality extended to them while they were there so many months. This hospitality took place not only at Washington, but up in the wilds of the Behring Sea, and was heartily appreciated by those who received it. This Bill, in dealing with principles, he must first of all point out—in addition to what the Attorney General had said—bore an incorrect title. The title "The Behring Sea Award Bill," as the Attorney General stated, was wrong in the matter of geographical area, because the particular portion of the award it dealt with was not confined to the Behring Sea. The matters referred to arbitration were five in number, and the award of the arbitrator was given on those five points. A Bill called "The Behring Sea Award Bill" necessarily should be a Bill dealing somehow or other with those awards, but this measure did not touch any one of them. And perhaps he might here say that no one appreciated more than he did the splendid work done by the Attorney General and his colleague, the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight, in Paris, where they had to fight America on those five points. The victory won there was no doubt due partly to the brilliant work these gentlemen did, but greatly to the correct and careful and elaborate manner in which the case was prepared. But, as he said, the Bill did not in any way refer to any one of the five points of the Award. The Award was given with regard to exclusive jurisdiction, and right of property in fur seals. The Bill did not touch one of these points of the Award. It merely sought to carry out a contingent decision of the arbitrators, who were requested in the terms of the Treaty under certain conditions to propose "Regulations for the proper protection and preservation of the fur seal." But a very cursory glance at the first Schedule of the Bill, in which was contained the principle of the measure—for the clauses were to enact that first Schedule—or a glance at any one of the clauses of the Bill, would show that the Bill was the very reverse of one for the proper protection and preservation of fur seals. The facts he should adduce in evidence would not be many. They were well-known both to the Attorney General and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Wight. In the first place, on the Preamble, he would call attention to the fact that it had been stated distinctly that the Regulations which followed were the Regulations approved by only four out of the seven arbitrators, and the three arbitrators who disagreed were gentlemen who had personal and national knowledge of the subject—that was to say, the gentlemen representing the United States and Canada. It would not be right, on his part, to go into detail in regard to the Articles of the Award; but he would briefly, on each of them, point out how it was that they would not result in a proper protection of the fur seal. The first Article spoke of a 60-mile zone around the Pribyloff Islands inclusive of the territorial waters; but every naval man knew that a zone at sea could only be effectually defined by lines of latitude and longitude. In Article 2—and here came the gravamen of his charge—they were told that the close season in which seals were not to be taken was to be from the 1st of May to the 31st of July. All the evidence that had been accumulated—and here he would remind hon. Gentlemen who took any interest in the financial affairs of the country that large sums of money were spent in collecting evidence on behalf of this country—proved conclusively that the only damage done and the only gratuitous destruction done at sea to fur seals was done at that period of the year when, owing to the necessities of the case—owing to the natural history of the case, so to speak—the greater portion of the seals taken at sea were females heavy with young. That—from all considerations of humanity as well as economy—they wished to protect the animals at all was a period at which they certainly ought to protect the fur seal. What did they find in the Regulations? They found, according to the statistics in the Blue Book, that the period at which the slaughter of females heavy with pups took place was early in the year, ceasing in the beginning of May, but they found under the Regulations that sealers were not only allowed but stimulated, encouraged, to take seals at that particular period—the only period when it was known that they did damage to the seal herd. He knew that this point—that of taking female seals in that condition—was a point which the sealers themselves—those excellent seamen who pursued the seal at sea—were anxious to avoid. It was recorded in the Blue Book that the sealers themselves, in considering a close time, urged that it should be earlier, covering this most destructive period. Yet they were insisting, right in the face of this evidence, that the close time should be such as to compel the men to go to sea and kill seals when they ought not to be killed. This was a matter which would attract the sympathy and attention of all those who, like himself, were supporters of the wholesale movement which had been so great during the present century against cruelty to animals. Article 3 was a useful Regulation in providing that only sailing vessels should be employed, but it did not cover other vessels—whalers, traders, and cod-fishers. The same remark applied to Article 4. As to Article 5, it had been proved over and over again that it was difficult to discriminate between the sexes of seals, and yet the Regulation required that the sex should be entered in the log book. Article 6 was a remarkable Regulation. It said shot guns might be used outside, but not inside, the Behring Sea, which was a ridiculous stipulation. If the use of shot guns was bad outside the Behring Sea, it was bad inside; and to say, therefore, that they might be used outside but not inside was to bring ridicule on the Regulation. As to Article 7, it was provided that the two Governments were to take measures to control the fitness of the men engaged in the fishery. He did not know what "to control the fitness" meant. The Regulation went on to say—

"These men shall have been proved fit to handle with sufficient skill the weapons by means of which this fishing may be carried on."

In other words, these men were not to be allowed to go into the water until they had learned to swim. They must be proved to be efficient in the management of boats and in the handling of weapons, results which could only come by actual experience. Article 8 was one which he hoped would receive the careful attention of all those who were interested in the rights of aboriginal races. Certain Indian races were to be left, within defined limits, to hunt the fur seals, but numerous other natives who had from time immemorial earned their livelihood by catching fur seals on the shores of Alaska were to be prevented from hunting in future. Article 9 was one for which he was not aware of any precedent. It said that these concurrent Regulations should remain in force until they had been modified by common agreement between the two Governments, so that neither Government could change or denounce the Regulations without the consent of the other. He knew of no precedent in any Treaty for such an arrangement. The concluding clause said that these Regulations should be submitted every five years for examination by the two Governments, but there was no provision to refer any dispute to arbitration. So that this first Schedule, as drawn, was distinctly and clearly unworkable, and would, he believed, prove destructive to the industry it sought to preserve. As he had said before, he did not wish to interfere with the decision of the Arbitrators, but he thought he had said enough to show there were great objections to these Regulations formulated in the Bill. So much for the acts of commission of the Government in the Bill. He would now, very briefly, deal with their acts of omission which still further militated against the particular value of these proposals. The first point he would urge was this: The Arbitrators had gone outside their instructions under the Treaty by interfering with the jurisdictional rights of the United States in territorial waters, and yet they omitted to recognise that no Regulations for the preservation of the fur seal could be effectual unless they covered all modes of slaughter, especially those on shore. There was no case in the world where the fur seal had been destroyed to an extent approaching to extermination except by slaughter on shore, and yet these Regulations did not refer to the necessity for any limits on shore. That he considered to be a grave act of omission if they had genuinely at heart the preservation of the fur seal. Then, there were two other grave omissions. There was no provision in the Act to control sealers of other nations or sealers of these nations flying other flags, and rendering entirely nugatory even the miserable provisions of the Bill. That, he was sure, was a matter which the Arbitrators would have taken up had it been pointed out to them. Then, there was no clause providing that the contracting parties should agree to co-operate in securing the adhesion of other Powers to the Regulations. The Solicitor General said that they could not do that in an Act of Parliament; but, at the same time, there were clauses in innumerable Acts of Parliament to the effect "that the Act is subject to the adhesion of other Powers." Another point of omission was this: He had asked that day whether the United States Bill was identical with the one now before the House, but the only answer he received was that the Attorney General had seen the United States proposals in a somewhat detailed form, and there were no substantial differences. He considered it was a grave omission that the present Bill did not contain a provision that it should take effect only on the passing by the United States of a measure identical in its terms with the present Bill. These were his objections to the Bill; but, as he had said, he did not wish to stand in the way of or do anything which would militate against the success of the Award. It might be said that the defects which he had pointed out were the fault of the wording of the Treaty, which made it impossible for the Arbitrators to lay down any other Regulations. This evil could have been easily obviated had proper steps been taken to bring the Arbitrators to see that their deliberations could not, under the clause, issue in proper Regulations for the protection of the seals. He asserted that occasions did arise before, during, and after the Arbitration, when negotiations might have been opened which would have obviated the difficulty in which they now found themselves. If they examined the Blue Books they would see that the Foreign Minister of the United States, as long ago as June 21, 1891, suggested that if the Arbitrators found the duty cast upon them of issuing Regulations, they should consult experts before issuing them; but that point was neglected, so far as he could make out, in all recent negotiations. If experts who were acquainted with seal life and the conditions of seal hunting had been consulted, a Code would have been devised which would have had the result of really protecting the fur seals. He hoped he had not troubled the House at too great length. He thought it necessary to stand up and explain what a somewhat close personal acquaintance and sympathy with the men who conducted the fisheries had resulted in in his mind. He was speaking not only of the desire of our Canadian fellow-countrymen, but of the men in the United States who controlled the fisheries in the Pribyloff Islands; and they, one and all, wished to see the fur seal race protected and the industry continued. He thought, when they passed a measure of this kind, that they ought to have Regulations which would practically effect that object. Before he sat down he wished to bring one other argument before the House, and it was one of great importance. This Bill differentiated between two portions of the North Pacific Ocean. The fur seal fed and bred in all portions of that ocean. They were legislating for half of that ocean and leaving out the other half—namely, the feeding and breeding places which belonged partly to Russia and partly to Japan. In any measure of this kind, the object of which was to secure an industry and an interesting tribe of natural history from extermination, this consideration ought to have been taken into account. Immediately on the cessation of the arbitration in Paris negotiations ought to have been not only opened but carried through to bring the other Powers into conference for the settlement of a Code of Regulations, which could have been perfectly easily devised, and which would once for all have secured the preservation of the industry. In some respects the Regulations that had been made were almost inhuman, and they were certainly defective and inadequate. He was told that a Bill similar to this was being adopted in the United States, and that the great Canadian Dominion had no objection in principle to this Behring Sea Bill. If he found that this were the case he would raise no objection to the passing of the Bill, but he intended as soon as it was passed to do his best in the interest of the sealing industry, and he might also say in the interest of the fur seal, so to modify and improve the Regulations that they would secure the real protection and preservation of the fur seal.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, that in many respects hon. Members were in an inadequate position to discuss this Bill. In the first place, they did not know what corresponding Bill the United States had introduced into their Legislature. The Attorney General (Sir C. Russell) had stated that the United States Bill broadly corresponded with ours, but of course the matter was one of highly technical and complicated detail. In the next place, hon. Members were entirely unaware of the view that Canada took in the matter. Canada was far more directly and immediately interested in it than any of the inhabitants of these islands. It was the hardships suffered by and the illegalities put upon the inhabitants of Canada that first led to the raising of the question, and he thought it unfortunate that the House should be called upon to read the second time a Bill affecting mainly and principally the inhabitants of Canada without knowing in the least, beyond what appeared from the general statement of the Under Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. S. Buxton) whether the Canadian people took the same view of the Bill as they took of the modus vivendi of 1891. No Member of the House would be undesirous of doing what in him lay to arrive at the conclusion of a proper agreement with the United States. Again, Members found themselves under a great disability, because many of them did not feel themselves at liberty to enter very fully into the Regulations laid down by the Arbitration Tribunal. Power was given to the Arbitrators to make Regulations, and, that being so, Members were most entirely estopped from criticising its real merits. The Bill, however, could not be passed without some remarks being made on the events which had led to its introduction. He warned the House last year that the arbitration was certain to go against England. It was said, forsooth, that it had been entirely in favour of England, so it had as regarded the shadow, but not as regarded the substance. The first important point decided by the Arbitrators was that the United States had no exclusive jurisdiction outside the territorial limits of the United States. It required no tribunal to decide that question. It was of the commonplaces of the Law of Nations. The Solicitor General would have settled the question in five minutes. It was also decided as a natural consequence that they also had no property in or right of protection for the fur seal outside those limits. That was the end of the question, because if the United States had no jurisdiction and no rights in all the claims that had been advanced on behalf of the Canadian sailors were justified. Having, however, settled that there was no jurisdiction and that there were no rights, the Commissioners proceeded to create a new jurisdiction and new rights, and to make the United States and Great Britain joint guardians of them. Having given to England the whole of the abstract right, they took away from her the whole of the concrete seal. Having given us the shadow, they handed over the substance to the United States. He found no fault with the Arbitrators; the fault lay in the terms of the Reference to them. The questions proposed to them were the questions proposed by Mr. Blaine, haggled over by Lord Salisbury, and finally accepted in their entirety on behalf of England. They were questions which could not but lead to the result that had been achieved. There seemed to be a fatality about all these arbitrations. The San Juan boundary question was an instance in point. The Treaty said that the frontier should pass through the middle of the Channel, but the right channel was excluded from the purview of the arbitrator, for he was called on to decide which of two wrong channels was the right one. There were other cases in which the wrong question had been submitted to the arbitrator. He was not going to apportion the blame;

the errors were due to the way in which our foreign affairs were considered and administered, and the absence of proper management. There seemed to be an unvarying fatality in all references by Great Britain to International arbitration. He hoped hon. Members opposite would see that that was largely due to the want of a permanent Committee on Foreign Relations, which was the great security for the protection of foreign interests and the continuity of policy in relation to foreign affairs in the United States. There was one point which he was not able to understand in regard to the Bill, and that was the delay which had taken place in its introduction, which necessitated the consequent hurry in which they had to pass it. The Award of the arbitrators was made on the 15th August of last year. They knew that last year the House was sitting long after the 15th of August, and he was unable to understand why, in a matter of this kind, and when the Government knew it was necessary to come to a conclusion at an early date, there should have been this delay. This Bill deprived the subjects of Her Majesty of certain rights on the high seas, and disposed of—and some people said it destroyed—the rights and interests of some of Her Majesty's Canadian subjects as well. Were the Canadians going to agree to this destruction of their interests, or were they going to claim compensation from this country? It appeared to him that they would be called upon to vote something on account of this monopoly which was being created, and so be really subsidising the Alaska Company. This Bill did not only absolutely abolish the liberty of the Queen's subjects on the high seas; but it did worse, and enacted that by the euphemism of the "Queen in Council," which simply meant a clerk in the Foreign Office, or an official at the Board of Trade, these Regulations could be repealed, and an end put to the Act; and practically, therefore, when they had passed the Second Reading of this Bill, it would be one that could be put an end to by some person outside that House. For what reason was this to be done? They were told that the so-called Regulations were being made in the interests of humanity, and for the protection of the seals. A great deal of false sentiment had been expended upon the killing of seals in these seas. Where was the sentiment with regard to the monstrous cruelties, the horrible cruelties, perpetrated day by day upon thousands of seals on the Pribyloff Islands, which were left entirely outside the protection supposed to be enforced by this Act, and where the over-driving of seals was customarily practised. It was not in the interests of humanity that this Act was to be passed, nor was it in the interests of the American citizen, but merely in the interests of the Commercial Company, formerly the Alaska Company, which had the exclusive right of sealing on the islands—one of the most monstrous monopolies that every disgraced the face of the earth, and against which American citizens themselves protested. If they were to pay yearly compensation in the form of Votes by the House to Canadian fishermen, it would be in order to repay them for what the Alaska Company had taken from them. They would, therefore, practically be putting this money into the pockets of the Alaska Company, and taxing the English people for the benefit of this Company. After all that was done, what had we achieved? We were to be taxed in order that the Government might subsidise the monstrous Alaska Company, and this country and the United States were to prohibit British and American subjects from sealing between latitude 35°, which was about the latitude of Mexico, and the North Pole. But what about other nations? As was pointed out by Mr. Blaine himself, the two countries had absolutely no control over them. Hon. Members who did not appreciate the importance of the subject might smile; those who did would not. He would read an extract from the Correspondence.

"The Company respectfully submits that it is not competent for Great Britain and the United States alone to declare what subjects shall be permitted to navigate those waters or fish in the high seas."

Lord Salisbury pointed out, and Mr. Blaine himself admitted, that one of the objections to the arbitration arrangement was that whatever might be agreed to we had no power to bind other nations. True, Mr. Blaine also said he did not expect the other nations would go there to seal, but perhaps they would think it worth their while, when they found that the Canadians and Americans were prohibited from doing so, to take a voyage, kill seals, and come back with them round Cape Horn. British and American subjects having been prohibited, the seal-fishing was left open to the rest of the civilised world. Then the Regulations were so loosely drawn that it was difficult to understand them. The first forbade the killing, capturing, or pursuing of seals within a zone of 60 miles of the Pribyloff Islands; but was the distance to be measured from a central point or from some extremity? Were the Islands themselves within the zone? Was it intended to forbid the clubbing of seals on the Islands? What was a zone? What were the limits? Take the Torrid Zone; there you have two limits.

*MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was hardly treating the subject in a proper manner.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES was only showing how loosely these Regulations were drawn. He supposed the Americans intended to retain the right of killing seals on the Islands, yet the loose language rather implied the contrary. Those were reasons sufficient for asking the House to reject the Bill; but since the matter had been submitted to arbitration under unfortunate conditions, and the word of England was pledged, the House had no choice but to pass the Bill; and there was no people for whom he would more cheerfully make a sacrifice than for our kith and kin across the Atlantic. Although subjects of difference might arise from time to time between the two countries, the people of our own race would always be found by our side, and should any peril ever menace the old country he believed that the voice of blood would not be heard in vain in the new. For that reason, though a considerable sacrifice had been made by England, he was willing it should be made in favour of our kinsmen beyond the sea.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight): I had hoped that my task would have been confined to expressing my concurrence with the admirable statement of the Attorney General; but it is absolutely impossible for me to permit the two speeches made on this side of the House to pass without comment. I trust that the House will not regard their criticisms and expressions of opinion as representing those of the Party with which they are associated. Before proceeding further I desire to join in the tribute paid by the Attorney General to the late Lord Hannen. Only those who, like myself, were present from day to day during the arbitration can have any proper appreciation of the ability and dignity displayed by Lord Hannen, one of the most distinguished Judges and jurists, from the beginning to the end, as a Member of that great International Tribunal. As to the criticisms of my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkdale, who possesses very extensive technical knowledge on his subject, I cannot but think that, upon consideration, my hon. Friend will feel that he has not made a very wise use of that knowledge. What is our position? It is that we are bound to carry out the undertaking of our country to a friendly nation. We agree that we ought to abide by the decision of the arbitrators and pass whatever legislation is necessary to give effect to the decision of the arbitrators. It does not, then, seem the time or place to criticise the wisdom of the arbitrators. It is our duty, both in law and honour, to see that legislation is passed which will give effect to that decision.

Mr. Gibson Bowles

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: I hope there is no desire to misrepresent me, but those are the very words I have used.

SIR R. WEBSTER: It is because I think that my hon. Friend does not quite appreciate his criticisms that I say he will acknowledge on reflection that his criticisms are slightly out of place. The questions raised are questions of International Law. There is no provision which the mind of man can suggest which will enable these declarations to be embodied into an Act of Parliament.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: That is what I said.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I understood my hon. Friend to say that the Bill is not satisfactory because it does not carry out the Award and because there is no reference to the five questions. How is it possible to put into a Bill a declaration that the United States have no claim in the Behring Sea? It would be not only unnecessary, but extremely unwise, and I must conscientiously say that it is very inconvenient such observations should be made in the House of Commons about this decision before it has even put upon its trial. No one can deny that this is a question which is surrounded by difficulties. It is said that the Canadians have cause to complain of these Regulations. What is the position in which Great Britain is placed? Both nations are anxious for the preservation of the fur seal, and to prevent seal hunting, which would be disastrous. There are no people to whom that is of more importance than to the sealers of Canada. My hon. Friends are very severe because the arbitrators did not provide for interfering with the United States action upon the Pribyloff Islands themselves. But that is absolutely impossible. No nation would submit to the arbitration of foreign nations with regard to the laws they make within their own territory. It has escaped the hon. Members for Kirkdale and King's Lynn that, inasmuch as the decision can only be applicable to the high seas, the arbitrators are expressly of opinion that it should be supplemented by Regulations operating within the sovereignty of the two Powers who are parties to the agreement. Any suggestion, therefore, that the Regulations should be so framed as to enable the Canadians to carry on the sealing would be disastrous indeed, and one which could not for a moment enter into the mind of a person who has the real object of the arbitration in view, so far as the preparation of Regulations is concerned. Both my hon. Friend on this side of the House and hon. and learned Friends of mine in the Press have been exceedingly severe upon me because the Regulations of the arbitrators have not provided for interfering with the United States action in the matter. It is absolutely impossible that any nation can submit to the arbitration of foreign nations as to what laws they should make in their own territories. We can only appeal to the good sense and the good feeling of the United States. Neither with regard to the United States nor British territorial waters can it enter into the contemplation of anybody in the course of these negotiations that the arbitrators should have power to prescribe any laws which should be enforced either by Great Britain or the United States in their own territory. So thoroughly did the arbitrators themselves appreciate this that they pointed out that the Regulations could only be applicable to the high seas. They expressed the opinion that the Regulations should be supplemented by others applicable within the limits of the sovereignty of each of the two Powers, and that these should be settled by agreement. My hon. Friend has said that the 60 miles zone is an absurdity, because, in the first place, it includes territorial waters. Does my hon. Friend remember that British subjects have no right to kill seals within territorial waters, and, therefore, by excluding British subjects from killing seals within territorial waters they have only re-declared the law? The real fact is that the Regulations are concerned with sealing on the seas, and accordingly the distance within which pelagic sealing will have to be restricted is 60 miles. It has been proved beyond all doubt or question that from 90 to 95 per cent. of pelagic sealing is done at a distance of 100 to 150 miles from the Islands. That is a zone to which there can be no reasonable objection. It would be a most unfortunate thing if people outside this House, or our Canadian brethren, thought that the Regulations were likely to be worked unjustly to them. I believe that when the Regulations have been fairly tried and tested it will be found that they offer a reasonable solution of what is admittedly a most difficult question. In saying this, I do not in any way wish it to be understood that I regard them as perfect, or that they will not require amendment or modification. I have said publicly—and I am prepared to stand by what I have said—that this settlement bears the mark of the great thought and consideration that have been given to every section of it. I feel most confident that it will to a very large extent meet the evil of the wanton destruction of seals which now exist, and which both nations are most desirous to put an end to. The United States at first insisted on far more stringent Regulations than the settlement as it is now drawn up contained. But they admitted that the tribunals were satisfied that less stringent Regulations than those they had laid down at first would attain the object desired by both nations. It has been stated that the shadow has been given to Great Britain and the substance to the United States. That is unquestionably an utter misrepresentation of the result of the Award, having regard to primary claims which the United States made and what had really been decided. In the first place, there was a most substantial claim put forward by the United States to seize British vessels, and to confiscate their cargo and imprison their crews. My hon. Friend has said that everybody who knew the least little bit about International Law knew perfectly well what was the proper position on each nation. The Rules that govern the case are clearly set out by Grotius and every writer on International Law since his day, and, of course, everybody knows the works of that distinguished writer and historian perfectly. No one would doubt the great ability of Mr. Justice Hartmann, of the Supreme Court of the United States. Both he and the other American representative, a lawyer of great eminence, entirely concurred in the finding of the two arbitrators in favour of Great Britain and Canada. The statements which hon. Members have made in the House of Commons, that there is nothing in the finding in favour of Great Britain, would not be, I do not hesitate to say, endorsed hereafter when this decision comes to be referred to. The hon. Member for King's Lynn said that in the matter of Regulations the substance was also given to the United States, and that the whole of this legislation was for the purpose of bolstering up the monopoly of the Alaska Company. When I heard the paragraph read from the Blue Book by the hon. Member I interrupted and asked for the date, and the reply was March, 1887. This was seven years ago, and five years before the Treaty, when, as is known, there were parties in the United States who were hostile to the interests of the Alaska Company. The importance, however, of the position is this—that the United States has concurred with Great Britain in agreeing that the Regulations decided by the tribunal should be binding on the citizens of the United States just in the same way as Great Britain had agreed that these Regulations should be binding on the subjects of the Queen. The consequence is that it is not in accordance with a fair judgment of this matter to contend that these Regulations, which were less than the United States asked for, and not as liberal as I and my hon. Friend contended for on behalf of Great Britain, and which went in the direction to a large extent of securing all life, would not achieve the object which Great Britain and the United States contemplated when the Treaty was first entered into. My hon. Friends are anxious that the United States should be induced to curtail the killing of seals on the Pribyloff Islands. It is obvious that the framers of the Regulations saw that the two nations ought to be left in a position wherein they would have something to deal with and to make a bargain with, so that in the event of further concessions made by Great Britain in the interests of the protection of the seals the United States may also have inducements by such concessions to impose Regulations which would get rid of those practices followed on the Pribyloff Islands tending largely to the reduction of the number of seals. The hon. Member for the Kirkdale Division of Liverpool asked, "What do we know what has been done in the United States?" It appears to me to be somewhat strange that this observation should be made without a question having been addressed to Ministers. It is no part of my duty to defend Her Majesty's Government, but I am permitted, however, by the courtesy of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, to say that the Bill of the United States has passed through the House of Representatives and the Senate, and is now law. The House has the assurance of the Attorney General that, having regard to the differences which must exist, substantially the legislation of the United States is based on the same lines as our own. It does not appear to me, therefore, to be right that the House should hesitate to pass this Bill, seeing that it is no more than this country is bound to do in order to implement the Award. I invite the hon. Member for King's Lynn, who appears to regard the carrying out of this statute as a perfunctory act of some official in a Department—such as a Board of Trade clerk—and not a matter of high policy, to look at the clauses of the Bill, and he will see that power is reserved to the Executive Government for the purpose of placing Great Britain in a better position if it should be necessary. The maximum penalty or restrictions that can be imposed on British subjects are a part of the Bill, but the Executive Government will advise Her Majesty to suspend or modify the Regulations to which objection has been taken in favour of British subjects. I think, I have now noticed most of the points mentioned by my hon. Friends, and, in thanking the House for the attention they have paid to me, I would say that I believe, apart from any indirect or direct benefit, the gain, so far as the seals themselves are concerned, are great; and that the Treaty and the Act of Parliament making the provisions of the Treaty law are a distinct advance in the settlement of International disputes. The conclusion of the speech of the Attorney General in addressing the Paris tribunal was specially worthy of perusal. My hon. and learned Friend pointed out that the questions involved were not merely questions as to the conduct of sealing, but as to whether the nations should more and more feel pledged to settle their disputes by agreement if possible, and, if not, by arbitration, instead of resorting to those dreadful methods which after all never settle anything, and only leave heartburning on one side or the other. I am sorry that the speeches of some hon. Members should have made it necessary for someone to point out to the House and to the country the true position of affairs. I hope that to a large extent I have satisfied their misgivings. But I am certain that this Award will be regarded as a monument of what can be done by fair argument towards settling International disputes, and there is nothing in the whole course of my career on which I shall look back with greater pride than the fact that I have been associated with the Attorney General in this great event.

Sir R. Webster

*MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford) said that, as the person who brought the matter prominently before the public in 1888, he wished to congratulate this country and the United States on having been able to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. The whole matter had been thoroughly discussed on behalf of all concerned. While he congratulated those who were engaged in the case upon the spirit in which it had been conducted there was one matter to which he must call attention. It was with the greatest regret that he found that the zone round the Pribyloff Islands had been extended to 60 miles. A zone of 12 miles would have been quite sufficient to protect the nursing seal. Owing to the difficulty of obtaining observations in the Behring Sea sometimes for a week together, it was often impossible for a vessel to know whether she was 20 or 60 miles from any particular point; and this would be the cause of interminable disputes. There were some other Regulations which pressed hardly on the sealers, who were a most deserving body of men; but, with these exceptions, he endorsed what had been said by his hon. and learned Friend.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

STANDING COMMITTEE (SCOTLAND).

RESOLUTION. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [2nd April]—

“That, in addition to the two Standing Committees appointed under Standing Order No. 47, a Standing Committee shall be appointed for the consideration of all Bills relating exclusively to Scotland which may, by Order of the House, be committed to them, and that the provisions of Standing Order No. 47 shall apply to the said Standing Committee :

That the said Standing Committee do consist of all the Members representing Scottish constituencies, together with fifteen other Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection, who shall have power from time to time to discharge the Members so nominated by them, and to appoint others in substitution for those discharged :

That Standing Orders Nos. 49 and 50 do apply to the said Standing Committee.”—(Sir G. Trevelyan.)

And which Amendment was, to leave out from the word “That,” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

“This House declines to sanction, in regard to Bills relating to one portion only of the United Kingdom, any plan by which the ancient practice as to the constitution of Committees of this House shall be fundamentally altered until it has had an opportunity of pronouncing upon a general scheme which shall extend a like treatment to Bills relating to each of the other portions of the United Kingdom.”—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question again proposed,

“That the words ‘in addition to the two Standing Committees appointed under Standing Order No. 47’ stand part of the Question.”

Debate resumed.

Mr. Staveley Hill

SIR E. CLARKE (Plymouth) said, he had feared that the resumption of the Debate would be postponed so late that he should have to thank Her Majesty's Government for suspending the Twelve o'Clock Rule in order that his speech might not be interrupted a second time. He had pointed out that among the Scotch Members there were those who did not by education or training represent Scotland, but only the particular constituencies to which they had been elected; and therefore a Committee of Scotch Members would include some whose authority on Scotch affairs was inferior to that of others who were excluded. For instance, there were two distinguished English lawyers on the other side, the Home Secretary and the hon. Member for West Fife (Mr. Birrell), both born and educated in England, and both representing Scotch constituencies. If they wanted to find real representatives of Scotland—representatives of the great Scotch names of Stuart and Macdonald—one must go to the Tower Hamlets and Shoreditch, and when they had discovered these gentlemen they would probably find them, as upon that night, very active in endeavouring to prevent the people of London from having a proper supply of water. To establish a system of Grand Committees on the principle that those who knew most of the subject to be dealt with should be included, the suggested arrangements would have to be altered. Then, what effect would the establishment of this Scotch Committee have on the composition of the other Grand Committees? No Scotch Member would be able to serve on the Grand Committee on Trade or the Grand Committee on Law, because the duties would clash. Moreover, he ought not to serve on those Committees, even if he were able. The principle laid down by the right hon. Member for East Denbighshire was a true principle, though it carried the right hon. Member further than he realised. The right hon. Member said that if Scotch Members sat on this Scotch Committee they ought not in reason to claim to be represented on other Committees; and the consequence would be that every Scotch Member's name must be struck off those Committees. Then there were Bills concerning the affairs of England only which were referred to Select Committees. It would be the absolute duty of English Members to take care, if this Scotch Committee were established, to resist every proposal to allow any Scotch Member to sit on any Committee to which an English Bill was referred. He did not look forward with satisfaction to any such innovation upon the Constitution of the Committees of that House, but he maintained that that would be the natural and necessary consequence of the separate proposals which the Government had put before them. If they were to have the Scotch Committee constituted in this way, and if they were to have these corresponding changes in the other Committees, he wished to ask the Government what was their reason for proposing these changes. Let it be supposed that this new Scotch Committee was constituted, and that there had been referred to it some measure exclusively relating to Scotland. If that measure were absolutely non-contentious and did not raise any of the political controversies which were to be found in Scotland as well as in this country, he admitted that such a Bill might pass through the Committee without difficulty. But such a Bill would pass through any of the ordinary Grand Committees of the House with equal facility. But if the Bill partook of another character and involved matter of political antagonism, what would be gained by referring such a measure to this Scotch Committee? If such a Bill were referred to an ordinary Grand Committee representing in a smaller area, but in due proportion, the different sections of the House, the House would, of course, accept the decision of the Committee. But supposing that the Bill were referred to the proposed Scotch Committee, which had not the advantage of representing all sections of the House, and supposing the views of the minority were overborne by the vote of the majority, was it to be supposed that the minority would not appeal to the House against the decision of the majority? Therefore, at the Report stage of the measure every controversial question would be raised again and discussed in the House, with the result that the whole time that had been occupied in considering the Bill in Committee would be entirely wasted. If that were the case he should like to ask Her Majesty's Government how far their present proposal was a practical one, and how far it was likely to conduce to the forwarding of the business of the House? He, however, did not think that he could attribute to the Government any desire to increase the speed of general legislative work in that House, or to relieve the House from any of the difficulties which the present Rules of Procedure imposed upon it. It was only the other evening that the Government had used their influence and had employed their Whips to defeat a proposal to inquire what means could be devised for expediting the business of the House. It must therefore be assumed that the Government had no real desire to secure that object in making this proposal. What, then, could be the object of the Government in sacrificing one of the golden weeks of their Session in discussing this proposal? They would have to obtain from the House a specific sanction for the reference of that Bill to the Scottish Committee, so that they would not be at the end of their labours when they had succeeded in passing the Resolution through the House. But let him suggest this to them also, that on the question of the time it would take to get Scottish legislation through they had to take into account, first, the time it took to pass this Resolution; secondly, the time, in regard to the reference of any Bill to any Standing Committee, in discussing the question of the exclusion of the Scotch Members from the Committee, the time that would be taken up for referring Bills to the Scotch Committee, and, lastly, the time that would be occupied in the appeal that would be made from the Scotch Committee to the House. When these matters were considered the Government would find that from the point of view of business their proposal was extremely unwise. They would find that it would cost a great deal more time than it was likely to save them in dealing with Scottish business. But there was just one other matter he should like to refer to. This subject had been put before the House by the Secretary for Scotland in a modest speech in which he spoke of it as merely a means of dealing with the business of the House. But there had not only been that remarkable incident, but there had been a Debate on Scotch Home Rule, and the Secretary for Scotland, who on Monday proposed the present Motion as a "practical and workmanlike measure," on the following evening gave himself the pleasure of supporting an unpractical and unworkmanlike measure—in which he had not the support of his Chief in the House and, so far as they knew, had not the support of his Chief in the Government—for giving Home Rule to Scotland. The sequence of the incidents was very interesting and curious. In his speech on Home Rule the Secretary for Scotland changed the position of this question from one merely of an arrangement of business into one of the existence of the Government. For he said—

"The Government were determined to carry the Grand Committee through as far as they could by every means they could employ, and by staking everything upon it."

It was a very curious situation that Parliament had been in during the present week. They all greatly regretted and sympathised with the cause which prevented the Leader of the House from being in his place to-night; but he hoped, in the right hon. Gentleman's absence, some one Member on the Treasury Bench would be good enough to supplement the speech which the Secretary for Scotland made on Monday evening, and tell them something in the way of explanation of the speech he made on Tuesday. It really looked as if there were two Parties on that Bench. They did not sit there at the same time, but some were in at one time and some at another. There was the Leader of the House, who did not vote in favour of Scottish Home Rule, and who, so far as they knew, was, like the head of the Government, not very enthusiastic about Home Rule at all. But there were two other Members who, having in their official capacity given their support to the "workmanlike, practical proposal" on the Monday, in a sort of unofficial capacity enjoying themselves in the absence of their Chief, on the Tuesday evening, took their share of the operation which he would not support, and voted in favour of Home Rule for Scotland. Surely they were entitled to know what it was that was the policy of the Government. Were they going in for Home Rule all round? [Cries of "Yes!"] There were some sponsors, it appeared, ready to answer for the Government, but the Government were not inclined to answer so promptly for themselves. Home Rule for Ireland they accepted long ago for various reasons. The question of Home Rule for Scotland was at present only a subject out of which to extract amusement on a Tuesday evening. Was it to be an integral part of the policy of the Party they represented?

Sir E. Clarke

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

SIR E. CLARKE: Somebody said "Yes"; he should think it was a Welshman. Gallant little Wales was only waiting its turn to claim a Parliament in some part of the Principality—after civil war, he should think, because it would require civil war to decide in what part of Wales that Parliament should be situated. Could they not know what it was the Government were proposing to do? If their policy was a policy of Home Rule all round; if they were gradually being led and pressed on to accept bit by bit that enormous policy, what possible excuse had they for occupying the time of the House of Commons by discussing proposals of the kind, and what excuse had they for not going with the Opposition to the masters of all of them—the people outside in the constituencies—and setting their proposals before them? They knew that to indulge in this policy of reticence and gradual acquiescence would be of no use. They knew that no scheme of Home Rule for either country could possibly pass into law until there had been a specific declaration of the people on the point. If that were so, it was right that they should make an appeal to the people. It was a pity for their own sake that they should waste time over the discussion of this proposal and over the solution of the many difficulties which its acceptance would bring upon them if they were meditating the adoption of a policy so much larger, and a policy that would absolutely swamp and obliterate the necessity for this. It might be that they had persuaded themselves that, while a Scottish Grand Committee would for certain purposes be a good thing, it would in their judgment be a better thing to have a Scottish Parliament in Scotland itself, and that the distinguished Scotchmen whom now were so glad to see on the Treasury should take themselves to the of the Tweed and occupy position in a less important and even in a special Parliament; that might be wished, but he thought the House was not entitled to know it; and until the Government gave the House their plan of their policy on that point he thought he was entitled to point out to them that the proposal they had made to the House was one which would alter the system of Committee representation which would introduce an entirely new principle of voting and estimating the position of the Members of the House, which would give the Government no advantage in non-contentious business, which would be rather a disadvantage than an advantage on controversial Scottish Bills, and which could result in a serious expenditure of time of which they had none too much to spare, and which had not been justified in the House by any argument which could justify its acceptance.

C. CAMERON (Glasgow, Coleridge) said, it might conduce to a saving of time of the House if the discussion were brought back from the realms of the imagination of gentlemen to the business which they had carried it into the business embraced by the Resolution. They were not discussing Home Rule for Scotland, or anything that had anything to do with Home Rule. [Opposition continued.] Of course, Members opposite would not admit that he knew more about the views of Home Rulers in Scotland than he did. He certainly said that if they (Home Rulers) were offered this proposal as a substitute for what they intended to demand they would not take it. It had been said that some two or three years ago he described the proposal for a Scottish Grand Committee as a "ling and pottering" proposal. He had only so described it as a substitute for Home Rule. He said it would be not only unworkable under certain circumstances, and it was put forward under those circumstances and in the present position as a business proposal which would not work perfectly well. It was more to the benefit of the House than of the Members, because certain business had to be got through, and whether it was done in the time of the House or in the time of a Committee made very little difference to the Scotch Members individually. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) had said that the proposal of the Government was a plan by which the ancient practice as to the constitution of the Committees of the House would be fundamentally altered. There were, however, no traditions concerning Grand Committees which had not yet been 10 years in existence. The constitution of Committees had been for very many years back not at all antagonistic to the vast preponderance of those belonging to the nationality concerned in a Bill. In 1878 a very contentious measure, the Sunday Closing (Ireland) Bill, was referred to a Select Committee. That Committee consisted of 12 Irish Members, the Irish Secretary, one Scotch Member—himself—and one English Member. What was that but a miniature Irish Grand Committee? Of course, it might be said that as this Committee was constituted for the purpose of collecting evidence it had a different function from that possessed by Scotch Grand Committees. A Scotch Committee was constituted on similar lines to consider the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill. Only a single English Member had a seat upon that Committee. The House was now asked to set up a Committee which would be in entire accord with its ancient practice, as far as it was illustrated by the Committees to which he had alluded. That Committee would be in accord with the political views of Her Majesty's Government and their supporters. It would work perfectly well under the circumstances. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had said that if the Grand Committee were set up Scotch Members must necessarily be excluded from other Grand Committees. Why should they be? There was nothing of the sort in the Resolution. The Committee of Selection had their instructions as to the Grand Committees on Trade and Law, and he supposed they would continue to follow them. Of course, Members could not be on two Committees at the same time, but did anyone imagine that all the Members of any Grand Committee were always present at the meetings of that Committee? As a matter of fact, the difficulty in many cases was to get a quorum. It was said that if a Scotch Grand Committee were appointed, a Welsh Committee and an English Committee would also have to be set up. There was nothing about that in the Resolution. A Scotch Committee had been asked for repeatedly by the Scotch Members, but the Welsh Members had never asked for a Welsh Committee. The reason was obvious. The Welsh Members were going to occupy a large portion of the time of the Session by the discussion of a Bill which could not be referred to a Welsh Committee, inasmuch as it concerned England as well as Wales. As to the English Members there had never been heard a word of any possibility of such a demand being made by them until it was brought forward to prevent the Scotch Members getting what they wanted. It was said that the proposal would not effect any saving of time, because whenever a minority were beaten in the Grand Committee they would appeal to the judgment of the House. Did any Member who was not absolutely unsophisticated and unused to the wiles of the House not know that whenever there was a chance of a minority overturning the verdict of a majority they appealed to the whole House on the Report, but did anyone imagine that in the case of a contentious Bill which had gone before a Grand Committee anything would be gained by a long discussion on the Report? He thought that the adoption of the Grand Committee system would result in the saving of a very large amount of time that would otherwise be consumed in Committee of the whole House. No doubt under certain circumstances the system would not work. A national Committee of which the majority of Members were opposed to the Government of the day would certainly not work, inasmuch as the Government would be obliged to reverse the decisions come to in Committee. When he said the Resolution had nothing to do with Home Rule he was laughed at, but he asserted emphatically that it would never be considered as in any way removing a single ground on which the demand was made for Scottish Home Rule. Among the Scottish Members there was a large standing majority of Liberals, and when a Liberal Government was in power a Grand Committee of such Members would work. When, however, a Conservative Government was in power, it would be impossible for a Scottish Grand Committee to work, and under such circumstances no one would want to appoint one. The Resolution, he was informed, only amounted to a Sessional Order, and he presumed that gentlemen opposite did not intend to cross the floor during the present Session. If and when they did cross the floor it would be for them to manufacture their own Standing Committee in such a way that they would facilitate the work of Parliament, and be consistent with the existence of a Conservative Government. When Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald was Lord Advocate he called a meeting of the whole of the Scotch Members in order to ascertain their views on a certain Bill, thus practically constituting a Scotch Grand Committee. The result was a great saving of the time of the House, although the Scotch Members gained nothing by it, because in the Lords all the Government Amendments objected to by the majority of the Scotch Members were inserted. The Scotch Members now wished for a Grand Committee, because they believed it would enable their business to be done more satisfactorily, as it would do away with the necessity of being content with odds and ends of time for their measures. They were willing to inflict greater labour upon themselves, and he did not see how anyone could object to that. As to taking the control of Scotch matters out of the hands of the House, that was an absurdity, inasmuch as all Bills would first be dealt with in the House that would be sent back to the House for the Report stage and Third Reading. Under these circumstances, he could not conceive how any fair-minded or impartial man could object to a proposal so moderate in its character. As to taking Scottish matters in any way outside the House, that was an absurdity. The Bill had to be ordered to go to the Committee, it had to come back here on Report, it had to go through the Third Reading. As well might they accuse the previous Conservative Government of appointing a Select Committee to consider Bills of going on to a Separatist route, or accuse this Government of now making a proposal which had any tendency in that direction. He trusted they would discuss this matter on its merits, and without reference to Scottish Home Rule. To show the spirit in which the Scottish members had asked this scheme, he might mention he was the medium through which their resolution on this subject was conveyed to the head of the Government. The resolution ran thus—

L. XXII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

“That pending the concession of Home Rule for Scotland we consider that it is hopeless to look for any Scottish business being got through, that the hope is futile of any Scottish business being got through, unless we get such a Committee as it is proposed to appoint.”

There was one direction in which he thought the right hon. Gentleman's (Sir J. Trevelyan) Resolution could be improved. That was to do away with the part of it providing for a Motion of reference in the case of every separate Bill, so that gave only another stage in which discussion could take place, not at the instigation of the Scotch Members only, but of the time of the House. He suggested that the right hon. Gentleman might, therefore, as well take this opportunity to improve the Resolution by adopting the amendment of which notice had been given by his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh.

LORD G. HAMILTON (Middlesex, Clarendon): I rise to move the Adjournment of this Debate. I have sat for 20 years in this House, and I will undertake to say that the oldest Member of the House never can recollect an occasion upon which the House has been treated with such scant courtesy as they have been treated with. After what has occurred during the last three days, the conduct of the Government is an outrage upon all the agencies of Debate. On Monday the Scottish Secretary made a proposal which reversed the whole principle on which from time immemorial the Committee —

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is a matter of argument.

LORD G. HAMILTON: Then why does not the Government argue it? On Monday the Scottish Secretary asked the House to assent to the novel and, to our mind, dangerous principle as regarded the constitution of Committees—that is to say, to substitute the principle on which they have hitherto been nominated reflecting the general opinion of the House for the principle of nationality, but yet, when we are told this evening that this was done in order to satisfy the deep-rooted convictions of the Scottish people,” the only hon. Member who has spoken to-night on behalf of this proposal says that the great merit of the proposal is that it is a Sessional Order, and that if a Unionist Government came into power he should not want this principle to continue. Then, on Tuesday we had the still more remarkable performance of the Scottish Secretary. He induced the House to accept the principle of Home Rule for Scotland—practically Home Rule all round. On the night preceding not one single Cabinet Minister attempted to take part in the discussion. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition made a speech which everybody must admit was worthy of reply. My right hon. Friend on Tuesday again followed the Scotch Secretary, and again he pointed out the utter absurdity and inconsistency of the position the Government have taken up with regard to Scotch business. To-night, again, my hon. and learned Friend the late Solicitor General has made a masterly speech, showing the inconsistency of the proposal, and how utterly impractical and unworkable it would be; but in reply we have not had a single, solitary word from the Government. Her Majesty's Government either make this proposal seriously or they do not. Do they know their own mind? If they know their own mind, they are bound to communicate what is in their mind to the House. If they do not know their mind, then it is a farce and a sheer waste of time to go on with this Debate. We have a special right to insist on declining to go on with the discussion until the Government clearly tell us what they intend to do. It was by the courtesy of the Opposition that the Government were able to get through their business before Easter. They bring forward this proposal with the most inadequate explanation. The Minister who made that proposal changed his mind the next night. The Leader of the House had been absent on all occasions on Monday, Tuesday, and to-night. [Mr. J. MORLEY interpolated an explanation which did not reach the Reporters' Gallery.] I apologise. I was not aware until this moment of the cause of the right hon. Gentleman's absence to-night. No other Minister has attempted to take the right hon. Gentleman's place on any one of these occasions. Under these circumstances, what is the use of continuing the Debate? I therefore move the Adjournment, in the hope that when the House meets again we may have a clear indication of what the Government intend; and when we have got that indication I hope they will adhere to it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Lord G. Hamilton.)

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The noble Lord has given us one evidence to-night that he is of Scotch extraction, because he has no occasion to call on Providence to give him a good conceit of himself. For what is the noble Lord's argument in favour of adjourning the Debate? It is that one or two speeches which his colleagues have made on the subject have been so conclusive and unanswerable, and have remained so entirely unanswered, that it is no use attempting to discuss the matter further. ["No!"] What has happened? My right hon. Friend the Secretary for Scotland made on Monday on the part of the Government an explanation of the reasons—[a laugh] —which may not have been satisfactory to the courteous gentleman who laughed—why the Government asked the House to agree to this Resolution. He was followed by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition. That was one speaker against one. In that evening's Debate the late Solicitor General for Scotland spoke and was answered by the Lord Advocate in a speech of great length. The next speech was that of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, who has concluded his remarks to-night. Therefore, the only complaint which the noble Lord can make is that no one has risen at once to reply to the late Solicitor General. I will admit the noble Lord into a secret. I intended to speak in this Debate, but I was anxious to know what certain other gentlemen had to say. From the beginning of the Debate it was understood on all hands that the right hon. Members for St. George's, West Birmingham, Bury, the University of London, and I do not know how many more illustrious Members of the Opposition, intended to take part in it. It was only right, therefore, that the Government should wait until some at least of that formidable artillery had been discharged before making any further interposition in the Debate. I deny the right of the noble Lord or any of his colleagues to dictate to Members of the Government the manner in which we shall conduct our business. Then the noble Lord said that on Tuesday another Debate had been interposed, which altered the character and position of the Resolution now before the House. It would not be within the proper Rules of Debate for me, speaking on the Question of Adjournment, to discuss that matter; but I agree with my hon. Friend who has just previously spoken that the question raised on Tuesday had nothing whatever to do with the question now before the House, which is a proposal to adopt a Sessional Order which we think would be of advantage in expediting and facilitating Scotch business, and would also obtain a better expression and give better weight to Scotch opinion in matters affecting Scotland alone. The Motion on Tuesday was not a Government Motion, but was one of those Motions of private Members on Friday and Tuesday nights, upon which Governments frequently do not think it necessary or right to express an opinion one way or the other. The proposition of the noble Lord is that we should forthwith adjourn the Debate. I am not aware that there is any force in the argument which the noble Lord has adduced which ought to lead the House to adopt that course. I frankly admit that after so large a portion of the time of the House has been to-night so unexpectedly taken up by a lengthened discussion on Private Bills, that the situation is somewhat altered.

Lord G. Hamilton

LORD R. CHURCHILL: On a Government night.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Government have no control over the day on which Private Bills can be put down. Therefore, it is not the Government who fixed the day, but the supporters of the noble Lord, whose Bills they were.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: My Bills?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is the supporters of the noble Lord who can choose the particular day for the discussion of these measures. I freely own that seeing that so large a part of the time of the House was taken up by Private Bills we can hardly expect—especially if all those important gentlemen to whom I have referred are going to favour the House with their views at great length—to conclude this Debate to-night. But the idea of cutting

Port the Debate before 12 o'clock—a Debate which has proceeded with per-
 : regularity and courtesy on the Minis-
 -ial side of the House—is a proposal which the Government cannot possibly sent.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 232 ;
 es 250.—(Division List, No. 16.)

Original Question again proposed,

That the words 'in addition to the two nding Committees appointed under Standing ler No. 47' stand part of the Question."

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND : After
 Division which has just taken place,
 Government must see how useless it to attempt to continue the Debate.
 erefore I beg to move the Adjourn-nt of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 That this House do now adjourn."—
 Sir F. Dixon-Hartland.)

MR. J. MORLEY : We are unable to ssent to the Motion of the hon. Member.
 The noble Lord who moved the Motion before this said he had for a long time een a Member of this House, and in the name of the decencies of Debate he moved the adjournment of it. I have not been so long in this House as the noble Lord, but I venture to say, when I review the circumstances of to-night, that so great an outrage on the usages and proprieties of Debate in this House has never been witnessed as the attempt f hon. Gentlemen opposite at this oment under these circumstances to op the Debate. [Laughter.] Let me mind hon. Gentlemen who laugh—rhaps they have not been in the ouse—of the circumstances. Owing to cumstances over which the Govern-nt had no control, it was impossible to ew the discussion of the Motion ore the House until, I think, 25 nutes to 11. [Several hon. MEMBERS :
 uarter to 11.] I was in the House
 the night, and I think that is so.

The hon. and learned Gentleman conided his speech. He was followed by y hon. Friend the Member for the ollege Division of Glasgow ; and then,
 t 25 minutes to 12, because no Member on this Bench gets up of equal Parliamentary rank, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War has shown, to reply, we are denounced for outraging the decencies of Debate by the noble Lord.
 I can only repeat what I have said, that if these tactics are to be persevered in they shall be persevered in, and persevered in long enough to mark them before the country.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : If I may judge from obvious signs the temperature of the House has risen to a very unnecessary pitch. I do not follow the reasoning of the right hon. Gentleman, whose anger is entirely thrown away upon the House at this late hour. I really would respectfully suggest that we should consider the situation in a spirit of calmness. What has happened is this : On Monday a Debate of very great importance, in the opinion of those on this side of the House, and one involving very grave issues of Parliamentary practice, was commenced by the Secretary for Scotland, in a speech which had many merits, but which amongst its merits had not the merit of discussing the question from a broad and Imperial point of view. We on this side tried to lay before the House certain arguments, with the object of showing that you could not deal with this as a measure relating to the Scotch measures alone.
 Perhaps feebly, I myself sought on Monday to put this view forward, and not only has no reply been made, but no reply has even been attempted. [Ministerial cries of "The Lord Advocate."] I hear the Lord Advocate mentioned, and I have a profound respect for that right hon. and learned Gentleman. I have the honour also to belong to the same clan as he does. He is a lawyer of great experience, he is one of our old Parliamentary friends, and is equally respected by both sides of the House, but he would,
 I am sure, be the last one to get up in this House and contend that in his speech he had attempted to go beyond the purely Scotch aspect of this problem, or had endeavoured to touch the larger question which we have endeavoured to bring before the House. What the Lord Advocate has failed to do no other Member of the Government has even attempted to do. Nevertheless, my hon. and learned Friend (Sir E. Clarke), who began a speech on Monday which must have impressed everybody, concluded that speech to-night, and sat down at a time when it is usual and convenient that a Parliamentary authority of the first rank should reply, and yet no Minister rose to do so, and the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech is left absolutely unanswered by any responsible Member of the Government. The only endeavour to deal with that speech was made by an independent Scotch Member, who treated the subject from a purely Scotch point of view, and did not attempt to deal with the broad question. Have not the Opposition, therefore, even with some heat, the right to say that this is not the proper mode of treating a great question? That was the justification which my noble Friend had in moving the adjournment, and I suggest to the Government, even if they are disposed to take no further part in the Debate, even if they are anxious to rest their whole case on the speech of the Secretary for Scotland, that they should allow us to adjourn to-night until some other gentlemen may have an opportunity of laying their views before us. I hope before the resumption of the Debate the Government will have considered the subject, and will have discovered that it is not purely a Scottish question, but that it is of interest to England, Wales, and Ireland, and that some Minister will come forward and give us the views of the Government on the broader aspects which the question presents. We must all feel that we can hardly enter into one of these painful contests at this time of night, with Parties as evenly divided as they appear to be, with any prospect of bringing our discussion to a conclusion either creditable to the House or improving to the prospects of future legislation. Whether there was any heat before the late Division or not, that is all over now, and the time has come, I hope, when we may part with mutual goodwill, to meet again in a frame of mind suited to the discussion of what is, after all, a not unimportant Constitutional question.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 231; Noes 246.—(Division List, No. 17.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, the vote that had just taken place showed that the majority in favour of continuing the Debate was becoming smaller and smaller, and as it was admitted that the discussion must go over to another day, there was no object in carrying it further now. He therefore moved the adjournment of the Debate.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to second the Motion.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

MR. J. MORLEY: If the interruption which has just now come to an end had not taken place—that is to say, if the noble Lord had not made his Motion for the adjournment five minutes less than an hour ago—gentlemen opposite would by this time have had their desire fulfilled and would have heard a Cabinet Minister, and we should have at this hour willingly consented to the adjournment of the Debate, and we should have avoided all that rise of temperature which the right hon. Gentleman opposite deprecated. It is not our fault that these desirable results have been missed. But, having regard to the hour, the Government will now no longer resist the adjournment of the Debate.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.—(No. 1.)

Reported with Amendments [Provisional Orders confirmed]; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 2.)

Reported without Amendment [Provisional Orders confirmed]; to be read the third time To-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDER (HOUSING OF WORKING CLASSES) BILL.—(No. 3.)

Reported with Amendments [Provisional Order confirmed]; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

NOTICE OF ACCIDENTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Burt, Bill for providing for Notice of and Inquiry into Accidents occurring in certain employments and industries, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Burt, Mr. Mundella, and Mr. Secretary Asquith.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 144.]

GROCERS' LICENCES ABOLITION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. David Thomas, Bill to abolish the retail sale of Spirits, Wine, and Beer by Shopkeepers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Thomas, Mr. Lloyd-George, Major Jones, Mr. Alfred Thomas, Mr. Whittaker, and Mr. John Wilson (Durham).

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 145.]

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 6th April 1894.

EAST LONDON WATER BILL.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, he wished to state on behalf of his hon. Friend the Member for St. George's-in-the-East (Mr. Benn), who had given notice of an Instruction to the Committee on the East London Water Bill, that after what had occurred on the previous day he did not intend to move it. He intended to reconsider the terms of the proposal, and to put it down on a later day.

QUESTIONS.

WELSH SCHOOL INSPECTORS.

MR. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if it is his intention to secure that in future appointments to the Government Inspectorate of Public Elementary Schools in Wales due consideration shall be given to the claims for promotion to such office possessed by the more experienced and highly qualified certificated teachers now at work in those schools; and whether it is his intention also to give similar consideration to the claims to promotion possessed by sub-Inspectors and by Inspectors' assistants now engaged in the work of inspection in the Public Elementary Schools in Wales?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (MR. ACLAND, York, W. R., Rotherham): I am always willing to give full consideration to all the claims or applications of those, whether certificated teachers or others, who desire to be made Inspectors, subject to the general conditions of age and the like, which are laid down by the Department. The answer to the second paragraph of the question is in the affirmative. I have already appointed two sub-Inspectors to be Inspectors.

STEAMSHIP ROUTES TO NEW YORK.

SIR J. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he will state the number of sailing knots respectively in the routes of steamers as shown on the Admiralty charts, first between New York and Liverpool viâ Queenstown, and second between New York and Liverpool viâ Moville; also the corresponding distances between the Ports of Halifax and Liverpool and Greenock viâ Moville?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.) (who replied) said: According to information given to me by my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, who has asked me to answer this question, the distances are as follows:—

	Nautical Miles.
New York to Liverpool viâ Queenstown—by usual route	3,070
Do. by shortest navigable route.....	3,016
New York to Liverpool viâ Moville—by usual route	3,100
Do. by shortest navigable route	2,990
Halifax to Liverpool viâ Moville—by shortest navigable route	2,450
Halifax to Greenock viâ Moville—by shortest navigable route	2,350

The shortest route may not be practicable at certain times of the year when ice abounds on the banks of Newfoundland; and the distances would then be considerably increased.

MAIL LANDING AT QUEENSTOWN AND MOVILLE.

SIR J. LENG: I beg to ask the Postmaster General on how many occasions the Atlantic mail steamers were unable from stress of weather to land the American and Canadian mails during the years 1892 and 1893 at Queenstown and Moville respectively?

MR. A. MORLEY: As regards Queenstown, the answer is five times in 1892 and twice in 1893. As regards Moville, I have already stated to the hon. Member that the Canadian Mail Service is performed under a Colonial, not an Imperial, contract, and that no records of its performance are kept at the General Post Office. I will, however, if the hon. Member wishes me to do so, endeavour to obtain the information and let him know the result of my inquiries.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): Is not the number of occasions on which stress of weather prevented the landing of the mails at Queenstown extremely small in proportion to the number of mails carried?

MR. A. MORLEY: My hon. Friend has the figures before him, and therefore can answer the question. No doubt the figures are very satisfactory.

INDIAN TROOPSHIPS.

MR. BAKER (Portsmouth): On behalf of my hon. Colleague in the representation of Portsmouth I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if it is in contemplation that Southampton, in place of Portsmouth, should in future be the port of embarkation and debarkation of troops going to and returning from India; and whether it is definitely settled that the Government troopships hitherto used for this service are to be laid aside?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): Three of the four Indian troopships will not run after the close of the present trooping season. The Malabar will continue to run from Portsmouth. Negotiations as to the future system of trooping for India are now proceeding between the Admiralty and India Office. Pending a decision on that subject temporary arrangements will be made for hired ships, which will probably be fitted at Southampton. The question whether that shall also be the port at which the hired ships will for the time embark troops is now under consideration.

LONDON BAKEHOUSES.

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been drawn to the Report of Dr. Waldo on the conditions under which a large proportion of the bakery business is being carried on in London; and whether the Local Authorities are impotent under the present law to enforce sanitary remedies; and, if so, will further legislation be introduced at the earliest possible opportunity to effect the object?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): The Report referred to by my hon. Friend is not an official Report, but a Paper read by Dr. Waldo at a meeting of the Sanitary Institute. It certainly discloses a very deplorable state of things. I may remind my hon. Friend that there are provisions in the existing Factory and Workshops Acts under which Sanitary Authorities can take action to put a stop to abuses which render bakehouses unfit for use. Till an attempt has been made by Sanitary Authorities to enforce these remedies and has failed I do not think it will be necessary to propose further legislation.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman cause inquiry to be made, with a view to stimulating the flagging action of the Local Authorities?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: If I have power to stimulate the Local Authorities I will certainly do so.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea): Will the right hon. Gentleman, pending the action of the Local Authorities and the inquiry of his own medical officer, consider the advisability of issuing a Circular to all the Local Authorities directing that all new bakehouses must be above ground and not under ground, as too many now are?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I will certainly consider that suggestion.

THRIFT IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. C. ROUNDELL (York, W. R. Skipton): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, with respect to public elementary schools in England and Wales, he can state the number of school savings banks and the number of schools in which scholars had accounts in Post Office or other savings banks in the year 1893, as compared with the year preceding the Assisted Education Act; and whether the totals of amounts deposited indicate a progress of habits of thrift among the children?

MR. ACLAND: The number of school savings banks, or schools in which scholars had accounts in Post Office or other savings banks, for the year ending 31st August, 1893, was 8,548. The corresponding number for 1891 was 2,629, so that in two years since the Act of 1891 came into operation the number has been more than trebled. The Returns for 1893 show that in 6,715 school savings banks £304,090 had been deposited during the year by 746,551 children, and that the total amount standing to the credit of the depositors at the end of the year was £199,489. In addition to this, sums estimated at about £86,000 were standing to the credit of scholars in accounts at Post Office or other savings banks.

PIER AND HARBOUR WORKS.

M'CARTAN (Down, S.) : I beg the Secretary to the Treasury if anything further has been done in connection with the loan already sanctioned for the pier and harbour at Bangor, County Down?

SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) : The present position is, that the powers of the borrower to execute the works have expired by lapse of time, he is now applying for a Provisional Order of the House of Trade, which will require to be confirmed this Session, extending the time for carrying out the works.

MARE GUARDIANS ELECTION.

KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the election of Guardians for the North Electoral Division, held on the 17th March, the returning officer declared that the candidates duly elected by a majority of five votes ; notwithstanding this decision the returning officer held a re-scrutiny on the 26th ultimo, and then declared seven votes to the defeated candidate, which he had rejected at the first scrutiny on the ground that the voting papers were improperly filled ; whereupon the returning officer refused to count the voting papers in question referred to the Local Government Board for decision as to their validity ; and if the Board direct the Local Government to hold a full inquiry into the circumstances which induced the returning officer to act in this manner, and, after their decision, direct that the candidate returned on the re-scrutiny will be prevented from exercising his functions as member of the Board?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-Tyne) : The Local Government are in communication with the successful candidates as to the several objections of the returning officer to which they object, and on receipt of full particulars will take such steps as may be necessary for ascertaining whether the returns were correct or otherwise. The returning officer is required by law to make a Return of the election according to the best of his judgment and ability, and I am informed he is under no obligation to submit the voting papers referred to for the opinion of the Local Government Board in the first instance. Pending the decision of the Board, there is no power to prevent the persons who have been returned from acting as Guardians.

THE NOTTINGHAM EXECUTION.

MR. BALLANTINE (Coventry) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Walter Smith, who was executed at Nottingham last week, made any confession?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.) : I cannot help regretting that my hon. Friend should have thought it his duty to put this question. I think that any public inquiry into statements made by persons under the sentence of death is, as a rule, to be deprecated. But as there is, I know, a certain uneasiness in the minds of many persons as to this case, I think it right to say that the night but one before his execution the prisoner stated to the officers in charge that he had bought the pistol for the purpose of killing the girl whom he shot.

ARMOUR-PIERCING PROJECTILES.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what information he can give to the House as to the results of trials of armour-piercing shot manufactured by a Sheffield firm, 9.2 inches in diameter, and weighing 380 lbs. each, which are stated to have passed entirely through a 14-inch compound plate, and then through 4 feet of oak backing into a heap of sand in the rear, without any practical damage to the shot itself ; whether the French projectiles have given similarly good results ; and whether the Admiralty will in all cases give the preference to warlike stores of Home manufacture?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : This is a question which should be addressed to the War Office.

MR. HANBURY : But a portion of the projectiles I refer to, which was obtained from French sources, were required by the Admiralty?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : No part of the projectiles referred to in the question were bought by the Admiralty.

THE EVICTIONS ON THE ARRAN ISLANDS.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a steamer was used to convey the police to the scene of the evictions on the Arran Islands ; and if he could state how the bailiffs were conveyed ?

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) : At the same time, I will ask the right hon Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the evidence given by witnesses before the Cowper Commission as to the Islands of Arran, from which it appears that there is no natural soil on these Islands, but that the crops are grown on soil artificially created by the labour of the Islanders out of sand, seaweed, and decayed ferns placed in layers on the bare rock and surrounded by walls to prevent it from being blown away ; also that in dry seasons, such as that of 1893, there is a complete failure of crops and imminent risk of starvation ; and whether, having regard to the fact that the soil of the Island is wholly the result of the labour of the tenants themselves, and to the failure of the crops in the past year, he will either refuse the aid of the constabulary in the carrying out of the evictions now in progress, or will at any rate make representations to the owners and their agents with a view of stopping the eviction of the tenants under these circumstances ?

MR. J. MORLEY : The police were conveyed on this duty to the Arran Islands in the steamer belonging to the Galway Steamboat Company, which visits the islands three times a week. The Sheriff, bailiffs, and the agent were conveyed by the same steamer. I am aware that evidence to the effect mentioned in the first part of the question of the hon. Member for Northampton was given before the Cowper Commission, which reported in February, 1887. Decrees of ejectment having been obtained by the landlord and placed in the hands of the Sheriff of the County of Galway for execution, the Government had no discretion in the matter, but were bound to afford adequate protection and the assistance of the constabulary in the execution of the decrees. It was decided last year by the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, from which decision it was held by the Court of Appeal that no appeal lay, that the Government were under absolute obligation to afford protection and assistance to the Sheriff, not only in the execution of decrees of ejectment by daytime but also in the case of night seizures under writs of the superior Courts, and that the executive officer refusing such assistance is liable to attachment and indictment. Informal communications did pass between the Divisional Commissioner and the agent as to these evictions, but the determination of the landlord to proceed was not shaken.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : Has the right hon. Gentleman any information as to the amount for which the processes of ejectment were issued ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I have not got it with me at this moment.

MR. CHANNING : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether in the informal communication addressed to the owners or agents their attention was drawn to the character of these holdings, which is quite unique ; and whether they were informed of the gross hardship and the barbarity of these evictions ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I do not suppose the communication was of that nature.

MR. SEXTON asked whether, as the evictions were going on from day to day, any shelter had been provided for the people, a great many families having been rendered homeless ; and whether the Inspector had returned to the islands from Galway. If so, would his Report be laid on the Table ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I have not yet had time to receive a Report. The Inspector reached the north island last night at 9 o'clock, and he telegraphs that the relieving officer is providing temporary relief to the evicted families which are considered destitute. Instructions have been given to provide temporary shelter, and on no account to allow the people to be exposed out of doors at night. No evictions have yet taken place on the south island, and this morning the sea was too rough to permit of communication with the island.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : Bearing in mind the condition of these people, will the Chief Secretary see that relief is brought to these people ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I have just stated that. Three weeks ago I sent an Inspector down to see that no persons suffered hardship. The Inspector will have power to see that the relieving officer does all that is required.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : I meant to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman intends to take any steps to improve the condition of these people, or whether this is to go on for ever ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I do not think the reception which Government proposals meet with encourages them to make fresh efforts.

MR. SEXTON : Will there be some relaxation of the ordinary outdoor relief ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I can only repeat that the Inspector has been instructed to see that no hardships take place.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) : May I ask whether Lord Carnarvon, who visited these Islands in 1885, left any record of any remonstrance addressed to these landlords ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I have not come across any such document.

INLAND BRANCH, GENERAL POST OFFICE.

MR. DIAMOND (Monaghan, N.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, considering that one of the duties of the Inland Branch, General Post Office, was a few years ago 12 noon to 8 p.m., which duty is, on the recommendation of the medical officer, allotted to invalids and the older men in the Service, he will explain why this time has been altered to 11.45 a.m. to 8 p.m., or 8.15 p.m., per day for six days per week ; whether those men are also under an obligation to remain after 8 p.m. without pay when the exigencies of the duty require it, and by whose authority the time has been lengthened ; and whether he will order that the men be paid for all time exceeding 48 hours per week ?

MR. A. MORLEY : I find that the attendance referred to by the hon. Member was altered many years ago to 11.45 a.m. to 8 p.m., instead of 12 noon to 8 a.m., at the request and for the convenience of the staff on duty, in order that they might be allowed an extended interval for dinner after 12 noon (instead of having to take it before noon), and also a longer interval for tea. It is not the fact that this duty is allotted to invalids and older men, though a few of these may be employed on it. It seldom occurs that the staff are kept on duty more than a few minutes after 8 p.m. The attendance is on no occasion sufficiently prolonged to entitle them to overtime payment.

RUSO-GERMAN COMMERCIAL TREATY.

MR. HOLLAND (Salford, N.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether British traders may, under the Most Favoured Nation treatment, rely on receiving whatever advantages are conferred by the new Russo-German Commercial Treaty ; and whether certificates of origin are still required in Russia for British goods ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick) : British traders are entitled under the existing Treaty between Great Britain and Russia to the benefits of the Russo-German Commercial Treaty. Certificates of origin are not now required by Russia except for a very few articles. These are spirits and liqueurs, wines in bottle, preserved fish, lead and zinc. The new Regulations as to this will be published in full.

THE ARMY MEDICAL STAFF.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will be able to consider favourably the Petition of Surgeon Major Hamilton George Gardner for reinstatement in the Service, in view of the facts that that officer served for 16 years in the Army Medical Staff ; that he retired voluntarily in December, 1890, his name being still retained "in the retired list as liable to be recalled for service ;" that he receives no pay or retaining fee for such retention ; that there is nothing recorded against him as an officer ; and that there is said to be a paucity of military medical officers, especially for service in India ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.) : A medical officer who has retired voluntarily from the Army is not eligible for re-instatement in the Service although he is liable to be recalled for duty in a case of emergency up to the age of 55 years. There is at present no such emergency, and there is no paucity of medical officers for service in India or elsewhere.

THE VOLUNTEER DECORATION.

MR. WEBSTER : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the form of the decoration has been decided on to be given to non-commissioned officers of the Volunteer Service ; and, if that is the case, whether any time for their distribution has been fixed ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I hope that there will not be much longer delay in this matter.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

MR. WEBSTER : I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether it is proposed to take any steps to erect an architectural and suitable façade to the South Kensington Museum, in room of the present constructions ?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. H. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.) : Mr. Aston Webb's plans, which were approved by the late Government, will be placed in the Tea Room on Monday, and the hon. Member will then have an opportunity of forming an opinion upon them.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS (IRELAND).

MR. H. PLUNKETT (Dublin Co., S.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that much dissatisfaction prevails in the Registry of Deeds (Ireland), both in the Senior Staff and in the Second Division, with regard to the scale of pay and the stagnation of promotion ; and whether it would be possible to appoint some of these officials to posts in the Registry of Titles, as contemplated and specially provided for by the Local Registration of Title Act ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I have had inquiry made into the grievances alleged in my hon. Friend's question, and I am satisfied that neither the first and second classes of the staff nor the Second Division clerks in the Registry of Deeds Office in Dublin have fair ground of complaint. The organisation of the Registry is that of a Second Division office, and a certain number of staff posts will be added as the first and second class clerks of the old establishment disappear. As there are still 20 of these surviving, there will not for some time be any excuse for the creation of staff posts, and I am assured that no Second Division clerk is employed on work which would justify the creation of such a post. With regard to the recent increase of staff in the Registry of Titles, I find that it consists in part of posts requiring professional qualifications, and for the rest is composed of persons temporarily employed. I can see no possibility at present of transferring to it any members of the Staff of the Registry of Deeds.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) : I beg to ask the Attorney General whether "the rights existing at the passing of this Act," referred to in Section 10 of the Superannuation Act of 1887, include the customary prospects of promotion of Civil Servants ?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.) : "Customary prospects of promotion" cannot, I think, properly be called rights ; but, whatever they are, the Act of 1887 does not in any way affect them. It is conversant with an entirely different subject.

UGANDA.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have now come to a decision in regard to the affairs of Uganda ; whether he can state what that decision is ; whether further Papers can be presented on the subject ; and whether he can intimate any likelihood when time can be allotted for the consideration of the question in this House ?

SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon Honiton) : At the same time, I will ask the hon. Gentleman if the Papers relating to Uganda are ready for distribution and if he will endeavour to procure their issue without further delay ?

SIR E. GREY : The announcement of the decision of the Government with reference to Uganda will be made on Monday, and the late Sir G. Portal's Report will be distributed on Tuesday morning.

SUNDAY PREACHING IN CORK.

MR. BARTON (Armagh, Mid.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland

whether he proposes to take any steps to put an end to the scenes of violence and bloodshed caused by attacks of organised mobs in Cork streets on Sundays?

MR. J. MORLEY: During these painful and deplorable scenes the police have acted on careful instructions given to them, and I believe they have so acted as to win the approval of both Protestants and Catholics in the City of Cork. No doubt there have been complaints, and I have carefully inquired into the circumstances and read the Reports from the Constabulary, as well as the communications which have reached me from other parties concerned; but I confess I cannot say how I could give more careful instructions, or how those instructions could be more efficiently carried out than they have been. Everybody regrets that these scenes should have taken place, but there has been a enormous exaggeration. The hon. Member may rest assured that everything that can be done shall be done to bring the state of affairs to an end.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the great majority of the Protestants of Cork have expressed their disgust at these preaching performances at least as strongly as the Catholics?

MR. D. BARTON: I am suggesting a motion against the conduct of the police. I am merely asking what steps have been taken with reference to next Sunday?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Is it true that, notwithstanding the instructions given to the police, several of the citizens of Cork have been brutally assaulted by the police present, and no arrests made?

MR. J. MORLEY: There have, no doubt, been assaults committed in the course of these transactions. The police have the duty to perform of preventing anything which was illegal. What was illegal was obstruction, and they have done all they can to put that down. It is not a mere matter of making arrests, which under the circumstances is not an easy task. They might not always select the right persons. I believe they have acted with absolute impartiality and great judgment.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: In the case of the obstruction of a thoroughfare, is it the duty of the police to summon for obstruction?

MR. M. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the disturbances were got up for electioneering purposes?

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork) asked whether under the late Government similar difficulty arose at Arklow, and whether a clergyman who caused the obstruction was summoned and punished?

MR. J. MORLEY: I believe that persons were sent to prison in Arklow, but the effect was not to stop the street preaching, so I am not encouraged to take a similar course.

MR. CREAN (Queen's Co., Ossory): Have not the Catholic and Protestant Magistrates of Cork issued a proclamation calling on the preachers to cease?

MR. J. MORLEY: That is so. It is perfectly true that the great majority of both the Protestants and Catholics of Cork desire an end put to these proceedings.

THE SYSTEM OF "PAIRING."

MR. SEXTON: Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a question to you with reference to the records of the House as to the Division on the Second Reading of the East London Water Bill yesterday, the Second Reading being carried by a majority of one. I find that the name of the hon. Member for the Nuneaton Division of Warwickshire (Mr. Newdigate) is given as voting in the Division; and, with reference to the vote of that hon. Member, I have to call attention to the following statement which has been handed to me by one of the Whips of the Irish Party:—

"Mr. Blake (South Longford) and Mr. Newdigate (Nuneaton Division, Warwickshire), although paired with absent Members, were both in the House yesterday, and as Mr. Blake desired to take part in the Divisions I asked Lord Walter Lennox (Chichester Division, Sussex) early in the afternoon if he would agree that each of the hon. Gentlemen should be free to vote. He did not accept the proposal at the time; but after the bell had rung for the Division on the East London Water Bill, I met him at the door of the House and renewed the offer, to which he then consented. I asked him if the arrangement would apply to the Division about to take place, and he replied that there was not then time to inform Mr. Newdigate. I therefore sent word to that effect to Mr. Blake, who was in the Lobby prepared to vote, and he abstained from taking part in the Division. Mr. Newdigate's name appears in the List this morning as having voted on the opposite side."

It would therefore appear that Mr. Newdigate must have been released from his obligation by his Party, otherwise he could not have voted, whilst the Whip maintained the obligation in the case of Mr. Blake. I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the vote must be regarded as valid, and, if so, whether some explanation is not due to the House of the circumstances under which Mr. Newdigate recorded his vote?

*MR. SPEAKER: There is no official or Parliamentary recognition of the system of pairing. If the name of the hon. Member who voted wrongly had been struck off the List, it would in that event have been left to me, in my capacity as Speaker of the House, to give the casting vote in the Division. I do not wish to say what I should have done under the circumstances. The system of pairing is not recognised officially, and I can take no notice of the incident. It is a custom that has grown up owing to the convenience it affords to Members, and, of course, it is fully recognised by all that it must be conducted upon the most strictly honourable principles, which fact I am convinced has hitherto never been lost sight of by hon. Members. I have no doubt at all that the hon. Member for Warwickshire will be able to give a completely satisfactory explanation of the reason which induced him to vote, when, as a matter of fact, he was paired at the time of the Division, and was thereby precluded from recording his vote.

LORD W. LENNOX (Sussex, Chichester): By the indulgence of the House I should like to say one word in explanation of the question which has been raised by the hon. Gentleman. I think I shall be able to explain it at once, and it will be the shortest way if I say that both the hon. Member for Longford and also the hon. Member for North-East Warwickshire were paired for yesterday. They were paired with different people, and not with each other. An arrangement was arrived at between the Whips on both sides that when both those hon. Members arrived in the House they might take part in any Division that took place, and so counteract each other's votes. When the first Division took place I was not aware that the Member for North-East Warwickshire had arrived in the House, and I therefore asked that the hon. Member for Longford should not take part in that Division. It seems, however, that I was wrong in thinking that my hon. Friend had not arrived here. He had arrived at the House; he thought he was able to vote, and he accordingly took part in the Division. I can only say, Sir, that this was entirely due to a misapprehension, partly on the part of myself and partly on the part of my hon. Friend, and I am sure the House will be quite satisfied that it was through no want of courtesy to the House or courtesy to other hon. Members which made my hon. Friend take part in that Division. I may, perhaps, be allowed to say, Sir, that it is not altogether unprecedented for mistakes of that kind to occur; and I may, perhaps, be allowed to remind the House that on Tuesday last the hon. Member for West Fife (Mr. Birrell) took part in a Division as a Teller, although he, on that occasion, was paired with another hon. Member.

Mr. Sexton

MR. NEWDIGATE (Warwickshire, Nuneaton): I hope, with the indulgence of the House, I may be allowed to say one word on this question. On Wednesday I was assured that my "pair" for Thursday was off. Needless to say, had it not been for this intimation I should not have thought of voting; and I can only assure the House that I am most sorry I inadvertently voted in the Division.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): Would the Chief Secretary, for the convenience of the House, say when the Government propose that the Debate on the proposal for a Scotch Grand Committee should be resumed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): Perhaps, at the same time, the right hon. Gentleman will make any general statement it may be in his power to make as to the future course of Public Business.

MR. J. MORLEY: In the absence of the Leader of the House, I think I may announce that he proposes to move on Monday that Government Business shall have priority on Tuesdays, and that we shall propose to take Morning Sitting on Fridays. Of course, the Navy Estimates will be taken on Monday as promised, and the future course of the Scotch Debate will be settled in con-on with the duration of the Debate the Navy.

1. J. CHAMBERLAIN: How do the Government intend to take time of private Members?

2. J. MORLEY: For the present, events, up to Whitsuntide.

3. A. J. BALFOUR said, that he had not had time to see the general bearing of the Motion of which the Government gave such short notice, but if it did turn out, after an examination of precedents, that he and his friends thought the Government were very early in coming with the time of private Members there must be a long Debate.
Would that interfere with the Debate on Naval Estimates, on which they had promised a full discussion? And if time on Monday became limited though the cause he had mentioned, would further time be given?

4. J. MORLEY hoped that no prolonged discussion would be necessary on the Motion he had announced under the peculiar circumstances in which the House found itself. There was no disposition to grudge the proper time for a full discussion.

5. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) asked whether the Government would allow all Tuesdays irrespective of the day on which some Members had debated through the ballot? In some of the Motions which had obtained the first position many Members took a deep interest.

6. J. MORLEY replied that it would be more convenient to deal with the question when the Motion was discussed. He would, however, point out that the only form in which the Government could take the time of the House was that which he mentioned.

7. C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest Dean) understood that if there were particular topics standing first for debate in which general interest was shown, the Government would state their policy in connection with them on Monday.

8. J. MORLEY said, those were the reasons for Monday.

9. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Are the Government going to give up certain debates to their own friends and exclude other Members?

MR. J. MORLEY: I may assure the hon. Gentleman there is no intention of the kind.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to give notice that in consequence of the reply I have received to Question No. 18, I shall draw further attention to the matter by moving a reduction on the Irish Estimates.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 2.)

Read the third time, and passed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDER (HOUSING OF WORKING CLASSES) BILL.—(No. 3.)

As amended, considered; to be read
the third time upon Monday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.—(No. 1.)

As amended, considered; to be read
the third time upon Monday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 3) BILL.—(No. 122.)

Read a second time, and committed.

COCKENZIE FISHERY PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Sir G. Trevelyan, Bill to confirm an Order made by the Secretary for Scotland, under "The Sea Fisheries Act, 1868," relating to a several mussel fishery at Cockenzie, county of Haddington, ordered to be brought in by Sir
G. Trevelyan and the Lord Advocate.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 146.]

NORTH BERWICK PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.—(No. 89.)

Reported, without Amendment [Provisional Order confirmed]; Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES) (CHAIRMEN'S PANEL).

Sir John Mowbray reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had selected the following Six Members to be the Chairmen's Panel and to serve as Chairmen of the two Standing Committees to be appointed under Standing Order 49:—Sir Henry James, Mr. Henry
Matthews, Sir G. Osborne Morgan, Mr.
Arthur O'Connor, Sir Matthew White
Ridley, and Mr. Stansfeld.

Report to lie upon the Table.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

ROYALTY RENTS AND WAYLEAVES.

RESOLUTION.

MR. WOODS (Lancashire, Ince) rose to move—

“That this House is of opinion that the present system of Royalty Rents and Wayleaves is injurious to the great industries; that the evidence given before the Royal Commission on Mining Royalties goes to show the injurious nature of the present system; and this House is of opinion that the time has arrived when such Rents and Wayleaves should be acquired by the State.”

He said, this was one of the most important questions that could be discussed in the House of Commons, because to a considerable extent the question of mineral royalties and wayleaves depended upon the prosperity of our commerce and industries. They often had discussed in that House economic questions which raised the subject of foreign competition, but he asserted that there was no question which more concerned and affected the question of foreign competition than the question of mineral royalties. Practically speaking, so far as the working classes of this country were concerned, there were no two opinions on this question. There might be exceptions, but they were so small that the number was not worth noticing. This question was discussed at a recent Conference of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain at Leicester, where the subject was discussed not only as to the nationalisation of minerals, but also as to nationalisation of mines, and a resolution was carried almost unanimously in favour of the nationalisation of mines as well as minerals and wayleaves. For years past this question had been fully discussed by different sections of the working classes of the country. So far back as 1886, when the Trade Unions Congress met at Hull, his hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Durham moved an important resolution dealing with this question. The resolution was in the following terms:—

“That, in the opinion of this Congress, the royalty rents and other charges demanded by the landlords of this country are iniquitous and injurious. Iniquitous, because they form a monopoly of our mineral resources, where they should be used for the good of all. Injurious, because they place a tax upon our staple industries, interfering with, and hindering our commercial prosperity, restricting the profits of the capitalists, and limiting the already too small wages of the workman; and this Congress instructs the Parliamentary Committee to take immediate steps for instituting an inquiry into the character and amount of these royalties and charges with the object of making them national and not individual property.”

That resolution was carried unanimously by the Trade Unions Congress, representing directly 1,500,000 workers, and indirectly a much larger number. In 1888 a similar resolution was passed unanimously at Bradford. No doubt the recommendation of the Royal Commission would be quoted against his Resolution. With the view of anticipating that argument, he would quote the words of an hon. Member of that House whose opinion would carry great weight. He referred to the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), a gentleman whose experience on questions of this kind no one would be inclined to dispute for a single moment. Speaking at the National Miners' Conference in Manchester, on the 22nd of November, 1886, the hon. Member for Morpeth said—

“Why did the difference between Great Britain and other countries as to royalty rents exist? There were many reasons, but he believed the chief one was because in other countries on the Continent whatever other errors they might have committed they had taken care to retain their minerals as the property of the State. They had not allowed them to become the property of private individuals. That gave these countries a double benefit. They paid less; and what they did pay, instead of going into the pocket of private individuals, it went to the benefit of the State, and was used for the advantage of the community as a whole. That was the just and true principle to lay down in regard to minerals.”

He observed that the hon. Member formed a very important and conspicuous Member of the Commission that inquired into this subject, and he anticipated that the hon. Gentleman, who was going to move an Amendment to the Resolution, would quote the recommendation of the Commission as against the Resolution. But whatever might be the opinion of that Commission, in 1888 it was clear the hon. Member for Morpeth held the opinion the royalties should be the property of the State. In the Miners' Conference held in Birmingham, in March 1889, it was resolved every year that the Royal Commission be appointed to inquire into this subject), and at which there were present representing the County of Northumberland the hon. Member for Morpeth and his hon. Friend who represented the Wansbeck Division of Northumberland, Mr. Cowey, Yorkshire, moved, and Mr. Weir seconded, the following resolution:—

"In the name of the miners of the United Kingdom this Conference tenders its best thanks to Mr. T. Burt, M.P., for having succeeded in inducing the Government to grant a Royal Commission to inquire into the mineral royalty question, and expresses a hope that the Commission will be sufficiently wide in its scope to thoroughly deal with the questions, and will be composed of men in whom the miners and their leaders have confidence, and that the outcome of its labours may be the full and complete restoration of the minerals to the State."

He had quoted these statements and resolutions to show that, whatever might have been the opinion of the labour section of the Commission in the year 1894, at least some of the most prominent members held different opinions in 1889. His Resolution might be easily divided into three points: first, that the present system of paying royalty rents, &c., was injurious to the nation; second, that the evidence given before the Royal Commission went to prove this proposition; and third, as a consequence of this, he asked the House to affirm the opinion that the time had arrived when the State should acquire the minerals of the nation. Dealing with the first of these points, he contended that the present system, under private ownership, gave an unfair advantage to foreign competitors both in coal and iron in the markets of the world. According to the most reliable statements from the most experienced individuals, the average mineral royalties paid on coal in this country was 8d. per ton, while the royalty paid in France, Belgium, and Germany averaged 1½d. per ton, which went to the State in lieu of taxation. The average royalty paid on iron ore in this country was 3s. a ton, while on the Continent it was very little more than what now paid on coal. Last year 70,000,000 tons of coal were produced in this country, and an average royalty of 8d. per ton amounted to £5,500,000 sterling. On the Continent, a trifle over

£1,000,000 sterling was paid on the same production. It was evident, therefore, that the foreign employer occupied a position of unfair advantage as compared with the English capitalist. He wanted to point out to the House that these royalties were not always paid directly. They were paid very often indirectly in the shape of dead rents and other forms, and when these taxes of various kinds were levied upon employers they became a most serious impost upon industries, and tended very much to retard and cause depression of trade. He would give one illustration to show the nature of mineral royalties, and how oppressive they were upon the various industries. He would quote from the evidence given by Mr. Hewlett, the agent and principal Director of the Wigan Coal and Iron Company, and one of the most prominent colliery owners in Great Britain. Mr. Hewlett was examined before the Royal Commission on the 17th of June, 1890, and he then stated that the Wigan Coal and Iron Company had overpaid in minimum rents up to December 30th, 1890, £313,642. That was a payment for dead rents, and to a very great extent for coal that had not been obtained, and probably would not be obtained, during the continuance of the Company. He (Mr. Woods) contended that it was a complete fraud upon the Company to ask for a tax upon a commodity that had not been got and could not possibly be got during the working of the colliery by the Company. Mr. Hewlett further stated that the amount paid for coal under the minimum rent clauses of the leases and for coal which they had not been able to work was over £60,454. In some leases the lessor had the power to terminate the leases, and Mr. Hewlett stated that in one case a lease of 70 years was terminated at the end of the first half. On that lease they had overpaid for coal which they had not obtained £9,849. They had also built cottages and workshops on the tenure of the whole lease at a cost of £5,800, all of which was forfeited. Mr. Hewlett concluded his statement by saying that the modern leases in Lancashire were, in his opinion, more onerous than the older leases. He submitted that Mr. Hewlett's statements were in themselves sufficient to lead the House to take definite action with a view to reforming these tremendous abuses which pressed so heavily upon many industries. But, in order to make himself sure, he had written to another employer in Lancashire only last week and asked his private opinion as to the influence of mineral royalties and wayleaves upon his colliery, and he would quote from the reply he had received from this gentleman. ["Name!"] He did not know that he was at liberty to divulge the name, but he would show it to any hon. Member privately. This gentleman, who was an employer of 2,000 miners, wrote saying that he did not object to the principle of royalties provided they were reasonable, but in his experience for the last 20 years they had been considerably increased. During the years 1873-4, when there was a period of prosperity in the coal trade of this country, he had no hesitation in saying that many leases in Lancashire were granted on an increase of 50 per cent., and since then the lessors had endeavoured to maintain those abnormal prices. There were leases in his district (said the writer) where as much as 9½d. per ton was paid for common coal, which he considered very high. As for the wayleaves, he thought they ought to be abolished. The lessors were well paid for the surface land occupied by the colliery without seeking wayleaves. In South Lancashire up to 1873 the surface rent was 1d. per ton, and now it was 1½d., whilst in one case he knew of it was 2d. He (Mr. Woods) had quoted the statements of two of the largest colliery owners in Lancashire, and he verily believed that if he obtained the evidence of the whole of the owners in the country they would express a similar opinion. He would like now to point out the baneful effects of mineral royalties. He maintained that the present system of paying royalties and wayleaves often led to terrible strikes and lockouts. He knew one colliery where there was a prolonged strike, which lasted from October, 1889, to March, 1890, the point of dispute being that the collier wanted 5d. per ton more than the employer was able to give. One of the reasons given by the employer why he could not pay the price demanded by the workman was because of the high rent of the minerals. He knew that had been disputed, but it could be supported by a large deputation who had an interview with the employer to whom he referred. As to the baneful influence of wayleaves, he knew one colliery near Bolton where the colliery-owner offered to give £10 per acre for a right of way through certain land, but this was refused by the intermediate landlord, and the result was that an outlying field of coal could not be worked at all unless at the cost of sinking a new shaft. He knew another case in which the owner of a colliery wanted the use of a short road through an intervening property. The owner offered to pay 1s. per ton for the right of a single box to go over the land the road being only 60 yards long, and the offer was absolutely refused; so that in that case also the owner if he wanted to work the outlying coal seam must sink a shaft, which would put the Company to a very extensive loss indeed. He knew another colliery in the neighbourhood of Rochdale where the owner had to deal with no less than 20 landowners, and this meant very serious cost indeed, for the owner had to treat with every one of the landowners and get leases from them in order to get a right of way. His next point was that the evidence given before the Royalty Rents Commission proved the injurious nature of royalty rents and wayleaves, and the manner of taking and giving leases. After having critically examined the Report of the Royal Commission, he should say that at least 80 per cent. of the witnesses had distinctly stated that colliery rents and wayleaves were injurious to the coal and iron industries of this country. In the face of this strong testimony, he could not understand the tame recommendation which the Commission had made. He did not ask the House to find fault with the Commission which had been appointed to inquire into a difficult and extensive subject, but it struck him as singular that after the strong evidence which had been given the Commissioners did not, even in a Minority Report, give a proper judgment on the situation. In his opinion, the recommendations of the Commission were not only tame but harmless, and would not be productive of good to any class of the community. They said, first of all, that the present system of paying royalty rents had not interfered with the development of our mineral resources and had not interfered with the export trade. There would be difference of opinion on those points; but, however that might be, he submitted that the Commission was not appointed to inquire into the question of the development of our mineral resources or the extent of the export trade. It was appointed to inquire as to the effect of those mineral royalties and wayleaves and leases on the profits of employers and the wages of workmen, but they had not expressed an opinion on those two points. He came now to a more difficult matter—the question of a remedy—which had never been discussed in the House before. He had not the slightest doubt that there would be a great difficulty in arriving at a decision as to the remedy that should be applied. For the evils he had described he proposed a remedy which he believed was desired by 99 per cent. of the workmen. The proposal he made was that, seeing the injurious nature of these imposts upon our staple industries, the time had arrived for the State to procure the minerals of the nation. Nothing short of that would solve the question. He held it was a blot upon the civilisation of England, with all its power, wealth, and influence, that she should be at least a century behind France, Belgium, and Germany on the question of owning the minerals of the country. In those countries all the minerals belonged to the State, the proceeds went to the reduction of taxation, while in this country the large revenues derived from the same source went into the private pockets of individuals. He would not trouble the House with an historical disquisition on the manner in which the minerals of the country had got into the possession of private individuals. All he would say was, that the way in which this had come about formed a page of corruption and jobbery unparalleled in our history, except, perhaps, that of the Union between England and Ireland. But the question was, how could the latter part of his Resolution be carried out?—what was the remedy to apply? This was, no doubt, a difficult problem, but all our great economic questions were surrounded by difficulties, especially in the presence of so much poverty and destitution and competition in the country. The late Sir G. Elliot, while the recent unfortunate coal strike was in progress, propounded a scheme for buying up the mines and minerals of the country for £20,000,000 by a large syndicate of mine-owners, land-owners, colliery-owners, and miners. Under this scheme a price would be put on coal which would pay the landowner, give a collier a fair wage, and pay the mine-owner at least 15 per cent. on his capital. He could agree to that scheme provided they put the nation in the place of the syndicate. The late Mr. John Bright suggested that money should be borrowed at 3½ per cent. in order to relieve the Irish peasantry, and the same process might be adopted for raising the money for buying up the minerals of the country and thereby deriving benefit for the good of the State. He by no means was so extreme as to suggest that minerals should be confiscated. He would be the last man in the world to approve of the confiscation of anything that belonged to other individuals, but he maintained that unless the present owner of minerals could prove his right to them by purchase there could be no harm in the State taking back that which had been stolen from the nation in days gone by. His Resolution involved a great question, and the House of Commons ought to thresh the subject out thoroughly. He had several reasons for suggesting that the State should become the owner of the minerals of the country. In the first place, the State would be more sympathetic and show more humanity than many of the lessors had done in dealing with the difficulties of the colliery owners in working the minerals of the country. That opinion was very strongly expressed by most owners of mines, who declared they could get no redress from any of the lessors. His next reason for suggesting that the State should become the owner of the minerals was because he believed the present system was a serious loss and inconvenience both to employing and working-class communities, and consequently to the nation at large. He thought it would be admitted by any Member of the House, if it was proved—as he thought he had proved—that those mineral rights were injurious to the best interests of the nation, and brought about a serious loss and inconvenience to our great commercial undertakings, that it was the duty of the House to put those things right. In the third place, he believed that his Resolution, if carried, would give almost universal satisfaction to the community outside. He hoped that hon.

Mr. Woods

he rose to second the resolution, but would do so with some difficulty after the very able, lucid, and instructive speech to which the House had just listened. He somewhat unexpectedly had to take the place of the hon. Member for the North Lonsdale Division of Lancashire, who would have seconded the Motion if he had not been called away by a domestic bereavement, and who would have dealt more especially with the injurious effects of the present system on the iron and steel industries of the North of England. He, for his part, would to a great extent have to confine himself to the effect which the mining royalties had on the coal trade of South Wales; but before doing so he would quote one sentence from Sir Isaac Lowthian Bell's book on iron and steel manufacture, which dealt with the iron trade of the North of England, though he admitted that since that book was published there had been some reduction of royalties and consequent improvement in the position of the trader. Sir Isaac Lowthian Bell estimated the royalties on a ton of pig iron, including, of course, those on the ore, the limestone, and the coal for smelting at about 3s. 6d. per ton in the Cleveland District, 6s. in Scotland, and 6s. 3d. in Cumberland; while in Germany the rate was only 6d. per ton; in France, 8d. per ton; and in Belgium 1s. 3d. per ton. When they remembered the enormous transactions in pig iron, who worked got less than half was paid in royalties. The royalties were, unfortunately, on a national point of view, mainly on private individuals. According to law as it stood, the owner of the face of the land claimed from the earth to the sky, or, in more emphatic language, from "another place." In England of 38,000,000 persons held 2,000,000 acres of land, 1 persons held a quarter of England and Wales. In Scotland a quarter of land was held by 24 persons. He bore in mind that it was no millions of money derived from royalties on coal and other minerals worked that we had to consider also the enormous values of the minerals underneath the surface of the land, which had been taken from the nation, and now claimed by a comparatively small number of private individuals. What was the present system? The minerals were claimed by those who, as a rule, discovered their existence, but who nor invented the means of winning them, nor extracted them from the land by their labour, nor indirectly from the capital. On the contrary, when the mineral owner won, he risked his happiness, health, and even ended his days, if not in the work, very close to it. The colliery owner lost his money, and frequently, by a royalties; if bad times came he had his dead rent charges, and if the colliery owner went into bankruptcy the mineral owner put in a preferential claim, seized all the property, waited for better times, and sold again. He would give one example. There was a colliery in Wales and Monmouthshire which for the workers meant the grave of 268 men, and for the colliery proprietors a loss, it was said, of £500,000. But how did the royalty owner fare? For years he drew large sums yearly in royalties and rents, and the mine having been subsequently to the explosion re-opened thousands a year were again being received for royalties, &c. Then they came to the amount of the royalties. One hon. Gentleman had said that they amounted to 8d. per ton on the coal. According to the Royal Commission, however, it was 5½d. The figures were challenged at the time, and he thought that the Commission were far under the mark. Still, 5½d. per ton would serve his purpose. In 1892 the total amount of coal worked was 181,000,000 tons. The royalties on that amount, at 5½d. a ton, came to over £4,000,000. Surely that was a pretty good draft on the commercial enterprise of the country for coal alone. The question of wayleaves was of equal importance as hampering the working of the minerals. Wayleaves had been described as "the key of the coal cellar," and the landholder had the power, and often did enforce, more money for the key of the cellar than the coal in it was worth. Of course, so long as royalties were in the hands of an individual, it was only human nature that he should demand his royalty, and as things stood at present his royalty must come first. In his opinion, however, that was a wrong position. A living wage for the collier should come first—a generous and liberal living wage—because if there was one man more than another who ought to be paid well for his work it was the miner who spent his days delving in the bowels of the earth for a necessity of human existence. Next, he would put the interest on the capital invested, and the royalty third. He invariably sympathised with colliers in their struggles against a reduction of wages, and if he were a collier he would strenuously resist a reduction in his wages if the royalties were not reduced first. Then came the still more important point, and that was the terms on which the minerals were to be acquired. He would like to be fair to the mine-owners, but there must be fair play for the nation as well. They must not lose sight of the fact that there was wrong perpetrated in bringing about the present position of land-holding in all its phases. Landowners' Parliaments had legislated in the interest of land-holders, and he now wished to see a people's Parliament legislate in the interest of the nation as a whole. He did not say that the land and minerals should be wrested from the landowners, but he maintained that a fair balance-sheet should be struck between them and the nation. If this country was to retain her commercial supremacy, or perhaps even her commercial existence, it was absolutely impossible that the present system should go on. When they looked at the vast amount of money in this country in the shape of unearned increment in land values and minerals and the royalties almost entirely going into the pockets of private individuals they could understand, from an economic point of view, why there was bound to be on the other side vast poverty and misery. At the present day, whilst fabulous fortunes were being made by some, the struggle for existence not only amongst labourers, but amongst shopkeepers, tradesmen, commercial men, merchants and even professional men, was a continuous and desperate one. It was absurd that in a great and wealthy country like England there should be those extremes of enormous fortunes and absolute poverty. Could it be said that such a system was right, and for the national advantage? And if the existing land laws were not right, and were not to the national advantage, what was to be done? He would refer the House on this subject not to a Trafalgar Square speaker, not to a platform orator unrestrained by responsibility and addressing a meeting of his friends and admirers, but to an address by the highest legal dignitary in the land—the Lord Chief Justice—who, in addressing a meeting of the Juridical Society in Scotland, used the following language with reference to the land laws:—

"These Land Laws," he said, "might be for the general advantage, and if they could be shown to be by all means they should be maintained; but if not, does any man, with anything he is pleased to call his mind, deny that a state of law under which such mischief could exist, under which the country itself would exist not for its people, but for a mere handful of them, ought to be instantly and absolutely set aside?"

The Radicals of the country wanted to get at the root of this question. They held that the present system was not right, and was not to the national advantage, and, that being so, it ought to be dealt with in the way suggested by the Lord Chief Justice—that was, "instantly and absolutely set aside." It was only by a greater and wider distribution of wealth that the happiness of the country would be brought about; and Parliament would do well not to shirk dealing with these important questions whilst they had an opportunity of doing so on reasonable conditions. No well-meaning workman, tradesman, professional man, landowner, or wealthy squire need have any fear of a programme that would do something towards removing the misery and destitution that was in our midst, and to uplift that wretched stratum of society, the existence of which was a disgrace to the country, to civilisation, and to humanity. A celebrated writer a fervent speaker, and a generous-hearted democrat, whose name and teachings, however, were not appreciated by the propertied classes in this country, in one of his speeches before the Financial Reform Association made use of this excellent sentiment—

"I would rather be a citizen of the smallest Republic; I would rather be a citizen of the most insignificant city where all have an opportunity of leading a healthy and decent life, rather than I would be a citizen of the most magnificent Empire where the luxury of the few is in close proximity to the destitution of the many."

We want this noble sentiment impressed upon the hearts and minds of our statesmen and public men, and if to-day he had only said one word that would lead the House to take a greater and a generous interest in this question he would consider that a by no means unimportant triumph had been achieved.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"This House is of opinion that the present system of Royalty Rents and Wayleaves is injurious to the great industries, that the evidence given before the Royal Commission on Mining Royalties goes to show the injurious nature of the present system; and this House is of opinion that the time has arrived when such Rents and Wayleaves should be acquired by the State,"—(Mr. Woods),

—instead thereof.

Mr. Burnie

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge), who had the following Amendment on the Paper, but which he was precluded from moving:—

"To leave out all the words after the second word 'that,' and insert the words 'it is expedient that any legislation which may be proposed to this House on the subject of Royalty Rents and Wayleaves should be based upon and in accordance with the recommendations of the Commissioners appointed in 1889 to inquire into the subject of Mining Royalties, who, after a searching investigation, extending over nearly four years, arrived at unanimous conclusions on all points, and have recently reported their conclusions and recommendations to this House,'" said, he had listened with the greatest interest and attention to the two speeches which had been made. So far as the object of the Mover and Seconder of the Motion was to improve the condition of the miners—so far as it was a humanitarian object—he thoroughly sympathised with it, but he utterly failed to understand how hon. Members hoped to accomplish that object. He failed to understand what they really meant. The hon. Member for Luce laid down two propositions—first, that the present system of royalties and wayleaves was injurious; and secondly, that the evidence, not the Report, of the Royal Commission supported that view; and then, in the third place, he advocated a remedy of his own which was not supported either by the Evidence or Report of the Commission. The Commission asked no fewer than 20,360 Questions, they sat four years, and they produced five enormous Blue Books, so large that to get at the evidence was really a matter of mining, and a very serious matter of mining. No one could say that the Commission was an unfair one. He had analysed it, and found that it was fairly constituted. There were six members on it who were not at all interested in mines; eight who were mineral lessees (not proprietors); four who were partly interested as or on behalf of proprietors, and partly as or on behalf of lessees; and three Representatives of the working miners—namely, the hon. Member for Morpeth, the hon. Member for the Rhondda Valley, and Mr. Chisholm Robertson. The Commission took evidence at great length, and now the hon.

ember for Ince came forward and said at these people were quite incompetent to draw up a Report, that their Report was wrong and contrary to the evidence. He said, in effect, We ask the House of Commons to reverse that Report and say it was not in accordance with the evidence, and we oppose certain things against which the commissioners unanimously reported." What was the state of affairs? The hon. Member in support of his Motion had brought forward certain cases—some of them, no doubt, very strong—but they were anonymous. He did not say where they were, and he did not say whether the people interested had given evidence before the Royal Commission or not. If they had not given evidence, why was it? Why did they make Members in his House their mouthpiece rather than make their statements before the proper tribunal? If they did give evidence, then clearly it was not believed, but that advanced on the other side was preferred to it. The hon. Member said that one of the strongest reasons why they should go in for the nationalisation of the mines was that the hon. Member for Morpeth in the year 1886 said he was in favour of that policy. But the Commission commenced its labours in 1889 and sat for four years, reporting last year; and after hearing the evidence the hon. Member for Morpeth changed his mind, and signed the Report, which said that nationalisation was impracticable, and not to be recommended. Did the hon. Member for Ince, as a candid man, prefer the opinion of the hon. Member for Morpeth before he had informed his mind to the opinion he entertained after he had heard the evidence given to the Commission? But he (Mr. Griffith-Boscawen) did not wish merely to take advantage of the peculiar position the hon. Member for Ince occupied in this matter. He would like to deal with the hon. Member's main contention. It was said that the system of royalties hampered Englishmen as compared with foreigners. So that he would apply the practical test of figures. He did not suppose that the hon. Member who put forward that view meant that it gave the foreigner an unfair advantage in our own markets, for very little foreign coal came into this country—though there were imports during the late deplorable general strike. The hon. Member must have referred to our export trade. But the figures adduced before the Royal Commission proved that between 1865 and 1884 our exports of coal to Germany increased from 1,456,000 tons per annum to 2,485,000, or 74 per cent.; to France, from 1,589,000 to 4,367,000, or 175 per cent.; and to Belgium, from 21,310 to 295,549, or 1,280 per cent. The hon. Member had said that figures might be given showing that an increase had taken place, but it had only been pari passu with the increase in population. Well, he (Mr. Griffith-Boscawen) would be sorry to hear that the population had increased by 1,280 per cent. But to prove that royalties hampered our foreign trade the hon. Member must show two things: (1) that royalties entered largely into the price of coal; that royalties were higher in England than abroad. How far did royalties enter into the price of coal? In good times, when prices were very high, the price was absolutely independent of the cost of production. Perhaps it would be urged that in bad times the average royalty did enter into the price of coal; but that argument was most fallacious. Royalties were not a fixed rent on all coal alike. They marked the difference between mine and mine. If the mine were very favourably situated and produced excellent coal, then the royalty would be high; but if the mine were badly situated and produced poor coal, the royalty would be very low; so that, as a matter of fact, only the minimum royalty could enter into the cost of production. This was shown by Mr. McCreath, in Question 13,181—

"In bad times, when the collieries could just get on, how far would the royalties enter into the selling price?"

He replied—

"Not much, to the extent of the smallest royalty I should say.—Q. You would say up to the lowest royalty in the district? A. Yes."

And Mr. Daglish, President of the North of England Institute of Civil Engineers, was asked—

Q. 9665. "Supposing all the royalties were to be by a stroke of the pen abolished to-morrow, what would be your idea of the result? A. That the lessees of the better collieries would put the difference between their royalty and the lowest into their pockets.—Q. To what extent would the public be benefited? A. It would have no effect in the present prosperous times.—Q. We will take a time in which there might be some public benefit, to what extent would you put it? A. In very depressed times the public would get the whole of the advantage the limit

Royalty Rents

{COMMONS}

ould be 13d.—Q. That being the t which a colliery is now worked
A. Yes."

maintain that royalties hindered ade abroad, it must be proved royalties abroad were lower than e here. The hon. Member who ed the subject put foreign royalties a ton. Abroad the mines were by the State, and concessions were at a charge to the concessionaires came to about 1½d. per ton. But the concessionaire sub-let his con-on to men who worked the colliery stood to him just as the owner er in this country stood to the owner royalties. If the hon. Member for e disputed that he (Mr. Griffithseawen) had ample evidence with him prove it. Mr. W. Gill, General anager of the Oronera Mining Comany at Bilbao in Spain, said—

"A concessionaire does not usually himself work the minerals. About one-third do and two-thirds do not. Sometimes he sells out and out; sometimes leases."

Later on he said—

"The leases are purely of an English form.
The conditions are payment of an annual royalty of so much per ton, an annual minimum dead rent usually with power to surrender the mine before the term of the lease expires, provided it becomes exhausted."

Q. "What do these payments amount to?—
A. You could not get a mine for 10d., nor a good mine for 1s. 3d."

Mr. Broomhead, of Sheffield, who was also connected with a Spanish Company, gave similar evidence, and stated that the royalties in Spain were actually higher than the royalties in this country. The second position of the hon. Member, which was that our system hampered us in regard to foreign trade, had therefore fallen to the ground; and the Commission were right in declaring that our foreign trade had not been affected in the slightest degree by royalties. But there was another point. The hon.
Member was very anxious to prove that royalties affected wages, and therefore strikes. He seems to think that if there were less royalties to pay or if his scheme was taken up strikes would be averted. The same argument applied in this case. What did wages depend upon? He imagined that they depended chiefly upon prices, and if royalty did not enter into the selling price of coal to a very small extent, it could not affect wages either;

therefore it was absurd to they abolished royalties strikes would less frequent. The hon. Member opposite said that it was a monstrous thing on the part of a master to propose a reduction of wages whilst royalties were being paid. The hon. Member apparently did not know that in bad times royalties were reduced or taken off altogether. In the case of a poor mine in times of keen competition a lessor was nearly always ready to take a smaller royalty, because were he to refuse to do so the mine might have to be shut up, and then he would get no royalty at all.
Abundant evidence of that was supplied by the Report of the Royal Commission.
There was, for instance, the evidence of Mr. Evans, representing the miners of the Rhondda Valley, who stated that he knew a colliery where the dead rent had been reduced from £4,000 to £1,000 a year, and where the landlord wiped out a debt of £22,000 and reduced the royalty to 5d. He did not attempt to prove that under this system everything went right, but a certain latitude was given by it by which it was possible for the royalty to be reduced in a few particular cases, which would enable these cases to carry on; whereas if there was a uniform system, and they had to deal with the State instead of private individuals, the chances were that the royalty would not be reduced in these particular cases, and these mines would have to shut up in consequence of bad times. But it was absurd to contend that royalties were the cause of the closure of mines. Bad times were the result of over-production, and then some mines must close, whether they paid royalties or not. Supposing that all royalties were abolished, what would happen? Immediately those mines which were in a disadvantageous position, and paid less royalty, would be unable to compete with the better placed mines, and they would have to stop at once. The result would be that the men working in these mines would be thrown out of work. That was a material point, and he put it forward in the interests of the miners. As to the proposal for the nationalisation of mines, the hon.
Member told them that no less than 99 per cent. of the working miners were in favour of it, and that the Miners' Association had unanimously carried a resolution in favour of it. If that was the case should like to ask the hon. Gentlemen

W this paragraph appeared in the Report of the Commission—

"The suggestion for the nationalisation of minerals was not approved by most of the representatives of the miners. No such suggestion in favour of the nationalisation of minerals made by any Association representing the mines, and those witnesses whom we examined were in favour of the present law as to mineral property."

These resolutions were carried how was they did not come before the Royal Commission, which reported that most of the representatives of the miners were opposed to the proposal of nationalisation? He would like to ask the hon. Member what he meant by nationalisation? When he talked about the nationalisation of mines and minerals did he mean that the State was to take over the minerals and to lease the mines to those who now worked them? If so, the system of royalties would remain, the only change being that the State would have taken the place of the private owner. If the hon. Member meant that the State was to work the mines itself the cost to the taxpayers would be enormous. One witness before the Commission estimated it at £100,000,000. Then, if the State was to take over the mines or minerals, or both, compensation must be given, and it was difficult to see what advantage would accrue from such a procedure. Of course, if compensation were not given, then it was simply a piece of robbery, and, to use a parallel with the hon. Member's remark, the most monstrous thing that had happened since the Government introduced the Resolution for dealing with Scotch Bills. The hon. Member, however, held a different view, and he said he would except some rights. He said, for instance, that where private individuals in days gone by stole a mine he did not see why they now should not steal it back. If the hon. Member was going to set himself up to prove where a man had stolen a mine and successfully carried out that purpose he would have accomplished more than the Commission were able to do. They must either give compensation or not. If they did, the State would simply buy people out and would have to raise that amount of money, and then, he supposed, work the mines at a profit to itself. If they did not give compensation then it was sheer robbery, and he failed to understand why they should be asked by the hon. Member to rob one class of property and should not be asked at the same time to rob every other class. He quite failed to see that any distinction could be drawn between property in minerals and other kinds of property. Before the Commission one of the miners' representatives stated that there were working men who bought land, subject to mineral rights, for building or for agricultural purposes. Where working men had bought land in mineral districts was their property in the minerals to be taken from them without payment? The Report of the Commission was adverse to nationalisation, and he trusted that the House would take the same view. As the Commissioners pointed out, there were, of course, some defects in the present system, but they could be removed by legislation? On the subject of wayleaves, for example, the Commissioners made several valuable suggestions. The Report of the Commission dealt one by one with the objections to the present system, and made recommendations which he thought the House would be well advised in carrying out. He asked the House, therefore, not to pass the Resolution, but to adopt his Amendment, which he hoped might be the machinery of really useful, practical, and beneficent legislation.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) thought that the particular form which the Resolution had taken was due probably to the recent occurrences in Yorkshire, which had the effect of paralysing for a considerable period a great deal of the trade of England, and necessarily called public attention to the question of property in minerals and the way in which private owners had used their proprietary rights. He thought his hon. Friends, however, had somewhat misunderstood the use of a Resolution of this House. The hon. Member who seconded the Resolution told them that the value of it was that it would draw attention to a particular subject. He, for one, protested against the House of Commons being regarded as a species of elevated discussion forum for bringing forward matters in no sense ripe for legislation. The Resolution suggested that this House was of opinion that the time had arrived when mining rents and wayleaves should be acquired by the State. That was a question of enormous importance, and one upon which it was very possible to hold very varying opinions. As to one part of that sentence—namely, as to whether the time had arrived at which the State should make this purchase there could be but one opinion. Although they did not know what the contents of the coming Budget would be, yet they knew enough to feel perfectly certain that the financial condition of the country was not such as to enable them to enter into very large commercial transactions or speculations at the present moment. He therefore regretted the insertion of the concluding part of the Resolution, because he thoroughly agreed with the former part of it. Although many of them might think the Royal Commissioners might have gone further in some of their recommendations, yet those that they had made were very important, and were such that the House would do well to give effect to in legislation at the earliest possible moment. As he had said, he should like to have seen the Resolution limited to the earlier part of it, and the portion which dealt with the great question of the nationalisation of mines omitted from it, because he thought they might probably have been able to pass the first part of the Resolution, and have done something to be of use. If he understood their procedure correctly, when that House passed a Resolution by a majority and the Government assented to the Resolution, it was intended that the Government should give effect to the opinion of the House by bringing in legislation to carry out the Resolution of the House. He did not suppose that even the most advanced Member of the Government was prepared with a scheme to buy the whole of the mineral property of this country, and he was quite sure most of their supporters would be very much surprised if the Leader of the House were to introduce any scheme of the kind at the present moment. Having referred to the recommendations of the Commission as to wayleaves, and expressed his concurrence with their suggestions, the hon. Member said the recommendation to which he wished to draw particular attention was the one where the Commissioners, in effect, advised that some tribunal should be established which should be enabled to fix a fair sum in respect to wayleaves where the parties were unable to determine the price, and to deal with the various disputes and difficulties that arose between the owner of the minerals and the person who was working the mineral property. The Commissioners seemed to think there should be some commercial tribunal established to deal with difficulties as to royalties and wayleaves. One of the great difficulties they had in this country was that experienced in their Courts in dealing with commercial matters. He did not know whether it was that lawyers were Constitutionally unable to deal, as a general rule, satisfactorily with commercial difficulties; but whether dealing with railway rates, Railway Commissions, or ordinary commercial cases, it was a sad fact that the commercial community had, to a certain extent, withdrawn their confidence from the Courts of Law. He regretted that this should be so. The recommendation of the Commission pointed to what he had long thought a necessity in this country, and that was something in the nature of a commercial tribunal which would deal with matters such as wayleaves, disputes as to mining royalties, and various other commercial questions. He was glad that this Resolution had been brought forward—though he objected strongly to the form—because it would give an opportunity to those hon. Members familiar with mining matters to emphasise the valuable recommendations which had been made by the Commissioners. He should be glad if the Resolution could be so altered in form as to enable it to be adopted by the Government, who could then direct their attention to the recommendations made by the Royal Commissioners, so that the mining industry of the country might at once obtain some relief which would be of benefit to it. Most of them thought that it was more important at the present time in the mining as well as in other industries to do something which would be of value and help to the commercial community rather than that they should speculate with regard to speculative matters such as the nationalisation of land and the State purchase of mines, and that they should use their time in something practical and useful instead of in discussing questions which at present, at any rate, were not ripe for legislation.

Mr. Dodd

*MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) said, that as the only Member of the Royal Commission present in the House, he uld like to occupy its attention for a minutes. He regretted the absence the hon. Members for Morpeth and ondda, who were most valuable members of that Mining Commission, who ended to its deliberations and evidence st carefully, and who, like all the er members of the Commission, gned with absolute unanimity the Re-rt which had been laid before the ouse. The hon. Member who spoke st was inclined to quarrel with e Report of the Commission be- use it was unanimous, and imputed eakness to the Royal Commissioners cause they did not recommend drastic anges, and because there was no inority Report. Might he suggest at the unanimity of the Report was ie to the strength of the evidence which e Commission received, and not to the eakness of the Commissioners. What e wanted to say was that the unanimity f the Commission was remarkable. The ommission as constituted was a many- ided Commission. The three interests ainly involved—those of the mineral owners, the coal owners, and the work- ng miners—were represented on the Commission, but he did not hesitate to ay that of these three interests the one most strongly represented, not merely numerically, but also intellectually and by practical experience, was the interest of the working miners. But besides the representatives of the miners, the Commission included Mr. David Dale, Professor Munroe, and Mr. Reddington, the well-known Irish Nationalist; and if a Commission composed of such diverse elements could come to a unanimous conclusion, surely the inference to be drawn was not that the evidence was in the direction which the hon. Member suggested, but that it must have been overwhelming in the other direction. No complaint was made by the lessees, or by the organisations of the lessees, to the Commission against the work- ng of the present system as a whole, although there were complaints in in- dividual cases of excessive royalties being exacted. The Commission would ave liked to see the system of a sliding scale in mining royalties universally pplied, and it was noteworthy that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the largest owners of minerals in England, had n all their recent leases introduced he sliding scale, which worked with more apparent equity than a fixed mining royalty. In bad times the mineral owners suffered with others, and had to lighten their demand. The miners hoped that if the State took possession of the mines there would be a larger production of coal in the country, but he thought the facts and the evidence given before the Commission proved most conclusively that, under the present system, the production of coal in this country had been extraordinarily rapid and progressive. The rate of production of coal in Great Britain was enormously in excess of that in Belgium, Germany, and France, where the State owned the minerals, the increase in the United Kingdom in 10 years being greater than the total production in France and Belgium, and equal to one-half the production in Germany. It was, therefore, impossible to believe, in the face of these figures, that the present system tended to check production in Great Britain. This was not the only country in which there was private ownership of minerals. The system had been adopted in the United States and in all our Colonies, and in the United States there had in the last 20 or 30 years been a most extraordinary development of mining industry, notwithstanding the fact that the royalties paid in the United States were higher than those paid in the United Kingdom. There had been no sort of movement in the United States against the system. The evidence from there was all in favour of private owner- ship. It was not the fact that the present system of royalties injuriously affected miners' wages. In 1890 the average wage of the miner in France was £53; in Belgium it was £48; in Germany, £53; while in this country it was £71, and it must be remembered that the miners in this country worked under better con- ditions than those abroad. The Royal Commission reported in favour of the present system, but did not enter upon a detailed consideration of the practicability or possibility of the nationalisation of minerals, because, in their judgment, no sufficiently definite scheme to that end was brought to their notice. But, as such a scheme had been indicated by the hon. Member for the Ince Division, he asserted un- hesitatingly that Conservatives of all kinds of opinion had very strong theoretical and practical objections to any scheme which would add to the responsibilities of the State in this vast industry. He hoped that the Amendment would be supported, and that the Government would speedily give effect to the positive recommendations of the Commission.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I do not think any hon. Member can complain that the hon. Member for Ince has introduced such an important topic, and one so well worthy the consideration of the House, or of the Amendment which has been moved by the hon. Member opposite in what we must regard as a temperate speech. But we cannot treat a Resolution such as my hon. Friend has proposed as a mere expression of opinion; we must deal with it as a practical proposal which, if the Government assented to it and the House approved it, it would be the duty of Parliament to carry out. My hon. Friend makes in his Resolution the definite statement

“that the time has arrived when such rents and wayleaves should be acquired by the State.”

The proposal deals with a matter which has formed the subject of a long and laborious investigation by a particularly able Royal Commission, which was composed with the greatest impartiality. Three members of that Commission are well-known as having been practically working miners themselves, and as having been associated for years with the representation of the miners' interest in and out of the House of Commons. The Commission presented a unanimous Report, and my hon. Friend asks us to reverse that unanimous finding. That is a very strong position for any Member of the House to take up. I am to a considerable extent in sympathy not only with the general object of his view, but with the point of view from which he approaches the question. I think it was a misfortune that the State lost its control over the minerals, and I cannot help thinking that, if the transfer had not taken place, we should now have found ourselves in possession as a community not only of a very valuable source of revenue, but of the means to control a large industry upon which the prosperity and welfare of the nation and its commercial predominance must largely depend.

Mr. Whitmore

But it is no use lamenting what has taken place in the past. What we have to do is to deal with the actual situation, and I ask my hon. Friend to consider what his proposal amounts to. I would ask what is the proposal of the hon. Gentleman? According to the Report of the Commission, the rents and wayleaves with which he proposes to deal amount, at this moment, to the annual sum of about £5,000,000 sterling. It is obvious that unless the State acquires the mining of minerals not only open, but unopen, throughout the length and breadth of Great Britain and Ireland, you would only be dealing with the matter piecemeal, and you would have, side by side with State ownership, private ownership. What does that amount to? It amounts, in the opinion of the best and most sober-minded authorities, to a capital expenditure of £150,000,000 sterling. My hon. Friend may dispute my figures upon the ground that the £150,000,000 sterling—I am only using rough figures—will only be needed if you compensate the existing owners on what he would regard as extravagant terms. I followed with great care what my hon. Friend said on this point, but I am not sure I altogether understand his position. He said he would give compensation where the present owner can prove his title by purchase or some other legitimate means. I understand a man proving his title by purchase, but what are the other legitimate means to which he refers? Suppose the origin of a man's title, which may have come from his grandfather or father, or which may have been continued in his family for generations and centuries, is lost in obscurity, and that it is impossible at this distance of time to prove that his title had what I may call an honourable origin, then arises the serious question, Is he or is he not to be compensated? If the State is to step in it must be on the terms of paying fair and reasonable compensation to those who are at present entitled; and the moment you have established that principle you land yourselves, as I say, in a capital expenditure which would be something like a quarter or more than a quarter of our National Debt. I ask my hon. Friend what profit the State would derive from the transaction; how would it recoup itself? I do not think any case whatever has been made out for the proposed change. I am not going to use my own words in such a matter when I find, as I do in this Report, a most careful analysis of the evidence by a man in whose judgment I place every confidence—the hon. Member for Morpeth, whose absence is due to the fact that he has gone to Newcastle to take part in the formation of a Wage Board for Northumberland and Durham, and not to any disposition on his part to shrink from the full responsibility of his position. After stating that the lessees had practically made no complaint whatever of the royalty system, the hon. Member (Mr. Burt) said that the Commissioners went on to say that, on the other hand, some of the representatives of the miners did urge that, owing to the inability or unwillingness of the mine-owners to reduce the royalties, wages had fallen, strikes had been caused, and collieries had been closed. What do the Commissioners say? That—

“The witnesses, however, frankly admitted that their information upon the subject was imperfect, as they had not the means of knowing accurately the transactions between lessors and lessees. We entertain no doubt of the good faith of their representations, and we endeavoured to ascertain the facts in respect to the particular cases cited. We found that in some of them the real cause of the stoppage of the mines in question was not the pressure of royalties. It would be occupying too much space in our Report to enter into the details of these cases, but a summary of the evidence with regard to them will be found in Appendix IV. Without going so far as to say that no such cases have occurred, we believe that they have been extremely rare, and that where mines have been closed it has generally arisen from other causes than excessive royalties. Mr. R. Young, whom we examined as the representative of the Northumberland miners, said truly that ‘lessors generally find it to their advantage to reduce royalties when they find that a reduction is absolutely necessary for the continued working of the mines.’”

Those are the facts under the existing system, as the Report has pointed out. Do not let it be supposed that I or the Government in whose name I speak are in any way blind to the defects of the existing system, which the Report has pointed out, or that we will show any slackness in giving effect to the recommendations of the Commission on the subject. I myself take the view strongly that where you have, in an industry such as mining, three different interests—the interest of the owner of the raw material, if I may so call it; the interest of the capitalist who is working the raw material; and the interest of the miner who is actually engaged in hewing or winning it—and where from unforeseen causes the profits fall, the burden of the loss ought to be equally distributed among the various interests concerned. I think the system under which one of these interests escapes scot-free while the other two have to divide between them the whole burden is a system that is not reconcilable with justice or with common sense. I think there are cases, I do not say they are very common, but they are sufficiently numerous to be well worthy the attention of Parliament, in which under the existing system the royalty owner does escape. Unfortunately, it has been the practice in many of our mining districts, at any rate, to have a fixed royalty—a dead rent first of all, and then a royalty if the amount raised exceeds the amount of the dead rent—going on for 30 or 40 or 50 years, with no provision in the lease for anything that might happen in the interval. A very great authority, one of the greatest in the country (Sir Lowthian Bell), said that in his opinion it would be very much better to have a sliding scale than to have this system of fixed royalties. I believe that to be the opinion and experience of a very large number of colliery owners in Great Britain. I do not say that is a matter in which Parliament can compulsorily interfere, but I cannot help thinking the adoption of the sliding scale instead of the mechanical rule of dead rent and fixed royalty would very largely ease mining transactions, and tend to shift the burden to where it ought in fairness and equity to be. That possibly is a matter beyond the power of Parliament to deal with, but there are other matters which are not to which the Commissioners have referred. I will only state two or three of them very briefly. In the first place, I think it is pre-eminently necessary, where you have a dead rent, and where the lessee, working with reasonable skill and energy, is unable to produce an amount of coal in the year sufficient to work out that dead rent—a case of what is technically known as “shorts”—but where he is entitled to recoup himself in the succeeding year for that deficiency, then, when you come to the end of the lease, the mine owner ought not to be allowed to keep in his pocket the amount of royalty which, in fact, has been overpaid through the inability of the lessee to work it out. I agree with the recommendation of the Commissioners that there should be established some tribunal—I do not say how it should be constituted—to which, in cases of this kind, reference might be made in order that that great injustice might be prevented. It is a more doubtful and disputable question whether there should be power in the same tribunal to permit temporary reductions in cases of unforeseen calamity or accident. That, also, is a matter well worthy the consideration of the Legislature. There is a third point in which the Commissioners, I am glad to see, expressed a clear and unfaltering judgment, to which I attach great importance—namely, that there should be no unreasonable restriction allowed by law to the free alienation of mining leases. A mining lease is quite a different thing from an agricultural lease. Although in form it is a lease, it is in fact a purchase. A lessee who has thus effected a purchase should have the same free disposition of his property as an ordinary purchaser of land has, and should not be subject to unreasonable refusals on the part of the lessor to permit him to assign his interest. All those points are well worthy of consideration with the view to legislation. I agree entirely with my hon. Friend (Mr. Woods) in what he has said on the subject of wayleaves. I think a clear case has been made out on the evidence before the Commission for legislating with regard to the existing system of wayleaves. I see no difference whatever in principle between the compulsory powers which this House constantly allows to Railway Companies, and other undertakings which require to be incorporated by Act of Parliament, and the case of the private owners or private undertakers who are carrying out an industry so important to the community as the mining industry. When it is shown that the owner solely by the unreasonable and arbitrary use of his monopoly prevents the mining lessee from getting that access which he needs, and without which he cannot get his goods to the market, I think the Legislature may very well step in and give some independent Public Authority power to obtain for him that which the landlord will not grant spontaneously; and the tribunal to which I have referred, the composition of which the Commissioners hint at, might very well be entrusted with cases such as this. I do not propose to say more. I think I have indicated, so far as the Government are concerned, that they will at the earliest opportunity that the exigencies of Public Business allows be prepared to give full and even liberal effect to the unanimous recommendations of this most important Commission. We ask the House in a matter of this kind to give weight to the ripe and deliberate judgment of the Commission to whom it has been deputed, and when that body has pronounced its decision not to go behind that decision. We ask the House not, by its vote to-night, to embark on a very large and speculative scheme the limits of which it is impossible to foresee, and for which no sufficient case has been made out by the speech of my hon. Friend who brought forward this Motion. The Government, therefore, ask the House to negative the Motion in the form in which it appears on the Paper. I trust that after what I have said my hon. Friend may see that we have no want of sympathy with the real grievances which he has brought forward.

*MR. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.) said, it would be useless for the House to devolve inquiries to Commissions if after a full and impartial investigation hon. Members were to ask the House to go behind the Report. Recognising the responsibility of the House in that respect, he must say, though he admired the speech to which they had listened, he regretted that after the careful and fair inquiry of the Commission the hon. Member should have brought this Motion before the House. If that course was to be taken it would be worse than useless to appoint Commissions of this kind. In the appointment of the Commission the utmost care was taken to secure the most thorough impartiality, and to insure that every view would be patiently considered, and that every effort would be made to arrive at a sound conclusion. Now the House was asked, as the result of a few hours' Debate, to reverse the finding of the Commission, and if that course were taken it would, in his opinion, be worse than useless to spend public time and public revenue in conducting such inquiries in future. He did not want unnecessarily to prolong this discussion and would only say he believed that the argument of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Woods) that royalties hampered trade and gave foreigners an undue adantage in competing with us was unound and absolutely groundless. It was untrue to say that royalties could have any operation whatever in the direction of raising prices; prices of all commodities were determined by considerations totally apart from any royalty that might be paid. Had the hon. Member satisfied the House that foreigners paid no royalties? In point of fact, royalties in some shape were a necessary consequence of the fact that the cost of production was less than the price obtainable in the market for the article produced. They must go into the pocket of somebody, and into whose pocket they went did not matter to the miner, whose wages were determined on other and independent considerations. There might have occurred cases, such as had been mentioned by the hon. Member for Ince, of lessees who had entered into foolish bargains, and had undertaken to pay higher royalties than they could pay, if they were also to pay fair wages; and in such cases the mines usually stopped.

Mr. Asquith

 But there were plenty of cases in which owners worked their own mines, and therefore paid no royalties at all, and in such cases the men employed did not receive more than the average rate of wages.
 The Report of the Commission curiously gave illustrations in other countries, as in France, of high royalties concurring with high wages, and nominal royalties with wages below the average. The advance of wages where royalties were paid proved that royalties did not keep wages low. The grounds on which the appeal was made to the House failed, and hon. Members would appeal in vain. As to the proposed remedy, that the rights of mine-owners should be purchased by the State, he could add but little to what had been said by the Home Secretary;
 but it appeared to him that the sum of £150,000,000 was too low, and less than those rights would fetch in the market.
 The question was involved of what was to be done with the lessees; were they to be left in possession, some of them with leases for 40 or 50 years? Was the interest of the owners only to be touched, and not that of the lessees? It had been suggested that the State would deal more "humanely" than private owners in the remission of royalties in hard times; but at whose cost was this humanity to be exercised? Were the taxpayers to be asked to submit to extra burdens in order to ease the conditions of competition in carrying on their business to wealthy men in times of difficulty?

 And these were men who had made bargains with all the foresight and judgment they could exercise. The House, it seemed to him, would shrink from relieving these men from the consequences of their bad bargains. That was a proposal to which he thought the House would not assent. Both in America and England the royalty system had been identified with the highest development of mining industry for the benefit of both capitalists and working men; and the facts seemed to furnish quite sufficient reason why we should not change our system for that of the Continent, where miners were less well off than they were here. It was with regret he heard the remark of the Home Secretary that when things went wrong in the mining industry the owner's interest went scot-free, and the lessees and miners had to bear the burden of the loss—that they had to bear all consequences. This, he believed, was not a correct representation of what occurred. It was true the owner received a dead rent and a royalty which was fixed, instead of being paid on a sliding scale; but this was because lessees preferred fixed charges to sliding scales. A lessee gained in fat years compensation for what he had to lose in lean years, and calculated that his average payments would not amount to more than he would have to pay under a sliding scale. There was the additional advantage that the annoyance and inconvenience were avoided of having to submit accounts of sales and prices in order to arrive at what would have to be paid on a sliding scale. The obligation to pay a dead rent had the effect of preventing a man from becoming a monopolist and holding a mine for the mere purpose of keeping someone else out—a result which it could not be desired to bring about by a change of system as proposed. It was better there should be some minimum dead rent fixed—some moderate amount, supposing the minerals to be worked reasonably.
 That was the great reason in favour of maintaining dead rents. It was a system of arrangement by mutual consent, and was satisfactory in all cases where fixed on the basis of reasonable working. Where the system had not worked satisfactorily it was not the fault of the system itself, but the fact of particular lessees having arranged unsatisfactory terms. On all the grounds that had been urged he hoped the House would not entertain an impossible scheme for the nationalisation of our minerals.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil) said, he had on the Paper an Amendment in favour of "The creation of a Mining Department to be presided over by a Minister of the Crown," and that such a Department was needed for the purpose of collecting and publishing accurate information with regard to mines and minerals. From this point of view it did not appear that the Report of the Commission had received any consideration from Her Majesty's Government. It was admitted on all sides that mining interests were vital to the country; and those engaged in the mining interests scarcely knew what official Departments they had to deal with. On the one hand they had to deal with landowners; and on the other they were concerned with various departments both at the Home Office and the Board of Trade. The time had arrived when not only the question of royalties but that of an eight hours day in mines and other questions relating to the mining industry should be under the control of one Department. This was not the first time he had made this suggestion to the House. It received favourable consideration three or four years ago, since when both the Miners' Federation and the London Chamber of Commons had passed unanimous resolutions in favour of it. The mineowner was at the mercy of the landowner, and yet could not pay good wages to the working miner, because he was handicapped through having to give a portion of his product to the owner of the land. It was clear, therefore, that royalties must affect wages. He was himself in favour of royalties, although he objected to the principle on which they were charged. They should be paid on the profits of an undertaking, and not on the product. In some of the Colonies compulsory powers were given to miners to carry on their industry. In England the miner could not compulsorily obtain a mining lease so as to give employment to labour, although compulsory powers were given to Local Bodies, and compulsory powers of purchase were also in existence in Ireland. As things were at present, the man who wanted to employ his capital in mining had to go hat in hand to the landowner, who of course insisted upon having all his conditions performed and fulfilled. When the unfortunate miner had got a lease he was met by those in authority with the remark, "You had no right to take that lease. If you do not like its conditions you ought not to have taken it." The miner, however, who wanted to employ his capital and also to give employment to his fellow man had to submit to the state of things as they existed. In other countries where there were Ministers of Mines a dispute about royalties was settled by the Minister of Mines. He read that afternoon in The St. James' Gazette that another great strike was threatened, and that at an enormous meeting of miners at Nottingham a violent attack had been made on Lord Shand, who had kindly undertaken to perform some very onerous duties. During the last strike or lock-out it was found necessary to get the present Premier to endeavour to throw oil upon the troubled waters. They were now again apparently in a very serious condition with regard to the miners. If all questions in dispute could be considered by some proper tribunal, responsible to the House of Commons, something like relief from the disorder which now continually prevailed might be secured. He believed that the effect which the present system of royalties had upon industry was not known to the House as it should be. Only that morning a letter reached him from the manager of a well-known slate quarry. In this letter the following passage occurred:—

Mr. Matthews

"I maintain that the value of the raw material in slate quarries does not average more than 10s. per ton, and as the average royalty per ton comes to about 2s. 6d., it follows that the royalty is about 25 per cent. of the value of the raw material."

He himself knew a very promising sulphur mine in North Wales where 25 or 30 men were at work. Sulphur could be brought from Italy and landed in this country at a cost of about 9s. 6d. a ton, and yet the owner of the sulphur mine in North Wales charged a royalty of 2s. 6d. a ton. If he would only knock off 1s. a ton, the mine could employ 100 or 200 men. The owner of the mine was a noble Lord who, he supposed, had never been in the district, and his agents no doubt considered it to be their duty to obtain the highest possible terms. He would suggest that if the Government did not like to go to the expense of having a separate portfolio for the Ministry of Mines, they should make the Minister for Agriculture the Minister for Mines as well.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) said, the hon. Member for Luce (Mr. Woods) had made two or three statements with regard to mining royalties which were not quite accurate. In the first place, the hon. Member said that the mining royalties in this country amounted to 8d. per ton. It was a well-known fact that the average mining royalty in South Wales did not amount to more than 5½d. per ton. As to fortunes having been made out of mining royalties, such a thing had never occurred. With regard to wayleaves, he admitted that some alteration, such as the constitution of a new Department like the French Tribunal de Commerce, would be an excellent thing. The hon. Member for Luce (Mr. Woods) did not seem to have known much about the state of things in foreign countries, inasmuch as he had compared mining royalties in this country with those in France, Germany, Austria, and Belgium. France had no mining royalties at all. The State conceded the land to the miners, and the concessionaires then had to pay an octroi and other dues, amounting to a total taxation of something like two francs a ton. According to the Royal Commissioners' Report, the total amount of coal got in the United Kingdom was upwards of 38,000,000 tons, whilst in France it was only 6,000,000, in Belgium 2,000,000, and in Germany 23,000,000. Therefore, the whole of the coal produced in France, Belgium, and Germany only amounted to about 32,000,000 tons, or less than the production of Great Britain. It stood to reason that if the non-royalties system were more favourable to France, Germany, and Belgium than the royalties system was to this country, the output of coal would be much greater, especially when it was borne in mind that the hours of labour were much greater on the Continent than in Great Britain, whilst the wages were considerably lower. With reference to the question of leasing, he might say that he had never yet granted a lease which did not contain a clause providing that the lessee should have the power of transferring it to anybody else, and the transfer of such leases had always taken place without the smallest objection, providing that the transferees were respectable and substantial people. Nobody, of course, would dream of transferring a lease to a man of straw. He did not believe that in the whole of South Wales could be found a single instance in which permission had been refused to the transfer of a lease. He himself was constantly in South Wales, and he thought he had a thorough knowledge of the country, so that his statement was not made without experience. He had listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech made by the Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith). He hoped and trusted that the Mover and Secunder of the Resolution would take the right hon. Gentleman's very pregnant remarks to heart, and would abandon the scheme referred to in their Resolution, but, at the same time, that the outcome of the discussion would be the constitution of Tribunals of Commerce before which all matters in dispute might be taken, and which might prevent the recurrence of the terrible effects of strikes from which the country had suffered so shockingly in recent times.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, he should not have troubled the House had it not been for the fact that, satisfactory as were some of the recommendations contained in the Report of the Royal Commission, he shared a strong conviction with not a few of his constituents that, as far as Cornwall was concerned, these recommendations were lamentably deficient. He did not wish to raise the question in the interests of one class. He considered that in a matter of this kind the House was bound to regard from an equitable point of view the interests of all concerned—landowners, lessees, and working miners alike—and also to bear in mind that the interests of the community at large were at stake. All the minerals that were mined in Great Britain were absolutely essential to the prosperity of the whole of the country. The question the House had to consider was how it could best alter the present system, which had certainly not worked uniformly well. Three proposals had been put forward in the course of the Debate. The first was that of the hon. Member for Luce (Mr. Woods), who thought that mining rents and royalties should be acquired by the State. The second was that of the hon. Member for the Tunbridge Division of Kent (Mr. Griffith-Boscawen), which simply desired the House to take its stand upon the recommendations of the Royal Commission. The third was that of the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Pritchard Morgan), who was anxious to see established a Mining Department presided over by a Minister of the Crown. As regarded the first proposal, he (Mr. Conybeare) could not as a practical man shut his eyes to the convincing character of the logical arguments advanced against it by the Home Secretary. Theoretically, he (Mr. Conybeare) held that the minerals should belong to the State, but it was necessary to consider the practical limitations by which the House was bound in a matter of this kind, and he felt compelled to discard the proposal as being outside the range of practical politics. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Tunbridge was satisfactory as far as it went. It presented the usual mental attitude of the Tory—namely, that of taking one's stand upon that which existed, and accepting that which was presented to one without troubling to consider what was really the best course. He (Mr. Conybeare) was not content to take his stand on the recommendations of the Royal Commission as far as his own county of Cornwall was concerned. As to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Merthyr, he (Mr. Conybeare) thought that an important industry like that of mining ought to be adequately represented in the Government of the country, and, although he did not complain of any maladministration on the part of the Home Office, he was convinced that it was impossible for a Department which had a thousand other matters to look after to give satisfactory time, attention, and consideration to so gigantic a business as the mining industry of this country. He was therefore at one with the hon. Member for Merthyr in his proposal, and he thought he could show that it was very important to establish a tribunal, in addition to a Minister for Mines, with such powers as were outlined by the Home Secretary in the speech he had just delivered. He was the more pleased with the reference which the Home Secretary had made in this respect, because it showed how they had progressed in the years that had gone by since he first entered the House. In his first Session the matter of mining royalties was argued, and at that time he believed he was practically alone in advocating the establishment of tribunals for the settlement of mining disputes, and the first Member who introduced a Bill to give effect to that proposal. He was glad to think that, whatever the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners might have been, they had now heard from the Home Secretary that he was entirely in favour of such a proposal, and he therefore hoped that the time was not far distant when the Government would be able to devote a little consideration to this matter. Though the Commissioners were unanimous, he happened to know that differences of opinion existed, for one of them had said to him—"If I had had my way, the recommendations would have been somewhat different." He believed that those who had the interests of Cornwall at heart would be agreed that the recommendations ought to have been different, so far as that county was concerned. The seventh recommendation stated that the Commissioners recommended for the favourable consideration of Parliament any measure which might be introduced, with the concurrence of all parties concerned, for dealing with mineral leases in Cornwall and Devonshire,

"Such as the Bill introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. St. John Aubyn and Lord St. Levan in 1886."

In regard to that recommendation, he must complain that it was singularly inadequate, as contrasted with the proposal which the Home Secretary was in favour of—a special Court for mining questions. That Bill was defeated on the Second Reading, on the very ground that it was so ridiculously inadequate that it would not at all satisfy the wishes and claims of the people of Cornwall. He had the satisfaction of bringing about the defeat of Mr. St. John Aubyn on that ground, and it was an unworthy suggestion to make that they should go back to that defeated Bill. The evidence even of such staunch apologists of the landlord interest as Mr. Marriott, which was quoted in the final Report of the Commissioners, showed that this proposal was absolutely unsatisfactory. If the Home Secretary, when he came to consider this matter, would study particularly the evidence connected with the county of Cornwall, he would find that witness after witness—well-known names in connection with the county—was in favour of the establishment of a Court of Arbitration. Those who drafted the Bill in 1886, who were his political opponents, would have nothing to do with a Court of Arbitration, but to-day practically every mining authority was in favour of it, and he asserted that it would be an insult to the county if that recommendation which had now been made should be taken as representing what the people of Cornwall desired and intended to have. He had introduced into the House during several Sessions a Bill embodying what he had reason to believe were the views of a great proportion, at any rate, of his own constituents in reference to this Court of Arbitration, and in the evidence which he gave before the Royal Commission the details were given as to the appointment of a Court representing all the three interests concerned—the mine-owners, the lessees, or “adventurers” as they were called in Cornwall, and the working miners. He made this suggestion to the Government: Cornwall had always been separately treated in these mining matters. Two hundred years ago they had a regular Parliament of their own, in which all matters connected with tenures were dealt with by representatives of different portions of the county, and he asked that they should be allowed to revert to the old practice. The Stannaries Court was now merely a sort of County Court, the principal officer holding an office which was almost a sinecure, and he thought it would be possible to establish a Court which would be representative of all the three classes interested, which would deal out equal justice, and which would probably be so successful that most of the other mining districts would be only too anxious to follow their example. With regard to the question of royalties, he considered that the nation ought to have an interest in them, and he did not see why there should be any difficulty in insisting that a portion of the royalties that now went into the pockets of private individuals should be the property of the nation. He thought it would be only fair that there should be a division of rates upon mines between the royalty-owner and the mine-owner, for the former at present bore none of these exceedingly heavy charges. The late Home Secretary had talked about the lessees as being themselves to blame if they entered into foolish bargains; but those foolish bargains were in most cases thrust upon them. Mine-owners had formerly, and still had, the power to insist upon their own terms; they had practically absolute ownership, and so long as that absolute ownership was uncontrolled by such a Court as he had suggested, it would be in the power of individual mine-owners—if it was not true generally of their class—to impose whatever conditions they pleased upon the unfortunate lessees or “adventurers.” The right hon. Gentleman also contrasted the condition of the working miners of this country with that of the working miners abroad, and stated that the latter were worse off than our own countrymen, the wages here being higher than on the Continent, where the mines were more or less under the control of the State. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman was right as regarded the miners of France, Belgium and Germany, but as regarded the United States of America, Mexico, South America, and South Africa, he would find that men who were doing the same work there as the men in his own constituency in Cornwall were receiving as much as £12, £15, and even £20 a month, whereas the Cornwall miners were scarcely getting £4 a month. The evidence showed that there was a general consensus of opinion in Cornwall against royalties being fixed for a long term of years, and that was another matter which he recommended to the attention of the Government. He heartily thanked the Home Secretary for having given utterance to what he would describe as so advanced a programme in reference to this matter, as compared with what they were struggling for some years ago in regard to the establishment of a tribunal to deal with all these questions.

Mr. Conybeare

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerstone), who was received with cries of “Divide!” said, he was quite aware that the House was anxious for a Division; but this was a very important question, and ought not to be disposed of in the summary manner that some hon. Members seemed to desire. He would have liked to have had an opportunity of speaking at some length, because it was a subject of the utmost importance to the working classes throughout the country;

but he would not detain the House long. He was very glad that an opportunity had been found of introducing this subject and raising even a brief discussion upon it, because he had noticed that for years past, so far as the working-class electors in the towns were concerned, there was a strong and growing opinion upon the question, and they were exceedingly anxious that an effort should be made to find some solution for the problem. He had listened to the speech of the hon. Member for the Tunbridge Division of Kent, in which he stated that he could not see the slightest difference between property in minerals and property of any other kind. If the hon. Member failed to discover the difference, and would consult the intelligent artisans of the towns, in their clubs and political organisations, they would soon tell him the difference, which was that one was the gift of nature and the other was the product of human industry. The Home Secretary had told them that he was very sorry the nation had ever parted with its interest in the mineral wealth of the Kingdom. But he remembered that, not more than three years since, the House was afforded an opportunity of introducing the very principle, the recognition of which his hon. Friend now contended for, into a Constitution which was then being discussed in this House—namely, the Constitution of Western Australia. At that time he (Mr. Cremer) moved an Amendment that the Government of that country should give effect to the very principle now contended for, and retain as public property the mineral wealth of the colony, but the Home Secretary was not one of those who went into the Lobby and supported that Amendment. The Home Secretary and other speakers had told them that the nation could only acquire the mineral wealth of the Kingdom by an expenditure of £150,000,000 or by confiscation. But there was an alternative proposal which he had frequently heard discussed by working men—namely, that this House should notify the owners of land and mines that the time had arrived when the State was determined to resume its proprietary rights in the soil and minerals, giving the possessors of land and royalties simply a life interest therein. He believed that was a solution which was favoured by the most intelligent artisans in the country, and he felt satisfied that such a Resolution would be introduced into and passed by this House at no distant date. This was a scheme which found favour out of doors when the question of old age pensions was under consideration. It was no doubt difficult to decide where the money should come from to provide those old age pensions; but it was thought that when the State had resumed its proprietary rights in the mineral wealth of the Kingdom, and the £5,000,000 which were now pocketed by landlords as mining royalties had been placed at the disposal of the nation, that the amount would be almost sufficient to pay old age pensions. He knew that the word "confiscation" was an ugly one, but he did not think the working classes were likely to be frightened by it, because they knew that a system of legal robbery had been in existence for generations past in the abominable system of leaseholds which enabled landlords to compel people to pay heavy ground rents for the privilege of building houses upon land which had previously been worth next to nothing, and then at the end of the lease appropriating the bricks and mortar and labour and capital and skill of the industrial classes. As the clock pointed to the hour of 8, he would not further prolong the discussion.

Mr. Cremer

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 150; Noes 43.—(Division List, No. 18.)

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," again proposed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. MORLEY : By the indulgence of the House I should like to correct a statement which I made earlier this afternoon. I intimated that the Motion which my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House would make on Monday in reference to the Business of the House would be limited to Whitsuntide. The Motion which my right hon. Friend will make will be to give priority to Government Business on Tuesdays and Morning Sittings on Fridays, not merely up to Whitsuntide but up to the end of the Session.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Eight o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 9th April 1894.

SAT FIRST.

The Lord Tweedmouth, after the death of his father.

THE BEAUMARIS SCHEME.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, in accordance with private notice which he had given, he desired to ask the Lord President whether the Beaumaris Scheme had been printed, and if not when it would be laid before the House?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The EARL of ROSEBURY): I understand it will be printed and circulated to the Members of the House this afternoon.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a; to be printed; and referred to the Examiners. (No. 9.)

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILLS AND CONSOLIDATION BILLS.

Message from the Commons that they concur in the Resolution of this House communicated to them on the 19th of March last on the subject of Statute Law Revision Bills and Consolidation Bills as desired by this House.

PISTOLS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to regulate the sale and use of pistols—Was presented by the Lord Stanley of Alderley; read 1^a; and to be printed. (No. 11.)

CHARITABLE TRUSTS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Charitable Trusts Acts—Was presented by the Lord Halsbury; read 1^a; and to be printed. (No. 12.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the law relating to the limitation of actions—Was presented by the Lord Chancellor; read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a on Monday next. (No. 13.)

VOL. XXII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

LAW OF INHERITANCE AMENDMENT

BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the law of inheritance to real property—Was presented by the Lord Chancellor; read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a on Monday next. (No. 14.)

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 9th April 1894.

QUESTIONS.

FOOTPATHS IN THE ISLAND OF LEWIS.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been drawn to a Petition signed by 15 heads of families at Calbost, Park, Lochs, Lewis, in which it is stated that the Planasker (or Marvig) School, which was built for this district, is about two miles from the township they represent, in which there are fully 40 children of school age; that, since the erection of said school house, children have had to walk that distance through rough ground in all weathers; that last year an attempt was made by the County Council to construct a footpath from the township to the school, but from want of funds it was not completed; and that during the past inclement winter the parents unanimously agreed to keep their children from school, and no child has attended school from the township since the beginning of February; and whether, if these statements are confirmed upon inquiry, steps will be taken to remedy the existing state of matters? The hon. Member complained that after the words "rough ground" the words "and swampy bogs," inserted in the question as handed in at the Table, had been omitted.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): My attention has not been called to the Petition referred to, but I have nothing to add to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member on the 22nd of March, in reply to a similar question. While it is the practice of the Scotch Education Department to call the attention of School Boards to the necessity of securing regular attendance, yet it rests with the School Boards, and not with the Department, to enforce the compulsory clauses.

ALLEGED ASSAULT BY A LEWIS SCHOOLMASTER.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he will cause inquiry to be made into a case of alleged assault, on 13th January last, by the schoolmaster of Knockindue School, Keose, Lochs, Island of Lewis, upon a boy, aged 13 years, a pupil of that school, reported to the Procurator Fiscal for the Island of Lewis; whether he is aware that the Procurator Fiscal, in making inquiry into the case, sought no information from the parents, or from the doctor who attended the boy and dressed his wounds; that he referred the parents to the School Board of which he, the Procurator Fiscal, is clerk; and that he never brought the case before the School Board; whether he will state what other offices the Fiscal holds; the amount of his commissions, fees, or allowances from private parties for prosecutions for the year ending the 31st of March, 1893; and on what transactions these commissions, fees, or allowances were paid; and whether he is aware that many children in the district are not attending school, whilst the School Board take no notice of the fact?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I am informed by the Procurator Fiscal that he carefully investigated the allegations of undue severity towards pupils made against the head master of Knockindue Public School, and deemed it advisable to institute proceedings. After an exhaustive trial before the Sheriff of Ross and Cromarty, in the course of which he heard evidence from school children, parents, the compulsory attendance officer, the parish doctor and Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools, the headmaster was acquitted. I think it right to add that the Inspector of Schools gave testimony in his evidence to the efficiency and success of the head master; and I understand that the attendance at Knockindue School is about the best in the parish. The Fiscal holds under authority from the Sheriff the offices of clerk to the School Board of Lews, and the office of Secretary to the Piers and Harbours Commissioners. During the year ended the 31st of March, 1893, he did not conduct any prosecution on behalf of private parties, and he received no commissions, fees or allowances in respect of any such prosecutions. The School Board and managers intimated before the trial their willingness to hear the complainants at the first meeting of the new School Board which was recently elected. That meeting takes place to day.

Sir G. Trevelyan

MR. WEIR gave notice that he would call attention to the matter on the Estimates.

REPORTED WRECK OFF WARREN HASTINGS ISLAND.

MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to a Report made at Vancouver by Captain Tullock, of the British General, to the effect that he had been boarded off Warren Hastings Island in December last by natives, who reported the loss of a large vessel there several months previously, and gave up a quarant belonging to the vessel; that there was reason to believe that the vessel was either the Morayshire or the Blair Athol, both of which, bound from Java to Vancouver, have been missing since last summer; and that, in his opinion, a search should be made on the island; and whether, in the interest of the Merchant Navy and the relatives of the officers and crews of the missing vessels, it will be possible for one of the Queen's ships to visit the island and make inquiries?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): The first information we have received is from my hon. Friend. The newspaper reports are somewhat conflicting, and we cannot say what action may be desirable till we have received further information from the owners of the British General, to whom a telegram has been sent to-day by the Admiralty.

FRAUDS IN THE MEAT TRADE.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether Her Majesty's Government will favourably consider the recommendations of the Committee of the House of Lords on the marking of foreign meat—namely, that every dealer in this class of meat should be required to register himself as such, and to affix a notice over his shop intimating that he is a registered dealer in that commodity, also that inspection should be made of retail butchers' shops by duly qualified Inspectors to secure compliance with these conditions?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): I understand that the recommendations to which my hon. Friend refers are embodied in the Bill standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for the South Molton Division. We shall give very careful consideration to the arguments advanced in support of that Bill should an opportunity for its discussion arise; but Her Majesty's Government are not satisfied whether that further legislation is necessary, or that the adoption of the proposals of the Committee would be of any real benefit to home producers, and they are, therefore, not disposed themselves to initiate legislation on the subject.

METROPOLITAN COUNTERMEN AND TELEGRAPH CLERKS.

MR. BUTCHER (York): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has had an opportunity of considering a Petition of the Metropolitan Districts Countermen and Telegraph Clerks, dated the 28th of February, 1893, and having reference to the conditions of their annual leave, and whether a reply to such Petition may shortly be expected; and whether he has had an opportunity of considering a Petition of the Metropolitan Districts Countermen and Telegraph Clerks, which was presented on the 16th of May, 1883, having reference to their duties and pay, and whether a reply to such Petition may shortly be expected?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): The Petition of the 28th of February from the countermen and telegraphists in the Metropolitan District was duly considered, but before an answer could be sent the Petition of the 16th of May, 1893, which raised the whole question of the conditions of employment of these officers, was received, and it was thought best to deal with the two Petitions together. The subjects dealt with by these Petitions are still under consideration, but I hope shortly to be able to reply to the Memorialists.

DINGWALL GAME PROSECUTIONS.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if his attention has been called to the conviction of Wm. Mackenzie, Ardneaskan, by Sheriff Hill, at Dingwall, on the 13th of February, 1894, on a charge of trespassing in pursuit of game on the estate of Baron Middleton, of Applecross, on the 9th of January last, on the sole evidence of a game watcher, who admitted that he was not at any time within 40 yards of the accused; whether he is aware that other witnesses in their evidence showed that it was a physical impossibility for Mackenzie to be at the place at the time mentioned; and whether steps will be taken to amend the Law of Evidence, in order to make it obligatory that the evidence of at least two witnesses shall be taken to justify conviction?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.): I answered this question so far on Tuesday last. On further inquiry I find that the watcher had previously known the accused, that on the day in question he had had him in view for three hours, and had, therefore, full opportunity of identifying him. It is the fact that the watcher was never nearer to him than 40 yards; but at this distance they had some conversation, and the accused, after shooting the watcher's dog dead, threatened to shoot the watcher himself. The evidence of the only witness, who stated that it was impossible for the accused to be at the place at the time mentioned, failed upon cross-examination; and that even taking the watcher's own statement, it was quite possible for him to have done all that was alleged. There have been cases which have shown the desirability of an amendment of the Day Trespass Act, but I doubt whether this is one of them.

KILLARNEY UNION.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the auditor of the Local Government Board has recently made any Report as to the financial condition of the Killarney Union, and if he can give the substance thereof; whether it is true that £5,031 of the poor rate remained uncollected at the close of the year, and that £2,122 of the seed rate was still outstanding; and if he can state what the Local Government Board propose to do in the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I am informed that the Auditor's Report in the case of the Killarney Union was entered on the Union Ledger and submitted to the Board of Guardians in ordinary course. The Report was published in the local newspapers, from which the hon. Gentleman can obtain the information he desires in answer to the first paragraph. As regards the second paragraph, I understand that on the 24th of March the outstanding balances in respect of poor rate and seed rate had been reduced to £3,966 and £2,037 respectively. The Local Government Board have addressed a communication to the Guardians warning the collectors that unless their collections were brought to a satisfactory close within a specified period they would find it necessary to remove them from office.

THE SLANEY FISHERIES.

MR. FFRENCH (Wexford, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it has been brought to his notice that, under the bye-laws of the Conservancy Board which regulate the close time for fishing in the Slaney, the net fishermen are placed at a disadvantage in taking salmon, as compared with the anglers in that river and the net fishermen in neighbouring rivers; whether he is aware that the fishermen have only three representatives on the Conservancy Board, whereas the anglers are represented by three elected members and also 10 ex officio members, together with 10 other ex officio members who may be called in at any moment; and whether he will inquire into the matter, with a view to remedying the alleged grievance of the Slaney fishermen?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Inspectors of Fisheries inform me that the Close Season Order referred to was passed with the object of preserving the stock of fish in the River Slaney, which was proved to be diminishing from excessive netting.

Mr. T. W. Russell

The Order was not passed in the interest of any one class of fishermen, and the Inspectors believe that the restrictions placed on netting will ultimately benefit both net fishermen and anglers. The facts appear to be as stated in the second paragraph; but I would point out that the constitution of the Board of Conservators is regulated by Statute, and that there is no power to interfere in the matter in this respect.

THE CASE OF EDWARD TAFFE.

MR. BODKIN (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if his attention has been directed to the case of Edward Taffe, now residing in great poverty in Boyle, County Roscommon, who was discharged from the Army in 1872 without a pension after three and a-half years' service in the East India Company, and 12 years and two months in the Imperial Service: is he aware that Edward Taffe was during almost the entire period on active service; that he joined the East India Company's Service (the Madras Fusiliers) in June, 1856; that he was transferred to the Imperial Service in January, 1860; that he was in active service all through the Indian Mutiny in No. 9 Battery 4th Brigade Artillery, as volunteer; that he afterwards went to New Zealand, and served in the Maori War; that he was sent to England in 1868, and was transferred to No. 9 Battery 2nd Brigade for foreign service: and that he was sent again to India (Singapore), where he remained until discharged; and will he give the matter his most favourable consideration, with the object of providing, if possible, that this man, after arduous and distinguished service in the Imperial forces, may have some provision beside the poor-house for his old age?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): E. Taffe's conduct in the Service was recorded as "very bad," and he was discharged in 1872 under sentence of Court Martial. It is not a case in which any pension can be granted.

SKIBBEREEN CUSTOM HOUSE.

MR. E. BARRY (Cork Co., S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a resolution recently passed by the Skibbereen Town Commissioners protesting against the removal of the Custom House from Skibbereen to Baltimore, a village nine miles distant from the former town, and whether he is aware that considerable inconvenience is likely to be caused to an extensive district of which Skibbereen is the centre should this contemplated removal of the Custom House be carried into effect; and what action he proposes to take in the matter?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): A copy of the resolution referred to was on Saturday last received by the Commissioners of Customs and will receive attention; but the changes of station of the Customs officers belonging to the Port of Skibbereen, from Bantry and Skibbereen to Baltimore, were considered to be advantageous both in the interests of the Service and of the public, and were recommended both by the late and the present district collector, who are of opinion that in view of the present railway communication between the two towns no inconvenience is likely to be caused to Skibbereen.

DUBLIN CUSTOM HOUSE.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the great inconvenience caused by the closing of the entrance door leading from the public street to the office of the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, Custom House, Dublin; whether he is aware that, since the closing of this entry, the office can only be reached by a circuitous way up and down stairs and through long passages, involving considerable loss of time; and if he will, in the interest of the public, take into consideration the desirability of having this entrance door kept open during the office hours?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am informed that, though some slight inconvenience may have been caused by the step referred to, it can hardly be called serious, and it affects only a very limited number of persons. If the door were kept open during office hours it would necessitate the employment of an extra porter for this purpose only, and the advantage to be gained would scarcely justify the expense.

REPORTS OF HER MAJESTY'S INSPECTORS OF MINES.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Summaries of the Statistical Portion of the Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Mines will be in the hands of Members?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): The Summaries are now in the printers' hands, and I understand they will be ready by Wednesday.

THE BEHRING SEA AWARD BILL.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state whether the Government of the Dominion of Canada have agreed in full detail to the Behring Sea Award Bill; or whether any, and if so which, points still need consideration?

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): Before the hon. Gentleman answers the question I should like to ask him if there is any difference between the Bill now before the House and the Bill of and Agreement with the United States Government, as has been alleged?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The expected Despatch from Canada, to which I referred on Thursday, has not yet arrived. We have no reason to suppose that it is likely to affect the principle of the Bill, and if Amendments may eventually be found to be necessary they can be introduced at a later stage.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can present to the House the text of the Behring Sea Award Bill which has now passed the Legislature of the United States?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): We received the original text of the United States British Sea Award Bill, and the various Amendments made in it have been communicated separately by telegraph. As soon as the complete text of the Bill as passed is received it will be presented.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: May I ask my hon. Friend if he can give any explanation of the very serious report in The Times of to-day of the language used in the United States Senate concerning the Bill before this House, it being described as an evasion of the Arbitration Treaty?

*SIR E. GREY: I think it will be more convenient if the Attorney General is permitted to explain the matter when the Bill gets into Committee.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I should like to ask what arrangements the Government propose to make in order that this very important question may be discussed this evening. What security has the House that the Bill will be taken this evening?

*SIR E. GREY: I do not think that the question as to the disposal of the time of the House is one that I can reply to.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Then I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he will explain the statement which has appeared in the newspapers as to the existence of a serious difference between the United States Government and our own with regard to this Bill?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.): There is no serious difference, and the statement to this effect is exaggerated. There is a variance between the two Bills, and I will take the opportunity of explaining the matter fully when the Bill gets into Committee this evening.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): What time shall we go into Committee? Do the Government propose to adjourn the Estimates in order to give us time to discuss this important question?

[No answer was given.]

NEW COUNTY MAGISTRATES.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Return granted showing the County Magistrates appointed since the Resolution of this House of 5th May, 1893, will be presented?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, North

Sir E. Grey

Beds): All that I can learn from the Lord Chancellor is that the Return is being proceeded with, but is not yet ready.

MR. DODD: Then I beg to give notice that I will call the attention of the House to this matter on an early day.

BRITISH HERRINGS IN RUSSIA.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether certificates of origin will still be required in Russia for British herrings?

*SIR E. GREY: According to the new Regulations received by us, certificates of origin will only be required for herrings when preserved in marinade or oil, or when stuffed.

M. KERCKHOVEN'S EXPEDITION.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Expedition under M. Kerckhoven, which became established at Lado in the early part of 1893, has been completely withdrawn?

SIR E. GREY: Her Majesty's Government have no knowledge of the Expedition having been established at Lado.

COMMANDER BETHELL: Has there not been a correspondence on this very subject?

SIR E. GREY: I can give the hon. and gallant Member no information beyond that we have no knowledge of the Expedition having been established.

COMMANDER BETHELL: Then to what did the protest of Lord Rosebery refer?

SIR E. GREY: The Belgian Government was asked where the Expedition was, and they replied that they did not know what it was or where it could be.

DINIZULA.

COMMANDER BETHELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether a decision in the case of the imprisonment of Dinizula and others has yet been made?

MR. S. BUXTON: The Secretary of State is in communication with Sir Marshall Clarke, Administrator of Zululand, in regard to this question, and other questions affecting Zululand. I cannot state when I shall be in a position to make a communication to the House on the subject.

PONDOLAND.

COMMANDER BETHELL : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if, as reported, one of the lately contending Chiefs in Pondoland is to be exiled ; if so, where to ?

MR. S. BUXTON : We have as yet no official information confirming this report.

PARISH COUNCILS.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Instructions sent to the various Local Authorities with the view of bringing Parish Councils into existence during the present year ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) : If the hon. Member will move for the Instructions they shall be laid on the Table of the House.

MR. HENEAGE : I will move.

H.M.S. "POWERFUL."

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if the boilers of the Powerful now being built are to come from France ; and, if so, why they are not to be obtained from England ; and if the contract makes any provision that English materials shall be used as far as possible in the construction of the vessel, or that the Resolution of the House in 1891 as to fair wages and fair hours shall be observed ?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : The boilers of the Powerful will be built by an English firm. Materials of British manufacture will be used as far as possible in constructing the ship. The contract provides for giving effect to the Resolution of the House.

ARMOUR-PIERCING PROJECTILES.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what information he can give to the House as to the results of trials of armour-piercing shot manufactured by a Sheffield firm, 9·2 inches in diameter, and weighing 380 pounds each, which are stated to have passed entirely through a 14-inch compound plate, and then through four feet of oak backing into a heap of sand in the rear, without any practical damage to the shot itself ; whether the French projectiles have given similarly good results ; and whether they were for Army or Navy use ?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. WOODALL, Hanley) (who replied) said : The trial referred to is the ordinary test for armour-piercing projectiles of the calibre named. Only one shot was fired, and as it passed proof the projectiles were accepted for land service. No French projectiles of 9·2 inches have been tested by us during the last three years. No comparison, therefore, can be made with French shot of recent date.

LESSON BOOKS IN IRISH SCHOOLS.

MR. BODKIN (Roscommon, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can now state when the Return in regard to the lesson books of the Irish National School Board, which was ordered some months ago, will be laid upon the Table of the House ?

MR. J. MORLEY : The Board of National Education report that with every pressure on the staff to close the Return at an early date it will not be possible, in view of the other heavy engagements of the Office, to complete it for presentation until the end of the current month.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH BURGH HEATH.

MR. BUCKNILL (Surrey, Epsom) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether arrangements were made and concluded by the Post Office, so far back as a year since, for laying down telegraphic communication with Burgh Heath, in the County of Surrey, for the transaction of public telegraph business there ; whether any reason exists for the delay in carrying out the said arrangements ; and whether eligible residents at Burgh Heath have offered to take the post and telegraph office there, and to work the same ?

MR. A. MORLEY : It is the case that nearly a year ago the Post Office undertook to extend telegraphic communication to Burgh Heath. Great difficulty was, however, experienced in obtaining the necessary permission to erect the telegraphs, both from private persons and from the Surrey County Council. When these difficulties were at last overcome the Sub-Postmaster declined to conduct telegraph business, and it appeared that there was no other eligible person who could be appointed to the office. I am now informed of two applicants for the post, and I have given instructions for the necessary inquiry to be made with a view to ascertain whether one of them can be recommended. If so, I will see that there is no further delay in carrying out the telegraph extension.

THE ROYAL WARWICKSHIRE REGIMENTAL RIFLE.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Royal Warwickshire Regiment, stationed in Ceylon, is supplied with the Lee-Metford Magazine Rifle; if so, whether the following changes, stated by the War Office on 6th June, 1893, to be important modifications of the Mark 1 Rifle, have been made in the said rifle—namely, bolt, rounded at end to suit the rounded angle of cocking piece; spring (magazine), a fourth coil added; screws (bolt cover) (two), made a tight fit; screws (bolt head), mild cast steel, hardened at point and tempered, instead of mild steel unhardened; and whether the regiment is supplied with the Lee-Metford Magazine Rifle, Mark 2, with the Penn-Deeley patent bolt head?

*MR. WOODALL: The battalion of the Warwickshire Regiment in Ceylon has the Mark 1 (star) Lee-Metford Rifle. It is not known for certain whether the first of the modifications named in the question was made in these particular arms, as it was only applied to rifles made after a certain date. It is not, however, a point of much importance.

MR. WEIR: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that on the 6th of June last the War Office stated that these modifications were of really great importance?

*MR. WOODALL: It is quite true that the series of modifications introduced into the Mark 1 (star) Rifle finally adopted are useful and important, but the one in question is a small detail.

Mr. A. Morley

MANUFACTURING COSTS AT ENFIELD AND SPARKBROOK.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state what it costs to manufacture a Lee-Metford magazine rifle at Enfield, and what it costs at Sparkbrook, assuming that the same number and kind of Lee-Metford Magazine Rifle is ordered from each factory?

*MR. WOODALL: The productive power at Enfield is about three times as great as was that at Sparkbrook, and it is therefore not possible to give from practical experience the cost of producing an equal number of arms at each factory. Under ordinary circumstances the difference of cost is but fractional. For instance, the cost for the last three years of completed accounts was as follows:—1890-1, Enfield, £3 11s. 10½d.; Birmingham, £3 14s. 5d.; 1891-2, Enfield, £3 11s.; Birmingham, £3 9s. 2d.; 1892-3, Enfield, £3 14s. 6½d.; Birmingham, £3 17s. 4½d.; and these fluctuations were due principally to the value of orders placed at each factory.

MR. BARRAN (York, W.R., Otley): May I ask whether establishment costs are added?

MR. WOODALL: Yes.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): Is there not information at the War Office to the effect that the rifles made at Sparkbrook cost 2s. 6d. less than those made at Enfield in 1891, and if this is the case, would there not have been a saving of £11,000 of public money had all the rifles been made at Sparkbrook during that year?

MR. WOODALL: I admit that in 1891-2 the rifles made at Sparkbrook cost 1s. 10d. per arm less than those produced at Enfield; but, on the other hand, in the preceding and succeeding years the cost at Birmingham was higher than at Enfield.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: And was not that increased cost due to the fact that the charges for plant, machinery, &c., were included in the reckoning against the rifles?

*MR. WOODALL: My right hon. Friend can easily satisfy himself on that account. The cost of producing the rifles includes actual expenditure, wages, material, depreciation on buildings and plant, establishment charges, and amortisement of machinery erected for the special purpose of manufacturing the rifle.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND MINISTERIAL CRISIS.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can now state the decision arrived at by Her Majesty's Government in reference to the request for a dissolution made to the Governor of Newfoundland by the present Ministers of that Colony?

MR. S. BUXTON : The Governor of Newfoundland is still in communication with his Ministers on the subject of the political crisis that has arisen.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) : Does the hon. Gentleman mean to say the Governor is directed to take the advice of the responsible Ministers in this matter, seeing that they are the gentlemen whose conduct is now under trial?

MR. S. BUXTON : But as in all self-Governing Bodies the responsible advisers of the Governor are the Ministers until they retire he is bound to take their advice, although he may not follow it.

UGANDA.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have now come to a decision in regard to the affairs of Uganda; whether he can state what that decision is; and whether he can intimate any likely date when time can be allotted for the consideration of the question in this House?

SIR E. GREY : Papers relating to Uganda cannot be distributed till to-morrow. The statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not be made until Thursday.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.) : Will the Papers be accompanied by a map?

SIR E. GREY : The Government will have no objection to furnish one, if such a map is not already included in the Papers.

BANSTEAD COMMON.

LORD G. HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing) : I beg to ask the Attorney General if his attention has been directed to a proposal made to the Corporation of London, on the 15th of February, and with which his name has been connected, to inclose and divide one-half of Banstead Commons amongst private individuals; whether his name has been used with his authority; and whether the proposal is in contravention of the Metropolitan Commons (Banstead) Supplemental Act, passed last Session, by which the whole of the said Commons were secured for the benefit and enjoyment of the public?

SIR C. RUSSELL : My attention has been called to the proposal in question. My position in relation to it can best be explained by reading the material part of the letter which, upon seeing my name mentioned in connection with the scheme, I wrote to Mr. Robert Vigers, surveyor, who proposed the scheme, and his answer to my letter. On February 20, 1894, I wrote to him—

“Dear Sir,—I am surprised to find my name put forward as if supporting the Banstead enclosure scheme. I cannot think you meant to do this wholly unwarrantable thing. When I saw you here I told you—(1) That I was opposed to the scheme, and, if carried, would give you a commission to sell my place; (2) that the conservators (of whom I am one) could be no parties to propounding such a scheme; and (3) that I felt certain that no such scheme could be carried through Parliament.”

Mr. Vigers' reply was as follows—

“Dear Sir Charles,—I have your letter of this day's date, from which I note that you express surprise at seeing an article in the newspapers making mis-statements, and that you, above all people, assume them to be correct. My experience of newspaper reports is that should one happen to know all the facts it is sure to be untrue. I practically agree with all your statements, number 1, 2, and 3, with the exception that you told me that if I got the scheme carried you would give me a commission if I could sell your place. I do say that you told me that you had some talk with Mr. Budden, and that you had offered him a commission if he could sell your place for you. I have to-day been before the Committee of the Corporation upon this matter, and I made it my business to say that the statements made in the newspapers about you and some of the other gentlemen who surround the common were incorrect; in fact, your letter came to me while I was waiting to attend the City Committee. I hope, therefore, you will be satisfied that I have not done anything unwarrantable, and if anybody has been guilty of mis-statement it has been the public Press. Yours faithfully, Robert Vigers.”

I may add that Mr. Francis Baring, Mr. Bonsor, the Member for Wimbledon, and myself were amongst those who bore the cost of the heavy litigation in Chancery, which rescued Banstead Downs from enclosure, and I have reason to know that Mr. Baring and Mr. Bonsor are both opposed to the enclosure scheme in question.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON SECONDARY EDUCATION.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the terms of the Reference to the Royal Commission on Secondary Education would enable them to have regard to the conditions upon which the existing sources of revenue from endowment have been hitherto attached to particular forms of teaching, whether religious or otherwise?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) (who replied) said : It lies with the Commission to interpret the Reference which has been made to it, and I am unable to give any information on this point. I cannot doubt that they would consider any communication the hon. Gentleman may think right to make to them.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) : May I ask whether the terms of the Reference to the Commission were not agreed upon on the advice of Her Majesty's Government, and why the Government cannot therefore state their intentions?

MR. ACLAND : When a Reference has been made to a Royal Commission it lies with the Royal Commission to deal with the matter.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE : It is obvious that the Government must have meant something, and the question I venture to put is this: The Government gave certain advice to Her Majesty, under which the Royal Commission is issued. Did they intend that the Commissioners should have power to inquire not only as to the amount of endowments, but as to the circumstances surrounding them? There is a vast number of these secondary education endowments wholly devoted to the purposes of religious education, and the Reference is a matter of extreme importance to them. Unless the terms of the Reference are made clear, all the investigations of the Commission will probably be useless.

MR. ACLAND : The Reference is perfectly clear, and has been made in perfect good faith. The Royal Commission is the body to interpret the Reference.

THE BUDGET.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will provide in the forthcoming Budget for the return of duty which has been paid on spirit on importation when such spirit is exported as methylated spirit, it being stated that the refusal to allow the return of such duty is driving the trade from this country?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) : The time has not yet arrived to announce the Budget proposals.

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST CHOLERA.

MR. HENEAGE : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government have considered the very serious expenditure which is incurred by the Local Authorities of seaport towns and fishing villages in taking special precautions, by order of the Local Government Board, to prevent the introduction of cholera; and whether they will be prepared to assist such Local Authorities to defray the cost of such special precautions as are taken in the interest of the whole country in regard to the inspection of vessels at sea, provision for isolation of patients in hospital ships, and the disinfection of vessels at sea?

SIR W. HARCOURT : This question was discussed many times in the course of last year, and I have nothing to add to what I then said.

MR. HENEAGE : Were not the three specific subjects mentioned in my question agreed on by the late President of the Local Government Board and the 80 Members who waited on him last year?

SIR W. HARCOURT : I think not. I have already stated that the ports had not established any special claim as apart from the other parts of the Kingdom; and I have no reason to depart from that opinion.

OUTDOOR RELIEF IN THE LISTOWEL UNION.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the auditor of the Local Government Board has recently made any Report in reference to the abuse of outdoor relief in the Listowel Union; whether a special meeting of the Board of Guardians was recently convened to consider the Auditor's Report; and if he can state the nature of the Report, and the action taken by the Guardians thereon?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Auditor's Report on the accounts of the Listowel Union was submitted to the Board of Guardians by their clerk in the usual way, and it is open to the hon. Gentleman to obtain from the local newspapers the substance of the auditor's remarks. With regard to the action of the Guardians on the Report, I am informed that at a special meeting held on the 15th of February the Guardians called upon the several relieving officers to furnish lists of the recipients of outdoor relief, with a view to a general revision of the lists, and that the matter is still engaging the attention of the Guardians.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): As this question contains a reflection on a Board of Guardians in my constituency, can I see the Report of the auditor?

MR. J. MORLEY: I will inquire, but I am told the substance of the Report was published in the local newspapers.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Is it not a fact that the cost of outdoor relief in the Listowel Union amounted to 1s. 10d. in the £1?

MR. J. MORLEY: I cannot say.

PUBLICANS AS MAGISTRATES.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the date upon which the Commission of the Peace was conferred upon Mr. E. P. O'Kelly, of Baltinglass, County Wicklow; whether he is aware that Mr. O'Kelly was the holder of a retail licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors in that town, and that he transferred the licence before his appointment to the Bench to his wife; whether it has been brought to his knowledge that the Queen's Bench in Ireland has decided that the transfer of a licence can only be granted in one of three events—the death of the licensed person, sale of the premises, or the assignment of the licence on removal from the premises; and whether, in view of this decision, he will take steps to prevent the colourable transfer of licences in order to qualify for the Commission of the Peace?

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): Is it necessary for the holder of a licence to get rid of that licence, by transfer or otherwise, in order to qualify as a Magistrate?

MR. J. MORLEY: The gentleman referred to was appointed to the Commission of the Peace on the 15th March. Upon ascertaining that he held a publican's licence, the Lord Chancellor required that a bonâ fide transfer of the licence should be made, and this Mr. O'Kelly informed the Lord Chancellor had been done. He has since ascertained, however, that the transfer was a colourable one. The law appears to be as stated in the third paragraph, and acting on that view of the law the Lord Chancellor will insist on a bonâ fide transfer, and will not permit a colourable transfer in this or any other case.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The Queen's Bench having decided that these colourable transfers are illegal, will the Lord Chancellor see that the publicans who have made them are not allowed to defeat the Licensing Laws by sitting on the Bench when licensing matters are dealt with?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have said that these colourable transfers will not be allowed.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my question, whether it is necessary to get rid of the licence, by transfer or otherwise, in order to qualify as a Magistrate?

MR. J. MORLEY: That involves a legal question, which rests with the Lord Chancellor.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: But is it the case that the holder of a licence is not qualified for the Commission of the Peace?

MR. J. MORLEY: No, that is not the case. Holders of licences have been appointed to the Bench by the late Government and other Governments.

CHARITIES OF ST. MARY THE VIRGIN,
OXFORD.

MR. DODD : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the Charity Commission has propounded a scheme for the parish charities of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford, in which the trustees are to be three of them ex officio, three of them co-optive, and five (being a minority) representative ; whether he is aware that 200 years ago these charities were under the control of the Vestry, which was then elected by each of the ratepayers having one vote and no more ; if so, whether he will suggest to the Commission to withdraw the co-optive element from the scheme ; and, as to Nixon's Charity at Oxford (an educational one), whether he will suggest to the Commission that, in framing the new scheme now before them, they should give power to the trustees to let their land, if they see fit, or parts of it, in allotments ?

MR. ACLAND : The Commissioners, in the result of representations made to them, have already modified the Draft Scheme for these charities by the omission of the Churchwardens from the proposed Governing Body, thus leaving the trustees to be elected by the ratepayers in a majority. In the case of one only of the charities, but that the largest, the income was, in the reign of James I., directed to be applied by the Churchwardens, with the consent of the major part of the householders parishioners of the parish. The other charities have been administered by the Vicar and parish officers or some of them, or by individual trustees. In these circumstances, the Commissioners do not contemplate any further alteration of the Governing Body. The scheme for Nixon's Charity at Oxford is no longer before the Commissioners, having been submitted to the Education Department on the 19th of March last.

POSTMEN AND THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.

SIR J. LENG (Dundee) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the practice of granting a holiday to those engaged in the Customs service, and also the major departments of the Post Office, on the Queen's birthday, can be extended to postmen generally throughout the United Kingdom ?

MR. A. MORLEY : I fear not. The public would not tolerate the post being stopped throughout the country on the day set apart for celebrating Her Majesty's Birthday.

THE SUNDAY DISTURBANCES AT CORK.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many persons have been arrested by the Constabulary in connection with the continued assaults which have been made upon Protestant preachers in the streets of Cork ; and whether any of the persons so arrested have been brought to trial ; if so, with what result ?

MR. CARSON (Dublin University) : At the same time I will ask the right hon. Gentleman, with reference to the riotous scenes which on each Sunday for some months past have taken place in the City of Cork by reason of attacks made on Protestant clergymen, whether the action of the said clergymen in preaching in the streets is legal ; and, if not, whether they have been proceeded against for continuing such preaching to test the legality of their action ; whether any persons have been proceeded against for assaulting and interfering with said Protestant preachers ; and whether he will give instructions to the police either to prohibit the preaching or to prevent the assaults upon the said preachers ?

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) : Is it a fact that these preachers have themselves assaulted the police ; if so, have any of them been arrested, or had proceedings taken against them, and with what result ?

*MR. W. KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green) : Has the right hon. Gentleman observed that the Rev. Mr. Hallows, of Arklow notoriety, has gone to Cork to join those street preachers, whom I, in common with gentlemen opposite, regard as a menace to the public peace and an insult to Catholics in the vicinity ? And would the right hon. Gentleman think well of drawing the attention of those gentlemen to the admirable letter written on the 3rd of February, 1891, by the present Leader of the Opposition to this same Mr. Hallows, in which he points out that the division between dif-erent sections of the community caused by difference of creed is so deep and so far-reaching, and religious convictions are so closely interwoven with political opinions, that a course which would be innocent and even praiseworthy on one side of St. George's Channel might be morally and if not legally indefensible on the other, and that this fact, while it affords no shadow of an excuse for violence, may very possibly offer sufficient grounds for criticising the action of those by whom the violence is knowingly provoked?

MR. J. MORLEY: In answer to these questions, I have to state that no person has been arrested or brought to trial by the police for proceedings arising out of the religious services in the streets of Cork. The police have not witnessed any assaults upon the preachers, and, as I am informed, no actual assaults of a serious nature have been committed upon them. The assaults that have been committed were of the nature of horseplay, consisting of hustling and mud-throwing, and were invariably committed by women and boys; but the police have seen no stones thrown, as has been alleged, nor do they believe that a single stone has been thrown on any occasion. In confirmation of the reports which have been made to me by the police, I am informed by their very experienced officer in charge that not one of the preachers has received the slightest hurt or injury since the commencement of these proceedings in November last; and it is due to the police to say that the unwearied and efficient protection afforded by them to the preachers at all times has prevented the commission of serious assaults, or the occurrence of anything more painful and deplorable than has already taken place.

I have previously remarked that the accounts of these transactions which have appeared in the Press have been grossly exaggerated, and as regards the complaints that have been made regarding the action of the police throughout these every trying proceedings, many eye-witnesses of the occurrences—both Protestant and Catholic—have, unsolicited, offered to testify to the good temper and forbearance displayed by the police. With reference to the question raised by the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University as to the legality of the preaching, I would observe that street preaching per se is no offence by Common or Statute Law, but that in the performance of an otherwise legal act the preachers act illegally if they thereby obstruct or by gathering crowds cause an obstruction of the highway. This was the principle recognised by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition in his dealings with the more violent proceedings at Arklow. It is competent to the Constabulary to compel any person obstructing the highway or causing an obstruction to move on, and, in addition, it is the duty of the police, if they cannot otherwise prevent a breach of the peace, to disperse such an assemblage as provokes it. The preachers must be aware that they are acting illegally by causing obstruction, but, as the offence is one which can be prosecuted by any member of the public, it is also well known that the police, as public prosecutors, claim the exercise of a discretion in the institution of proceedings. At Arklow private individuals prosecuted with unsatisfactory results, notwithstanding the fact that a conviction for obstruction was obtained and one of the preachers, in default of paying the fine, went to prison. There was no encouragement for a police prosecution at Arklow, and, having regard to the experiences there, there is no encouragement to proceed at Cork.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): As to the charge of obstruction, is it not a fact that the Mayor and Corporation of Cork had suggested that the street preachers should carry on in future their proceedings only on the Marina or other open space?

MR. J. MORLEY: I believe that is their recommendation.

MR. SEXTON: Is there not some Society or Organisations which, by providing funds, is responsible for the obstinate persistence of these street preachers? Will the right hon. Gentleman direct inquiries into that point?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am not aware of that, but I will cause inquiry to be made.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government propose to mete out a different treatment to the preachers in Ireland to that which was meted out a short time ago to the Salvation Army preachers in connection with meetings they attempted to conduct at Eastbourne and elsewhere? Did not the Government in those cases interfere, and even repeal a clause in Private Bills which was contrary to the public law? I am not defending these Cork preachers, but I cannot see any difference between the two classes of preachers or meetings, and I think that the law that applies to gatherings of that sort at Eastbourne should also apply to the proceedings at Cork.

*MR. SPEAKER: This question is only an argumentative way of bringing forward a matter having reference to another question than the one under consideration, and I must rule it out of Order.

TEMPERANCE CANTEENS FOR THE ARMY.

MR. ARCHIBALD GROVE (West Ham, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he could state what facilities are offered to the Army Temperance Associations for establishing canteens in the various Military Centres; and whether it would be possible to establish a temperance canteen with every regiment, or at every Military Centre?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): There is already in every barrack what is practically a temperance canteen—namely, the room where non-intoxicants are sold—under Article 84 of Section 15 of the Queen's Regulations. We have also included in the Estimates for this year a sum of £500 as a grant-in-aid of the Army Temperance Association, and our desire is to assist that Association to the full extent of our power in extending its operations in this country.

HIGHBURY VALE SCHOOL.

SIR W. HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that certain expenditure upon a new cloak-room at Highbury Vale School has been disregarded by the Department as not legitimate under Article 90 of the Code; whether, in addition to this fine upon the resources of the school, very long delay has taken place in the payment of grant; and whether he will state the reason for this long delay, and the decision in regard to the cloak-room?

Mr. T. W. Russell

MR. ACLAND: The grant to the school, which was inspected on the 29th of January, has now been paid. The delay in the case was mainly due to the managers having included in the accounts a sum not specified representing the cost of building a new cloak-room, and having afterwards placed the case in the hands of the Diocesan Board of Education instead of withdrawing the sum from the accounts. The right hon. Gentleman must, I think, be well aware that the cost of structural additions to a school is, and always has been, disallowed under the Code as expenditure in the accounts of the school. There has been no fine on the resources of the school, the full grant having been paid.

GAS CONSUMPTION IN PARLIAMENT HOUSES.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he can state what quantity of gas was consumed in the Houses of Parliament in the year 1893; what was the total cost of the same; and what was the price charged per 1,000 cubic feet by the Company supplying the gas?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. H. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): The total consumption of gas in 1893 in the Houses of Parliament and their precincts was 27,871,000 cubic feet; the total cost was £4,223, besides £33 for meter rents; and the price was 3s. 1d. per 1,000 feet, except for the street lamps, for which the charge is 2s. 2d. per 1,000.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I understand that the Vestries of London are paying for the gas used by them for all purposes at a uniform cost of 2s. 2d. per thousand, and I should be glad to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will approach the Gas Company with a view of getting them to supply all the gas required at the lower rate?

MR. H. GLADSTONE: There are two qualities of gas, I believe, supplied by the Company; but I will inquire into the matter.

TRINIDAD AND VENEZUELA.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what steps are being taken to relieve the Colony of Trinidad from the extra impost of 30 per cent. levied for 12 years past in Venezuela upon all goods coming from that island and the Antilles over and above the heavy duties levied upon goods from any other part of the world; and, having regard to the injury this extra duty has inflicted upon the Colony most adjacent to Venezuela, if Her Majesty's Government will consider the expediency of conferring with the other Antilean Powers—namely, France, Holland, and Spain, upon the situation, should the removal of the extra impost not be favourably considered by the new President, General Crespo, and Senor Bojas, the Minister for Foreign Affairs at Caracas?

MR. S. BUXTON: Diplomatic relations with Venezuela are still suspended, and consequently no steps have been taken at Caracas to relieve the Colony of Trinidad from the impost referred to in the first paragraph of this question. Owing to this continued suspension of relations, Her Majesty's Government do not consider the present moment propitious for entering into any negotiations on the subject.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: Will the Government take the earliest opportunity of moving in the matter?

MR. S. BUXTON: That question should be addressed to the Foreign Office.

CATTLE SEIZURES IN COUNTY TYRONE.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that on the 3rd of November, near Six Mile Cross, in the County of Tyrone, cattle, the property of William Sawyers, which were being driven by George Sawyers, a son of William Sawyers, and a man named Joseph M'Farland, were seized by two bailiffs carrying out a decree against Joseph M'Farland at the suit of the Ulster Bank; and that M'Farland and George Sawyers, for resisting this seizure, were arrested and returned for trial to the Quarter Sessions at Omagh, County Tyrone; that, before allowing the cattle to be released, the bailiffs insisted on the instructions of the solicitor for the Ulster Bank on payment of the amount of the decree, which George Sawyers, who had got out on bail, paid under protest; that the money so paid by George Sawyers was recovered on a decree obtained against the Ulster Bank at the Belfast Quarter Sessions last January; that George Sawyers was subsequently put on his trial at the Omagh Quarter Sessions, and convicted for the alleged rescue; whether he is aware that the Sessional Crown Solicitor for County Tyrone (Mr. T. C. Dickie), who prosecuted George Sawyers at the Omagh Quarter Sessions, is also the Solicitor for the Ulster Bank who obtained the decree for the said bank against M'Farland; whether Crown Solicitors are entitled to utilise their office as Crown Solicitors in the interest of their private clients; what justification was there for the issue of this warrant without notice, and under such unusual circumstances; and whether directions will be given that these proceedings will be immediately discontinued?

MR. J. MORLEY: The first paragraph sets forth the facts with substantial accuracy except, as I am informed, that the ownership of the cattle was not tried by the Judge at Quarter Sessions. The two men, M'Farland and Sawyers, were arrested on a warrant obtained by the bailiff, and were tried at the Omagh January Quarter Sessions, when they pleaded guilty and were allowed out on their own recognisances to attend for judgment when called upon. They appear to have been dealt with in this manner in consequence of Sawyer's undertaking not to execute the decree obtained by him against the Bank. Contrary to the arrangement thus entered into, Sawyers levied the decree, and the Sessional Crown Solicitor, who appears to have regarded this as a breach of faith, served him with the usual 10 days' notice to come up for judgment at next Quarter Sessions. No warrant has been issued in connection with this branch of the case. The attention of the Attorney General having been drawn to the facts of the case some days ago, directed that the notice to appear for judgment should be at once withdrawn by the Sessional Crown Solicitor.

BUILDING SOCIETIES' ACTS.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, a Bill to amend the Law relating to Building Societies?

MR. ASQUITH: It is the intention of my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works to introduce a measure to amend the law relating to Building Societies.

THE BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

MR. W. KENNY: I have to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to whom I have given private notice of the question, whether, having regard to the order in which the Government Bills were placed—first, Registration; second, Welsh Disestablishment; third, Evicted Tenants; and fourth, Local Veto—the House may take it for granted that the Government have determined to put the Welsh Disestablishment Bill before the Evicted Tenants Bill?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I received notice of this question about two and a-half minutes ago. The hon. Member can draw no conclusions of the kind which he seems to have been disposed to draw until the Government have declared their intentions.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: May I ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, to whom I have given private notice of the question, whether, in view of all the circumstances of the case, and especially in view of the fact that the Leader of the Opposition said on Thursday that all Parties were agreed as to the first part of the terms of Reference, he does not think it advisable to go on with the first part of the Reference at once? Will he not consent to move that part to-night?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am considering how it may be possible to establish a modus vivendi with gentlemen opposite, and am engaged in negotiations on the matter. If the hon. Member will ask me a question on Thursday, I will give him a definite answer.

THE BEHRING SEA ARBITRATION BILL.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): With reference to what fell from the Attorney General earlier in the afternoon, I should like to ask at what time the Government propose to adjourn other business in order to take the

Mr. Gerald Balfour

Behring Sea Arbitration Bill, which does not stand even as second Order on the Paper?

SIR W. HARCOURT: We are anxious that proper time should be given for the consideration of a Bill of such importance. But I hope we may assume that, under the circumstances, it is not a Bill which is going to be opposed. It would be a very ungracious thing towards the United States if it were opposed. I am extremely anxious, on account of the International character of the Bill, that it should not be made the subject of Party controversy. Would it be considered adequate if we took the Bill at half-past 11?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As a matter of personal explanation, let me remind the right hon. Gentleman that when the Bill was read a second time I took great pains to make it clear that the Bill would not be treated by us in any controversial spirit, and that I would do my best to enable it to pass. The whole difficulty arises from some differences between this measure and the measure presented to the United States Legislature. I am not qualified to say whether the differences are such as would justify a Debate in this House. The Government are better judges of that; but I hope they will not stint the necessary time for the consideration of the Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: If it is desired, the Bill will be taken at 11 o'clock.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

James Caldwell, esquire, for the County of Lanark (Mid Division.)

MOTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (GOVERNMENT BUSINESS).

RESOLUTION.

SIR W. HARCOURT, in rising to move—

“That for the remainder of the Session Government Business shall have priority on Tuesday; that on Friday; the House do meet at Two of the clock, and Order 56 be extended to Tuesday and the Morning Sitting on Friday.”

AD How, no doubt, be expected by the House to state the grounds on which Her Majesty's Government make this claim—this large claim—in respect of the

ne to be given to them for the transaction of business. I will do so with absolute frankness and in a manner that will give offence, I hope, to no party or section in the House. The grounds on which the Government make this request are—first of all, the date indicated by the calendar; secondly, the business the House has to transact; and, thirdly, the relation of the Government to that business. As regards the date, I may remind the House that it is the 9th of April, and I think need not remind the House of the abnormal circumstances that have taken place in the first quarter of this year. I will not refer to those circumstances in detail, for they are all familiar to the House. I will take this opportunity of cordially recognising the assistance the Government have received from the Opposition in transacting the necessary business in order to conclude the first quarter of the year. It is well-known that the Government were placed in an exceptional position. They were bound to conclude the financial business of the country by a particular date, and I am glad to recognise the assistance they received from gentlemen in all quarters of the House in performing that part of their duty. But what we are concerned with to-day is the future, and what remains of the session on which we have entered. In these circumstances, I do not propose to do what has been done on some occasions and go through a number of precedents, because precedents really have no bearing upon the circumstances of the present time. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes; that is a well-founded observation, as I shall endeavour to show to the House. I will take it for granted that I shall have the assent of the House to this proposition, that if we can help it we are not to follow the example of last year. The continued and continuous sittings of Parliament are, I think, neither good for a House of Commons nor good for a country; and, if I may assume that, I hope it may be an element that we shall take into consideration in determining what we are going to do with the future of the Session. I would point out to the House that, according to the present arrangements, the business days at the disposal of the Government are eight in the month, and that is making no allowance for vacations at Easter and at Whitsuntide. You may multiply that by the number of months you desire the House of Commons to sit. I will not make that multiplication, but I observe that my right hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) has fixed the time when the Session is to be closed. It is a little old-fashioned, I think, but he and I remember when the Session closed on August 10; and that is the date that he now adopts. I shall not be so rash myself as to fix any date; but if I take the date he has adopted, the number of days at the disposal of the Government without any recess at Whitsuntide is somewhere about 36.

An hon. MEMBER: No, 32.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Well, 32. Therefore, according to the hypothesis of my right hon. Friend, 32 days are available to the Government to transact the business they have to deal with. I venture to say that those eight days in the month are not sufficient for the business that the Government have to transact in the House of Commons. I would venture candidly to desire the House to consider what is the business which the Government is expected to transact—and rightly expected to transact—in the course of a Session, and I will discuss this not in relation to one Government or another, but in relation to all Governments, as the question affects our successors as much as it does ourselves. The first and indispensable business is the administrative business of the Government connected with Supply and all that depends on it—all questions relating to the administrative business of the country at home, in the colonies, in India, in foreign affairs, and all the questions that lie outside the circle of legislative action. That is the first class of business the Government have to transact, and that nobody else can transact. The second class of business is what I should designate as legislation of a neutral character—that is to say, legislation not of a distinctly Party or political character, or of a highly controversial character, but of a sort and magnitude which only the Government can deal with. There are frequently proposals made by non-official Members of which it is said that the subject can only be adequately dealt with by the Government, and we are familiar conclusion any measure of importance, the Government is the only capable instrument. Now, if I am allowed to apply these observations to the present, I say that, in respect of administrative business and non-contentious and non-controversial business, the Government have a right to appeal to all sections of the House to give them ample time for dealing with that description of business. As regards the larger Bills of a more controversial character, and as regards the political Bills, I perfectly admit that we have no claim upon gentlemen opposite who are opposed to these measures and who desire to resist them. I cannot ask them—if I did I know I should not get it—that they will give us any facilities to promote any measures which they desire to see not passed into law. But, Sir, the time of the House is at the disposal of the majority of the House. Whether it be, as was the case in the last Parliament, a Tory majority, or whether, as in this Parliament, it be a Liberal majority, the time of the House is at the disposal of the majority. When it has been desired to give effect to political measures like the Crimes Act or the Home Rule Bill, the House has had no hesitation in affording the time necessary. I am stating what I believe to be unquestionably the truth—that the question of determining the disposal of the time of the House is a matter upon which the majority of the House has a right to decide. As I have said before, we have no right to expect the minority to facilitate measures to which they are opposed; but, for the same reason, the Government have the right to appeal to the majority of the House—by whom, in fact, they are placed in the position they hold—to give them the means and to afford them the support that is necessary to give effect to the Bills which they desire to see carried into law. We are the crew of a vessel which has a fixed destination; we have a voyage to make; we have a precious cargo to carry. [Ironical cheers.] I know that is a cargo which you do not desire to see carried. We, however, regard it as a valuable cargo. It has been placed in our charge, and we are responsible for it. In making that voyage, and in meeting the stormy seas and the winds and waves which we have to encounter from the Opposition, we desire to press straight on. We cannot afford to make calls at all the interesting spots on the way. That is not our business—it would be the business of a voyage of pleasure, which ours is not. [A VOICE: "Speak up."] I must appeal for the usual courtesies of Debate. We are pledged to go forward in the way to which we have pledged ourselves, and we ask the support of those who concur in our opinions and who desire the success of the measures to which we are committed. Those are the grounds—which I have endeavoured to state as impartially and calmly as I can—why I make upon the majority of the House a claim and a request which the Government believe to be founded upon reason. We have asked no more than we consider that we absolutely require. I know we are to be met with various Amendments. One Amendment upon the Paper is that our present request should be limited till Whitsuntide. That would be a waste of time, because we should then have to fight the battle over again. We, therefore, cannot accept that. Another Amendment is that we should take only Tuesday mornings, and not the whole of Tuesdays. We do not think that would be adequate for the purpose. My right hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby is more liberal, for he is going to propose that we should limit our request to August 10. I am obliged to him, but that would be rather like fixing a particular date beforehand as the limit for the duration of the Session. Besides these proposals, what is still more formidable is, that we shall most probably be pressed to make exceptions in the case of particular Bills. If so, I may say at once that in the request now made there is no time for exceptions. If we once commence to deal with exceptions, we shall have a prolonged contest in which it will be very difficult to know to whom the apple is to be given. The Government have already committed themselves to give days for four special subjects. There is the Navy, the discussion upon which is to be taken, I hope, to-day, and, if necessary, to-morrow. There is to be a discussion on Uganda. And a day has been promised for Indian finance. Those days were promised as conditions of concluding the financial business; and an opportunity has also been promised for discussing the Eight Hours Bill. Beyond that we feel that it is impossible for us to go. I have now endeavoured to state, as impartially as I can, the case upon which the Government make this request. It rests with the majority of the House to determine how it will dispose of its time, and it is for them to determine whether they are disposed to bestow on the Government that time which we consider absolutely essential to enable the Government to fulfil the duties that have been imposed upon them by the majority of the House and by the majority of the country.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That for the remainder of the Session Government Business do have priority on Tuesday. That on Friday the House do meet at Two of the clock, and that the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to Tuesday and the Morning Sitting on Friday."—(Sir W. Harcourt.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Whatever we may think of the substance of the demand made upon us by the right hon. Gentleman, nobody who has heard his speech will accuse him of adopting, in recommending the substance of the Motion to the House, a tone likely to embitter the Debate. He has made his speech and his proposal in a manner as likely to recommend it to his opponents as well as to his friends as, I think, was possible under the circumstances. Nevertheless, he will not be surprised to hear that, in however soft and tender accents he makes this proposal to us, the substance of his request is of such a character as to make it absolutely impossible for us to give a willing assent to the policy he asks us to accept. In the first place, I ask the House to note that the right hon. Gentleman has abandoned the course hitherto pursued by his predecessors in Office in asking the House to give up its time to the Government. He has not rested himself in any way upon precedent, but has laid down certain general propositions, which he thinks ought to command our assent. I do not, however, hesitate to say that the independent or the private Members of this House will practically give up all the rights which they have hitherto enjoyed if they assent to the propositions. It may or it may not be proper for the Government to make this claim upon us at this time. To that I shall address myself directly, but for any Government to come down to this House and say that, by the Standing Orders, the Government had only eight days a month, which are quite inadequate for Government business, is practically to cut at the very root of every privilege which private Members enjoy, not merely at the beginning or end of the Session, but at any period of the Session, and I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has found it necessary to place his claim upon such very broad bases, and lay deep the foundations for future aggressions on the part of those who may succeed him in the office he holds. The right hon. Gentleman told us that he was not going to appeal to precedents, and I notice that those against whom precedents tell usually prefer to go to first principles to support their proposals. It is a very natural taste, and the right hon. Gentleman has laid before us the first principles to which he appeals with all his accustomed clearness. And what are they? He says that the responsible Government of the day, the creation of the majority of the House, are bound to carry through certain classes of business, which he proceeded to specify. He gave the first place to Supply, and I should be quite ready to make this concession to the right hon. Gentleman, that if Supply really was taken at a convenient period of the Session before the House was utterly worn out towards the middle or end of it, private Members would probably have very little cause to complain, because it is upon Supply that private Members can with most effect bring forward their grievances. It is upon Supply that private Members can best bring forward their own views, and can best criticise the action of the Government in Office. I am not complaining of the right hon. Gentleman bringing Supply on at a late period of the Session. That has been the course adopted by his own Government, by many previous Governments, and the late Government. But even if he is going to put down Supply in the list of the business that the Government has got to get through, and is going to quote Supply as a reason why private Members should be expected to lose their privileges at the early part of the Session, then I think private Members have a right on their part to demand that the Government should bring on Supply at a time when private Members are able adequately to discuss it. But no such promise was given by the right hon.

Sir W. Harcourt

Gentleman; no hint was given by him that a different course would be taken with regard to Supply than that which was adopted by them last year and by us in the year before. I presume, therefore, that they will carry out their own policy and their predecessors' policy, and relegate Supply to a period when practically a full discussion of the Estimates and of the principles underlying the Estimates is really withdrawn from the great mass of the House of Commons. Having dealt with Supply and casually mentioned a certain amount of non-Party legislation which the Government have to get through, the right hon. Gentleman went on to talk of Party measures, and he appeared to think that there were those on this side of the House who objected to bringing forward such measures. If there be such critics I do not rank myself among them. Of course, the Government exist for the purpose of bringing forward Party measure, and the Opposition, as an Opposition, exist for the purpose of criticising them. I make no complaint of the action of the Government in producing Party measures, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will make no complaint when we proceed to criticise them. But what I do complain of is that the Government are so long in bringing forward these controversial measures. The Queen's Speech has not been before us very long, but, after all, it has been before us for upwards of a month, and the Government have not yet brought forward these controversial matters of which we have heard so much in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He will say, "Oh, that is because we had to pass a certain amount of financial business before Easter, which took up the whole time of the House, the whole time of the Government, and the whole time of private Members, and you cannot complain of us for deferring to the present period these controversial measures which it is our business to lay before the House." But the Government have not made the best of their opportunities. What have they done since we met? I give them all the time before Easter. Granted that they were to occupy us as they chose to occupy us during the whole of last summer, last autumn, last winter, and this spring, then I admit that in this Session before Easter they had no time or opportunity to bring in any of their measures. But since Easter they have had all the ordinary advantages which a Government possess of the days allocated by the Standing Orders of the House. How have they spent those days? Have they spent them by bringing forward these controversial measures? Not a bit of it. Those measures are still to be brought forward. We are still ignorant of what they are; and all we have had is this foolish proposal about a Scotch Committee, which is not legislation at all, but which is, as far as I can gather, the fad of a single Minister and of a single section in the House. It has occupied all the time of the Government since Easter, and, as far as I am able to forecast its future, it is likely to occupy a good deal more if they insist upon proceeding with it. What is the use of coming down to the House when you mismanage your business in this fashion, and making this appeal on the merits, because, forsooth, more than eight days in the month are required by the Government for forcing through the House the controversial measures referred to? I could have wished that if the right hon. Gentleman found it out of his power, or inexpedient, for the purpose of controversy to go into a discussion of past precedents, he had at all events exercised his ingenuity in giving to us a forecast of his future action. We have had no forecast. No attempt has been made by the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of the Government to tell us when he means to bring on Supply, and in what order he means to bring on the measures of the Government, or what measures the Government hope to pass. The whole future of the Session is absolutely obscure. We do not know what the Government intend, or what they mean to carry through, and in this state of absolute darkness we are asked to vote away our privileges. I do not think it is my special business to stand up here as a guardian of those whom the right hon. Gentleman calls unofficial Members. Perhaps I may observe that he rather prided himself on the phrase "unofficial Members," and I think with small reason. The term unofficial Members is extremely inconvenient and misleading. Gentlemen on this Bench are unofficial Members; but according to the ordinary that the Government are happier in their vessel than I should be in any vessel, even a more seaworthy one than that of the Government. I am afraid, Sir, that they have more formidable dangers before them than the horrors of sea sickness. I think I see traces of the fact that the winds and waves, as the right hon. Gentleman expresses it, are gradually making their impression on that vessel, and that leaks—not very formidable leaks, perhaps—have been sprung, and have been stopped by methods of a not very permanent character. Meanwhile, however, I may reassure the right hon. Gentleman by saying that, whatever may be his future destinies, I do not think he is likely to suffer shipwreck to-day. The winds and the waves on this occasion, as on others, will do their best to impede his course, but he will survive our efforts. I do not think, however, that he has, either from the general point of view or from the point of view of the unofficial Members, shown any sufficient reason why we should give him privileges which in similar circumstances have never been asked for by his predecessors in Office.

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll) said, he was one of the unofficial Members who occupied one of the two first places affected by the Motion of the Government. He was not going to dispute the right of the Government to take the time of the House, but the Government must have known for weeks that about this time it would be necessary to take the whole time of the House, and he complained that they did not give notice four weeks ago of their intention, in order that hon. Members might be saved the necessity and worry of the ballot, and still more the necessity of getting up subjects. To-morrow night he should have had the opportunity, but for this Motion, of calling attention to the financial condition of India in relation to Great Britain, and he complained that they should be discussing the question of taking Tuesday only on the day before. Why should they not have got a month's notice? A cook got a month's notice, and surely a Member of Parliament ought to get as much. He trusted that in future the Government would, when they foresaw the necessity of taking the whole time of the House, give due notice to hon. Members, so as to avoid difficulties and heartburnings, and appeals for exceptions. For himself, much as he appreciated the position he occupied for the two days which would be affected by this Motion, and highly as he appreciated the subjects he had intended to bring forward, he must say honestly that he appreciated the stability of the Government more, and although it was a sacrifice, he would support the Government in a Division which would rob him of his privileges. He appreciated the advantages of a Liberal Government more than any private Motion that he could bring on, and for that reason he should support the Government in the Division.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham), as an agricultural Member, desired to utter one or two words of earnest protest against the course which the Government had seen fit to adopt. Important as were all those questions, the consideration and discussion of which might be affected by the course of the Government, he ventured to say that none of them equalled in importance the great question of agricultural depression. How could the Party opposite and the Government any longer keep up their pretence of sympathy with the agricultural interest? He did not think the agricultural labourers would now continue to be their dupes. This ought to be the finishing touch to that gigantic fraud which, he was sorry to say, the Government had, with some success, carried out before the country during the last few years. It should be the last straw which should break the camel's back. What had been the conduct of the Government in regard to agriculture, and how had they redeemed those numerous promises with which they had deceived and cajoled the agricultural labourers? They granted a Commission to inquire into what everyone knew already, except the Minister of Agriculture—namely, the causes of agricultural depression; but when any remedy was proposed or desire evinced to bring this great question before the country, how were they (the Opposition) met? They were either opposed or snubbed. He called to witness as to this the way in which a deputation on a most important question was received the other day by the Minister of Agriculture. That was the way in which agricultural interests were treated, and now, when at last a chance was offered to bring the question of this great agricultural depression before the House and the country by discussing the Motion of which the hon. Member for Essex had given notice for Tuesday week, how were they treated? Again the Government interposed, and by this most arbitrary and uncalled-for action made any discussion impossible. There were two things, to his mind, absolutely clear: first of all, that the Government were utterly incapable of managing the affairs of this country; and, secondly, that they were supremely indifferent to the agricultural interests.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Waterford): I am not one of those Members who sympathise very much with the grievances of private Members. I have sat now in this House for 12 years, and my experience has been that the time devoted to private Members has not, on the whole, been very productive of good to the country, and I am bound to say, Sir, the Resolution proposed by the Leader of the House, if carried, would, in my judgment, leave a sufficient portion of every week available for private Members. It would leave Wednesday absolutely free for private Members to bring forward their Bills, and leave the evening sitting on Friday also available for the discussion of private Members' grievances. We cannot afford to forget the experience of past years, as indeed has been alluded to by the Leader of the Opposition—that when private Members have come down to this House to discuss these private Members' grievances, other private Members have taken advantage of the occasion to stay away from the House, with the result that the House was counted out and valuable time lost. Therefore, if the Government of the day has the confidence of the majority of the House of Commons, and the majority of the country, and if that Government has serious and important legislative work to perform, then, for my part, I think the supporters of the Government are justified in coming for at least as much of the time of the House as is asked for in this Resolution. But having said so much, I desire to press respectfully upon the Government for some information as to what the public business is that they intend to proceed with. This is an occasion upon which it seems to me that possibly a good turn may be done for the interests of the county I represent if Irish Members would use the opportunity of endeavouring to extract from the Government some promise as to their course of procedure with reference to Irish measures. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that in the course of the Queen's Speech the first measure mentioned was an Irish measure, touching very nearly an important Irish question—that is the question of the evicted tenants. That measure was put in the very forefront of the Queen's Speech; but on the very first night, I think, of the discussion on the Address to the Throne, I and some other Members asked from the Government an assurance that the place accorded to that Bill in the Gracious Speech from the Throne would be observed in the order of Business during the Session. We had, Sir, a right to claim that that Bill should have precedence, because the House will remember how that question of the evicted tenants in Ireland has been treated. The House will remember that when this Government came into power in the month of August they were pressed to call an Autumn Session of Parliament together for dealing with that question, and many people thought in Ireland that the opportunity thus afforded would be the best opportunity available for the Government to settle this question. Very many people, even at that time, immediately after the General Election had taken place, when the opposition to the Government had not become so embittered as it afterwards did, owing to the discussions on the Home Rule Bill and other matters, thought that then possibly many of the landlord class in Ireland would have been willing to make a compromise on this question, and the Bill might have been passed into law. The claim that was then made on the Government was rejected by them, and, in spite of the protests which were made, they adjourned the meeting of Parliament for six months, and they issued a Commission to inquire into facts which were notorious, which every man in Ireland and out of it was perfectly well acquainted with. Then, when the next Session of Parliament assembled, of course the Home Rule Bill took precedence of the question of the evicted tenants, and again an Autumn Session was called last year. We asked from the Government for a limited portion of that Autumn Session to deal with the question of the evicted tenants, and again our claim was rejected. And what was the excuse made? I am speaking by the card when I say that upon 100 platforms it was stated that the Government refused to introduce this Bill in the Autumn Session because they intended in the Session of this year to make the evicted tenants' question the chief, the most urgent, and the first measure they would introduce, and, therefore, we asked on the Debate on the Address to the Throne whether the place accorded in the Queen's Speech to that measure would be maintained. We got an unsatisfactory answer, and it appears now that the measure is to be put back until after the Registration Bill has been passed into law. That much we know; we do not know how much further back still it may be put in the future. We do know, however, it is not to be taken until after the Registration Bill. I hope that the proposals which the Chief Secretary is going to put forward will be laid before the House and the country immediately. But even that is not sufficient. Having done that, it is the right hon. Gentleman's duty to press on with the Bill as fast as possible. I see no reason why it should be put into a position next to the Registration Bill. I am not saying that the whole of the time of the House during the next few weeks should be devoted to this question alone; but I say it is not too much for us to say that the Registration Bill and the Evicted Tenants Bill should be taken pari passu. But instead of that it appears to be the intention of the Government to put back the Evicted Tenants Bill until the Registration Bill has passed into law. After that the Government is to consider whether this Bill shall have the second or what place. There appears to me to be some competition between the backers of the Evicted Tenants Bill and the backers of the Welsh Disestablishment Bill. Of course, the Welsh Disestablishment Bill is one which has my very hearty sympathy—first upon its merits, and also because of the many obligations which we are under to the Welsh Members who desire to have it passed. After all, charity begins at home. The Welsh Disestablishment Bill cannot be so urgent for the Welsh Members as the Evicted Tenants Bill is for us. I have mentioned these matters because I think it is due to the House and due also to Ireland that before Irish Members are asked to vote in favour of the Government proposal to give all the time of the House to Ministers it is right to inquire from the Government some assurance of what the course of public business will be in reference to these Irish questions. I have stated elsewhere, and I state here, that I am greatly afraid that the chance of passing the Evicted Tenants Bill into law has enormously diminished, if not entirely disappeared, through the delay which has already taken place. The duty of introducing that Bill and passing it into law rests with the Government because of the pledges which have been given in their name; and it is a violation of the spirit of those pledges to postpone any further the introduction of this Bill to restore tenants to their homes as promised by the right hon. Gentleman, who is a Member of the present Cabinet. Under these circumstances I, for one, although I have little sympathy with the claims of private Members, will not take the responsibility of voting in favour of the Motion of the Leader of the House unless we receive an assurance that this Bill will be introduced at once and pushed forward step by step with the Registration Bill, and not be relegated to the end of the year, when some crisis may precipitate a Dissolution, and the Session end without any serious attempt having been made to grapple with the matter. I hope the Government will state their mind openly upon this matter, seeing that up to the present they have spoken no straightforward word upon it, but have contented themselves with expressions of goodwill and sympathy to the evicted tenants without saying what practical step they would take to restore them to their homes and to bring this Bill to a successful issue.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman seems to call for some remarks from myself. Those remarks will be very short, and I am afraid that in the course of them I shall not be able to inform the hon. Member of what he professes a desire to know—namely, the precise order and place we shall give in the business of the Government to the Evicted Tenants Bill: because we are now asking the House two things—first of all, to show that they have confidence in the Government, by placing time at its disposal for the accomplishment of the work they have in hand; and, second, to leave the distribution of that time in the hands of the Government, so that they may dispose of it in the way which to them seems most fit. The hon. and learned Member has related the history of the dealings of the present Government with the question of the evicted tenants, into which I do not think it would be right or relevant that I should follow him. He says we ought to have had an Autumn Session in 1892 in order to bring forward an Evicted Tenants Bill, which he believes would then have had a good chance of becoming law. I think I know as much about the inner concerns of the evicted tenants' question as the hon. and learned Gentleman, and all I can say is that unless all the information which I had at my disposal was faulty, it is not correct to say that the measure, if brought forward that year, was likely to receive the support of the Irish landlords in this House or elsewhere. Apart from that matter, I entirely deny the hon. and learned Member's assertion that the Autumn Session of 1892 was a favourable time for bringing forward that matter. The appointment of the Commission is an old story, and has been fully discussed in this House; but I do say that Commission was the means of collecting and bringing to light information without which no Bill could have been adequately and efficiently presented to this House. The hon. and learned Gentleman cannot suppose that I, who am responsible for the administration in Ireland, am likely to allow the Evicted Tenants Bill to fall into such a position that it would be put out of our power to pass it into law this Session. I have said again and again in this House that I am as alive as any Irish Member, and more alive, perhaps, than some Irish Members, as to the urgent importance, if it can possibly be done, of persuading this House, and it might be another House, to pass this measure into law.

Mr. J. Morley

I do not despair of bringing in that measure in a form which ought to command the assent of every reasonable man, both in this House and elsewhere. This is one of the measures for which we are asking that the time of the House should be given to us. The hon. and learned Member, and other Irish gentlemen interested in this matter, may rest assured that there is no intention whatever to play with this important question. On the other hand, we shall keep it where it now is, in the front rank of the measures with which we are prepared to go in this Session.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): The Chancellor of the Exchequer has introduced this matter in a tone so moderate and mild, and his speech was dealt with afterwards so humorously by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, that I think it is possible that the extreme importance and magnitude of the change which it is now proposed to make in our Parliamentary practice may have escaped the observation of the House. That it is a change of great importance and magnitude is shown convincingly by the speech to which we have just listened from the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who, falling as is his wont into terms which exceed in definiteness those of his colleagues, has made it clear for the first time that the Government are asking us to deal with the question of the disposal of the time of the House in the shape of a challenge upon a Vote of Confidence. I have never known before, upon a question of this kind, anything like the solemnity of the appeal which has been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Chief Secretary to their followers to follow them into their Lobby upon this matter. As a rule, this excessive pressure has not been brought to bear upon the Members of a Party when a question of this kind is brought forward, and I think the House may fairly conceive that there is some good reason for it upon the present occasion. Why should we regard this as a matter of extreme importance? I suppose that, according to the definition given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Leader of the Opposition, I am a private Member of this House. I do not sit upon either Front Bench, and I was not a Member of either of the two last Governments. Although I am a private Member, I do not stand here as an advocate of their claims, and I may frankly confess that I do not care a brass button what becomes of them. I have never seen any great utility in the discussions which under our present system take place on private Members' nights. It would be altogether different if the House had a power of selection; but I find that, according to our present practice, it is almost always the greatest bore who gets the first place. But although he is able to get the first place, he is not able to get Members to come and hear him; and the result is, that the time of the House, which might be much better occupied, is entirely wasted. Therefore, while I acknowledge the magnitude of the change, I rejoice that for the first time we have a Government which comes here and says that it is for the majority of the House—that is, the Party majority—to dispose of the time of the House, and proceeds to dispose of the time of the House by cutting the ground altogether from under private Members. The sham of private Members, after the vote which I suppose will be taken to-night, will be once for all disposed of. Hereafter every Government which desires time for its own measures will be entitled at the very beginning of the Session, before private Members have had a single day at their disposal, to come down and quote this precedent and say “the time of the House belongs to the Party majority, and the Government of the day make it a matter of confidence that they should have the whole time of the House.” [Cheers.] Now, Sir, no doubt that is a change of very great magnitude which appears to be willingly accepted by my hon. Friends below me, and which undoubtedly will serve as a most useful precedent in the future. Therefore, so far as private Members are concerned, I do not feel at all antagonistic to the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I do feel disinclined to give more time to this Government. I have no objection whatever to take it away from private Members, but I do not see that these gentlemen deserve it, and I do not see that they are in need of it, or that they have made out any case whatever. I have heard a good number of discussions on similar points, and hitherto always two things have had to be shown, or at all events two points have been brought against the Government, and they have been asked to show reason in reference to them: the first is, that there is an emergency which justifies the demand for time; and the second is, that this emergency is not the result of gross mismanagement on the part of the Government. I remember in the time of the late Government they had to ask for the whole time of the House, but they never asked for it so early as it is asked for on this occasion. At that time my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton invariably attacked the then Leader of the House, and said it was a monstrous proposition, that he and his Government had got themselves into a hole through gross mismanagement, and that, under the circumstances, there was no justification for giving them the whole time of the House. I assume, at any rate, I am justified in applying the same sort of test to the present proposal. If there be an emergency, it is wholly the fault of the Government, and why should we give them more time under the circumstances? They have misused the time they have had, and what ground have we for supposing that they will make any better use of the time for which they ask? What is the emergency? The emergency consists in the fact that this is April 9. Is there not a little confusion in the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? What has the fact that it is April 9 got to do with the question? It shows that we are in the fourth month of the year, and is it because we are in the fourth month of the year that he thinks the period has come for asking for the whole time of the House? Usually, we have considered this question with regard to the time of the Session. As regards the Session, we are in the first month, and, as far as we have gone, the Government have every reason to congratulate themselves on the generosity of the House. They have got more in a month than the late Government ever got in two months. They have got the whole of the Supplementary Estimates and part of the ordinary Estimates. They have concluded the financial business of the year, and they have introduced and taken the First Readings of one or two Bills. What more do they want in a month of only eight days of Government time? Under those circumstances, it is perfectly absurd to pretend that there is any emergency. It may be said, and it is quite true, that, although this is only the first month of the Session, it is the fourth month of the year. If we are to consider January and February and part of March as part of this Session, and if we are to deal with the matter as though we were in the fourth month of the Session, we must consider what was done in January and February. The Government would be in the position of a Government which in the fourth month of the Session had already succeeded in passing two Bills of first-rate importance—the Parish Councils Bill and the Employers' Liability Bill—and had, in addition, accomplished the other work to which I have referred, and who then came down prepared to make arrangements for winding up the Session. Under these circumstances, the first thing we should expect the Government to do is to tell us what Bills they are going to drop. The illustration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a very unfortunate one, and when it has been so heckled by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition I am almost ashamed to return to it. I must, however, point out that when a vessel in the position in which he describes himself and crew—a vessel which some of us think is badly managed and overladen, and which, as he says, has got, above all, to get to a fixed destination—finds itself in trouble, in a storm or a hurricane, those in charge jettison a part of the cargo. If the time has come when we must consider that we are in the fourth month of the Session, I think we have a right to call upon the Government to jettison a part of their cargo, and no longer to flourish in our faces the mere pretence, as we all know it is, of a whole number of Bills, like the Evicted Tenants Bill and a great number of others that had been put down for electoral purposes without the slightest chance of being proceeded with. I now come to consider whether this so-called emergency—which I do not think is an emergency at all—is not due to the mismanagement of the business of the House by the present Government. I will put my charge against the Government in one word—that they have wasted an immense amount of time in pressing forward a Bill which has not a hearty supporter even on their own side. I refer, of course, to the Home Rule Bill. I say there is not a single section of the Party which supports the Government which was heartily in favour of the Home Rule Bill. [Cries of "Oh!"] Certainly not the Irish Members—certainly not either section of the Irish Members, at whose instigation the Bill was presumably brought in, but both of which sections took opportunity again and again in the course of debate to show that they regarded it as a very imperfect satisfaction of their demands. And certainly no one here can honestly say that it was a Bill which was popular with the constituencies in the country. That is what has made the difficulty. Had that been a popular Bill the whole course of matters would have been perfectly simple; for when that Bill was defeated the Government would have appealed to the country, and if they had come back, as they would have come back, on the hypothesis that the Bill was popular, with as large or a larger majority, they would have been able to proceed with the Bill with every chance of immediate success. But they did not dare to go to the country on that Bill. There is not a man on this side of the House who will contradict me when I say that not one of them advised the Government to take a Dissolution on the Home Rule Bill. There is not a single one of them who believes that, if they had taken a Dissolution on that Bill, they could possibly have obtained a majority. As the Government did not dare to take their principal measure, which had never been before the country, and obtain a decision upon it, what was the position in which they found themselves? They were bound to endeavour to retrieve the situation by bringing in a whole lot of other measures which they thought would be more popular than the Home Rule Bill. This is the reason why the Queen's Speech has been crammed on two occasions with the most contentious items of the Newcastle Programme, and that is the meaning of the Autumn Session which has brought about the state of things in which we find ourselves. Even then the Government did not carry out their policy properly. Their object was a bad object, because I call it neither more nor less than an attempt to deceive the constituencies of the country. I call it nothing more nor less than an attempt to take the decision of the country upon the wrong issue. But, even if the object were right, the methods by which they endeavoured to secure it have been entirely wrong. What ought they to have done? They know what they ought to have done, because they professed when they asked for the Autumn Session that they would bring forward non-contentious Bills. They brought forward Bills which, so far as principle was concerned, were non-contentious. I refer to the Employers' Liability Bill and the Parish Councils Bill; but when those Bills came into the House how did the Government treat them? The Employers' Liability Bill was conducted throughout, I do not hesitate to say, by the Home Secretary in a more aggressive manner than any Bill in our time. [Cries of "Oh!"] Does anyone deny that? Will anyone tell me of any other Bill of the same importance upon which the Minister conducting it has refused every single Amendment which was moved by his opponents? I do not believe such a case can be quoted; and I go further, and say—

Mr. J. Chamberlain

MR. ASQUITH: My right hon. Friend has made an assertion as to facts in most imperfect information. He was not present in the House when a great part of the Debate on that Bill took place. I will inform him that there was hardly a single clause in the Bill as it left this House which was not amended, and in which Amendments proceeding from the right hon. Gentleman's own friends were not accepted by the Government.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It is quite true that I was not present during the whole of the Debate; but I am able to read, and I have read most carefully all that took place. The right hon. Gentleman says he accepted a number of Amendments. Yes, he did; he accepted an immense number of Amendments from his own side. But my point is, that he did not accept one single Amendment, except formal Amendments, not one Amendment of the slightest importance from his opponents.

MR. W. M'LAREN: Yes, he did. There was my own Amendment.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, I know; but do you call that an Amendment from an opponent?

*MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is not entitled to go into a discussion as to the details of the proceedings upon the Employers' Liability Bill.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am much obliged to you, Sir. I am afraid I was about to be led away by the interruption to which I was subjected. My point is, however, simple. I say, as regards the Employers' Liability Bill, there was, in effect, one Amendment of great importance urged on the right hon. Gentleman even by his own supporters, which he refused, and before which, in a fit of temper, he dropped the Bill. The Parish Councils Bill was introduced in a most conciliatory speech by the Secretary of State for India, and had he been allowed his way that Bill would have been carried in less than half the time which it actually took. I do not hesitate to say that many weeks of the time of the House were wasted because the right hon. Gentleman was put aside by his colleagues, and highly contentious matter was introduced at the last moment into the Bill. I say, under these circumstances, the Government have no one to thank but themselves for the condition in which they find themselves. They occupied the House until the 5th of March, or an Autumn Session they ought never to have held at all, and which in any event ought to have been concluded before Christmas, and it is because of the manner in which they treated those two Bills, which were brought in before the Autumn Session, that we find ourselves now on April 9 without having made any considerable progress with the legislation of the present Session. Nor in this Session have they done much better. The Leader of the Opposition referred to the extraordinary folly of the Government in introducing a highly contentious Constitutional question like the Scotch Committee question at a time when, as they say, they cannot possibly deal with the important business which they have put upon the Paper. Why did they not introduce the Registration Bill instead of the Scotch Committee? I beg to warn the Government that, if they go on with the Scotch Committee proposal, they will waste at least two, and very likely three, weeks of the time of the House. Do not let me be misunderstood. I do not mean the discussion upon the Committee. That, of course, will be concluded in a comparatively limited space of time; but just see how a proposal of that kind will affect all our business. Already notices are down to refer Bills coming before us to a Committee of London Members, and I suppose a similar Motion will be made with regard to Welsh Bills. I think you will find that if this proposition is carried out the question will be continually cropping up in the course of the Session, and there will be a most unjustifiable waste of time in reference to a proposal which is brought before us by the Government as though it were a matter of business of comparatively small importance. I think I have shown that not only is there no emergency, but that the delay in business is entirely due to the attitude of the Government. Under these circumstances, I do not think they have the slightest right to call upon us to give them all the time of the House. What use are they going to make of it? Will they tell us now in what order they are going to take their Bills? If they continue to go on as they have been doing we shall only have a repetition of what occurred last Session. We shall only have a waste of time and temper without being much more forward at the end of the Session than we are at the beginning. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to admit that the Government made a mistake last Session, because he said there seemed to be a universal agreement that business ought not be conducted in the same way this Session as it was last Session. But unless the Government are willing not only to continue this Session for an unusual time, but to have an Autumn Session, it is impossible for them to make any reasonable progress with the Bills they have put in the Queen's Speech. It is perfectly well-known that if there is kept hanging before the House of Commons a large number of Bills, one is apt to interfere with the others. It would be a much more straightforward course and a much better course for the progress of business if the Government would undertake to say what are the Bills to which they attach importance, and then we should know upon official authority that as regards the other Bills in the Queen's Speech they are put there for show, and not with any idea of serious progress. There is only one other suggestion I have to make to the Government. I see they are in really an embarrassing condition. I am afraid these difficulties will crop up again and again. I do not think that if they got the whole of the time of the House they would be able to do much better than they are doing now, and I would advise them to cut the Gordian knot at once and give us a Dissolution.

Mr. J. Chamberlain

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had commenced by saying that he was neither an official nor an unofficial Member. He (Mr. Labouchere) wondered what he was. In his opinion, the right hon. Gentleman was neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, nor good red herring. He thought he had never heard a speech which had gone so much round the subject without coming to the actual question before the House as the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. It appeared that the right hon. Gentleman did not care one brass farthing for private Members, but that whilst he did not want them to have the time of the House he did not want the Government to have it. Who, then, in the name of wonder, was to have the time of the House unless it was to be the right hon. Gentleman himself? Was the House to have speeches inflicted upon it by the right hon. Gentleman every evening? The right hon. Gentleman said the Government had mismanaged their affairs. He (Mr. Labouchere) had not perceived that the Government had more mismanaged their affairs than every Government he had known had done. They commenced the Session late. That was not their fault. [Opposition cries of "No!"] Well, it was their misfortune and not their fault. They had to go through Supply, and it was impossible to say that they had mismanaged their business on the three Government days which had since elapsed. As to the Scotch Grand Committee, he could not understand how any English Members could object to allowing the Scotch Members to leave other Members in peace while they went into a room by themselves and discussed the Law of Hypothec or any other Scotch question. He should have thought that no proposal would have secured such universal consent as a proposition of that character. The right hon. Gentleman said the Government mismanaged business last Session. Apparently, in the right hon. Gentleman's view, they were to be forced to waste the time of this Session because they wasted the time of last Session. The right hon. Gentleman complained that the Government had brought in last Session an Employers' Liability Bill, and had not been conciliatory over it, and he went on to suggest that they should be punished because the former President of the Local Government Board (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had been exceedingly conciliatory over the Parish Councils Bill. No matter what the Government did they would never find favour with the right hon. Gentleman. Whether they were conciliatory or unconciliatory; whether they wasted time last Session or not; whether they were anxious or not to waste time in the present Session, the right hon. Gentleman was prepared at any moment to make a speech against them and to find some recondite reasons for voting against that which he supported in former times. He (Mr. Labouchere) had noticed that almost every Member who had spoken had declared that for private Members he entertained the greatest contempt. From the Government point of view a private Member was a public nuisance. The private Member was expected to go down to the House and to hold his tongue; he was expected to cheer Ministers, to vote for them whatever they did, and invariably to declare that his Leaders were the wisest and best human beings in the world. When the Party was in Opposition, the private Member was told not to "let things go too quick," and he was expected to keep alight the sacred lamp of Opposition. Under these circumstances, he (Mr. Labouchere) thought that private Members were most useful, whether their Party was in power or was in Opposition. As to private Members' Motions, it was obvious that when 600 gentlemen balloted not very wise Motions would occasionally be brought forward. But, at the same time, the ballot sometimes gave priority to some very useful Motions. Last week a very valuable proposal in regard to Home Rule for Scotland was made by a private Member and was adopted by the House. Of course, the adoption of that Motion would encourage Ministers to go on in the path of Home Rule. It had always been held that reforms were agitated outside the House at first; that they were then brought forward in the House by private Members' Motions, and such Motions were subsequently moved again and again until at last the majority became so large that the proposal was taken up by the Government. He never knew a Government yet that did not object to private Members' Motions, because very often a very nasty and inopportune Motion was placed on the Paper. The tendency of Governments on a variety of questions was to "sit on the fence," and the object of their supporters was to bring them over to their side of the fence. It frequently happened that, by means of a private Members' Motion, Ministers were obliged to show their hand and to adopt a course which they would not have adopted but for the bringing forward of that Motion. The same thing was always said on one side or the other in these Debates, the only difference being that when gentlemen were on the Treasury Bench they said one thing and when they were on the Front Opposition Bench they said the other. He was sorry the Government could not make an exception in favour of the Tuesday which had been obtained by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Dalziel). He was bound to say that if the Government were ready to leave the question concerning the House of Lords as it stood at present, he did not think their supporters need even complain of his hon. Friend's day being taken away. The House had passed a Resolution of a most drastic character in regard to the Lords. The majority of the House who had voted for that Motion stood on firm ground, for all they had to do was to call upon the Government to give effect to the will of the majority. If the Government were not prepared to do that, he confessed that, as far as he was concerned, they would not enjoy that amount of confidence which he at present entertained for them. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) in thinking that it was somewhat unfair on the part of the Government to make this question one of confidence. He had always thought that these matters were left entirely to the discretion of the House. He himself had moved Amendments on proposals of this kind, and those Amendments had been accepted by the late Mr. W. H. Smith when Leader of the House. If he thought the Government would assent to an Amendment he should move one now, but he did not want Ministers to be turned out. If they chose to make this a question of confidence, they really obliged him to vote for them. He would not allude to all the measures that had been referred to in the Queen's Speech, for, to tell the truth, he did not believe that many of those measures would be brought in or carried. Members knew, however, that they would have a Budget. He hoped the Budget would be an excellent one, and he should be sorry if Ministers were deprived of the opportunity of bringing it on. He knew also that they meant to bring in a Registration Bill. He thought that before a General Election took place the franchise ought to be expanded more than it was at present, and it was, therefore, desirable that the Registration Bill should pass. Until, therefore, the two eggs of the Registration Bill and the Budget had been laid, and, if they were good eggs, hatched by the House, he should not vote against the Government on a mere matter of detail such as that which was now before the House when he was told that if they were beaten they would resign.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt) had been quite correct in dividing Members into official Members, ex-official Members, and unofficial Members.

SIR W. HARCOURT: And double ex-official Members.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was not competent to dilate upon the last category mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman. Having occupied a seat in the House of Commons for a long time, and having sat on every Bench in it, with, he thought, scarcely an exception, he was of opinion that the description given by the right hon. Gentleman of the various classes of Members was a correct one, and it was certainly the one adopted by Mr. Disraeli and by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). To leave this somewhat technical point, he must enter a most distinct protest against the manner in which a very formidable fundamental change not only of the Standing Orders of the House, but in the practice and Rules of Parliament, had been treated by the Government on this occasion. The House was asked to make a very stringent Regulation under which the Government might forward their business during the remainder of the Session. It was also asked to alter fundamentally the Standing Orders of the House. He had frequently seen Standing Orders of the House made subject to alteration, but how had these alterations been accomplished and prefaced? When they had been at all of a formidable and drastic character they had always been preceded by a thorough inquiry before a carefully-selected Committee of the House. He had known many such Committees appointed in his time. These Committees had been composed of the most experienced Members of the House, selected impartially from both sides with an admixture of Members of lesser experience, so as to make the Committee representative of all sections of the House. The Government had cast these precedents to the winds, and they seemed to think that a casual majority was to be at liberty at any moment to tear up Standing Orders, to be a law unto itself, and to establish such Rules as it thought fit for the purpose of driving through Party business according to the exigencies of its own political organisation. He ventured to say that was a revolutionary proposition. It was all very well to say the majority must prevail, and that that was to decide how this business was to be carried on. He (Mr. Lowther) could only say that search where they would through the annals of Parliament and the Constitutional history of this country no precedent for such a doctrine could be found. He would undertake to say that the Standing Orders of the House, originally framed with the utmost caution and care, had never been subjected to any permanent or quasi-permanent alteration without the most careful scrutiny and inquiry. Reference was made a short time ago to the proposal of the late Government with regard to carrying Bills over from one Session to another—a measure of which he strongly disapproved, and should have voted against

Mr. Labouchere

if it had been pressed in the House of Commons. The Government of the day delegated that proposal to a Committee partially chosen—chosen according to a recognised principle in which Committees had always been hitherto appointed—with the result that the proposal did not meet with sufficient support to justify the Government in proceeding with it. The Government, he said, had upset all precedents. What did they now ask the House to do? They asked the House to hand over to them this additional time without having complied with another condition which under these circumstances was always recognised—and that statement he challenged the Chancellor of the Exchequer to contradict. In making an application of this kind it was customary for the Government to inform the House of the specific purposes for which they demanded the unusual facilities. The hon. Gentleman opposite knew that towards the end of the Session or the close of the financial year the Government found that the state of business was such that additional facilities were urgently needed for the transaction of public business, and the practice had been to inform the House precisely how matters stood and state the actual measures that were urgent, and give an assurance that those measures and none other would be submitted for consideration. He defied any Member of Parliament, by his experience what it might, to controvert that statement. How did the Government propose to allocate this time? They were driven to the ordinary sources of information to arrive at any conclusion. He had a strong suspicion that this House was being made use of for purposes which were usually discharged by vacant hoarding round a building in course of building on the streets. This House was to be made a block on which were to be plastered advertisements and gaudy signs of the most hideous and ghastly description. So far from the time which the Government asked the House to give at their disposal being used for the purpose of making up arrears in the business of the country, it was for the purpose of advertisement—Party and political advertisement—that their time was to be appropriated and misused. He ventured to say that there never had been a greater abuse of what he might call brute force and Party vote. Many Members who had preceded him had assumed that the Parliamentary conscience was sufficiently dead to swallow a proposition of this kind on purely Party grounds. He dared say hon. and right hon. Gentlemen had gauged the situation with adequate care and forethought. He regretted to find that there appeared to be very little disposition to discuss the question as one of great Constitutional precedent, but rather as an exhibition of Party strategy and political chicanery which either Party would be justified in using—or misusing. He was afraid that was the tendency of this Debate. His sympathies were with those who had hitherto had by the Standing Orders of the House certain privileges and facilities placed at their disposal by fundamental Rules which were not capable of being altered at the mere caprice of Ministers or will of a Party majority. He deeply regretted this dangerous innovation in Parliamentary practice. It was one which, he thought, boded ill to the independence of the House, and he trusted there would be many Members who would record an emphatic vote against it.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) said, that as far as the non-official or private Member was concerned, he had not received very much satisfaction from any of the Leaders of the Parties who had spoken during the Debate. There seemed to be only one opinion amongst the whole of these gentlemen, that was that having got beyond the necessity of using private Members' nights themselves they wanted to wreck them and take them away from other Members as speedily as possible. This Debate was one of the annual farces which occupied so much of the time of the House. If the Leader of the House and the Leader of the Opposition really believed what they had hinted to-night, that so little good occurred from the advantages that private Members enjoyed, the sooner they made arrangements between themselves to alter the Standing Orders permanently the better it would be for procedure in the House. Private Members would then know that it was not worth their while putting their names down for the ballot and co-operating with their friends and trying to get an expression of opinion upon some subject which they were deeply interested in, although it might not be interesting to the Party opposite. He hoped that if it was understood that Tuesdays were to go away from private Members, the change would be affected in a Constitutional manner in the future. There was nothing for which they had to thank the Leaders of the House. He was sorry the Government would not listen to the private Members who had gone through the ballot, and who represented a very strong body of opinion in the House. He had himself given notice of a Motion in reference to election expenses, a subject upon which some hon. Members held very strong opinions as to present arrangements. Of course it would be out of Order to discuss that matter, and he would only say they desired very earnestly to get an expression of opinion of the House how far they would go in the direction of giving equality of opportunity to poor men for entering the House. However, he was to be sacrificed with the rest of the Members who had already succeeded at the ballot. The course taken by the Opposition had made it impossible for this Motion to be discussed as it might have been as one with regard to the procedure of the House of Commons. The Opposition had chosen, as far as he could see, to make it an occasion of a Vote of Censure on Her Majesty's Government. The whole question of procedure had been put on one side, and they were not able, therefore, to take the action they should have liked to take with regard to the way in which the time of the House should be occupied. If they were to have an alteration in the procedure he sincerely hoped it would be made at once, and then private Members would know where they were; but he was one of those who took a different view as to what private Members had done in the past. He differed from those who thought that the action of those gentlemen had not been beneficial to the legislation of the country. Looking at the history of the country, some of the greatest reforms which had passed through Parliament had been introduced in the first instance, and pressed year after year whenever opportunity had offered, by some private Member who had started alone or with only a small number of Members at his back; but by persistence and by the growing strength of the small Party, those reforms had eventually been placed upon the Statute Book—not he admitted, by the private Members themselves, because just as their efforts were coming to fruition the Government for the time being had taken up those measures, and had taken good care to secure all the reward due to the efforts of the private Members. He looked sadly, therefore, upon the way in which, during several past Sessions, the time of private Members had been gradually encroached upon, and if that kind of thing was to go on the sooner the private Member was swept out of existence in that House the better, and every Member would then recognise that he was only a voting machine when he took his seat within those walls.

MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helens) said, he hoped the hon. Member who had just sat down would have the courage of his convictions, and would oppose this proposal. They had not heard many protests from private Members in the House, but he ventured as one of them to oppose this most unprecedented proposal. He was not surprised at the Leaders of the House, of the Opposition, and of the little Unionist Party on the other side sneering at the rights of private Members, because they could get a hearing whenever they chose. They were in a very different position to the ordinary Members, and were not, as a matter of fact, affected in the least. What they were called upon to decide was whether they were to have any rights or privileges at all. These proposals hitherto, during the last few Sessions, had been supported by some kind of excuse, some kind of apology to the House from the Government for making that request; but on this occasion they had heard nothing of the kind. They were simply asked, practically, to establish the principle that in future private Members had no right except to vote. Private Members on the other side of the House need not be afraid of consequences if the Government were beaten. The Government had by this time got used to that operation. They were beaten on the Address and had been beaten on the average about once a week ever since. Still that did not seem to affect their position, and therefore he did not see why hon. Members opposite need be afraid of voting in opposition to this dangerous proposal. Were private Members to have any rights at all? Arguments had been put forward that they did not make any good use of their time; but that had nothing to do with the question. If they did not choose to come down to the House on Tuesdays and Fridays, that was their own business; and he thought it was better sometimes that the House should be counted out than occupied assisting the present Government to forward their measures. The question was, whether private Members were justified in supporting their own rights? Hon. Members opposite chose to vote like sheep, as if this was a Party question, the consequences must be on their own heads. He did not think, however, as far as Parties were concerned, they need be afraid of consequences. He had no desire to bring forward any special grievance of his own, though, as a matter of fact, he had put down a very useful bill, which he thought would have received the sanction of the Government. They were, in fact, being deprived of the right to bring in private measures, and he could submit to the House a list of bills and Resolutions by private Members which were quite as useful as anything the Government had brought forward. He regretted very much the attitude taken by the hon. Member opposite, who always, when he sat on that side of the House, used to be the guardian angel of private Members' rights. How he had come to change and run away from his principles it was hard to understand. His action that evening tended to destroy the last rag of faith in the consistency of eminent politicians. There was no reason, however, why other private Members on either side of the House should follow his example; and if they allowed themselves to be slaughtered on his occasion they would never get another chance. They would certainly lose their privileges if they failed to stand by one another.

Mr. J. Rowlands

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, if anything would justify Her Majesty's Government in bringing this Motion before the House it would be the attacks made on this occasion. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had stated to the House and to the country that private Members' Debates were useless, and that it would be far better there should be no opportunity afforded for such Debates to take place at all. That example had been followed by another right hon. Gentleman, for not only had he said that the private Members' evenings were employed uselessly, but he justified the proposal of the Government by saying that two or three weeks' additional time would be required before the Scotch Grand Committee could be carried through the House if the Government persevered in it. Clearly the plea for the private Members was a delusion and a farce. It was time that the Radicals on that side of the House had some kind of intimation of what the attitude of the Government was going to be towards the Second Chamber. It would be to the advantage of the Government, the House, and the country, if they had a Debate upon that question. He was simply putting that forward from a friendly point of view. The Government must feel strongly upon that point, for they had seen the work of last year thrown to the winds, and the prospect was that their work this year again would be practically useless. That seemed, therefore, one of the most pressing questions for the moment to the Government. He was content to rest in the belief that at the proper time, some occasion probably more favourable than the present, the Government would be prepared, not on a private Member's Motion, but upon their own initiative, to put forward a policy on the question. He had no doubt as to his duty upon the present proposal. Hon. Members opposite had invited them on that side of the House to join in defeating the Government. That was, in reality, the purpose they had in view, but the hon. Member opposite was hardly a skilful tactician if he thought he was going to take them with him into the Division Lobby. As far as he had had an opportunity of judging, none of them had any idea of taking action in the slightest degree embarrassing to the Government, in which they had complete confidence. They believed the Government were about to bring forward a programme which would justify them in giving it their confidence, and that this demand was made to enable them to carry through the programme to which they were pledged. They would hold the Government responsible if those pledges were not fulfilled, and for those reasons they had no hesitation in giving the Government their support.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) moved to leave out the words "for the remainder of the Session," and to insert "until Whitsuntide." A great deal might be said for the Resolution if there were any fear that the present congestion would still be existing in three or four weeks' time. That was a matter which rested not with Members of the House but with Her Majesty's Government. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had pointed out, it was for the Government to state how much of their proposed legislation they intended to go on with and how much of it they meant to abandon, and by that means lighten the ship. If they would get rid of part of their cargo the congestion would be to a great extent relieved, and a good deal of valuable time would be left to private Members. He pointed out the absence of any proviso that this appropriation by the Government of the whole time of the Session would not be extended to any Autumn Session. It had always been agreed that whenever such a demand was made it should only be for the Session and should not extend beyond. With regard to the limitation to Whitsuntide, the Government would themselves admit that the time after that was not of such great value to them. In the first place, before Whitsuntide the Budget would be introduced, and as they were told that this year the Budget was going to be of great interest and of supreme importance, it would be better if the discussion upon it could proceed virtually de die in diem, if it was going to be very controversial and to contain, as was stated, matters of great moment. Therefore, as regarded taking the whole time of the House for that particular measure, he did not believe there would be strong opposition from any part of the House. But what they did object to was that the whole of the private Members' time should be sacrificed for the purpose of introducing and parading a number of Government Bills which it was impossible could ever become law. That would be a deliberate and indefensible waste of time. Upon that point he would earnestly appeal to hon. Members opposite who were interested in Private Bills, because after Whitsuntide Tuesday evenings were of great value to private Members, because Bills which had then reached any stage were proceeded with; and private Members' Motions never had the same amount of vitality after as they had before Whitsuntide, if very substantial progress was not made with them. He therefore appealed to hon. Members opposite for their support on this occasion. Allusion had been made to the Evicted Tenants Bill, the Local Veterinary Bill, and the Welsh Disestablishment Bill. Did hon. Members prefer to see a merely formal introduction of those measures, or did they prefer that progress should be made with useful legislation of their own? Then several contentious measures, like the Rating of Machinery Bill, had been mentioned, raising questions which ought to be taken seriously into consideration. Most heartrending appeals were made to hon. Members last Session in charge of Bills, which they had got read by overwhelming majorities, not to press them, and they were asked whether, as they could not be passed owing to the Government taking the time of the House, they would not allow them to be referred to Select Committees? They recognised that impossibility, but should have thought of that before giving up their rights to the Government. It was very easy to be wise after the event; and if private Members wished to have a chance for their measures they must make up their minds now which way they would act. If they would vote for his Amendment they would know they had done their best to forward their own Bills; but if they did not they could not in justice expect hon. Members on that side of the House to strike a blow for them to enable them to pass their Bills into law. He was sorry one hon. Member was absent who last Session, when this proposition was made, said he would always, no matter what Government was in power, stand up for the rights of private Members, but would give the Government the time they wanted for the purpose of passing the Home Rule Bill. The hon. Member for Sunderland then said, as the occasion was exceptional, he would not struggle for private Members' rights, for it was not every year that the Government had to remodel the Com-stitution. It was to be hoped the Government did not intend to remodel the constitution this year, and he therefore hoped his Amendment would be supported. This was not a merely temporary alteration which the Government was making, but they were absolutely going to the whole root of Parliamentary procedure. Unless private Members would unite to strike a blow now, it would be absolutely useless for them to attempt any private legislation whatever, and he earnestly appealed to them for support.

Mr. Dalziel

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "for the remainder of the Session," in order to insert the words "until Whitsuntide." — (The Marquess of Carmarthen.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

*SIR G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) hoped that Liberals would not listen to the voice of the charmer opposite, charm he never so wisely. With regard to this invasion of the rights of private Members, private Members were themselves to blame for the position in which they stood. Talk of driving six omnibuses through Temple Bar! Why, 600 would be nearer the mark. On the second day of the Session he took his chance of the ballot, and came out 243rd. Of the 242 gentlemen before him, not more than four or five who were successful in obtaining first places had the slightest chance of getting their Bills beyond a Second Reading. It was said they should reserve their Tuesday evening rights on the chance of being able to ventilate questions with a view to subsequent legislation. But how were their Tuesday evenings to be used? One hon. Member wished to bring forward a question dealing with the House of Lords. But he should remember they had already had a Debate on the privileges of the House of Lords, and he thought the time had arrived when there should be action and not discussion. Then there was the proposal of his hon. Friend below him (Mr. J. Rowlands), which was very important, but it was not new, for it was upon this very question he gave his first vote on entering the House 25 years ago. The hon. Member for Flintshire had down an important Motion for another Tuesday, and he had no doubt the hon. Member was most anxious to save that particular Tuesday. He had heard a good many Debates on bimetallism, and while they were going on he had felt very like James II., who when he heard the plaintiff's case wanted to decide for the plaintiff, and when he heard the defendant's case wanted to decide for the defendant, but when he heard the reply he did not know how to decide. That was very much the position in which he found himself on the question of bimetallism. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. Redmond) had contrasted the position of the Evicted Tenants Bill with the Welsh Disestablishment Bill, but unless the Motion of the Government were carried there was not the slightest possibility of either the Tenants Bill or the Welsh Bill being passed further than the Second Reading. As a rule, he was not an advocate of questions of this kind being decided on Party lines, but he hoped this Motion would be decided on Party lines, because then they would be able to recognise not only their open enemies but their false friends. Of course they should have against them the Conservative Party and the Liberal Unionists, but he hoped that every man calling himself Liberal, and that all Irish and Welsh Members, would vote in favour of the Motion of the Government.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said that, as a private Member he wished to remind the House that upon many occasions during the last Government he supported the rights of private Members. The large bulk of the House were private Members, and without doubt much of the important legislation had been brought about in the first instance by private Members. There was one point raised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should like to answer. The right hon. Gentleman asked what was the Business of the House? That was exactly what they had been asking over and over again, and could not get to know from the Government. He ventured to-day to ask a question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer about the Behring Sea Bill, but the right hon. Gentleman did not condescend to answer until the question was put a little later by the Leader of the Opposition.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Debate now must be confined to the Question of taking the time of the House up to Whitsuntide—that is the particular Amendment before the House.

MR. BARTLEY said, of course he bowed to the ruling of the Chair, but from now to Whitsuntide the House had certain privileges which it would lose afterwards, and this emphasised, with all respect to the Chair, the point he was making. Unless the Amendment of his noble Friend was carried, those of them who had chances in the ballot would really be cut out altogether by the proposal now before the House, and they said that if the Government had taken advantage of their opportunities, and not wasted the time as they had done, there would have been no reason why this Motion should have been introduced before Whitsuntide. He did not know whether he should be in Order in referring to the circumstances of last week, but last Thursday was lost because the Government thought proper to become the partisans of a certain Municipality. On that day which was thus wasted they ought to have had brought on one of those measures the Government wished to introduce. They thought they ought to have the Tuesdays and Fridays up to Whitsuntide for the Motions that were down for those days, and they were most anxious for, and not the least afraid of, the great Debate there was to have been on the House of Lords. That Motion was to have been brought forward by a supporter of the Government, but the Government seemed to be afraid to bring it forward, as they did not know on what side they were going to stand; and, therefore, the Government were desirous of burking these awkward questions. He, therefore, thought that as private Members they ought to resist in every possible way the action of the Government on this Motion. They (the private Members) were a very downtrodden race, and their only chances lay in the early period of the Session, usually before Whitsuntide, when they had an opportunity of bringing Motions forward. His experience was that after Whitsuntide the private Member became practically a voting machine. They desired to have an opportunity of bringing before the House those questions in which their constituents were interested, and, therefore, he thought that private Members on both sides of the House were bound to support the Amendment.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, that having given notice of an Amendment, he should like to say that in giving notice of it his object was to impress upon the House that the words

“for the remainder of the Session” were remarkably indefinite. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have told them something more of what was in the minds of the Government. They had got now an indefinite term—“the remainder of the Session,” and they might have the experience of last year over again, with a Session lasting over 14 months, and they were to give the whole time of the House for those 14 months to the Government, because under the Motion as it now stood the Government could not only take the whole of the usual time of the House, but could keep the House sitting until next April, or any other time, and then claim, under this Motion, to have the whole time of the House, and take it for any Bill or any subject they chose. The Government had not told them even now what Bills they intended to press forward; therefore, he did not think they should have the time of the House for an indefinite period without letting the House know what further they intended to do. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that he (Mr. Heneage) was more liberal than the noble Lord, and had put down the date as the 10th of August, and if the right hon. Gentleman refused his Amendment he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he was going to sit through the whole of the Autumn? If the Government meant to do that which was generally the object for which the whole time of the House was asked, wind up the Session, why not accept the Amendment, or some other date, say the 1st of September? Unless they were told what the Government intended, he thought it was perfectly monstrous for the Government to come down, without a single Bill being read a second time, and say they wanted the whole time of the House for what they liked. Unless the Government gave them some more information than they had given them already, they ought to do everything they could to restrict the period. So far as he was concerned, he should support the Amendment of the noble Lord, and then he presumed that his own Amendment would be out of Order.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said he only desired, in supporting the Amendment of the noble Lord, to enter a protest against the proposal of the Government. He was only a simple agricultural Member, and last Tuesday he put down a Notice of Motion on the Paper dealing with agricultural depression. The Notice did not obtain a good place, but it would develop for tomorrow three weeks. His object in putting down that Notice and in speaking now was not factious opposition, or was—to use the expression of the hon. Member for Norfolk which had now become classical—the vote at the bottom of it, but because he believed that, with the exception of his colleague in the County of Essex, no one knew the ruin and disastrous condition prevailing in the Eastern Counties. That was solely his reason in speaking now, to point out that the condition of agriculture in the Eastern Counties was absolutely deplorable.

Mr. Bartley

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, he would not detain the House long, but there was one point he desired to mention. It seemed to him the Government, by the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was going wholly against every precedent they had on this matter. He remembered that on the 28th of November, 1891, a Motion was made of this kind, and an Amendment was moved to it. The proposal was to take the time of the House until Christmas. That Motion was made by the late Mr. W. H. Smith, and was a very modest proposal to that now made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But how was it met? The then Leader of the Opposition, the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), used these remarkable words—

“There is no precedent touching such a Motion as this. He has precedents to show that on former occasions, after the commencement of the Session, demands have been made on the House for certain important measures, but this was not an application for this or that important measure, but for Government business generally,” and on that account the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for Midlothian opposed Mr. Smith's Motion, although it was only a modest Motion up to Christmas, and the whole of the then Gladstonian Party supported their Leader in opposing it. The hon. Member below him, the Member for Bradford, used very remarkable language. He said—

“You have wasted the whole of last Session with your Compensation Bill.”

The hon. Member drew a graphic picture of the waste of time and said—

“You punish private Members for the mismanagement of business by the Government during the last Session of Parliament.”

That was exactly what he said now, the Government had mismanaged the business of last Session and they made private Members suffer for their mismanagement, and it was because the noble Lord proposed to limit the Motion that at all events he should support him, and in doing so he thought they had precedent all along the line.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 268 ; Noes 244.—(Division List, No. 19.)

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, the next Amendment stood in his name, and he proposed to move it in a somewhat different form to that in which it stood on the Paper, because, of course, it was perfectly true, even under the present Standing Orders, that Government business had priority on Tuesday mornings. He should, therefore, propose to alter his Amendment by omitting the words “Government business do have priority upon,” so that the whole paragraph would run thus—

“That for the remainder of the Session on Tuesday and Friday the House do meet at 2 o'clock.”

He made this proposal in order to bring the Government proposal more into accordance with what had been the usual practice of Governments when they had taken the time of the House. The precedent of departing from the Standing Order ought not to be lightly adopted. There was no doubt whatever that if this Motion was passed it would relate, as the Leader of the Opposition had stated, not only to Government business this Session, but it would serve as a precedent for all succeeding Sessions. That was to say, that this was about the last opportunity they would have of fighting for the rights of private Members. He agreed that very often the time allotted to private Members was wasted, and the principal advantage of a private Members' night was that most of them could go to bed at a reasonably early hour, which was a strong argument for private Members' nights in a Session like the last, which extended over \ months. If the Government had said they would afford private Members another opportunity of discussing grievances by putting down Supply at a reasonable time—even once a week for the remainder of this Session—he would not have brought forward this Amendment, because Supply would afford a much better opportunity of discussing grievances than would a Motion on a private Members' night. But, instead of that, the Government had brought forward a proposal which was so distinctly against the Standing Orders, and against the established practice of the House, that it ought to be passed by something more than a mere Party majority. If hon. Members sitting on the Government side of the House attached any importance to their own Motions which they had on the Paper they would undoubtedly vote for his Amendment. The Government had only got 18 of a majority at the best, and of the Motions down for the next four Tuesdays no less than 11 of them were in the names of hon. Members sitting on the Government side of the House. No less than eight of them had got the first or second places for their Motions, whilst only three Members on the Opposition side of the House had got their names down for Motions at all, and they had not got first place. If these hon. Members attached importance to their own Motions they could not vote for the proposition of the Government as it stood, and they ought to vote for the Amendment. He claimed that the Amendment was not brought forward from Party motives, but simply in the interests of private Members and of fair discussions in this House. All preceding Governments that had asked for further time for public business had not dropped private Members. They had taken only Morning Sittings on Tuesday, with the result that there had been plenty of time for the consideration of public business without private Members being deprived of the opportunity of bringing forward important Amendments. The present Government, however, had not adopted this course. They had, instead, brought forward a Motion which absolutely shut private Members out, and he was not at all sure that the time they were to give themselves would be actually devoted to urgent public business. If he felt it was to be profitably employed, he might agree to the proposal of the Government; but they had got no guarantee whatever of this. Take last Session, for instance. The Government took the whole of the time; it was the longest Session on record, and yet it was the most barren of legislation. He thought more work might be done in this House if they did not take up so much time. The eight hours day which had been adopted in the Government factories might very well be applied to Government time in this House. If the Government followed the usual practice, and only took five or six hours on Tuesday, they would get through as much in those five or six hours as if they took the whole day, and then private Members who had important Motions could bring them on at 9 o'clock. In ordinary Sessions he admitted that a good many of the Motions brought forward by private Members were crotchets, but that was not the case this Session. The Motions which stood for the first four Tuesdays really related to matters of the greatest possible importance, and which might be discussed with advantage and profit, such as the Indian home charges, the payment of returning officers, the question of the currency, and the depression in agriculture. Then there was the Motion, which was to have been proposed next Tuesday, upon the House of Lords. The latter was not a subject that could be discussed on mere Amendments in Committee of Supply, but one which ought to be dealt with, and decided one way or another, and upon which the Government ought to give a definite opinion. It was the last legacy of the right hon. Member for Midlothian, when he was leading the House. Had it dropped already, and become a subject in which the Government took no interest whatever? There could be no doubt that the object of the Government in not bringing forward the usual Motion, which was brought forward by all Governments at this time of the year, but in its stead bringing forward a Motion to exclude all private Members, was to burke the discussion by Members on their own side of the House of these questions. The Opposition were not afraid of discussing them; they ought to be brought to a definite issue, and they wanted the country to know the views of the Government upon them. It was because such questions could only possibly be brought to a decision upon Tuesdays that he did not want Tuesdays to go. The only possible opportunity a private Member had of raising an important Motion was by bringing it forward on Tuesday—the private Members' day—as a substantive Motion, which could be brought to the test of a Division, and upon which the Government had to express an opinion by its vote one way or the other. Unfortunately, these were the very Motions which the Government, departing from the practice of all other Governments, were about to preclude them from discussing. The only argument of the Government was that of urgency. That was the cry they heard the whole of the last Session, and they knew what came of it. Only four weeks of the Session had passed; there might be 10 months yet to run for ought they knew, and for this Motion now to be brought forward on the plea of urgency was one of the most ridiculous proposals ever made. Would the Government themselves give effect to the last legacy of the hon. Member for Midlothian? Would they allow a private Member to bring on his Motion about the House of Lords and give the House an opportunity of discussing it? Last Tuesday the Government ran away from the discussion on Scotch Home Rule, but the House passed an important Resolution upon that subject, which he should like to know if the Government intended to give effect to? Were they going to give effect to the decision of the House of Commons or not? If not, how were they to deal with the Lords for not doing so? The House of Commons had deliberately said that this matter of Scotch Home Rule was of urgent importance, yet following the example of the House of Lords—whom they never ceased to abuse—the Government said they attached no importance to what the House of Commons might say, and declined to take any notice of this question of Scotch Home Rule. There were several Bills of a neutral character which were of the greatest importance to the commercial community and others, such as the Bills for the amendment of the law relating to Building Societies, Limited Liability Companies, and so on; but if the Government were to have the whole time of the House, how did they know that any of these measures would be brought forward? His main reason for not agreeing to the particular suggestion of the Government was that for the first time they were now asked to vote the whole time of the House in confidence. That was a perfectly unheard-of thing. The Government asked them to shut their eyes and vote them the whole time of the Session without in the least knowing what it was to be devoted to. The conduct of the Government in the way they had hitherto wasted time was not such as to induce them to comply with such a demand—which was unprecedented—especially when they had no indication whatever of what they were going to do when they had got the whole of the time. What they had heard to-night was that the Government did not know themselves. The fact was, that a struggle was going on between the different groups who formed that brotherhood, who dwelt together in unity in such a remarkable fashion, as to particular Bills in which they were interested, and the Government kept these things in the dark because they intended to deceive as far as possible each one of these groups. He repeated that it was in the interests of private Members generally that he had brought forward this Amendment.

Mr. Hanbury

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Government business do have priority on Tuesday. That," in order to insert the words "on Tuesday and."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I should be ill-occupying the time of the House if I endeavoured to answer the observations made by the hon. Member. I have already stated by anticipation all that the Government have to say in answer to that part of the speech which may be called argument, and there was a great deal of abuse of the Government to which it is not necessary I should reply. A very large percentage of the time of the House has been occupied by the hon. Member. Now, his point of view is that the right of private Members is a sort of personal privilege. I take it that private and unofficial Members hold that time in trust for the country, and this sort of claim was put forward humorously by the Leader of the Opposition that it was the privilege of private Members to have a Count-out if they liked, and that they could do what they pleased in their own time. That really is an admirable illustration of the point of view which champions of the rights of private Members take of the situation. The hon. Member was extremely indignant with hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House who, having obtained by ballot places for their Motions, have thought it right, for considerations which seem sufficient to them, to waive that right in the interests of those subjects which they thought even greater than those subjects in which they take a special interest. In my opinion, the Members who have taken that view have taken a more worthy view of the duties of private Members than the hon. Member opposite takes. He seems to think that a man has nothing to do but to think of himself and the position he will occupy in reference to his Motion. The hon. Member is perfectly entitled to take that view and to act consistently upon it, which he does very much; but he has no right to condemn other Members who take a less egotistical view of their situation in this House. As to taking the whole of Tuesday, a day on which some Members have important questions to bring forward, these Members looked at the question very carefully, and have come to the conclusion that there is something even superior to their own Motions, and that is the general policy of the Party to which they belong and the Government which they support. In desiring to further that policy and support the Government, which after all is their organ and instrument for carrying out their views, they are taking a course which, I venture to say, the country will approve much more than that which the hon. Member opposite has suggested they should follow. The Government fully considered this matter, and they think that they ought to ask the House for the whole of Tuesdays. At the Morning Sitting on a Tuesday it is quite true that when there is formal business we get on very well; but it often happens that some controversial question prevents the main business from being reached until a late hour in the afternoon, and then the Government make very little progress. Therefore, it is thought better to take the whole sitting. The hon. Member says that the Government have a long Session of 10 months before them. That really depends on hon. Members who occupy the time of the House; and the hon. Member himself would be well advised if he would spare the House of Commons a little more than he does. I hope that the manner in which the business will be conducted this Session will not necessitate any such expenditure of time as the hon. Member contemplates, and that the House under the circumstances will not accept his Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman was at perfect liberty to abstain from replying to the speech of my hon. Friend. There is nothing in our procedure to compel a reply to the speech of the speaker immediately preceding him. But, though the right hon. Gentleman has chosen not to deal with the arguments of my hon. Friend, he need not have introduced into his own speech a most unnecessary and personal attack on my hon. Friend, who may have delivered himself very freely about the Government as a Government, but certainly did not condescend to personal invective upon any Member of the Government or any hon. Member opposite. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has repeated what he told us earlier in the evening, as to the reasons which induce the Government to prefer the whole of the Tuesday sittings. Of course, if the Government want time it is very natural that they should prefer to take the larger than the smaller slice of the time of private Members. But that preference on the part of the Government is the only argument which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has thought right to adduce against the course which all his predecessors have adopted under similar circumstances. The Government fail to understand that they are making not only a great, but an unprecedented, demand on the time of private Members, and have not realised that they should give something in return. What we ask in return is a little confidence on the part of the Government. During the four hours which this Debate has occupied the Government have not vouchsafed a single reply either to the questions I myself put, or to the questions put by other hon. Members. We have all pressed on them, as a simple return for the immense demand they were making on us, that they should tell us what their own programme is to be. At present we know absolutely nothing about it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer recited the promises which the Government have given us, and which I am sure the Government will fulfil with regard to certain Debates on certain questions; but we know absolutely nothing as to the course they mean to pursue in the case of the absurd Scotch proposal, or as to the order in which they mean to bring in their Bills. A most interesting quotation was given earlier in the evening by my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone from a speech by the late Prime Minister on a similar, but less drastic, Motion by the late Mr. Smith. The late Prime Minister laid down that these demands on the time of the House should be made in reference to particular business of great importance. What is the particular business of great importance in this instance? They have not told us. Their language almost suggests that they do not know themselves. I do ask, in the name of common sense and the ordinary conduct of our affairs, that, before the main question is finally disposed of to-night, the Government will tell us for what specific purposes they hope in the immediate future the unexampled privilege they ask from us is to be employed. I do not say that such a statement would remove all our objections. But we should, at all events, feel that we were not wholly without guarantee as to the way in which this blank cheque was to be filled in, and that we were not voting away our time and convenience while getting absolutely nothing in return.

MR. P. SMITH (Lanark, Partick) said, the Leader of the Opposition had seemed surprised at the change in the tone of the two speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He (Mr. Smith), however, could not say that there was anything very astonishing in the change. At the time of the first speech, the ship was labouring in the sea with the winds and waves beating on it, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was constrained to make a vow to any saint or god who would help him out of his difficulty. At the time of the second speech the ship had weathered the point, and the right hon. Gentleman was able to return to his usual and well-understood mode of sailing in his handling of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Preston. The right hon. Gentleman had said that Morning Sittings were of comparatively little use. Then why did the Government ask for Friday mornings? Let them agree to a compromise if they did not care to accept the proposal before the House; and if they considered Morning Sittings of such little value, let them give private Members the whole of Friday and take to themselves the whole of Tuesday. But he (Mr. Smith) confessed that in this matter he very much differed from the right hon. Gentleman. He thought that a great deal of work did get done in Morning Sittings, and, from the point of view of private Members, he thought that two short sittings were better than one long one. He would prefer sittings from 9 to 12 on Tuesdays and Fridays to one long sitting on Friday. If the Government would take the mornings of Tuesdays and Fridays and retain those evenings for private Members, they would not only greatly help in their own business, but would also be following precedent. The Chancellor of the Exchequer declined to have anything to do with precedents. No doubt precedents taken from the calendar were of no use. It was useless to say what was the state of things on the 9th of April in other years, because the whole situation had been so altered by the abnormal length of last Session and the way it had encroached on the present Session. They could not found any argument as to what was reasonable to-day on considering what was reasonable on the 9th of April last year, or the year before, or the year before that. But they could found an argument upon precedent if they looked at the number of sittings in previous Sessions. In 1889 private Members had nine evening sittings on Tuesday, and in no case did they have the whole of that day. In 1890 they had four evening sittings on Tuesday, and only the whole day in two instances. In 1891 they had five evening sittings on Tuesdays, and six whole Tuesdays; and in 1892 they had 10 evenings, and only four whole

Tuesdays. Morning Sittings were greatly developed by the late Government, and the length of evening sittings was reduced. At first they could continue until 1 o'clock in the morning, but subsequently they were cut short at midnight. No doubt a sitting from 9 to 12 in the evening did not give time for a full and elaborate discussion, but it did give time to bring forward and ventilate a subject and take the opinion of the House upon it. With regard to the argument as to "Counts-out," they must happen so long as the selection of subjects was left to chance; but it would be perfectly easy to propose a scheme by which priority at evening sittings should be given to the subject which obtained most support. If that system were adopted, it would, he thought, be a considerable improvement upon the present arrangement—of leaving the whole thing to chance. It would get over what seemed to him the only serious argument against the value of evening sittings—namely, the chance of an uninteresting subject getting the first place, and the House getting counted out. No doubt, it was not possible for private Members to carry through serious legislation, except on the most rare occasions, but it was quite possible for them to take hold of questions in their preliminary stages when no Government would commit itself upon them—when even hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Front Opposition Bench would not commit themselves upon them. Gentlemen on the back Benches could take up such questions, and many instances might be cited in which measures which were now admitted to be of great value had been first brought forward by private Members. Perhaps the most striking case in point was the way in which the present Secretary for Scotland (Sir G. Trevelyan) had brought forward the question of the County Franchise whilst occupying the position of a private Member. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had no right to despise precedents. Private Members had rights which the House had admitted year after year. He did not say that those rights were definable according to the calendar, but he maintained that taking previous Sessions the figures worked out very much to the same effect so far as the privileges of private Members were concerned, and this formed a strong argument against the present action of the Government. It was all very well for a professional cynic like the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) to take the line that one Party was just as bad as another, and that when in power each proposed that which when in Opposition it resisted. But there had been a very substantial and considerable difference between the attitude of the present Opposition when they were in power and that of the present Government. In 1889, 1890, and 1891 Government business had precedence at 108 sittings, while private Members' business had precedence at 33 sittings; but in 1893 Government business had precedence at 211 sittings and private Members' business at only 19 sittings. Under the late Government private Members had one-quarter of the time of the House, but under the present Government they had had less than one-tenth. During the present Session the case of private Members was a good deal worse, because they had scarcely had any evenings at all. He admitted that eight days a month was not time enough for the Government to carry their business; but, as a matter of fact, statistics showed that eight days a month, or two-fifths of the whole time of the House, was not all the time Governments had taken during recent years. Instead of two-fifths of the time, they had taken three-fourths, and that seemed to him a much more reasonable fraction of the time of the House for the Government to have than that they should have the whole of the time. What security was there that the Government would leave private Members the Wednesday Sittings and Friday nights? They were entitled to some assurance from the Government on that point. In any case, it seemed to him that the precedent which was now being set would be followed in future. All Governments wanted more time. Any Government that ever existed could make excuses for asking for the time of the House just as good as they had heard to-night. Every Government that had the confidence of the House could come down and make a pathetic appeal to its supporters, and make the question one of confidence. That precedent was one which he did not think any Government in the future would forget.

Mr. P. Smith

Certainly, he did not think the Opposition would forget it when they came into power. This matter of precedent, which Radicals and Home Rulers might very well set some store by, because it was for more gentlemen who supported the Government than Unionists of any shade who were anxious to have an opportunity of setting down Motions, and of arguing them as private Members. It might well be that a Unionist Government on coming into power might feel embarrassed by some Resolution set down by some Member of the Opposition. They would have an excellent weapon to their hands—a certain defence which the House might be confident they would avail themselves of in this precedent of coming down without any particular reason and without specifying the purpose for which the time was required, and demanding as a matter of confidence nearly the whole time of the House. After this he did not see how hon. Gentlemen could oppose such a claim. It was because he thought the Government would have ample time if they took only Tuesday mornings instead of the whole of Tuesdays, and because he regarded it as a safer precedent—better in the interest of the House, if private Members and of the Government itself—that he urged the acceptance of the Amendment.

MAJOR DARWIN (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said, that of the Debates in the House gentlemen sitting on the Front Benches usually got the lion's share. It was right that they should, because these gentlemen were to a certain extent the spokesmen for the rest of the Members. But when they came to a subject relating to the rights of private Members, he thought the House should be indulgent to those who wished to take part in the discussions. Those on the Front Benches who had long had a dislike to Tuesdays and Fridays Motions took a rather prejudiced view of the subject, and for that reason it was especially desirable that private Members should intervene. They were asked to give up Tuesdays to the end of the Session, and the hon. Member for Preston proposed that some modification should be made in the demand. And in making the proposal it was only right to point out that the Government had already had an abnormal amount of time this year—from Christmas to the beginning of the present Session. That ought to be taken into account. There had been only two Tuesdays available for such discussions as usually took place on those evenings this year, and the demand of the Government was that there should be no more Tuesdays available. The Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer entirely did away with the privileges granted to private Members by the Standing Orders. The proposal of the Government involved a complete change of precedent. On every previous occasion when a Government had asked for privileges of this kind they had been able to show what actual time of the House had been previously spent on measures, and that that time would be wasted unless their demand was acceded to. It had always previously been the case that the Government had introduced large proposals, and that any restriction in their legislative programme would lead to the wasting of the time already spent on legislation. The present Government, however, could put forward no such argument, for they had introduced no large measures, and not a single hour of Parliamentary time would be wasted if no restriction of private Members' time was made. Such a change in precedent could only be justified by showing that the existing Rules of the House were not suitable, or by proving that the circumstances were very exceptional. They did not know what line the Government took up. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was true, had said that at present there was not a reasonable distribution of the time of the House. Why, then, did he not propose some alteration of the Standing Orders of the House? That was the way to meet the case. There were many Members of the House who doubted whether the time taken up by abstract Resolutions usually discussed on Tuesdays and Fridays was really a good distribution of time. But when they came to discuss individual cases of this so called waste of time they found great difference of opinion. There was hardly a subject brought before the House which some Members would not think justified the time occupied on it. On Tuesday last they had a discussion on mining royalties, and those gentlemen who brought it forward expressed what he might call the official view of the miners. It appeared to be of interest to the mining industry that they should——

*MR. SPEAKER : Order, order ! The hon. Member must not follow up the discussion on mining royalties.

MAJOR DARWIN said, he apologised. He was only trying to illustrate the advantage of such general discussion to the country at large. He agreed that the question as to whether these abstract discussions were useful or not was an open one ; but if the Government thought that time should not be devoted to them, let them propose an alteration of the Standing Orders. But he did not understand that the Government based their argument upon that. The Government claimed exceptional circumstances as their reason for demanding the time of the House. The only exceptional circumstance the Government could allege was that they were endeavouring to force more legislation into the Session than was possible ; and if that was accepted as an excuse for the Government taking the time of private Members thus early in the Session, it was a certainty that every future Government would be able to claim the same indulgence. He was afraid they were now doing away for all time with the rights of private Members on Tuesdays—at the end of the Session, if not for the whole of the Session. Still, as the present Government did not make the change by altering the Standing Orders, when they were again in Opposition they would resist a Motion like this in the interests of private Members, and so obstruct Unionist legislation. It appeared to him that they ought to deal with the question at large, and settle permanently what was to be done in the interests of both Parties in the House. He should certainly vote against the proposal of the Government if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Preston—which would afford a reasonable solution of the difficulty—were not accepted.

SIR M. J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright) said, he objected most strongly to the course proposed by Her Majesty's Government. He was not going to argue the matter out because they had already had it argued out much better than he could have done it. The absence of all precedent for the Government proposal had been shown. He felt that in launching forth this policy and in laying down practically new Standing Orders they were making a new precedent which would be followed in future years, so that practically from this time private Members' Motions would be shut out on Tuesdays. The only way in which a private Member could bring forward a question was by making a Motion, and whether they were crotchets or not their constituents in many cases had sent them there with a mandate to bring certain matters before the House. If they were shut out they could not fulfil that mandate. But he had risen rather to suggest that the Government should give some indication of the subjects they intended to press upon the attention of the House, because it now had before it a bill of fare for which all the time of the House would be insufficient. Only the other day he (Sir M. J. Stewart) was one of a large deputation to the President of the Board of Agriculture. The answer the right hon. Gentleman gave was unsatisfactory and a Motion was down for next Tuesday on the subject. The go-by had now been given to the subject. They were threatened in this respect with a great divergence from the policy pursued during the past 18 months. They were led to believe that the Minister in charge of the Department was as convinced of the utility of slaughtering animals imported into this country at the port of debarkation as they were ; but the views expressed by the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion were directly opposite. That was one of the subjects that would be shut out from discussion by the Motion of the Government. He would ask the Government whether they really thought that by forcing a Motion of that sort on a very large minority of the House they were really advancing the business of the House ? When they were compelling 244 Members as against 268 to do a certain thing, it required a good deal more compulsion than taking Tuesdays and Fridays to accomplish their purpose. He therefore thought the Government were making a great mistake in the action they proposed ; and if they accepted the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Preston, they would in all probability advance their measures more than if they had a large Opposition struggling hard against what they had been compelled to do by a small majority. Members, and especially Scotch Members, would like to know what questions were to be brought before the House by the Government on Tuesdays and Fridays. The House had been assured, on the authority of the Minister in charge of Scotch business, that they were to have a Grand Committee, and that the Government were pledged to do all they could to secure that result. The next day they had had an assurance from the same right hon. Gentleman that Scotland was to have Home Rule. They should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman's Colleagues agreed with that view; and what they really intended to do with regard to Scotch business?

Major Darwin

*MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) said, he thought the discussion had not been very complimentary to private Members. If private Members who never aspired to even the most subordinate position in the Government would have no opportunity of expressing their views, or of doing useful work, the attractions of the House would be reduced to a great number of independent men. Private Members who took up questions at present formed a very useful percentage of the House. Many not very ambitious, but very useful, Bills had been carried by private Members. A great many questions had also been raised by private Members the discussion of which had laid the ground for legislation. Resolutions had been moved and carried by private Members which convinced the Government of the necessity of dealing with certain questions, and legislation had been the result. A great deal of most useful work had been done in this way on Tuesdays and Fridays as well as on Wednesdays. No doubt a certain number of private Members got first places for questions of no importance. But that was the misfortune of the business being arranged by the chance of the ballot. It certainly was no argument against the policy of appropriating a reasonable portion of the time of the House for private Members to occupy in raising questions in which they were interested. Take the four Tuesdays which the proposal of the Government would completely cut out. Next Tuesday one of the Members for Somersetshire proposed to call the attention of the House to the Charity Commission, and to suggest that it should be reconstituted so as to place it more directly under Parliamentary control. He saw no more useful or more practical subject than that. Since he had had the honour of being a Member of the House—now some years—he had frequently heard dissatisfaction expressed with reference to the Charity Commission. A great deal of the time of the House had been taken up at inconvenient times with the question of the affairs of charities and the action of the Commission. Then the hon. Member for Argyllshire, who had had a large Indian experience, was to have called the attention of the House to East India home charges. He did not know of a more practical subject than that. It was true that the hon. Member for Argyllshire had said he considered the introduction of the question of less importance than maintaining the Government in Office, and that as the defeat of the Government would lead to resignation he thought it better to subordinate that particular question to the interest of the Government; but the consequences feared need not happen. If the hon. Member for Preston's Amendment were carried, the Government might still remain in Office, and an interesting discussion would be secured just the same. The hon. Member for King's Lynn had also an important Motion for discussion—namely, the plurality of offices in the Public Service; and, lastly, one of the Members for Essex had a Motion relating to agricultural matters. The Member for Essex represented a constituency suffering from grievous agricultural depression; and he wanted to call the attention of the House to a phase of the question which could be very profitably discussed at the present time. The Minister for Agriculture had refused to inquire into the present rules as to the compulsory slaughter of cattle imported into this country at the port of debarkation. Deputations had waited upon him, but no opportunity had been afforded for pressing any argument upon the attention of the Minister. If the hon. Member for Essex had only the smallest opportunity of pressing this matter upon his attention, useful and practical service would be done to the agricultural community. These subjects might be dealt with in a concise way, and suggestions made of great value which would prepare the way for the action of the Government later on. If the Amendment were accepted, while the Government would get the Morning Sitzings for their business, there would be left an opportunity for the discussion of a number of matters which could be usefully discussed in the best interests of the House and the nation. To take another day, Tuesday the 17th the hon. Member for Wandsworth had a subject for discussion with regard to the disparity of representation between the various constituencies of this country. The hon. Gentleman represented 100,000 people, which was twice as large a population as many other Members of that House represented, and he naturally wanted to press this subject upon the attention of the Government. On the following Tuesday, the 24th, the hon. Member for Finsbury proposed to move a Motion relating to the expenses of returning officers. Very great advantage would be obtained by discussion upon that matter, which actually bore upon one of the subjects—the Registration Bill—which the Government had in hand. On the following Tuesday, the 1st May, they had again the question of the depression of agriculture down for discussion; surely that was a fitting subject to occupy the attention of the House. He must say he viewed with serious apprehension this inroad of the Government's upon the rights of private Members. As it was, the Government enjoyed not only the two days which were usually known as Government days, but practically a considerable portion of the private Members' days. The questions which were put to Ministers and the answers which were given were more or less Government business, and Government business frequently cropped up, and therefore it was unjust to say that private Members took three days a week as compared with the two days alleged to be taken by the Government. He should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Preston, and, if that was not carried, against the Motion of the Government.

*MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD (Stratford, Warwick) said, the hon. Member who had preceded him had made reference to the deputation which had waited upon the Minister for Agriculture. He was a Member of that deputation, and he placed upon the Paper a Motion with regard to that matter. He wished that the Motion had fallen into better hands than his, but, at the same time, as it stood in his name, he should like to express the bitter disappointment which he was sure would be felt by the agricultural community—that it was impossible to make any Motion with regard to this question. The reply which was made to them was simply read from a prepared document, and contained no answer to the arguments which had been advanced by speakers. They were used to such replies from the Treasury Bench. He wanted to bring forward a most important Motion which stood in his name, but he desired to point out that he was deprived of any opportunity of presenting to the House a Resolution which might have some beneficial influence upon the agricultural interest of the Kingdom.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, that he much regretted this extraordinary proposal of Her Majesty's Government to take away the time of private Members. These encroachments had increased rapidly within late years, and he had always done what he could to oppose them. But this case was the most indefensible of all. We were not now, as now presented, at the close of the Session, but quite at the commencement. The Session had not yet lasted a month, and of that month—he did not complain of it, because there were special and sufficient reasons—the Government had monopolised almost the whole of the time that the House had sat. Now, why did they make this unusual demand? It was not that our Rules and Regulations had proved in any way defective. His hon. Friend the Member for Islington moved a few days ago for a Committee to inquire into the Rules, and the Government resisted the proposal as being quite unnecessary. Nor could it be from any unusual prolongation of debate on the part of the Opposition. The Government would not allege that. They were allowed to introduce their Bills without opposition and almost without debate, and as a matter of fact they had made unusually rapid progress with Supply. The Government, by their proposals for a Scotch Committee, had themselves frittered away the time of the House on what the hon. Member for Glasgow called a pottering and peddling Amendment. They had told us that they were in favour of Home Rule for Scotland; why, then, did they press for a Grand Committee? Was it for the present Session? He believed that they could certainly have got their Scotch Bills through Committee in less time than it would take them to obtain the Grand Committee and then get the Bills referred to it. The Government would not allege that the time allotted to private Members was wasted. What had been the greatest changes made in our laws during the past century? The answer would include the reform of Parliament, the extension of the franchise, free trade, and education measures. But all these were private Members' questions—some of them had been repeated year after year; and it was only after private Members had educated public opinion that Governments took these questions up. Of course, when questions were ripe for solution the Government had advantages in carrying Bills which no private Member possessed. Yet there were many important measures which had been actually carried by private Members. He might mention the Free Libraries Act. Again, the Bills of Exchange Act, which codified and regulated the whole law relating to bills and cheques, was a private Member's Bill. Even when private Members' Motions were negatived, the discussions often were of great value, so that even if the measures failed to pass, the time of the House could not on that account be considered as having been wasted. The Motion of Friday last with reference to royalties was rejected, but the announcement of the view of the Government in the able speech of the Home Secretary was important; it would clear away many fallacies and misapprehensions, and soften, if not remove, the feeling of grievance which undoubtedly existed. There was a general impression that the object of this proposal was to shelve inconvenient questions. The Government would, he supposed, carry their Motion about a Scotch Committee. Well, then they could not, with any semblance of justice, refuse them an English Committee, but they might deprive them of any opportunity of proposing it. Would they give them a day to bring it on? He himself was in charge of two questions at the present time, and he would endeavour in a few words to point out the importance they were to the country generally. They were all agreed as to the importance of conciliation and arbitration in trade disputes. Now, one of the Bills he was in charge of related to that subject, and was brought in on behalf of the London Chamber of Commerce. It was supported by the Chambers of Commerce throughout the Kingdom; it had been drafted under the instructions of the London Conciliation Board, and was supported by the great London Trade Unions. Surely such a Bill and one so supported ought not to be shut out. It was true that the Government had a Bill of their own relative to the same question, but there was hardly more in it than in the dummy which his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade presented at the Table. The Bill, as the Government had framed it, really did nothing at all, and gave the Board of Trade no power which it did not already possess. The other question was one dealing with the terribly long hours of labour in shops. It was no question of eight hours, or 10 hours, or 12 hours even, but of 14 or 16 hours a day; and most of the shop assistants, it must be remembered, were women. The facts had been unanimously reported on by a Committee of this House, and their Report had never been denied. There was not a city or town where great meetings had not been held and resolutions passed in support of their Bill. It was founded on a Resolution passed unanimously in that House, supported on behalf of the Government by the Home Secretary, which was to the effect "That, in the opinion of this House, the excessive and unnecessarily long hours of labour in shops were injurious to the comfort, health, and well-being of all concerned; and that it was desirable to give to Local Authorities such powers as might be necessary to enable them to carry out the general wishes of the shopkeeping community with reference to the hours of closing."

These long and unnecessary hours undoubtedly affected the health, comfort, and even the life of probably 1,000,000 of their countrymen and countrywomen, and yet the Government could not give them an evening or even an hour for its discussion. What were the questions for the sake of which this course was proposed? He would allude only to those that had been mentioned in the Queen's Speech. The first measure mentioned in the Royal Speech was the Evicted Tenants Bill. Why were the tenants evicted? Because they did not choose to pay their rents. Not that they could not, but because they would not. Speaking, for instance, of the Luggacurren tenants, the hon. Member for South Kerry said that "they were able to pay their rents, but it was a fight of intelligence against intelligence—a case of diamond cut diamond."

And yet as they would not pay for themselves, though they could, it was now proposed that somebody else was to pay for them. He would not, however, discuss the merits of the measure; but he should like to ask, How many persons did it affect? The Mathew Commission reported the number of tenants on the Plan of Campaign estates at 1,300, of whom 400 had been reinstated, leaving something less than 1,000. Yet to these 1,000 individuals the time of the House was to be devoted, and for the 1,000,000 shopkeepers and shop assistants the Government could not spare an evening, and worse than that, not even an hour. Another subject mentioned in the Speech was

"the reform of the present method of conducting inquiries into fatal accidents in Scotland."

That might be useful and desirable, but surely it was not a matter more urgent or important than many of those which private Members wished to bring before the House. In conclusion, he submitted that the Government had no case for the Resolution they proposed, and he hoped the House would maintain the rights of private Members, and leave them the moderate proportion of time which after careful consideration had under the present Rules been allotted to them.

SIR J. GORST (Chatham) said, that the right hon. Baronet had called great attention to the various measures of usefulness that had been introduced by private Members in the first instance, and had put that fact forward as one reason why the time of private Members should not be limited, even for the purpose of giving more time for Government business. He had been in the House for many years, and that during the deal of the time that a private Member necessary to under more would have the vate Member the Governn Session to m vate Membe believed, tha to ask for stated to th cases they l their doing s believed as th Members w change, was on the face that the anxious to wrapped in a they undoubt make as mu which might to make thi under the Government criticising of They were powerful obj measures to Members of existed for business was his judgment tion than the that of watc policy of the the country public dissa and adminis vernment de give the measures th ment did not odd thing th criticised. of their pol able to th intolerable v their politica generally w of their su Majesty's p nervous abo

Sir J. Lubbock

vernment which had ever existed. Their political supporters had so many different views, were animated by so many different objects, and were supposed to pursue their views in such a very inconvenient and headstrong fashion that he imagined the Government lived in constant terror as to what their supporters might do next. There was a very remarkable illustration of independent action on the part of Government supporters last Tuesday night, and he had no doubt that the experience the Government had that evening of independent Tuesday evening Motions had induced them to make up their minds to suppress them altogether, otherwise why should they have pursued the totally unprecedented course they were pursuing this evening? If the Government would propose an alteration of the Standing Orders so as to give them the whole time of the House, the House would, no doubt, be disposed to discuss such a proposal, and there might be very strong reasons why such a course should be taken. Speaking entirely for himself, he had a perfectly open mind on the subject, and was perfectly ready to discuss any Amendment of the Rules of Procedure and the Standing Orders of the House which the Government might propose. As it was, the Standing Orders were, Session after Session, being made into a farce. What was the good of having Standing Orders if during nearly the whole of the Session they were to be suspended. If the Resolution of the Government were passed the present Session would be remarkable as the only one in modern times in which independent Members had had at their disposal only a single week of the time of the House. Before Easter the House had to suspend the Standing Orders in order to enable the Government to pass their financial business. By way of showing their gratitude to the House for their action in that matter, the Government asked hon. Members a week later to suspend the Standing Orders for the rest of the Session. He should have thought it would have been better to alter the Standing Orders so as to give the Government the whole of the time, and to allow private Members to have Tuesdays and Fridays as an exceptional thing. Hitherto Governments, in taking the time of the House, had done so piecemeal. They had taken Tuesday morning first and Tuesday evening afterwards. A great deal of business could be done on Tuesday morning, which was an excellent time for discussing Bills in Committee. Never before had the Government asked in the first instance for the whole of the Tuesdays, and their only reason for doing so now was that they wished to get rid of a number of inconvenient questions which would otherwise be brought forward by their own supporters. They did not want to have to continue to exercise their ingenuity in fencing with questions or to adopt the manœuvre of leaving the House in order to avoid the necessity of giving an opinion or of voting on Motions brought forward by their own supporters. They, therefore, took the bull by the horns, and suppressed the Tuesday Motions altogether. The Government could not trust their supporters, and consequently they dare not allow the House any longer to enjoy those privileges which the Standing Orders were intended to safeguard. This was the reason why at the very beginning of the Session they asked the House by this unprecedented Motion to suspend the Standing Orders all round.

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): There are many arguments that can be urged against the proposal of the Government. In the first place, I lay down that there is no precedent for this Motion at this time of the year, and I have a right to speak on the subject, for my Parliamentary memory is long, extending over 20 years, and is also very active. I say positively that this is an unprecedented Motion in the first month of a Session of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) commented on the fact that this was the 9th of April, and argued that the Motion was premature. But what has been the origin of this Motion. You, the Government, kept the House sitting last year for an unprecedented period, amounting to nearly 10 months in the year. That is the cause of your difficulties now. Having kept the House of Commons sitting for 10 months you called Parliament together again on the 12th of March. You had your necessary finance Votes to pass, and you got all the assistance you could from the Opposition. How do you recognise it? Before three weeks are over you come down to the House and you propose to appropriate Tuesdays as a whole and Fridays for Morning Sittings. You knock on the head the whole of the rights obtained by ballot by private Members during the first few weeks of the Session. That is your treatment of your supporters; that is your treatment of your opponents. I do not believe that any Leader of the House has ever made such a proposal before. I would remind the House that the proposal will not long rest here; the Government will before long endeavour to appropriate the whole of the time of the House. [Ministerial cheers.] Yes, that is cheered. The Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed a faint hope—and it struck me he had a faint heart—that this Session might not be like last Session. You are on the high road to producing a fac-simile of last Session. What is the worth to private Members at this period of the Session of Wednesday and Friday Morning Sittings? Coercion of the House of Commons like this does not lead to the passing of those innumerable Bills which are controversial in the highest degree, and which you apparently, from the Queen's Speech, hope to pass. You have concealed from us the order of your Bills. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says the order is administrative. Has he forgotten the Budget Bill, and does he think that from the nature of his Budget it will not require a great deal of discussion? Does he think he will be able to go into the Budget Bill immediately after he has introduced his Budget? It is absurd to think that he will be able to bring in the Budget Bill before Whitsuntide. What Bills are you going to bring in before Whitsuntide? Have you the right to take the time of the House of Commons and not say what you are going to do? Have you the right to leave not only your supporters, but the Opposition, whose numbers are very nearly as high as yours, in utter ignorance as to your programme up to Whitsuntide? You take all the time of the House practically. Is the taking away of the Morning Sitting on Tuesday consonant with precedent when you conceal from the House every information they desire? I have never known of any Ministerial proposal equal to that. The proposal of the Government last year was as bad as ever was made, but this exceeds it. Yet your majority fluctuates from a defeat by one on an order for a Bill which the Government supported to majorities first of 18 and then of 15 on the Motion for the adjournment of the Debate on the Scotch Grand Committee, and on no occasion can you muster more than 24. Are you going to take all the time of the House with a majority like that? What was your majority last year? It averaged 45. What is your majority now? Heaven knows! There is another point. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is the only Member of the Government who has spoken to-night. Nobody has had the courtesy to reply to the very courteous, the very humorous, the very good-natured, and the very brilliant speech of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition. I say that is extraordinary conduct. You make an enormous demand, and one Member of the Government, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, makes a most curious speech, which pretends to tell everything and concede everything. The Chief Secretary for Ireland made a brief speech, and did not notice a single argument used by my right hon. Friend. These are strange proceedings; they are proceedings which I have never seen practised in my Parliamentary experience; they are proceedings which will not profit you, because the Opposition is nearly of the same strength as yourselves, and in time you may find yourselves defeated. Your policy is certainly against the interests of the House. You may possibly persuade your followers to vote for you mechanically to-night; but you will find it hard to carry through the Newcastle Programme and the great Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a majority of from 1 to 15. I express the opinion which I have a right to express from a long experience of this House, and from a good deal of knowledge of its customs. You are pursuing a policy which was initiated last year of abandoning all the privileges and customs of private Members, and you are asking to be your accomplices in an act which is unprecedented, and which from the Parliamentary point of view is unnecessary.

Lord R. Churchill

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said, he rose principally to ask a question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He did not join in the attacks which had been made on private Members and on their Motions, for he would remind the House that there was scarcely a single measure of any importance passed by the House that had not been brought within the range of practical politics by the action of private Members on private Members' rights. Therefore, he should express his regret that the Government had taken all the opportunities of this Session from private Members. But he noticed that on the fourth Tuesday there was a Motion down to consider the question of the depression in agriculture. Unless the Amendment were assented to, the opportunity for discussing the question would be absolutely taken away. He would remind the House that there was scarcely a single Member—certainly not a Member of a rural constituency—who did not in his election addresses and speeches declare his anxiety to consider the question of the depression of agriculture; and though it might appear to affect only the rural constituencies, he ventured to say that there was not a trade or a branch of manufacture in this country that was not affected by the condition of agriculture. Good trade and bad trade were relative terms for prosperity or depression in agriculture. He had a question to put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, he was sorry to see, was always popping in and out. He thought they ought to have the head of the Government present when important questions were addressed to him, and especially when they were discussing a question moved by the right hon. Gentleman himself. But he would ask any Leader of the Government, if there were a Leader present—and he hoped the House would insist on some sort of answer—whether the Government would give a day for the discussion of the condition of agriculture in this country? They had promised a day for the discussion of several matters, including the Miners (Eight Hours) Bill; but would they promise a day for discussing a matter affecting the greatest industry of the country? The question was—Would the Government give a day for the discussion of the condition of agriculture—a question affecting our greatest industry, and which affected every man, woman, and child in the country, whether living in our towns or in the rural districts. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the country would approve of the action of the Government in shutting out all opportunity of discussing that important question, but the Government displayed a singular objection to testing the opinion of the country upon that or upon any other point. He wanted some assurance on the part of the Government on that subject. He had listened to the attack that the hon. Member for Northampton had made upon private Members. The hon. Member had tried his best to get out of the category of private Members, but had failed in doing so, and perhaps that was the key of the temper he had displayed, and had made him so bitter in his attack upon them. The Government were having a bit of electioneering practice that evening, but shuffling their cards would not change their hand. If the Government refused to give a day for the discussion of the depressed condition of agriculture the country would know what value was to be attached to the abundant promises which they and their supporters had made during the last General Election. He reiterated his request, which he hoped would be backed up by other speakers, and as the Government were practising electioneering tactics he suggested that they might go a step further and give the day he asked for.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, this was not merely a question affecting private Members, but whether the Standing Orders of the House were to be put aside without any reason being assigned. The cynical levity of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, relying as he did upon his majority of 24, and the careless levity of hon. Members opposite in dealing with so important a question, was surprising. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had used lamb-like language to which they were unaccustomed from that quarter with a tremendous majority of 24. But finding that if he had the majority of votes he had the minority of arguments on his side, the right hon. Gentleman had turned round, and, like a modern Goliath, had fallen on the unfortunate Member for Preston. The hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Division had been pleased to show a great contempt for private Members, who were, he said, a farce and a delusion. They might have expected support from him as the private Member who carried the famous Motion for giving Home Rule to Scotland. Was that a farce and a delusion? Perhaps it was, and this was the more to be suspected, because having a still more important Motion for one of these very days now in question, he had now run away from it, and had announced that he was going to vote with the Government. However, private Members were not a farce and a delusion, whatever the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Division might be.

Mr. DALZIEL explained, that in what he had said he was only putting his own interpretation on the speech of the hon. Member's Leader.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said, he was not a private Member. The question was whether they were going to try to save any remnant of their Standing Orders and privileges from the capacious maw of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had himself a very important Motion on the Paper for to-morrow with regard to pluralists which he had already on three occasions postponed at the request of the Government on the very ground that he would be able to bring it on to-morrow, which he was now to be prevented from doing. Consequently he had been defrauded. Private Members had balloted, and some of them had got forward places for their Motions, had prepared all their facts, and were ready to come down gravid with argument when they were thus summarily disposed of. His own place was not a very forward one, but he was not unmindful of the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who said that the bores always got the first places. In these circumstances, it was very hard that the Government should now snatch away the opportunities which private Members had thus secured. Having examined all the precedents from 1868 down to the present time, he asserted that such a proposal had never been made except either upon special grounds for a special purpose, or at the end of the Session in order to wind up business. No special ground had been here put forward, nor had any emergency been shown. No Bill had been named that it was urgent to pass. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had merely said that he was in charge of a precious cargo; but why did he not bring up a few bales and cases of this cargo and let them see what it was like? The right hon. Gentleman was fond of calling himself an old sailor. He (Mr. Bowles) called him an old soldier. Before Easter the right hon. Gentleman had begged for the time of the House on the ground of financial necessities and had got it. Now he turned round on his benefactors. Having like a mendicant begged them to give the Government more time, the Chancellor of the Exchequer now came forward with a bludgeon to rob them of the remainder, like a foot-pad. All he alleged was that this was the 9th of April, as though they were well advanced in the Session, whereas they were only at its fourth week. No obstruction was even alleged. It was not their fault that the Session did not begin until the 12th March, but the fault of the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues in overloading the ship, and the Government could not complain if the same result followed again, for as last year, like Pharaoh's lean kine coming up out of the river, their measures had eaten up the Session, so they would eat up this Session too and be none the better for it—they would still be as lean and ill-favoured as ever. This proposal was not made in good faith, because of the necessities of the Government or of the situation, but it was a last despairing attempt to cover previous failure and to prepare for future failures. Nobody knew that better than the right hon. Gentleman himself—it was simply a last despairing attempt to amuse the electors, while it would only give Ministers and their supporters further time to make further blunders.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 219.—(Division List, No. 20.)

Mr. Gibson Bowles

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, that, although the Government proposed to take the whole time of the House for the rest of the Session, they had given the House no information as to the purposes to which they intended to devote it. Last year, in spite of the large time at the disposal of the Government, the whole of Supply was crowded into a fortnight, and did not receive fair discussion. He, therefore, moved the addition of the following proviso to the Motion of the Government :—

“ Provided that in each week during the remainder of the Session the consideration of the Estimates in Committee of Supply shall be set down as the first Order of the Day on one night on which Government business has priority.”

If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not undertake to give one day a week for the purposes of Supply, would he undertake to say that Supply should be dealt with fairly and at an early period of the Session? If the right hon. Gentleman would give an assurance to that effect it might meet the difficulty; if not, he should certainly press the Amendment to a Division.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question, to add the words,

“ Provided that in each week during the remainder of the Session the consideration of the Estimates in the Committee of Supply shall be set down as the first Order of the Day on one night on which Government business has priority.”—(Mr. Heneage.)

Question proposed, “ That those words be there added.”

SIR W. HARCOURT: I must say, Sir, that the Motion of my right hon. Friend is unnecessary, because under the Standing Order Supply is always set down one day in the week. But I take it that that is not the real meaning of the Motion. What my right hon. Friend means, I presume, is that the Government should undertake that on some day in each week effective Supply should be taken. We have, however, shown that we are inclined to deal fairly with Supply, because in a short time we have had at our disposal I think we have made as much progress with Supply as has ever been made at this time of the year. No Government has ever been called upon to fulfil such a condition as this Amendment would impose upon them, for no Government can undertake beforehand what may happen during the Session. My right hon. Friend asks me to give an undertaking that Supply should be fairly dealt with, and I have no hesitation in giving that undertaking. I hope my right hon. Friend will not press the Motion, as the House is desirous of proceeding with the very important business involved in the Behring Sea Fisheries Bill.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I think the right hon. Gentleman has met the appeal of my right hon. Friend in a conciliatory tone. The position, however, is that there will be no opportunity at all for an unofficial Member to bring forward any question except by moving the Adjournment of the House. At the same time, if the right hon. Gentleman is able to carry out his present intention with regard to Supply, I think the Amendment might be withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question proposed.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said, he would like to ask whether any opportunity would be afforded by the Government for discussing the present position of agriculture, and he would like to know whether they refused to give a day?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not deny the importance of the subject to which the hon. Member has referred, but if I should undertake to decide as to the competing claims of different subjects upon the attention of the House I should inevitably become involved in complications from which it would be very difficult to extricate myself. I feel sure, however, that in the course of the Session, and practically at no very distant date, an opportunity will present itself for a discussion on the subject of that agricultural depression which we all deplore.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said, he hoped an opportunity would be given for a discussion of the depression in agriculture, on the ground that the Government had deprived an hon. Member of an opportunity of moving a Motion on the subject early in May. Days had been granted for the eight hours for miners and for other questions, and it was not unreasonable to ask for a single day to discuss the agricultural question, and so to test the pledges which had been given by so many Members.

SIR W. HARCOURT : I am asked to give a day in exchange for one which I am said to be taking away, but I must question the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman, because the Motion to which reference has been made is the third on the Paper for Tuesday, May 1. The first Motion refers to the currency question, and the second to what is called "Peers' disabilities," so that the agricultural question has to take its chance after those two engrossing questions have been discussed. I think, therefore, that the demand made upon me is not a fair one under the circumstances.

MR. MUNTZ (Warwickshire, Tamworth) said, it seemed to him that the present Government had failed altogether to appreciate the present position of the agricultural interest, which was in a most deplorable condition, and he asked whether the Government could not give a day for the discussion?

Main Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 249 ; Noes 223.—(Division List, No. 21.)

Resolved, That for the remainder of the Session Government Business do have priority on Tuesday. That on Friday the House do meet at Two of the clock, and that the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to Tuesday and the Morning Sitting on Friday.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, To-morrow resolve itself into Committee of Supply."—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

THE COURSE OF BUSINESS.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Does that mean that the Navy Estimates will come on first to-morrow? Would it be in Order to ask a question about the course of business for the rest of the week?

SIR W. HARCOURT : Yes ; our intention is that when the Navy Votes are concluded we shall then go on with the Motion on the Scotch Committee, and immediately after that we shall proceed with the Registration Bill.

MR. GOSCHEN : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Budget will be taken on Monday?

Mr. Jesse Collings

SIR W. HARCOURT : Yes.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL : Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the question of Uganda is to be taken on Thursday?

SIR W. HARCOURT : There will be a statement made by the Government on the subject.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL : Will there be any opportunity for Debate?

SIR W. HARCOURT was understood to say not.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

BEHRING SEA AWARD BILL.—(No. 123.) COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

*SIR C. RUSSELL : In ordinary circumstances I should not have troubled the House at all with any statement after the discussion which took place at some length upon the occasion of the Second Reading, but since then certain questions have been put by hon. Members in the House, and certain statements—not of an official kind—have appeared in the public Press this morning, which render it necessary that I should make, with the permission of the House, a very brief statement. The questions addressed to me have been, amongst others, whether the two Bills—namely, that introduced in Congress, and that introduced in this House, exactly correspond. The statement has been previously made that they substantially agree although they do not exactly correspond. I will mention what strikes me as the main differences. Under Section 8 of the United States Bill there is a provision, in the event of an offence against the Act, of absolute forfeiture of the ship and the contents of the ship. In the English Bill the ship and its contents are made liable to forfeiture, but the Court has an alternative of imposing a fine for the offence not exceeding £500. Again, in Section 10 of the American Bill there is a provision putting the onus of proof upon the accused party in certain cases with which I need not trouble the Committee. That is a matter of form more than of substance, and it is a form of clause not very usual in our legislation. It is merely a question of satisfying the Court, and the only object of the clause is to put the onus on the accused party. We have not any such clause in our Bill. There is a clause in our Bill giving the commander of an English cruiser seizing an offending ship the power of endorsing the certificate and directing the ship to be sent to a port for trial. That has been done in order that the cruisers shall be available for the real purpose for which they are there—namely, of preventing offences against the Act, and if a cruiser was obliged, having seized an offending ship, to accompany that ship into port, it would detract from the effectiveness of the cruiser to see that the Act was carried out. The only other difference is the clause which is referred to in the paragraphs that have appeared in the papers this morning. I have to begin by stating that the clause—which is Clause 7—has been entirely misunderstood by those who have commented upon it in the American Press—

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES: On a point of Order, Sir, may I ask is the hon. and learned Gentleman in Order in referring to Clause 7 when we are only on Clause 1?

THE CHAIRMAN: This is a Ministerial statement, which is being made by the indulgence of the Committee.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: Sub-section 2 of Clause 7 provides that—

“Where, on any proceeding against a person or ship in respect of any offence under this Act, it is proved that the ship sailed from its port of departure before the scheduled provisions were published there, and that such person or the master of the ship did not after such sailing, and before the alleged offence, receive notice of such provisions, such person shall be acquitted, and the ship shall be released, and not forfeited.”

That clause was designed to meet the cases of notoriety which the Award and the discussion of the proposed legislation has obtained, and the clause is one which would have an exceedingly limited operation, if any operation at all. The effect would be to prevent the forfeiture of the ship where that ship had bonâ fide sailed without any notice of the Award, and if it satisfies the Court it has bonâ fide sailed without any intention of violating the Act. In the comments in the American Press several serious mistakes have been committed in mentioning the effect of that provision. It has been thought, for instance, that it gives impunity to ships that have sailed before the Act came into force. It does nothing of the kind. The only effect it could have would be that if a ship had sailed without notice, and had committed what would otherwise be an offence against the Act, bonâ fide in ignorance of the provision of the Award, then as regards what it had done it could not be punished. But from that moment it has full and absolute notice of the Act, and it is debarred from any further offences against the Act under penalty of seizure. It has been also thought by some of these commentators that the commanders of cruisers would be the judges of whether or not the ship had had notice of the provisions of the Award. That is not so at all. Those who are at all skilled in reading these things will see that no option is given to the commander of the cruising ship at all. It is a matter that has to be proved to the satisfaction of the Court, which Court will deal with the matter, and if it is proved to their satisfaction that what has been done has been done in bonâ fide ignorance, the persons will be acquitted and the ship released and not forfeited. Therefore, in a case in which a seizure is effected, the matter will have to be dealt with by a competent Court, and the section will have no operation whatever unless it shall be affirmatively proved that there was that state of bonâ fide ignorance to which I have adverted. I have some reason to believe that the explanation I have now given will be satisfactory even to those who have made the objections to which I have referred, and I do not know that I am justified in saying more than this: that the explanation has been given, and that we have every reason to believe that that explanation will be satisfactory. The clause was inserted in response to the demands of the Canadian Government, who thought it a reasonable clause to insert, and the Government here, thinking it reasonable, inserted it accordingly. I have only one other word to say. It is for the Imperial Parliament to discharge this, which is its Imperial obligation. We desire loyally and fully to give effect to the Award, and to secure by this legislation adequate sanctions for enforcing the provisions of the Award. But we are not bound to follow verbatim et literatim the legislation of the United States, nor is the United States bound to follow verbatim et literatim our legislation. As a matter of fact, I have never yet seen the complete Bill of the United States, although I have seen the original draft, which was introduced by a Senator or Member of the Congress. I have, as I have said, never seen the Bill in its completed form. There have been undoubtedly some discussions between the Representatives of the two countries, and something like approximation to general agreement upon the main principles of the legislation has been arrived at. One final word I will say. It has been stated by one of the Senators, Senator Morgan, a gentleman who was one of the Arbitrators, and who did not agree with the rest of the body, that this clause was introduced in bad faith and was not to be found in the draft of the Bill submitted originally to the Secretary of State at Washington. I am informed that is a misapprehension on the part of that Senator, and that this clause was in the draft as it was originally submitted to the Government at Washington. I hope the House will, therefore, see that the clause does not bear the erroneous interpretation put upon it on the other side of the Atlantic, and that there has been no want of good faith, and, as no Amendment is down, I hope the House will see fit to pass this Bill without amendment and give us a Third Reading to-night.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) desired to point out that the Members of the Senate of the United States saw some very serious objections to this clause, and he must confess he could not quite understand the explanation given by the Attorney General. The hon. and learned Gentleman told them that the words, "before the scheduled provisions were published," did not mean the scheduled provisions of this Bill, but the scheduled provisions of the Award. Now, the scheduled provisions of the Award were published to the world last August, and it seemed to him, therefore, an entire work of supererogation to introduce a clause in this Bill which would deal with ships or persons sailing on sealing expeditions since last August. There were no sealing ships that left anywhere near that period. In August they knew of the provisions of the Award, and what was the use of putting a clause now into the Bill to deal with vessels which would not leave until the following January or February at least? It seemed to him that the explanation was of a very curious kind, and there was no doubt the words "scheduled provisions" would be read as presumably belonging to the Bill. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would amend the Bill so as to make it clear that the words related to the Award and not to the Bill, because if not it was clear that schooners which left the ports after last August would have no cause to complain—

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES, on a point of Order, desired to know if they could discuss Clause 7 on a Motion which related to Clause 1? Such a course was highly inconvenient, as there were other matters to be raised before reaching Clause 7.

THE CHAIRMAN: On the point of Order, I have to say that we can only discuss Amendments to Clause 1 on Clause 1.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he wished, on the first clause, to ask a question which had been asked twice before. The Canadian Government were, of course, highly interested in this matter, and they had a right to know—had the Canadian Government agreed unreservedly to this Bill? When the consent of the Canadian Government was asked to the modus vivendi Act of 1891 they specially annexed the condition of compensation. Had they annexed any such condition to their consent to this Bill?

*SIR C. RUSSELL: I have heard of no such condition being annexed, and I think, if I may express an opinion, that it would be an impossible condition. I beg to remind the Committee, as I said a few minutes ago, that though Canada has been most keenly interested in the whole question, yet this is a matter of Imperial obligation, and even if Canada were not a consenting party—as I believe it is—to this Bill, it still would be the duty of the House to see that it honestly and loyally discharged its obligations. I do beg the indulgence of the House, and ask them on a question of this kind not to protract the discussion. I may take this opportunity of pointing out, in answer to my hon. Friend opposite, that if he will look at Clause 1, third line, he will see that the provisions of the Behring Sea Arbitration Award are thereby described, and this Act is referred to as "The scheduled provisions." If, however, there is any doubt upon the point it is a matter which may be set right.

Sir C. Russell

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, there was an important principle involved in this clause. There was a provision that Orders under this clause were to be laid before Parliament, but it did not enact what was the usual corollary to that provision—namely, that the Order should lay upon the Table of both Houses during the Session for 40 days before coming into effect. It did seem to him, if the Orders were to be placed before Parliament, that the minimum opportunity of 40 days should be given in which to call attention to the matter.

*SIR C. RUSSELL said, the question was quite a reasonable one. There were, however, precedents for inserting the provision in the form in which it appeared in this Bill. For instance, a similar provision, he was informed, appeared in the Fishery Convention Bill. Circumstances might arise which would involve a necessary modification of this Bill, and it had been thought best to have this power as it appeared in this form without the 40 days.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) thought that under Sub-section 3 of Clause 3 considerable friction might arise unless the instructions to the officers of cruisers were carefully drawn. There should be an interchange of views between the Naval Authorities or the Governments of both countries to prevent any possible friction. If the powers given to the officers of cruisers of the United States were reciprocal powers exercised by both, it seemed to him that the officers of one Power should not capture a vessel of another Power if there were a ship of that Power in sight at the time.

SIR C. RUSSELL: The hon. and gallant Gentleman mentioned that point to me before, and I have taken care that attention shall be drawn to it in the proper quarter.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) suggested that this clause ought to provide for the publishing of the scheduled provisions. He did not find in the Bill any method specified by which the provisions were to be published.

SIR C. RUSSELL: The notoriety they have received.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4, 5, and 6 agreed to.

Clause 7.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) said, his attention had been called to the second sub-section of this clause, and he thought it would be necessary for the Attorney General to consider whether in another place that sub-section should not receive some slight alteration. It provided that—

"Where on any proceeding against a person or ship accused of any offence under this Act it is proved that the ship sailed from its port of departure before the scheduled provisions were published there," &c.

It seemed to him that considerable doubt might be raised as to what "published there" meant. There might not be publication in the port itself; and while he quite agreed with his hon. and learned Friend that it meant notoriety, he thought the Court might think it meant some form of publication, and this view was rather strengthened by the succeeding words of the sub-section—

"Such person or master of a ship did not after such sailing . . . receive notice of these provisions."

He would suggest that the sub-section should be made a little clearer, so as to provide for non-conviction in the absence of notice as distinguished from form of publication.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: The scheduled provisions should in some way be defined.

SIR R. WEBSTER: They are defined in Sub-section 1.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: There is a possible ambiguity, but not, I think, a serious one. I will see that both points are considered.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that by a section of this clause the Act would remain in force so long as the scheduled provisions remained in force and no longer. It seemed to him that was an inconvenient way of defining the duration of an Act of Parliament, and in accordance with precedent he would suggest that the Act should only last as long as the necessities of the Government required it. The stipulation was made that these Regulations were to be revised and possibly renewed and changed entirely every five years; therefore he should move to omit all the words after the word "force," and to insert "until 1st May, 1900." This would give them six years, and during this time they could consider whether the Regulations should be renewed.

SIR C. RUSSELL said, it was provided that the Award should be a final settlement of all questions of difference between this country and the United States, and the Award fixed these as the permanent Rules until the parties by agreement should alter them. Besides that, it suggested—but this was not a mandatory part of the Award—that after the experience of five years then the two Powers should examine and consider these Regulations in the light of such experience.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES could not agree that this was not mandatory. What was the phrase,

"The said concurrent Regulations shall be submitted every five years to a new examination"?

That was part of the Award. That was not a suggestion, but it was mandatory. These Regulations had to be examined every five years; consequently, he submitted that six years was entirely adequate for the necessities of the Government, whilst the Attorney General had made no case for giving these powers to a Government in perpetuity over the high seas. He therefore moved that the Act should only last until the 1st of May, 1900.

Sir C. Russell

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 4, to leave out the words "so long as the scheduled provisions remain in force and no longer," in order to insert the words "until 1st May, 1900."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will immediately resolve itself into Committee on the Bill."—(The Attorney General.)

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, he thought the Motion of the Attorney General was a strong measure. It meant that the House could proceed with a Bill in spite of the Standing Order. It was not fair to those hon. Members who were not present.

SIR W. HARCOURT: This is a course which has on more than one occasion been taken, and on far less important Bills. This is a Bill on which I think the reputation of the country is at stake. It is a question of dealing fairly with this Award, and that Award is of immense importance not only in itself, but in the example which it sets. Therefore, it would be a pity that there should be any carping upon the Award when the United States are dealing straightforwardly with it. That we should talk it out might set a bad example. This course has been taken before, and I hope that the Motion being in the power of the House the House will assent to it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am quite sure that no gentleman on this side of the House ever desired to carp at the Award or to interpose for a single moment unnecessarily in the passage of a Bill with respect to which we all feel the honour, not only of the House, but of the country, to be concerned. With regard to the proposal of the right hon. Member for Bodmin, we all feel, no doubt, that the Twelve o'Clock Rule is an important bulwark of our liberties and is not lightly to be dispensed with, but I think that if ever the straining of the Rule were justified—and I do not suggest that it is here—it would be justified on this occasion, and I hope that no objection will be made to the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill again considered in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Preamble stand part of the Bill."

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) said, that he deprecated the language of the Leader of the House in accusing any one of Party spirit in dealing with this Bill. All were equally anxious to see the Award carried out, and carried out effectively; but he regretted that the Government had been unable to place in the hands of Members before they brought in the Bill information sufficient to dispel the doubts suggested in the newspapers as to the objections of the United States Senate and the disagreement of Canada. He was sure, however, that Canada, equally with England, would loyally carry out the Award of the Arbitration Court. He could only wish that the Bill had been drafted with greater care, and that the Government had given more time for its consideration.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he could not permit the suggestion to pass unchallenged that anyone had been carping at the Award, or had endeavoured to oppose the passing of the Bill. The Government had given them only a short quarter of an hour for dealing with the matter at this stage, though the question was of the utmost importance. If the Bill had to be hurried through it was because the Government had chosen to keep the Award back for eight months, instead of laying it before the House and having it properly and leisurely discussed and passed in good time. Whatever difficulty had arisen was entirely due to the Government. They had kept the Award in their pockets for eight months, and then flung it on the Table, and asked the House to approve of it without due consideration.

VOL. XXII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he thought it was unfortunate that the Leader of the House should have suggested that hon. Members were carping at the Award. Feeling as he did the immense importance of the Bill, he should like it to be understood that the Regulations only had been criticised, and rightly criticised, because they were matters of great importance, and it was not to be expected that a body of men who had not got as much as they hoped to get, and who thought their interests would be interfered with, should refrain from pointing out, through their Representatives, where the Regulations were unsatisfactory. No one had carped at the Award as an Award. Having allowed the Bill to go through without opposition, because they felt that the honour of the country was involved, and that the country must show its willingness to carry out the arbitration, they were entitled to express their opinion with regard to the Regulations which were matters of discretion. He would only add that the working of the Regulations must be carefully watched, and it would be the duty of any Government dealing with the subject in the future to see that the Regulations had effected their purpose, and had not unduly interfered with British interests.

Motion agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment; read the third time, and passed.

SOLICITORS' EXAMINATION BILL.

(No. 112.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, the Bill was a Bill of only three clauses, and was promoted by the Incorporated Law Society to encourage University education among law students. It proposed to exempt solicitors' articled clerks who had taken a University law degree from the intermediate examination. It was a question altogether of internal regulation on the part of the Incorporated Law Society, and he respectfully asked the House to agree to the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir A. Rollit.)

4 G

1687 Fatal Accidents Inquiry {COMMONS}

(Scotland) Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDER (HOUSING OF WORKING CLASSES) BILL.—(No. 3.)

Read the third time, and passed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.—(No. 1.)

Read the third time, and passed.

NORTH BERWICK PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.—(No. 89.)

Read the third time, and passed.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO CHILDREN BILL.—(No. 44.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

COUNTY COUNCILS ASSOCIATION (SCOTLAND) EXPENSES BILL.—(No. 97.)

Read a second time, and committed for Wednesday.

TRUSTEE ACT (1893) AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 58.)

Read a second time, and committed for Wednesday.

METROPOLITAN POLICE PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Mr. George Russell, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, under "The Metropolitan Police Act, 1886," relating to lands in the parishes of St. Pancras and St.

Giles, Camberwell, ordered to be brought Mr. George Russell and Mr. Secretary As Bill presented, and read first time. [Bil

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 4) BILL.

On Motion of Sir W. Foster, Bill to certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the urban districts of Baildon, Burnley, Burton Trent, Leicester, Margate, Norwich, and the Port of Cardiff, ordered to be brought in by Sir W. Foster and Mr. Shaw Lefevre. Bill presented, and read first time. [Bil

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 5) BILL.

On Motion of Sir W. Foster, Bill to certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the urban districts of Bredbury and Romiley, Swadlincote and Wilmslow, and the Sanitary District of the Wharfedale, ordered to be brought in by Sir W. Foster and Mr. Shaw Lefevre.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bil

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 1) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Mundella, Bill to certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under "The General Pier and Harbour Act, 1861," relating to Bangor, Darlington, Littlehampton, and Seaford, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mundella and Mr. Bouverie. Bill presented, and read first time. [Bil

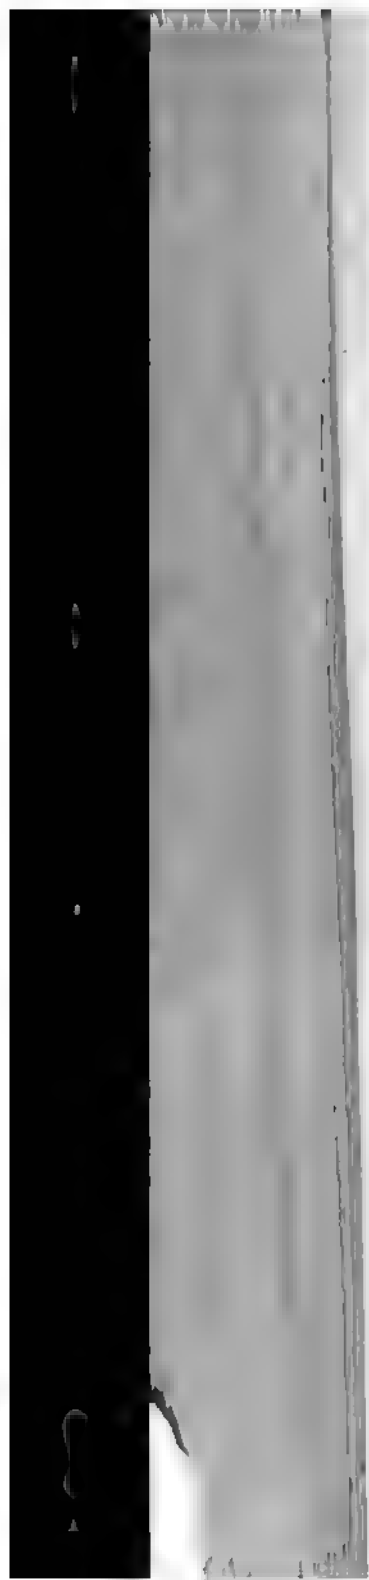

FATAL ACCIDENTS INQUIRY (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The Lord Advocate, Bill to make provision for Public Inquiry in respect of Fatal Accidents occurring in industrial concerns or occupations in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The Lord Advocate, Sir Trevelyan, and The Solicitor General for Scotland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bil

House adjourned at twenty minutes after Twelve

[I N D E X]

THE MINISTRY

OF THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EARL ROSEBERY, K.G.

AT THE OPENING OF THE SESSION ON THE 12TH MARCH 1894.

THE CABINET.

First Lord of the Treasury and Lord President of the Council	Right Hon. Earl of ROSEBERY, K.G.
Lord Chancellor	Right Hon. Lord HERSCHELL.
Lord Privy Seal	Right Hon. Lord TWEEDMOUTH.
Secretary of State, Home Department	Right Hon. HERBERT HENRY ASQUITH.
Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs	Right Hon. Earl of KIMBERLEY, K.G.
Secretary of State for the Colonies	Right Hon. Marquess of RIPON, K.G.
Secretary of State for War	Right Hon. HENRY CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN.
Secretary of State for India	Right Hon. HENRY H. FOWLER.
Chancellor of the Exchequer	Right Hon. Sir WILLIAM VERNON HARCOURT.
First Lord of the Admiralty	Right Hon. Earl SPENCER, K.G.
President of the Board of Trade	Right Hon. ANTHONY JOHN MUNDELLA.
First Commissioner of Works and Public Buildings	Right Hon. H. GLADSTONE.
Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant	Right Hon. JOHN MORLEY.
Secretary for Scotland and Vice President of the Scotch Education Department	Right Hon. Sir GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN, Bart.
Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster	Right Hon. JAMES BRYCE.
President of the Local Government Board	Right Hon. GEORGE J. SHAW LEFEVRE.
Postmaster General	Right Hon. ARNOLD MORLEY.
Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education	Right Hon. A. H. DYKE ACLAND.

NOT IN THE CABINET.

Chief Marshal Commanding in Chief	H.R.H. the Duke of CAMBRIDGE, K.G.
President of the Board of Agriculture	Right Hon. HERBERT GARDNER.
Members of the Treasury	{ RICHARD KNIGHT CAUSTON, Esq. WILLIAM A. MCARTHUR, Esq. RONALD CRAUFURD MUNRO-FERGUSON, Esq.
Members of the Admiralty	{ Admiral Sir FREDERICK WILLIAM RICHARDS, K.C.B. Rear Admiral The Lord WALTER TALBOT KERR. Rear Admiral JOHN ARBUTHNOT FISHER, C.B. Captain GERARD HENRY UCTRED NOEL, R.N.
Secretaries to the Treasury	EDMUND ROBERTSON, Esq.
Secretary to the Admiralty	THOMAS E. ELLIS, Esq.
Secretary to the Board of Trade	Right Hon. Sir JOHN TOMLINSON HIBBERT, K.C.B.
Secretary to the Local Government Board	Right Hon. Sir UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Bart.
Secretary, Home Department	THOMAS BURT, Esq.
Secretary, Foreign Department	Sir WALTER FOSTER.
Secretary for the Colonies	GEORGE WILLIAM ERSKINE RUSSELL, Esq.
Secretary for War	Sir EDWARD GREY, Bart.
Secretary for India	SYDNEY CHARLES BUXTON, Esq.
Postmaster General	Lord SANDHURST.
Secretary to the War Department	Lord REAY.
Locate General	Right Hon. CHARLES SEALE-HAYNE.
General	WILLIAM WOODALL, Esq.
General	Right Hon. Sir FRANCIS H. JEUNE.
General	Sir CHARLES RUSSELL.
General	Sir JOHN RIGBY.

SCOTLAND.

Attorney General	Right Hon. JOHN BLAIR BALFOUR.
Solicitor General	ALEXANDER ASHER, Esq.

IRELAND.

Attorney General	Right Hon. Lord HOUGHTON, K.P.
Solicitor General	Right Hon. SAMUEL WALKER.
Recorder	Right Hon. THE MACDERMOTT.
Deputy Recorder	Serjeant HEMPHILL.

QUEEN'S HOUSEHOLD.

Chamberlain	Marquess of BREADALBANE.
Household	Right Hon. Lord CARRINGTON, G.C.M.G.
Chief of Household	Right Hon. Earl of CORK.
Chaplain of the Household	GEORGE LEVESON-GOWER, Esq.
Chaplain of the Household	Right Hon. CHARLES R. SPENCER.
Chaplain of the Household	Right Hon. Earl of CHESTERFIELD.
Chaplain of the Household	Right Hon. Lord KENSINGTON.
Chaplain of the Household	Lord RIBBLESDALE.
Chaplain of the Household	Colonel Sir G. A. MAUDE, V.C., K.C.R.

ROLL OF THE LORDS SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL

IN

THE THIRD SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FIFTH PARLIAMENT

OF

THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND
IRELAND.

58^V VICTORIÆ, 1894.

MEM.—According to the Usage of Parliament, when the House appoints a Select Committee, the Lords appointed to serve upon it are named in the Order of their Rank, beginning with the Highest ; and so, when the House sends a Committee to a Conference with the Commons, the Lord highest in Rank is called first, and the rest go forth in like Order : But when the Whole House is called over for any Purpose within the House, or for the Purpose of proceeding forth to Westminster Hall, or upon any public Solemnity, the Call begins invariably with the Junior Baron.

His Royal Highness The Prince of Wales.	His Royal Highness George William Frederick Charles Duke of Cambridge.
His Royal Highness Alfred Ernest Albert Duke of Edinburgh.	Edward White Archbishop of Canterbury.
His Royal Highness Arthur William Patrick Albert Duke of Connaught and Strathearn.	Farrer Lord Herschell, Lord High Chancellor.
His Royal Highness George Frederick Ernest Albert Duke of York.	William Dalrymple Archbishop of York.
His Royal Highness Leopold Charles Edward George Albert Duke of Albany.	Archibald Philip Lord Rosebery (Earl of Rosebery). Lord President of the Council.
	Edward Lord Tweedmouth, Lord Privy Seal.

ROLL OF THE LORDS

Henry Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal of England.	Hugh de Grey Marquess of Hertford.
Algernon Percy Banks Duke of Somerset.	John Patrick Marquess of Bute.
Charles Henry Duke of Richmond.	William Alleyne Marquess of Exeter.
Augustus Charles Lennox Duke of Grafton.	William Marquess of Northampton.
Henry Charles Fitzroy Duke of Beaufort.	John Charles Marquess Camden.
William Amelius Aubrey De Vere Duke of Saint Albans.	Henry Marquess of Anglesey.
George Godolphin Duke of Leeds.	George Henry Hugh Marquess of Cholmondeley.
Herbrand Arthur Duke of Bedford.	George William Thomas Marquess of Ailesbury.
Spencer Compton Duke of Devonshire.	Frederick William John Marquess of Bristol.
Charles Richard John Duke of Marlborough.	Archibald Marquess of Ailsa.
John James Robert Duke of Rutland.	Constantine Charles Henry Marquess of Normanby.
William Alexander Louis Stephen Duke of Brandon. (Duke of Hamilton.)	George Frederick Samuel Marquess of Ripon.
William John Arthur Charles James Duke of Portland.	William Marquess of Abergavenny.
William Angus Drogo Duke of Manchester.	Gavin Marquess of Breadalbane. (In another Place as Lord Steward of the Household.)
Henry Pelham Archibald Douglas Duke of Newcastle.	Frederick Temple Marquess of Dufferin and Ava.
Algernon George Duke of Northumberland.	Lawrence Marquess of Zetland.
His Royal Highness Ernest Augustus William Adolphus George Frederick Duke of Cumberland and Teviotdale.	Charles Henry John Earl of Shrewsbury.
Henry Duke of Wellington.	Frederick Arthur Earl of Derby.
Cromartie Duke of Sutherland.	Warner Francis John Plantagenet Earl of Huntingdon.
Hugh Lupus Duke of Westminster.	George Robert Charles Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery.
Alexander William George Duke of Fife.	Henry Hugh Earl of Devon.
George Douglas Duke of Argyll.	Henry Charles Earl of Suffolk and Berkshire.
Gavin Marquess of Breadalbane, Lord Steward of the Household.	Rudolph Robert Basil Aloysius Augustine Earl of Denbigh.
Augustus John Henry Beaumont Marquess of Winchester.	Anthony Mildmay Julian Earl of Westmorland.
Henry Charles Keith Marquess of Lansdowne.	Montague Earl of Lindsey.
John Villiers Stuart Marquess Townshend.	William Earl of Stamford.
Robert Arthur Talbot Marquess of Salisbury.	Murray Edward Gordon Earl of Wirchilsea and Nottingham.
John Alexander Marquess of Bath.	Edwyn Francis Earl of Chesterfield.
James Marquess of Abercorn. (Duke of Abercorn.)	Edward George Henry Earl of Sandwich.
	George Devereux De Vere Earl of Essex.
	George James Earl of Carlisle.

SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL.

William Henry Walter Earl of Doncaster. (Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry.)	Francis Richard Charles Guy Earl Brooke and Earl of Warwick.
Anthony Earl of Shaftesbury.	Sidney Carr Earl of Buckinghamshire.
Randal Mowbray Thomas Earl of Berkeley.	William Thomas Spencer Earl Fitz- william.
Montagu Arthur Earl of Abingdon.	Frederick George Earl of Guilford.
Aldred Frederick George Beresford Earl of Scarbrough.	Charles Philip Earl of Hardwicke.
William Coutts Earl of Albemarle.	Henry Edward Earl of Ilchester.
George William Earl of Coventry.	Reginald Windsor Earl De La Warr.
Victor Albert George Earl of Jersey.	William Earl of Radnor.
William Henry Earl Poulett. ●	John Poyntz Earl Spencer.
John Francis Erskine Earl of Mar. (Elected for Scotland.)	Seymour Henry Earl Bathurst.
Sholto George Watson Earl of Morton. (Elected for Scotland.)	Arthur Wills John Wellington Trumbull Blundell Earl of Hillsborough. (Marquess of Downshire.)
Walter John Francis Earl of Mar and Kellie. (Elected for Scotland.)	Edward Hyde Earl of Clarendon.
George Earl of Haddington. (Elected for Scotland.)	William David Earl of Mansfield.
Frederick Henry Earl of Lauderdale. (Elected for Scotland.)	John James Hugh Henry Earl Strange. (Duke of Atholl.)
John Trotter Earl of Lindsay. (Elected for Scotland.)	William Henry Earl of Mount Edgcumbe.
David Stanley William Earl of Airlie. (Elected for Scotland.)	Hugh Earl Fortescue.
Robert Harris Carnwath Earl of Carn- wath. (Elected for Scotland.)	George Edward Stanhope Molyneux Earl of Carnarvon.
Ronald Ruthven Earl of Leven and Melville. (Elected for Scotland.)	George Henry Earl Cadogan.
Douglas Mackinnon Baillie Hamilton Earl of Dundonald. (Elected for Scotland.)	Edward James Earl of Malmesbury.
Sewallis Edward Earl Ferrers.	John Vansittart Danvers Earl of Lanes- borough. (Elected for Ireland.)
William Heneage Earl of Dartmouth.	Henry Ernest Newcomen Earl of Kingston. (Elected for Ireland.)
Charles Earl of Tankerville.	Dermot Robert Wyndham Earl of Mayo. (Elected for Ireland.)
Charles Wightwick Earl of Aylesford.	Hugh Earl Annesley. (Elected for Ireland.)
Francis Thomas de Grey Earl Cowper.	George Earl of Lucan. (Elected for Ireland.)
Arthur Philip Earl Stanhope.	Somerset Richard Earl of Belmore. (Elected for Ireland.)
Thomas Augustus Wolstenholme Earl of Macclesfield.	James Francis Earl of Bandon. (Elected for Ireland.)
Douglas Beresford Malise Ronald Earl Graham. (Duke of Montrose.)	James Earl of Caledon. (Elected for Ireland.)
William Frederick Earl Waldegrave.	James Francis Harry Earl of Rosslyn.
Hertram Earl of Ashburnham.	William George Robert Earl of Craven.
Charles Augustus Earl of Harrington.	William Hillier Earl of Onslow.
Newton Earl of Portsmouth.	Charles Earl of Romney.
	Walter John Earl of Chichester.

ROLL OF THE LORDS

Seymour John Grey Earl of Wilton.

George Charles Earl of Powis.

Horatio Earl Nelson.

Lawrence Earl of Rosse. (Elected for Ireland.)

Sydney William Herbert Earl Manvers.

Horatio Earl of Orford.

Henry Earl Grey.

Hugh Cecil Earl of Lonsdale.

Dudley Francis Stuart Earl of Harrowby.

Henry Ulick Earl of Harewood.

Gilbert John Earl of Minto.

Alan Frederick Earl Cathcart.

James Walter Earl of Verulam.

Adelbert Wellington Brownlow Earl Brownlow.

Henry Cornwallis Earl of St. Germans.

Albert Edmund Earl of Morley.

Orlando George Charles Earl of Bradford.

William Earl Beauchamp.

John Earl of Eldon.

Richard William Penn Earl Howe.

George Edward John Mowbray Earl of Stradbroke.

William Stephen Earl Temple of Stowe.

Francis Charles Earl of Kilmorey. (Elected for Ireland.)

Charles Stewart Earl Vane. (Marquess of Londonderry.)

William Archer Earl Amherst.

John Frederick Vaughan Earl Cawdor.

William George Earl of Munster.

Robert Adam Philips Haldane Earl of Camperdown.

Thomas Francis Earl of Lichfield.

John George Earl of Durham.

Granville George Earl Granville.

Henry Earl of Effingham.

Henry John Earl of Ducie.

Charles Alfred Worsley Earl of Yarborough.

Henry John Earl Innes. (Duke of Roxburghe.)

Thomas William Earl of Leicester.

Ralph Gordon Earl of Lovelace.

Charles William Francis Earl of Gainsborough.

Francis Charles Granville Earl of Ellesmere.

George Henry Charles Earl of Strafford.

Kenelm Charles Edward Earl of Cottenham.

William Henry Earl Cowley.

George Arnulph Earl of Winton. (Earl of Eglintoun.)

William Humble Earl of Dudley.

John Francis Stanley Earl Russell.

John Earl of Kimberley.

Richard Earl of Dartrey.

William Ernest Earl of Feversham.

Henry George Earl of Ravensworth.

Edward Montagu Stuart Granville Earl of Wharnccliffe.

Thomas George Earl of Northbrook.

Herbert John Earl Cairns.

Victor Alexander George Robert Earl of Lytton.

Edward Earl of Lathom.

George Watson Earl Sondes.

Roundell Earl of Selborne.

Walter Stafford Earl of Iddesleigh.

Cornwallis Earl de Montalt.

William Henry Forester Earl of Londesborough.

Gathorne Earl of Cranbrook.

Gilbert Henry Earl of Ancaster.

Robert Viscount Hereford.

Henry Viscount Bolingbroke and St. John.

Evelyn Edward Thomas Viscount Falmouth.

George Master Viscount Torrington.

Maurice Viscount Leinster. (Duke of Leinster.)

Francis Wheler Viscount Hood.

Mervyn Edward Viscount Powerscourt. (Elected for Ireland.)

Henry William Crosbie Viscount Bangor. (Elected for Ireland.)

Cornwallis Viscount Hawarden. (Elected for Ireland.) (In another Place a Earl de Montalt.)

SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL.

Carnegie Parker Viscount St. Vincent.	Alwyne Bishop of Ely.
Henry Viscount Melville.	James Bishop of Manchester.
William Wells Viscount Sidmouth.	William Walsham Bishop of Wakefield.
Henry Edward Montagu Dorington Clotworthy Viscount Templetown. (Elected for Ireland.)	Francis John Bishop of Chester.
John Campbell Viscount Gordon. (Earl of Aberdeen.)	Alfred George Bishop of St. Asaph.
Edward Fleetwood John Viscount Exmouth.	Daniel Lewis Bishop of Bangor.
John Luke George Viscount Hutchin- son. (Earl of Donoughmore.)	John Wogan Bishop of St. Albans.
William Frederick Viscount Clancarty. (Earl of Clancarty.)	Charles Robert Lord Carrington, Lord Chamberlain of the Household.
Robert Wellington Viscount Combermere.	Dudley Charles Lord de Ros.
Henry Charles Viscount Canterbury.	Charles Botolph Joseph Lord Mowbray.
Rowland Clegg Viscount Hill.	George Manners Lord Hastings.
Charles Stewart Viscount Hardinge.	Edward Southwell Lord de Clifford.
George Stephens Viscount Gough.	Charles Henry Rolle Lord Clinton.
Charles Lindley Viscount Halifax.	Robert Nathaniel Cecil George Lord Zouche of Haryngworth.
Alexander Nelson Viscount Bridport.	Rawdon George Grey Lord Grey de Ruthyn.
William Henry Berkeley Viscount Portman.	Charles Edward Hastings Lord Botreaux. (Earl of Loudoun.)
Henry Robert Viscount Hampden.	Francis Robert Lord Camoys.
Garnet Joseph Viscount Wolseley.	Miles Lord Beaumont.
William John Viscount Oxenbridge.	Henry Lord Willoughby de Broke.
Richard Assheton Viscount Cross.	Hubert George Charles Lord Vaux of Harrowden.
Frederick Bishop of London.	Ralph Gordon Lord Wentworth. (In another Place as Earl of Lovelace.)
Brooke Foss Bishop of Durham.	Alfred Thomas Townshend Lord Braye.
Anthony Wilson Bishop of Winchester.	Robert George Lord Windsor.
Charles John Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.	William Henry John Lord North.
James Bishop of Hereford.	Beauchamp Moubray Lord St. John of Bletso.
Arthur Charles Bishop of Bath and Wells.	Frederick George Lord Howard de Walden.
Richard Bishop of Chichester.	Bernard Henry Philip Lord Petre.
William Basil Bishop of St. David's.	John Fiennes Lord Saye and Sele.
John Charles Bishop of Liverpool.	John Francis Lord Arundell of Wardour.
Ernest Roland Bishop of Newcastle.	John Stuart Lord Clifton (Earl of Darnley.)
Richard Bishop of Llandaff.	John Baptist Joseph Lord Dormer.
William Bishop of Oxford.	Henry John Philip Sidney Lord Teynham.
George Bishop of Southwell.	Fitz-Osbert Lord Stafford.
William Boyd Bishop of Ripon.	George Frederick William Lord Byron.
Edward Bishop of Lincoln.	Lewis Henry Hugh Lord Clifford of Chudleigh.
John Bishop of Salisbury.

ROLL OF THE LORDS

Henry de Vere Lord Barnard.	George Augustus Hamilton Lord Fishwick. (Marquess of Donegall.)
Horace Courtenay Gammell Lord Forbes. (Elected for Scotland.)	Henry Charles Lord Gage. (Viscount Gage.)
Alexander William Frederick Lord Saltoun. (Elected for Scotland.)	Thomas John Lord Thurlow.
Charles William Lord Sinclair. (Elected for Scotland.)	William Morton Lord Auckland.
Alexander Hugh Lord Balfour of Burleigh. (Elected for Scotland.)	Charles George Lord Lyttelton.
Walter Hugh Lord Polwarth. (Elected for Scotland.)	Henry George Lord Mendip. (Viscount Clifden.)
Richard Edmund Saint Lawrence Lord Boyle. (Earl of Cork and Orrery.)	George Lord Stuart of Castle Stuart (Earl of Moray.)
George Lord Hay. (Earl of Kinnoul.)	Alan Plantagenet Lord Stewart Garlies. (Earl of Galloway.)
Digby Wentworth Bayard Lord Middleton.	James George Henry Lord Saltersford (Earl of Courtown.)
Frederick George Brabazon Lord Ponsonby. (Earl of Bessborough.)	William Lord Brodrick. (Viscount Midleton.)
Alfred Nathaniel Holden Lord Scarsdale.	Augustus Cholmondeley Lord Calthorpe
George Florance Lord Boston.	Peter Robert Lord Gwydir.
Charles George Lord Lovell and Holland. (Earl of Egmont.)	Charles Robert Lord Carrington. (1 another Place as Lord Chamberlain of the Household.)
George William Henry Lord Vernon.	William Henry Lord Bolton.
Edward Henry Trafalgar Lord Digby.	Thomas Lyttelton Lord Lilford.
Martin Bladen Lord Hawke.	Thomas Lord Ribblesdale.
Henry Thomas Lord Foley.	John William Lord Dunsany. (Elected for Ireland.)
Arthur de Cardonnel Lord Dinevor.	Edward Donough Lord Inchiquin (Elected for Ireland.)
Thomas Lord Walsingham.	William Charles Lord Carbery. (Elected for Ireland.)
William Lord Bagot.	John Thomas William Lord Mass (Elected for Ireland.)
Charles Henry Lord Southampton.	Hamilton Matthew Fitzmaurice L Muskerry. (Elected for Ireland.)
John Richard Brinsley Lord Grantley.	Francis William Lord Kilmaine. (Elected for Ireland.)
George Bridges Harley Dennett Lord Rodney.	Charles Mark Lord Headley. (Elected for Ireland.)
Henry George Lord Lovaine. (Earl Percy.)	Edward Henry Churchill Lord Croft (Elected for Ireland.)
Philip Reginald Lord Somers.	Hercules Edward Lord Langford (Elected for Ireland.)
Richard Henry Lord Berwick.	Dayrolles Blakeney Lord Ven (Elected for Ireland.)
Edward Lennox Lord Sherborne.	Henry O'Callaghan Lord Dunal (Elected for Ireland.)
John Henry De La Poer Lord Tyrone. (Marquess of Waterford.)
Richard Henry Lord Carleton. (Earl of Shannon.)
Charles Lord Suffolk.
Dudley Wilmot Lord Dorchester.
Lloyd Lord Kenyon.
Charles Cornwallis Lord Braybrooke.

SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL.

balloner Henry Lord Clarina. ed for Ireland.)	Orlando Watkin Weld Lord Forester.
nry Lord Loftus. (Marquess of	John William Lord Rayleigh.
Lord Carysfort. (Earl of fort.)	Edric Frederic Lord Gifford.
Ralph Lord Abercromby.	Hubert George Lord Somerhill. (Mar- quess of Clanricarde.)
Towry Hamilton Lord Ellen-	James Ludovic Lord Wigan. (Earl of Crawford.)
gh.	Uchter John Mark Lord Ranfurly. (Earl of Ranfurly.)
s Frederick Arthur Lord Sandys.	John Byrne Leicester Lord De Tabley.
orth Lord Sheffield. (Earl of eld.)	Charles Stuart Henry Lord Teunterden.
Macnaghten Lord Erskine.	William Conyngham Lord Plunket.
John Lord Monteagle. (Mar- of Sligo.)	William Frederick Lord Heytesbury.
Arthur William Patrick Hastings	Archibald Philip Lord Rosebery. (Earl of Rosebery.) (In another Place as Lord President of the Council.)
Granard. (Earl of Granard.)	Richard James Lord Clanwilliam. (Earl of Clanwilliam.)
— Lord Gardner.	William Draper Mortimer Lord Wynford.
omas Lord Manners.	Charles Gore Lord Kilmarnock. (Earl of Erroll.)
drian Louis Lord Hopetoun. of Hopetoun.)	Arthur James Francis Lord Fingall. (Earl of Fingall.)
Lord Meldrum. (Marquess of y.)	William Philip Lord Sefton. (Earl of Sefton.)
igerton Lord Grinstead. (Earl of killen.)	Charles Lord Clements. (Earl of Leitrim.)
Hale John Charles Lord Foxford. of Limerick.)	Thomas Lord Kenlis. (Marquess of Headfort.)
Albert Francis Charles Lord	Reginald Lord Chaworth. (Earl of Meath.)
hill.	Charles Adolphus Lord Dunmore. (Earl of Dunmore.)
Robert Canning Lord Harris.	Augustus Frederick George Warwick Lord Poltimore.
Charles Edward Lord Col-	Llewelyn Nevill Vaughan Lord Mostyn.
rg Henry Lord Ker. (Marquess hian.)	Henry Spencer Lord Templemore.
Francis Lord Minster. (Mar- Conyngham.)	Valentine Frederick Lord Cloncurry.
dward William Theobald Lord	James St. Vincent Lord De Saumarez.
de. (Marquess of Ormonde.)	Thomas Lord Denman.
Richard Lord Wemyss. (Earl of ss.)	James Yorke MacGregor Lord Abinger.
ange Lord Clanbrassill. (Earl len.)	Philip Lord De L'Isle and Dudley.
Lord Silchester. (Earl of ord.)	Francis Denzil Edward Lord Ash-
ay John Eyre Lord Oriel. (Vis- Massereene.)	burton.
rd Delamere.	Edward George Percy Lord Hatherton.

ROLL OF THE LORDS

Archibald Brabazon Sparrow Lord Worlingham. (Earl of Gosford.)	Charles Compton William Lord Ch
Hallyburton George Lord Stratheden.	Frederic Augustus Lord Chelmsfo
Geoffrey Dominick Augustus Frederick Lord Oranmore and Browne. (Elected for Ireland.)	John Lord Churston.
Simon Joseph Lord Lovat.	Henry Lord Leconfield.
William Bateman Lord Bateman.	Wilbraham Lord Egerton.
Algernon Hawkins Thomond Lord Kintore. (Earl of Kintore.)	Godfrey Charles Lord Tredegar.
George Ponsonby Lord Lismore. (Viscount Lismore.)	Fitz Patrick Henry Lord Lyveden
Derrick Warner William Lord Ross- more.	Henry Charles Lord Broughan Vaux.
Robert Shapland George Julian Lord Carew.	Arthur Fitz-Gerald Lord Kinnaird
Charles Frederick Ashley Cooper Lord De Mauley.	Richard Luttrell Pilkington Lord bury.
Arthur Lord Wrottesley.	Francis William Fitzhardinge Lon hardinge.
Charles Douglas Richard Lord Sudeley.	Luke Lord Annaly.
Paul Sanford Lord Methuen.	Robert Offley Ashburton Lord Hou
Henry Edward John Lord Stanley of Alderley.	John Gaspard Le Marchant Romilly.
William Henry Lord Leigh.	James Herbert Gustavus Meredyth Meredyth. (Lord Athlumney.)
Beilby Lord Wenlock.	Windham Thomas Lord Kenry. of Dunraven and Mount-Earl.
William Lord Lurgan.	Charles Stanley Lord Monck. (Vis Monck.)
Thomas Spring Lord Monteagle of Brandon.	John Major Lord Hartismere. Henniker.)
John Reginald Upton Lord Seaton.	Hedworth Hylton Lord Hylton.
John Manley Arbuthnot Lord Keane.	George Sholto Gordon Lord Penr
John Lord Oxenfoord. (Earl of Stair.)	Gustavus Russell Lord Branc (Viscount Boyne.)
George Crespigny Brabazon Lord Vivian.	John Henry Lord Kesteven.
Henry William Lord Congleton.	Arthur Lord Ormathwaite.
Victor Alexander Lord Elgin. (Earl of Elgin and Kincardine.)	Edward Lord O'Neill.
Thomas Montague Morrison Lord Truro.	Robert William Lord Napier.
Arthur Lord De Freyne.	Jeico William Joseph Lord Gc ston. (Viscount Gormanston.)
Edward Burtenshaw Lord Saint Leonards.	Thomas Kane Lord Rathd (Elected for Ireland.)
George Fitz-Roy Henry Lord Raglan.	John Hamilton Lord Lawrence.
Valentine Augustus Lord Kenmare. (Earl of Kenmare.)	James Plaisted Lord Penzance.
Henry Lord Belper.	John Lord Dunning. (Lord Rol
Richard Wogan Lord Talbot de Mala- hide.	James Lord Balinhard. (Earl Southesk.)
Robert Wellesley Lord Ebury.	William Lord Hare. (Earl of Lis
	Francis Edward Lord Howard of sop.

SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL.

Bernard Edward Barnaby Lord Castle-town.	Arthur Oliver Villiers Lord Ampthill.
John Emerich Edward Lord Acton.	William Montagu Lord Tweeddale. (Marquess of Tweeddale.)
Thomas Charles Lord Robartes.	William Ulick Tristram Lord Howth. (Earl of Howth.)
Frederick Lord Wolverton.	Donald James Lord Reay.
Algernon William Fulke Lord Greville.	Harcourt Lord Derwent.
Thomas Towneley Lord O'Hagan.	Henry James Lord Hothfield.
William Lord Sandhurst.	Edward Lord Tweedmouth. (In another Place as Lord Privy Seal.)
Francis Lord Ettrick. (Lord Napier.)	Frederick Beauchamp Paget Lord Alcester.
James Charles Herbert Welbore Ellis Lord Somerton. (Earl of Normanton.)	Hallam Lord Tennyson.
Henry Austin Lord Aberdare.	James Lord Strathspey. (Earl of Seafield.)
James Lord Moncreiff.	John George Lord Monk Bretton.
John Duke Lord Coleridge.	Walter Henry Lord Northbourne.
William Lord Emly.	Arthur Saunders William Charles Fox Lord Sudley. (Earl of Arran.)
Chichester Samuel Lord Carlingford. (Lord Clermont.)	John Robert William Lord de Vesci. (Viscount de Vesci.)
Thomas Francis Lord Cottesloe.	Marmaduke Francis Lord Herries.
Herbert Perrott Murray Lord Hampton.	Hardinge Stanley Lord Halsbury.
Charles Alexander Lord Douglas. (Earl of Home.)	Mervyn Edward Lord Powerscourt. (In another Place as Viscount Powerscourt.)
Arthur George Maule Lord Ramsay. (Earl of Dalhousie.)	Anthony Henley Lord Northington. (Lord Henley.)
John Henry Lord Fermanagh. (Earl Erne.)	Nathaniel Mayer Lord Rothschild.
William Richard Lord Harlech.	Edward Charles Lord Revelstoke.
Henry Gerard Lord Alington.	Robert Lord Monkswell.
Wilbraham Frederic Lord Tollemache.	Arthur Lord Hobhouse.
William Cansfield Lord Gerard.	Ralph Robert Wheeler Lord Lingen.
Lionel Sackville Lord Sackville.	Edward Lord Ashbourne.
Colin Lord Blackburn.	Rowland Lord Saint Oswald.
Charles Bowyer Lord Norton.	Robert James Lord Wantage.
Percy Lord Shute. (Viscount Barrington.)	William Baliol Lord Esher.
William Lord Watson. (A Lord of Appeal in Ordinary.)	Robert Wilfrid Lord Deramore.
Lawrence Hesketh Lord Haldon.	Henry John Lord Montagu of Beaulieu.
Ivor Bertie Lord Wimborne.	Sidney Herbert Lord Elphinstone.
Arthur Edward Lord Ardilaun.	Charles John Lord Colville of Culross.
Charles Wallace Alexander Napier Lord Lamington.	Farrer Lord Herschell. (In another Place as Lord High Chancellor.)
Charles Frederick Lord Donington.	Charles Henry Lord Hillingdon.
Arthur Edwin Lord Trevor.	Samuel Charles Lord Hindlip.
Montagu William Lord Rowton.	Edmund Lord Grimthorpe.
Edward Lord Brabourne.

LIST OF THE COMMONS.

THE NAMES OF MEMBERS

RETURNED TO SERVE IN THE TWENTY-FIFTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, SUMMONED TO MEET AT WESTMINSTER THE FOURTH DAY OF AUGUST, ONE THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND NINETY TWO, AS BY THE SEVERAL RETURNS FILED IN THE OFFICE OF THE CLERK OF THE CROWN IN CHANCERY APPEARS. CORRECTED TO THE MEETING OF THE PARLIAMENT ON THE TWELFTH DAY OF MARCH, ONE THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND NINETY FOUR.

BEDFORD.

NORTHERN, or BIGGLESWADE DIVISION,
George William Erskine Russell.

SOUTHERN, or LUTON DIVISION,
Howard Whitbread.

BEDFORD BOROUGH.
Samuel Whitbread.

BERKS.

NORTHERN, or ABINGDON DIVISION,
Philip Wroughton.

SOUTHERN, or NEWBURY DIVISION,
William George Mount.

EASTERN, or WOKINGHAM DIVISION,
Sir George Russell, bt.

READING BOROUGH.
George William Palmer.

WINDSOR (NEW) BOROUGH.
Francis Tress Barry.

BUCKS.

NORTHERN, or BUCKINGHAM DIVISION
Herbert Samuel Leon.

MID, or AYLESBURY DIVISION,
Baron Ferdinand James de Rothschild.

SOUTHERN, or WYCOMBE DIVISION,
Viscount Curzon. .

CAMBRIDGE.

NORTHERN, or WISBECH DIVISION,
Hon. Arthur George Brand.

WESTERN, or CHESTERTON DIVISION,
Hugh Edward Hoare.

EASTERN, or NEWMARKET DIVISION,
George Newnes.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.
Richard Claverhouse Jebb,
Right Hon. Sir John Eldon Gorst.

CAMBRIDGE BOROUGH.
Robert Uniacke Penrose FitzGerald.

CHESTER.

WIRRAL DIVISION,
Lt.-Colonel Edward Thomas Davenant
Cotton-Jodrell.

EDDISBURY DIVISION,
Henry James Tollemache.

MACCLESFIELD DIVISION,
William Bromley-Davenport.

CREWE DIVISION,
Walter Stowe Bright McLaren.

NORTHWICH DIVISION,
John Tomlinson Brunner.

ALTRINCHAM DIVISION,
Coningsby Ralph Disraeli.

CHESTER—cont.

HYDE DIVISION,
Joseph Watson Sidebotham.

KNUTSFORD DIVISION,
Hon. Alan de Tatton Egerton.

BIRKENHEAD BOROUGH.
Viscount Bury.

CHESTER BOROUGH.
Robert Armstrong Yerburgh.

STOCKPORT BOROUGH.
Joseph Leigh,
George Whiteley.

CORNWALL.

WESTERN, or ST. IVES DIVISION,
Thomas Bedford Bolitho.

NORTH-WESTERN, or CAMBORNE DIVI-SION,
Charles Augustus Vansittart Conybeare.

TRURO DIVISION,
John Charles Williams.

MID, or ST. AUSTELL DIVISION,
William Alexander McArthur.

SOUTH-EASTERN, or BODMIN DIVISION.
Rt. Hon. Leonard Henry Courtney.

NORTH-EASTERN, or LAUNCESTON
DIVISION.
Thomas Owen.

PENRYN AND FALMOUTH BOROUGH.
William George Cavendish Bentinck.

CUMBERLAND.

NORTHERN, or ESKDALE DIVISION,
Robert Andrew Allison.

MID, or PENRITH DIVISION,
James William Lowther.

COCKERMOUTH DIVISION,
Sir Wilfrid Lawson, bt.

WESTERN, or EGREMONT DIVISION,
David Ainsworth.

CARLISLE BOROUGH.
William Court Gully.

WHITEHAVEN BOROUGH.
Thomas Shepherd Little.

DERBY.

HIGH PEAK DIVISION,
William Sidebottom.

NORTH-EASTERN DIVISION,
Thomas Dolling Bolton.

CHESTERFIELD DIVISION,
Thomas Bayley.

WESTERN DIVISION,
Victor Christian William Cavendish.

MID DIVISION,
James Alfred Jacoby.

ILKESTON DIVISION,
Sir Balthazar Walter Foster.

SOUTHERN DIVISION,
Harrington Evans Broad.

DERBY BOROUGH.
Rt. Hon. Sir William George Gran-Venables Vernon Harcourt, kt.,
Sir Thomas Roe, kt.

DEVON.

EASTERN, or HONITON DIVISION,
Sir John Henry Kennaway, bt.

NORTH-EASTERN, or TIVERTON
DIVISION,
Colonel Sir William Hood Walrond, b
NORTHERN, or SOUTH MOLTON DIVISI
George Lambert.

NORTH-WESTERN, or BARNSTAPLE
DIVISION,
Alfred Billson.

WESTERN, or TAVISTOCK DIVISION
Hugh Courtenay Fownes Luttrell.

SOUTHERN, or TOTNES DIVISION,
Francis Bingham Mildmay.

TORQUAY DIVISION,
Richard Mallock.

MID, or ASHBURTON DIVISION,
Rt. Hon. Charles Seale-Hayne.

DEVONPORT BOROUGH.
Hudson E. Kearley,
Edward J. C. Morton.

—cont.

EXETER BOROUGH.

Sir Henry Stafford Northcote, bt.,

PLYMOUTH BOROUGH.

Edward George Clarke, kt.

William George Pearce, bt.

DORSET.NORTHERN DIVISION,

Kenelm Digby Wingfield-Digby.

EASTERN DIVISION,

Humphrey Napier Sturt.

SOUTHERN DIVISION,

Ernest Brymer.

WESTERN DIVISION,

Richard Farquharson.

DURHAM.JARROW DIVISION,

Charles Mark Palmer, bt.

BOUGHTON-LE-SPRING DIVISION,

Henry Thomas Fenwick.

HESTER-LE-STREET DIVISION,

James Joicey, bt.

NORTH-WESTERN DIVISION,

Allyn Archer Atherley-Jones.

MID DIVISION,

Wilson.

SOUTH-EASTERN DIVISION,

Richardson.

BISHOP AUCKLAND DIVISION,

Mellor Paulton.

BARNARD CASTLE DIVISION,

Joseph Whitwell Pease, bt.

DARLINGTON BOROUGH.

Theodore Fry, bt.

DURHAM BOROUGH.

New A. Fowler.

GATESHEAD BOROUGH.

Allan.

ARTLEPOOLS (THE) BOROUGH.

Christopher Furness.

DURHAM—cont.SOUTH SHIELDS BOROUGH.

James Cochran Stevenson.

STOCKTON BOROUGH.

Thomas Wrightson.

SUNDERLAND BOROUGH.

Samuel Storey,

Edward Temperley Gourley.

ESSEX.SOUTH-WESTERN, or WALTHAMSTOW*DIVISION,

Edmund Widdrington Byrne.

SOUTHERN, or ROMFORD DIVISION,

James Theobald.

WESTERN, or EPPING DIVISION,

Lt.-Col. Amelius Richard Mark Lockwood.

NORTHERN, or SAFFRON WALDENDIVISION,

Herbert Colstoun Gardner.

NORTH-EASTERN, or HARWICH DIVISION,

James Round.

EASTERN, or MALDON DIVISION,

Cyril Joseph Settle Dodd.

MID, or CHELMSFORD DIVISION,

Thomas Usborne.

SOUTH-EASTERN DIVISION,

Major Frederic Carne Rasch.

COLCHESTER BOROUGH.

Captain Herbert S. Naylor Leyland.

WEST HAM BOROUGH.North Division,

Thomas Newcomen Archibald Grove.

South Division,

James Keir-Hardie.

GLOUCESTER.MID, or STROUD DIVISION,

David Brynmor Jones.

NORTHERN, or TEWKESBURY DIVISION,

Sir John Edward Dorington, bt.

EASTERN, or CIRENCESTER DIVISION,

Harry Lawson Webster Lawson.

List of

{COMMONS, 1894}

*Members.GLOUCESTER—cont.*FOREST OF DEAN DIVISION,

Rt. Hon. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke, bt.

SOUTHERN, or THORNBURY DIVISION,

Charles Edward Hungerford Athole Colston.

BRISTOL BOROUGH.West Division,

Rt. Hon. Sir Michael Edward Hicks-Beach, bt.

North Division.

Charles Townsend.

East Division,

Sir Joseph Dodge Weston, kt.

South Division,

Colonel Sir Edward Stock Hill, K.C.B.

CHELTENHAM BOROUGH.

James Tynte Agg-Gardner.

GLOUCESTER BOROUGH.

Thomas Robinson.

HANTS.NORTHERN, or BASINGSTOKE DIVISION.

Arthur Frederick Jeffreys.

WESTERN, or ANDOVER DIVISION,

William Wither Bramston Beach.

EASTERN, or PETERSFIELD DIVISION,

William Wickham.

SOUTHERN, or FAREHAM DIVISION,

General Sir Frederick Wellington John FitzWygram, bt.

NEW FOREST DIVISION,

Hon. John Walter Edward Douglas Scott-Montagu.

CHRISTCHURCH BOROUGH.

Abel Henry Smith.

PORTSMOUTH BOROUGH.

John Baker,

Walter Owen Clough.

SOUTHAMPTON BOROUGH.

Tankerville Chamberlayne,

Sir Francis Henry Evans, K.C.M.G.

WINCHESTER BOROUGH.

William Henry Myers.

HEREFORD.

NORTHERN, or LEOMINSTER DIVISION,
James Rankin.

SOUTHERN, or ROSS DIVISION,

Michael Biddulph.

HEREFORD BOROUGH.

Charles Wallwyn Radcliffe Cook.

HERTFORD.

NORTHERN, or HITCHIN DIVISION,
George Bickersteth Hudson.

EASTERN, or HERTFORD DIVISION,
Abel Smith.

MID, or ST. ALBAN'S DIVISION,
Vicary Gibbs.

WESTERN, or WATFORD DIVISION,
Thomas Frederick Halsey.

HUNTINGDON.

SOUTHERN, or HUNTINGDON DIVISION,
Arthur Hugh Smith-Barry.

NORTHERN, or RAMSEY DIVISION,
Hon. Ailwyn Edward Fellowes.

ISLE OF WIGHT.

Sir Richard Everard Webster, kt.

KENT.

WESTERN, or SEVENOAKS DIVISION,
Henry William Forster.

NORTH-WESTERN, or DARTFORD DIVISION,

Rt. Hon. Sir William Hart Dyke.

SOUTH-WESTERN, or TUNBRIDGE DIVISION,

Arthur S. T. Griffith-Boscawen.

MID, or MEDWAY DIVISION,
Lt.-Col. Charles Edward Warde.

NORTH-EASTERN, or FAVERSHAM DIVISION,

Hon. Herbert Thomas Knollys-Hugessen.

SOUTHERN, or ASHFORD DIVISION,
Laurence Hardy.

IT—cont.

TERN, or ST. AUGUSTINE'S DIVISION,
Hon. Aretas Akers-Douglas.

ISLE OF THANET DIVISION,
Hon. James Lowther.

CANTERBURY BOROUGH.
n Henniker Heaton.

CHATHAM BOROUGH.
onel Lewis Vivian Loyd.

DEPTFORD BOROUGH.
arles John Darling.

DOVER BOROUGH.
orge Wyndham.

GRAVESEND BOROUGH.
nes Dampier Palmer.

GREENWICH BOROUGH.
omas William Boord.

HYTHE BOROUGH.
Edward William Watkin, bt.

LEWISHAM BOROUGH.
in Penn.

MAIDSTONE BOROUGH.
ncis Stanley Wykeham Cornwallis.

ROCHESTER BOROUGH.
scount Cranborne.

WOOLWICH BOROUGH.
lonel Edwin Hughes.

LANCASTER.

North Lancashire.

NORTH LONSDALE DIVISION,
illiam Smith.

LANCASTER DIVISION,
mes Williamson.

BLACKPOOL DIVISION,
. Hon. Sir Matthew White Ridley, bt.

CHORLEY DIVISION,
eut.-General Randle Joseph Feilden,
C.M.G.

North-East Lancashire.

DARWEN DIVISION,
arles Philip Huntington.

LANCASTER—cont.

CLITHEROE DIVISION,
Rt. Hon. Sir Ughtred James Kay-
Shuttleworth, bt.

ACCRINGTON DIVISION,
Joseph Francis Leese.

ROSSENDALE DIVISION,
John Henry Maden.

South-East Lancashire
WESTHOUGHTON DIVISION,
Lord Edward George Villiers Stanley.

HEYWOOD DIVISION,
Thomas Snape.

MIDDLETON DIVISION,
Charles Henry Hopwood.

RADCLIFFE-CUM-FARNWORTH DIVISION,
Robert Leake.

ECCLES DIVISION,
Henry John Roby.

STRETFORD DIVISION,
John William Maclure.

GORTON DIVISION,
William Mather.

PRESTWICH DIVISION,
Robert Gray Cornish Mowbray.

South-West Lancashire.
SOUTHPORT DIVISION,
Hon. George Nathaniel Curzon.

ORMSKIRK DIVISION,
Rt. Hon. Arthur Bower Forwood.

BOOTLE DIVISION,
Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Myles Sandys.

WIDNES DIVISION,
John Saunders Gilliat.

NEWTON DIVISION,
Hon. Thomas Wodehouse Legh.

INCE DIVISION,
Samuel Woods.

LEIGH DIVISION,
Caleb Wright.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE BOROUGH.
John Edmund Wentworth Addison.

List of

{COMMONS, 1894}

Members.

LANCASTER—cont.

BARROW-IN-FURNESS BOROUGH.

Charles William Cayzer.

BLACKBURN BOROUGH.

William Henry Hornby,

William Coddington.

HOLTON BOROUGH.

Herbert Shepherd-Cross,

Colonel Hon. Francis Charles Bridgeman.

BURNLEY BOROUGH.

Hon. Philip James Stanhope.

BURY BOROUGH.

Rt. Hon. Sir Henry James, kt.

LIVERPOOL BOROUGH.

Kirkdale Division,

Sir George Smyth Baden-Powell,
K.C.M.G.

Walton Division,

James Henry Stock.

Everton Division,

John Archibald Willox.

West Derby Division,

Walter Hume Long.

Scotland Division,

Thomas Power O'Connor.

Exchange Division,

Ralph Neville.

Abercromby Division,

William Frederick Lawrence.

East Toxteth Division,

Rt. Hon. Baron Henry de Worms.

West Toxteth Division,

Robert Paterson Houston.

MANCHESTER BOROUGH.

North-West Division,

Sir William Henry Houldsworth, bt.

North Division,

Charles Ernest Schwann.

North-East Division,

Rt. Hon. Sir James Fergusson, bt.,
G.C.S.I.

LANCASTER—cont.

East Division,

Rt. Hon. Arthur James Balfour.

South Division,

Sir Henry Enfield Roscoe, kt.

South-West Division,

Jacob Bright.

OLDHAM BOROUGH.

Joshua Milne Cheetham.

Rt. Hon. Sir John Tomlinson
K.C.B.

PRESTON BOROUGH.

Robert William Hanbury,

William Edward Murray Tomlin-

ROCHDALE BOROUGH.

Thomas Bayley Potter.

SALFORD BOROUGH.

North Division,

William Henry Holland.

West Division,

Lees Knowles.

South Division,

Sir Henry Hoyle Howorth, K.C.

ST. HELENS BOROUGH.

Henry Seton-Karr.

STALYBRIDGE BOROUGH

Tom Harrop Sidebottom.

WARRINGTON BOROUGH

Robert Pierpoint.

WIGAN BOROUGH.

Sir Francis Sharp Powell, bt.

LEICESTER.

EASTERN, or MELTON DIVIS
Marquess of Granby.

MID, or LOUGHBOROUGH DIV
Jabez Edward Johnson-Ferguson

WESTERN, or BOSWORTH DIV
Charles Benjamin Bright McLar

SOUTHERN, or HARBOROUGH D
John William Logan.

LEICESTER BOROUGH.

James Allanson Picton,
Sir James Whitehead, bt.

LINCOLN.

WEST LINDSEY, or GAINSBORO'
DIVISION,

Joseph Bennett.

NORTH LINDSEY, or BRIGG DIVISION,
Samuel Danks Waddy.

EAST LINDSEY, or LOUTH DIVISION,
Robert William Perks.

SOUTH LINDSEY, or HORNCastle
DIVISION,
Lord Willoughby d'Eresby.

NORTH KESTIVEN, or SLEAFORD
DIVISION,
Rt. Hon. Henry Chaplin.

SOUTH KESTIVEN, or STAMFORD
DIVISION,
Henry John Cokayne Cust.

HOLLAND, or SPALDING DIVISION,
Halley Stewart.

BOSTON BOROUGH.
Sir William James Ingram, bt.

GRANTHAM BOROUGH.
Henry Yarde Buller Lopes.

GREAT GRIMSBY BOROUGH.
Rt. Hon. Edward Heneage.

LINCOLN BOROUGH.
William Crosfield.

MIDDLESEX.

ENFIELD DIVISION,
Captain Henry Ferryman Bowles.

TOTTENHAM DIVISION,
Joseph Howard.

HORNSEY DIVISION,
Henry Charles Stephens.

HARROW DIVISION,
William Ambrose.

EALING DIVISION,
Rt. Hon. Lord George Francis Hamilton.

BRENTFORD DIVISION,
James Bigwood.

UXBRIDGE DIVISION,
Sir Frederick Dixon Dixon-Hartland, bt.

MIDDLESEX—cont.

BETHNAL GREEN BOROUGH.

North-East Division,
George Howell.

South-West Division,
Edward Hare Pickersgill.

CHELSEA BOROUGH.
Charles Algernon Whitmore.

FINSBURY BOROUGH.
Holborn Division,
Sir Charles Hall, K.C.M.G.

Central Division,
Dadabhai Naoroji.

East Division,
James Rowlands.

FULHAM BOROUGH.
William Hayes Fisher.

HACKNEY BOROUGH.
North Division,
William Robert Bousfield.

Central Division,
Sir Andrew Richard Scoble, K.C.S.I.

South Division,
Sir Charles Russell, kt.

HAMMERSMITH BOROUGH.
Major-General Walter Tuckfield Goldsworthy.

HAMPSTEAD BOROUGH.
Edward Brodie Hoare.

ISLINGTON BOROUGH.
North Division,
George Christopher Trout Bartley.

West Division,
Thomas Lough.

East Division,
Benjamin Louis Cohen.

South Division,
Sir Albert Kaye Rollit, kt.

KENSINGTON BOROUGH.
North Division,
Frederick Charlwood Frye.

List of

{COMMONS, 1894}

Members.

MIDDLESEX—Kensington Boro'—cont.

South Division,

Sir Algernon Borthwick, bt.

LONDON UNIVERSITY.

Rt. Hon. Sir John Lubbock, bt.

MARYLEBONE BOROUGH.

East Division,

Edmund Boulnois.

West Division,

Sir Frederick Seager Hunt, bt.

PADDINGTON BOROUGH.

North Division,

John Aird.

South Division,

Rt. Hon. Lord Randolph Henry Spencer Churchill.

ST. GEORGE'S, HANOVER SQUARE.

Rt. Hon. George Joachim Goschen.

ST. PANCRAS BOROUGH.

North Division,

Thomas Henry Bolton.

East Division,

Robert Grant Webster.

West Division,

Henry Robert Graham.

South Division,

Sir Julian Goldsmid, bt.

SHOREDITCH BOROUGH.

Hoxton Division,

James Stuart.

Haggerston Division,

William Randal Cremer.

STRAND BOROUGH.

Hon. William Frederick Danvers Smith.

TOWER HAMLETS BOROUGH.

Whitechapel Division,

Samuel Montagu.

St. George's Division,

John Williams Benn.

Limehouse Division,

John Stewart Wallace.

Mile End Division,

Spencer Charrington.

MIDDLESEX—Tower Hamlets Boro' cont.

Stepney Division,

Frederick Wootton Isaacson.

Bow and Bromley Division,

John Archibald Murray Macdonald.

Poplar Division,

Sydney Charles Buxton.

WESTMINSTER BOROUGH.

William Lehmann Ashmead-Bartle
Burdett-Coutts.

LONDON CITY.

Sir Reginald Hanson, bt.,
Alban George Henry Gibbs.

MONMOUTH.

NORTHERN DIVISION,

Thomas Phillips Price.

WESTERN DIVISION,

Cornelius Marshall Warmington.

SOUTHERN DIVISION,

Hon. Frederick Courtenay Morgan.

MONMOUTH BOROUGH.

Albert Spicer.

NORFOLK.

NORTH-WESTERN DIVISION,

Joseph Arch.

SOUTH-WESTERN DIVISION,

Thomas Leigh Hare.

NORTHERN DIVISION,

Herbert Hardy Cozens-Hardy.

EASTERN DIVISION,

Robert John Price.

MID DIVISION,

Clement Higgins.

SOUTHERN DIVISION,

Francis Taylor.

GREAT YARMOUTH BOROUGH.

James Marshall Moorsom.

KING'S LYNN BOROUGH.

Thomas Gibson Bowles.

NORWICH BOROUGH.

Samuel Hoare,
Jeremiah James Colman.

NORTHAMPTON.

NORTHERN DIVISION,
Rt. Hon. Lord Burghley.

EASTERN DIVISION,
Francis Allston Channing.

MID DIVISION,
Hon. Charles Robert Spencer.

SOUTHERN DIVISION,
David Charles Guthrie.

NORTHAMPTON BOROUGH.
Henry Labouchere,
Moses Philip Manfield.

PETERBOROUGH BOROUGH.
Alpheus Cleophas Morton.

NORTHUMBERLAND.

WANSBECK DIVISION,
Charles Fenwick.

TYNESIDE DIVISION,
Joseph Albert Pease.

HEXHAM DIVISION,
Miles Mac Innes.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED DIVISION,
Sir Edward Grey, bt.

MORPETH BOROUGH.
Thomas Burt.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE BOROUGH.
Charles Frederick Hamond,
Rt. Hon. John Morley.

TYNEMOUTH BOROUGH.
Richard Sim Donkin.

NOTTINGHAM.

BASSETLAW DIVISION,
Sir Frederick George Milner, bt.

NEWARK DIVISION,
Viscount Newark.

RUSHCLIFFE DIVISION,
John Edward Ellis.

MANSFIELD DIVISION,
John Carvell Williams.

NOTTINGHAM BOROUGH.
West Division,
Colonel Charles Seely.

East Division,
Rt. Hon. Arnold Morley.

South Division,
Henry Smith Wright.

OXFORD.

NORTHERN, or BANBURY DIVISION,
Sir Bernhard Samuelson, bt.

MID, or WOODSTOCK DIVISION,
Godfrey Rathbone Benson.

SOUTHERN, or HENLEY DIVISION,
Hon. Francis Parker.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY.
Rt. Hon. Sir John Robert Mowbray,
bt., D.C.L.
John Gilbert Talbot, D.C.L.

OXFORD BOROUGH.
General Sir George Tomkyns Chesney,
K.C.B., C.S.I., C.I.E., R.E.

RUTLAND.
George Henry Finch.

SALOP.

WESTERN, or OSWESTRY DIVISION,
Stanley Leighton.

NORTHERN, or NEWPORT DIVISION,
Col. William Slaney Kenyon-Slaney.

MID, or WELLINGTON DIVISION,
Alexander Hargreaves Brown.

SOUTHERN, or LUDLOW DIVISION,
Robert Jasper More.

SHREWSBURY BOROUGH.
Henry David Greene.

SOMERSET.

NORTHERN DIVISION,
Thomas Courtenay Theydon Warner.

WELLS DIVISION,
Colonel Sir Richard Horner Paget, bt.

FROME DIVISION,
John Emmott Barlow.

EASTERN DIVISION,
Henry Hobhouse.

SOUTHERN DIVISION,
Edward Strachey.

BRIDGEWATER DIVISION,
Edward James Stanley.

WESTERN, or WELLINGTON DIVISION,
Capt. Sir A. F. Acland-Hood, bt.

SOMERSET—cont.

BATH BOROUGH.
Colonel Charles Wyndham Murray,
Edmond Robert Wodehouse.

TAUNTON BOROUGH.
Hon. Alfred Percy Allsopp.

STAFFORD.

LEEK DIVISION,
Charles Bill.

BURTON DIVISION,
Sydney Evershed.

WESTERN DIVISION,
Hamar Alfred Bass.

NORTH-WESTERN DIVISION,
James Heath.

LICHFIELD DIVISION,
Major Leonard Darwin.

KINGSWINFORD DIVISION,
Rt. Hon. Alexander Staveley Hill.

HANDSWORTH DIVISION,
Sir Henry Meysey Meysey-Thompson,
bt.

HANLEY BOROUGH.
William Woodall.

NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME BOROUGH.
William Allen.

STAFFORD BOROUGH.
Charles Edward Shaw.

STOKE-UPON-TRENT BOROUGH.
Hon. George Granville Leveson-Gower.

WALSALL BOROUGH.
Sir Arthur Divett Hayter, bt.

WEDNESBURY BOROUGH.
Wilson Lloyd.

WEST BROMWICH BOROUGH.
Ernest Spencer.

WOLVERHAMPTON BOROUGH.
West Division,
Sir Alfred Hickman, kt.

East Division,
Rt. Hon. Henry Hartley Fowler.

South Division,
Rt. Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers.

SUFFOLK.

NORTHERN, or LOWESTOFT DIVISION
Harry Seymour Foster.

NORTH-EASTERN, or EYE DIVISION,
Francis Seymour Stevenson.

NORTH-WESTERN, or STOWMARKET
DIVISION,
Sydney James Stern.

SOUTH, or SUDBURY DIVISION,
William Cuthbert Quilter.

SOUTH-EASTERN, or WOODBRIDGE
DIVISION,
Robert Lacey Everett.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS BOROUGH.
Viscount Chelsea.

IPSWICH BOROUGH.
Sir Charles Dalrymple, bt.,
Lord Elcho.

SURREY.

NORTH-WESTERN, or CHERTSEY
DIVISION,
Charles Harvey Combe.

SOUTH-WESTERN, or GUILDFORD
DIVISION,
Hon. William St. John Fremantle
Brodrick.

SOUTH-EASTERN, or REIGATE DIVISION
Hon. Henry Cubitt.

MID, or EPSOM DIVISION,
Thomas Townsend Bucknill.

KINGSTON DIVISION,
Sir Richard Temple, bt., G.C.S.I.

NORTH-EASTERN, or WIMBLEDON
DIVISION,
Henry Cosmo Orme Bonsor.

BATTERSEA AND CLAPHAM BOROUGH.
Battersea Division,
John Burns.

Clapham Division,
Percy Melville Thornton.

CAMBERWELL BOROUGH.
North Division,
Edward Hodson Bayley.

SURREY—cont.

Peckham Division,
Frederick George Banbury.

Dulwich Division,
Sir John Blundell Maple, kt.

CROYDON BOROUGH.
Hon. Sidney Herbert.

LAMBETH BOROUGH.
North Division,
Francis Moses Coldwells.

Kennington Division,
Mark Hanbury Beaufoy.

Brixton Division,
Marquess of Carmarthen.

Norwood Division,
Charles Ernest Tritton.

NEWINGTON BOROUGH.
West Division,
Captain Cecil William Norton.
Walworth Division,
William Saunders.

SOUTHWARK BOROUGH.
West Division,

Richard Knight Causton.

Rotherhithe Division,
John Cumming Macdona.

Bermondsey Division,
Reuben Vincent Barrow.

WANDSWORTH BOROUGH.
Henry Kimber.

SUSSEX.

NORTH-WESTERN, or HORSHAM DIVISION,
John Heywood Johnstone.

SOUTH-WESTERN, or CHICHESTER
DIVISION,
Rt. Hon. Lord Walter Charles Gordon
Lennox.

NORTHERN, or EAST GRINSTEAD DIVISION,
Hon. Alfred Erskine Gathorne-Hardy.

SUSSEX—cont.

MID, or LEWES DIVISION,
Sir Henry Fletcher, bt.

SOUTHERN, or EASTBOURNE DIVISION,
Admiral Edward Field.

EASTERN, or RYE DIVISION,
Arthur Montagu Brookfield.

BRIGHTON BOROUGH.
Gerald Walter Erskine Loder,
Bruce Canning Vernon-Wentworth.

HASTINGS BOROUGH.
Wilson Noble.

WARWICK.

NORTHERN, or TAMWORTH DIVISION,
Philip Albert Muntz.

NORTH-EASTERN, or NUNEATON DIVI-SION,
Francis Alexander Newdigate.

SOUTH-WESTERN, or STRATFORD-ON-AVON DIVISION,
Algernon Bertram Freeman-Mitford.

SOUTH-EASTERN, or RUGBY DIVISION,
Henry Peyton Cobb.

ASTON MANOR BOROUGH.
Captain George William Grice-Hutchinson.

BIRMINGHAM BOROUGH.
Edgbaston Division,
George Dixon.

West Division,
Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain.

Central Division,
John Albert Bright.

North Division,
William Kenrick.

East Division,
Rt. Hon. Henry Matthews.

Bordesley Division,
Rt. Hon. Jesse Collings.

South Division,
Joseph Powell-Williams.

WARWICK—cont.COVENTRY BOROUGH.

William Henry Walter Ballantine.

WARWICK & LEAMINGTON BOROUGH.

Rt. Hon. Arthur Wellesley Peel.

WESTMORELAND.NORTHERN, or APPLEBY DIVISION,

Sir Joseph Savory, bt.

SOUTHERN, or KENDAL DIVISION,

Captain Josceline FitzRoy Bagot.

WILTS.NORTHERN, or CRICKLADE DIVISION,

John Husband.

NORTH-WESTERN, or CHIPPENHAM
DIVISION,

Sir John Poynder Dickson-Poynder, bt.

WESTERN, or WESTBURY DIVISION,

George Pargiter Fuller.

EASTERN, or DEVIZES DIVISION,

Charles Edward Henry Hobhouse.

SOUTHERN, or WILTON DIVISION,

Viscount Folkestone.

SALISBURY BOROUGH.

Edward Henry Hulce.

WORCESTER.WESTERN, or BEWDLEY DIVISION,

Alfred Baldwin.

SOUTHERN, or EVESHAM DIVISION,

Sir Edmund Anthony Harley Lechmere, bt.

MID, or DROITWICH DIVISION,

Richard Biddulph Martin.

NORTHERN, or OLDBURY DIVISION,

Sir Benjamin Hingley, bt.

EASTERN DIVISION,

Joseph Austen Chamberlain.

DUDLEY BOROUGH.

Brooke Robinson.

KIDDERMINSTER BOROUGH.

Augustus Frederick Godson.

WORCESTER BOROUGH.

Hon. George Higginson Ailsopp.

YORK.North Riding.*THIRSK AND MALTON DIVISION

John Grant Lawson.

RICHMOND DIVISION,

Sir George William Elliot, bt.

CLEVELAND DIVISION,

Henry Fell Pease.

WHITBY DIVISION,

Ernest William Beckett.

East Riding.HOLDERNESSE DIVISION,

Commander George Richard Bethe

BUCKROSE DIVISION,

Angus Holden.

HOWDENSHERE DIVISION,

William Henry Wilson-Todd.

West Riding, Northern PartSKIPTON DIVISION,

Charles Savile Roundell.

KEIGHLEY DIVISION,

Sir Isaac Holden, bt.

SHIPLEY DIVISION,

William Pollard Byles.

SOWERBY DIVISION,

Rt. Hon. John William Mellor.

ELLAND DIVISION,

Thomas Wayman.

West Riding, Southern PartMORLEY DIVISION,

Alfred Eddison Hutton.

NORMANTON DIVISION,

Benjamin Pickard.

COLNE VALLEY DIVISION,

Sir James Kitson, bt.

HOLMFIRTH DIVISION,

Henry Joseph Wilson.

BARNSELY DIVISION,

Earl Compton.

HALLAMSHIRE DIVISION,

Sir Frederick Thorpe Mappin, bt.

cont.

ROTHERHAM DIVISION,
Arthur Herbert Dyke Acland.

DONCASTER DIVISION,
James Fleming.

West Riding, Eastern Part.

RIPON DIVISION,
Sydney Wharton.

OTLEY DIVISION,
Francis.

MARKSTON ASH DIVISION,
Robert Gunter.

OSGOLDCROSS DIVISION,
John Austin.

PUDSEY DIVISION,
John Priestley.

PEN VALLEY DIVISION,
Palmer Whittaker.

BRADFORD BOROUGH.

West Division.
William Lillingworth.

Central Division,
George Shaw-Lefevre.

East Division,
Sproston Caine.

DEWSBURY BOROUGH.
John Lloyd.

HALIFAX BOROUGH.
Rawson Shaw.

James Stansfeld.

WIDDERSFIELD BOROUGH.
John Crosland, kt.

STON-UPON-HULL BOROUGH.

East Division,
Smith.

Central Division,
John Seymour King, K.C.S.I.

West Division,
Henry Wilson.

LEEDS BOROUGH.

North Division,
William Lawies Jackson.

YORK—cont.

Central Division,
Gerald William Balfour.

East Division,
Lawrence Gane.

West Division,
Vacant, on the Rt. Hon. Herbert John Gladstone being appointed First Commissioner of Works.

South Division,
John Lawson Walton.

MIDDLESBROUGH BOROUGH.
Joseph Havelock Wilson.

PONTEFRACT BOROUGH.
Thomas Willans Nussey.

SCARBOROUGH BOROUGH.
Sir George Reresby Sitwell, bt.

SHEFFIELD BOROUGH.
Attercliffe Division,

Hon. Bernard John Seymour Coleridge.

Brightside Division,
Rt. Hon. Anthony John Mundella.

Central Division,
Col. Charles Edward Howard Vincent,
C.B.

Hallam Division,
Charles Beilby Stuart-Wortley.

Ecclesall Division,
Sir Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett, kt.

WAKEFIELD BOROUGH.
Col. Albany Hawkes Charlesworth.

YORK BOROUGH.
John George Butcher,
Frank Lockwood.

WALES.

ANGLESEY.

Thomas Lewis.

BRECKNOCK.

William Fuller Maitland.

CARDIGAN.

William Bowen Fowlands.

CARMARTHEN.

EASTERN DIVISION,
Abel Thomas.

WESTERN DIVISION,
John Lloyd Morgan.

CARMARTHEN BOROUGH.
Major Evan Rowland Jones.

CARNARVON.

SOUTHERN, or EIFION DIVISION,
John Bryn Roberts.

NORTHERN, or ARFON DIVISION,
William Rathbone.

CARNARVON BOROUGH.
David Lloyd-George.

DENBIGH.

EASTERN DIVISION,
Rt. Hon. George Osborne Morgan.

WESTERN DIVISION,
John Herbert Roberts.

DENBIGH BOROUGH.
Hon. George Thomas Kenyon.

FLINT.

Samuel Smith.

FLINT BOROUGH.
John Herbert Lewis.

GLAMORGAN.

EASTERN DIVISION,
Alfred Thomas.

RHONDDA DIVISION,
William Abraham.

WESTERN, or GOWER DIVISION,
David Randall.

MID DIVISION,
Samuel Thomas Evans.

SOUTHERN DIVISION,
Arthur John Williams.

CARDIFF BOROUGH.
Sir Edward James Reed, K.C.B.

MERTHYR TYDWIL BOROUGH.
David Alfred Thomas,
William Pritchard Morgan.

SWANSEA BOROUGH

Swansea, Town,
Robert John Dickson Burnie.
Swansea, District,
William Williams.

MERIONETH.

Thomas Edward Ellis.

MONTGOMERY.

Stuart Rendel.

MONTGOMERY BOROUGH
Sir Pryce Pryce-Jones, kt.

PEMBROKE.

William Rees Davies.

PEMBROKE AND HAVERFORD BOROUGH.
Charles Francis Egerton Allen.

RADNOR.

Frank Edwards.

SCOTLAND.

ABERDEEN.

EASTERN DIVISION,
Thomas Ryburn Buchanan.

WESTERN DIVISION,
Dr. Robert Farquharson.

ABERDEEN BURG.
North Division,
William Alexander Hunter.

South Division,
Rt. Hon. James Bryce.

ARGYLL.

Sir Donald Horne Macfarlane,

AYR.

NORTHERN DIVISION,
Hon. Thomas Horatio Arthu
Cochrane.

SOUTHERN DIVISION,
Eugene Wason.

AYR DISTRICT OF BUR
William Birkmyre.

KILMARNOCK DISTRICT OF B
Stephen Williamson.

BANFF.

William Wedderburn, bt.

BERWICK.

at, on the Right Hon. Edward Mar-banks succeeding to the Peerage.

BUTE.

ow Graham Murray.

CAITHNESS.

avin Brown Clark.

VICK DISTRICT OF BURGHS.

ohn Pender, G.C.M.G.

CKMANNAN AND KINROSS.

on. John Blair Balfour.

DUMBARTON.

in John Sinclair.

DUMFRIES.

am Jardine Maxwell.

MFRIES DISTRICT OF BURGHS.

t Threshie Reid.

DINBURGH (MID-LOTHIAN).

on. William Ewart Gladstone.

EBINBURGH BURGHS.East Division,

t Wallace.

West Division,

unt Wolmer.

Central Division,

am M'Ewan.

South Division,

ort Woodfield Paul.

BURGHS AND ST. ANDREWS UNI-VERSITIES.

on. Sir Charles John Pearson, kt.

BEITH DISTRICT OF BURGHS.

at, on Ronald Crawford Munroguson being appointed a Lord of Treasury.

ELGIN AND NAIRN.

Seymour Keay.

ELGIN DISTRICT OF BURGHS.

nder Asher.

FIFE.EASTERN DIVISION,

Rt. Hon. Herbert Henry Asquith.

WESTERN DIVISION,

Augustine Birrell.

KIRKCALDY DISTRICT OF BURGHS.

James Henry Dalziel.

ST. ANDREWS DISTRICT OF BURGHS.

Henry Torrens Anstruther.

FORFAR.

Sir John Rigby, kt.

DUNDEE BURGHS.

Sir John Leng, kt.

Edmund Robertson.

MONTROSE DISTRICT OF BURGHS.

John Shiress Will.

HADDINGTON.

Richard Burdon Haldane.

INVERNESS.

Dr. Donald Macgregor.

INVERNESS DISTRICT OF BURGHS.

Gilbert Beith.

KINCARDINE.

John William Crombie.

KIRKCUDBRIGHT.

Sir Mark John Stewart, bt.

LANARK.GOVAN DIVISION,

John Wilson.

PARTICK DIVISION,

James Parker Smith.

NORTH-WESTERN DIVISION,

Graeme Alexander Lockhart Whitelaw.

NORTH-EASTERN DIVISION,

Donald Crawford.

MID DIVISION,

John Wynford Philipps.

SOUTHERN DIVISION,

James Henry Cecil Hozier.

List of

{COMMONS, 1894}

Members.

LANARK—cont.

GLASGOW BOROUGH.

Bridgeton Division,

Rt. Hon. Sir George Otto Trevelyan, bt.

Camlachie Division,

Alexander Cross.

St. Rollox Division,

Sir James Morse Carmichael, bt.

Central Division,

John George Alexander Baird.

College Division,

Sir Charles Cameron, kt.

Tradeston Division,

Archibald Cameron Corbett.

Blackfriars and Hutchesontown Division,

Andrew Dryburgh Provand.

GLASGOW AND ABERDEEN UNIVERSITIES.

James Alexander Campbell.

LINLITHGOW.

Captain Thomas Hope.

ORKNEY AND SHETLAND.

Sir Leonard Lyell, bt.

PEEBLES AND SELKIRK.

Walter Thorburn.

PERTH.

EASTERN DIVISION,

Sir John George Smyth Kinloch, bt.

WESTERN DIVISION,

Sir Donald Currie, K.C.M.G.

PERTH BURGH.

William Whitelaw.

RENFREW.

EASTERN DIVISION,

Michael Hugh Shaw-Stewart.

WESTERN DIVISION,

Charles Bine Renshaw.

GREENOCK BURGH.

Sir Thomas Sutherland, K.C.M.G.

PAISLEY BURGH.

William Dunn.

ROSS AND CROMARTY

James Galloway Weir.

ROXBURGH.

Hon. Mark Francis Napier.

HAWICK DISTRICT OF BURGH.

Thomas Shaw.

STIRLING.

William Jack.

FALKIRK DISTRICT OF BURGH.

Harry Smith.

STIRLING DISTRICT OF BURGH.

Rt. Hon. Henry Campbell-Baird.

SUTHERLAND.

Angus Sutherland.

WIGTON.

Sir Herbert Eustace Maxwell, 1

IRELAND.

ANTRIM.

NORTH ANTRIM DIVISION.

Charles Cunningham Connor.

MID ANTRIM DIVISION.

Hon. Robert Torrens O'Neill.

EAST ANTRIM DIVISION.

Captain James Martin M'Callum.

SOUTH ANTRIM DIVISION.

William Grey Ellison Macartney.

BELFAST BOROUGH.

North Belfast Division.

Sir Edward James Harland, bt.

East Belfast Division.

Gustav Wilhelm Wolff.

South Belfast Division.

William Johnston.

West Belfast Division.

Hugh Oakeley Arnold-Forster.

st of

{COMMONS, 1894}

Members.

ARMAGH.

ARMAGH DIVISION,
d James Saunderson.

ARMAGH DIVISION,
et Barton.

ARMAGH DIVISION,
igh.

CARLOW.

id.

CAVAN.

CAVAN DIVISION,
cis Vesey Knox.

CAVAN DIVISION,
5.

CLARE.

CLARE DIVISION,
r Kearney Redmond.

CLARE DIVISION,
rt Maguire.

CORK.

H CORK DIVISION,
opher Flynn.

EAST CORK DIVISION,
ham.

CORK DIVISION,
Kearns Deane Tanuer.

r CORK DIVISION,
ony John Charles Donelan.

r CORK DIVISION,
ly.

H CORK DIVISION,
y.

EAST CORK DIVISION,
mins.

CORK CITY.

ien,
ly.

DONEGAL.

NORTH DONEGAL DIVISION,
John Mains.

WEST DONEGAL DIVISION,
Timothy Daniel Sullivan.

EAST DONEGAL DIVISION,
Arthur O'Connor.

SOUTH DONEGAL DIVISION,
John Gordon Swift Mac Neill.

DOWN.

NORTH DOWN DIVISION,
Colonel Thomas Waring.

EAST DOWN DIVISION,
James Alexander Rentoul.

WEST DOWN DIVISION,
Rt. Hon. Lord Arthur William Hill.

SOUTH DOWN DIVISION,
Michael M'Cartan.

NEWRY BOROUGH.

Patrick George Hamilton Carvill.

DUBLIN.

NORTH DUBLIN DIVISION,
John Joseph Clancy.

SOUTH DUBLIN DIVISION,
Hon. Horace Curzon Plunkett.

DUBLIN CITY.

College Green Division,
Dr. Joseph Edward Kenny.

Harbour Division,
Timothy Charles Harrington.

St. Stephen's Green Division,
William Kenny.

St. Patrick's Division,
William Field.

DUBLIN UNIVERSITY.

Rt. Hon. David Robert Plunket.
Edward Carson.

FERMANAGH.

NORTH FERMANAGH DIVISION,
Richard Martin Dane.

SOUTH FERMANAGH DIVISION,
Patrick M'Gilligan.

List of

{COMMONS, 1894}

*Members.GALWAY.

CONNEMARA DIVISION,
Patrick James Foley.

NORTH GALWAY DIVISION,
Colonel John Philip Nolan.

EAST GALWAY DIVISION,
John Roche.

SOUTH GALWAY DIVISION,
David Sheehy.

GALWAY TOWN.
John Pinkerton.

KERRY.

NORTH KERRY DIVISION,
Thomas Sexton.

WEST KERRY DIVISION,
Sir Thomas Henry Grattan Esmonde, bt.

SOUTH KERRY DIVISION,
Denis Kilbride.

EAST KERRY DIVISION,
Jeremiah Daniel Sheehan.

KILDARE.

NORTH KILDARE DIVISION,
Patrick James Kennedy.

SOUTH KILDARE DIVISION,
Matthew J. Minch.

KILKENNY.

NORTH KILKENNY DIVISION,
Patrick McDermott.

SOUTH KILKENNY DIVISION,
Patrick Alexander Chance.

KILKENNY CITY.
Thomas Bartholomew Curran.

KING'S COUNTY.

BIRR DIVISION,
Bernard Charles Molloy.

TULLAMORE DIVISION,
Dr. Joseph Francis Fox.

LEITRIM.

NORTH LEITRIM DIVISION,
Patrick Aloysius M'Hugh.

SOUTH LEITRIM DIVISION,
Jasper Tully.

LIMERICK.

WEST LIMERICK DIVISION,
Michael Austin.

EAST LIMERICK DIVISION,
John Finucane.

LIMERICK CITY.

Francis Arthur O'Keeffe.

LONDONDERRY.

NORTH DERRY DIVISION,
Henry Lyle Mulholland.

SOUTH DERRY DIVISION,
Sir Thomas Lea, bt.

LONDONDERRY CITY.
John Ross.

LONGFORD.

NORTH LONGFORD DIVISION,
Justin McCarthy.

SOUTH LONGFORD DIVISION,
Edward Blake.

LOUTH.

NORTH LOUTH DIVISION,
Timothy Michael Healy.

SOUTH LOUTH DIVISION,
Dr. Daniel Ambrose.

MAYO.

NORTH MAYO DIVISION,
Daniel Crilly.

WEST MAYO DIVISION,
Robert Ambrose.

EAST MAYO DIVISION,
John Dillon.

SOUTH MAYO DIVISION,
James Francis Xavier O'Brien.

MEATH.

NORTH MEATH DIVISION,
James Gibney.

SOUTH MEATH DIVISION,
Jeremiah Jordan.

MONAGHAN.

NORTH MONAGHAN DIVISION,
Charles Diamond.

SOUTH MONAGHAN DIVISION,
Florence O'Driscoll.

QUEEN'S COUNTY.

OSSORY DIVISION,
Eugene Crean.

LEIX DIVISION,
Mr. Mark Antony MacDonnell.

ROSCOMMON.

NORTH ROSCOMMON DIVISION,
Matthew McDonnell Bodkin.

SOUTH ROSCOMMON DIVISION,
John Patrick Hayden.

SLIGO.

NORTH SLIGO DIVISION,
Bernard Collery.

SOUTH SLIGO DIVISION,
Thomas Curran.

TIPPERARY.

NORTH TIPPERARY DIVISION,
Patrick Joseph O'Brien.

MID TIPPERARY DIVISION,
James Francis Hogan.

SOUTH TIPPERARY DIVISION,
Francis Mandeville.

EAST TIPPERARY DIVISION,
Thomas Joseph Condon.

TYRONE.

NORTH TYRONE DIVISION,
Mr. Frederick Spencer Hamilton.

TYRONE—cont.

MID TYRONE DIVISION,
Matthew Joseph Kenny.

EAST TYRONE DIVISION,
William James Reynolds.

SOUTH TYRONE DIVISION,
Thomas Wallace Russell.

WATERFORD.

WEST WATERFORD DIVISION,
Alfred Webb.

EAST WATERFORD DIVISION,
Patrick Joseph Power.

WATERFORD CITY.

John Edward Redmond.

WESTMEATH.

NORTH WESTMEATH DIVISION,
James Tuite.

SOUTH WESTMEATH DIVISION,
Donal Sullivan.

WEXFORD.

NORTH WEXFORD DIVISION,
Thomas Joseph Healy.

SOUTH WEXFORD DIVISION,
Peter French.

WICKLOW.

WEST WICKLOW DIVISION,
James O'Connor.

EAST WICKLOW DIVISION,
John Sweetman.

APPENDIX I.

MEMORANDUM OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

RELATING TO

THE ARMY ESTIMATES, 1894-95.

Presented to both Houses of Parliament by Command of Her Majesty, March, 1894.

THE Estimates for the year 1893-94, with the Ordnance Factories Vote, amounted to £17,802,900; those for the year 1894-95 stand at £18,081,000, the increase being £278,100.

With reference to the statement in the Memorandum presented with last year's estimates, that measures had been adopted to equalise the number of battalions at home and abroad, I regret to say that circumstances have not yet admitted of a reduction of the force in Egypt sufficient to effect this most desirable result.

I have again to report most satisfactory progress in recruiting for the Army. The Establishments were so full at the commencement of the year 1893 that it was found possible for a time to dispense with the enlistment of "specials," and the standard for enlistment in the Foot Guards was raised to 5 feet 9 inches.

The total number of Effectives (including India) on 1st January, 1894, was 19,400, being 2,301 in excess of Establishment.

Vote 1 shows an increase of £104,937. This is mainly due to—

1. Certain small increases of Establishment, including 93 additional men to the Royal Engineers for Ordnance Survey work, and the additional large depôts required for four regiments having both battalions abroad. This, including the additional provision required for the increased number of Effectives, accounts for about £30,000 in this Vote.
2. The growth of the 1st Class Army Reserve, which stood at 80,349 on the 1st January, 1894, as against 76,595 on 1st January, 1893. The sum taken in the Estimates for the current year has fallen short of the expenditure by about £16,000. The additional sum provided for 1894-95 amounts to £57,260.

3. Increased provision for wages. This is mainly for the pay of Barrack Wardens, who, under a recent scheme, will be selected from non-commissioned officers in receipt of pension. As they will receive a rate of pay including their pension this increased charge will be partially met by a saving under the Non-Effective Votes.

Provision has been made to enable a larger number of men than usual of the 1st Class Army Reserve to carry out a limited period of drill in 1894-95. It is proposed to call out for a period of three days' training, or 12 drills, all men who will enter on the 10th year of their army service between the 1st April, 1894, and the 31st March, 1895, with a view to their instruction in the use of the magazine rifle. The drills will be arranged so as to preclude as far as possible interference with the men's civil employment.

The recruiting for the Militia has been brisker than was anticipated when the current year's Estimates were framed. This has caused a deficiency on this year's Votes, and an increased sum of £40,000 will be required for 1894-95.

As regards the Volunteers, the number of efficient is still growing, and this fact, coupled with a largely increased attendance at Brigade Camps, requires a further provision of £18,000. New Regulations as regards musketry requirements for the Volunteers have been approved, which will come into operation on the 1st November next; it is hoped that as a result the shooting throughout the whole force will be improved.

The Vote for Supplies shows the large increase of £109,800. This is mainly due to the great rise in the price of hay on account of the long drought of last summer; coal also has gone up in price, and fuller provision has to be made for the rations of the Regular Forces and the Militia on account of the Establishments being so full.

The Clothing Vote stands at almost the same figure as last year. This Vote includes provision for the initial cost of the new scheme by which the soldier will be allowed to retain his part-worn clothing, and to receive compensation with fewer restrictions than before. Beneficial results are anticipated from the change, and in a few years, when the new system is in full force, there will be no increased expenditure over that entailed under the old Regulations.

The Vote for Warlike Stores shows a decrease of £20,400. Large supplies of magazine rifles for the Infantry have been received. At the factories the work of the year will be mainly devoted to arming the forces which carry the carbine, though considerable deliveries of the Infantry arm will continue to be made throughout the year by the contractors. On the other hand, owing to the extensive building under the Barracks Act of 1890, it has been found necessary to make large increased provision for barrack and other stores for properly fitting out the new barracks.

The increase of £43,000 on the Works Vote is solely due to the annuity that has to be provided in repayment of the sums borrowed during 1893 under the Barracks Act of 1890. These annuities will necessarily increase until the year 1910, by which date the liability has to be discharged. There remains to be raised a sum of about £2,300,000.

I am glad to say that the expenditure on the Non-Effective Votes as a whole shows a net reduction of £30,000 as compared with 1893-94. As the sum taken provides for concessions made to the old campaigners, and to the men living abroad who desire to commute their pensions, and also to civil employés in the factories and other departments, it may be hoped that the high-water mark has now been passed in regard to this class of expenditure.

H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN.

12th March, 1894.

APPENDIX II.

STATEMENT OF FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY

EXPLANATORY OF

THE NAVY ESTIMATES, 1894-95.

Presented to both Houses of Parliament by Command of Her Majesty.

THE Navy Estimates for 1894-95 amount to a net total of £17,366,100, or £3,126,000 more than the sum voted for 1893-94.

This large increase is due chiefly to Shipbuilding, Armaments, Manning, Victualling, New Works, and Royal Naval Reserves.

In 1893-94 the net estimate of the numbers of Officers, Seamen, Boys, Coast-guard, and Royal Marines was 76,700. A force of 83,400 is proposed for 1894-95, being an increase of 6,700. Part of this increase (about 1,600) is automatic, and arises as the boys from the training ships (3,700 of whom are entered annually) are drafted into the Service.

We propose to enter 800 Seamen direct from the Mercantile Marine and other sources in order to meet present wants, and to meet the objections, in case of war, of having to fall back on too large a number of our Reserves. The proportion which the number of men on the permanent list should bear to the number of Reserve men available has been carefully settled, and it is in order to secure the proper number of more experienced men that we make the present proposals.

It is essential to the efficiency of the Fleet that the number of the Engine-room Artificers should be increased, and it is proposed to add 350 to the numbers of this class. The increase desired in the number of Stokers amounts to 2,450. During the present financial year we shall have entered the full number provided for in the Estimates of 1893-94. The men seem likely to be an extremely satisfactory and valuable addition to the crews of our ships.

It is proposed to repeat the increase of 500 made last year in the Royal Marines, which will bring up the total to 15,500—a number necessary for the requirements of our present Fleet, and the efficiency of the Corps.

The number of ships in commission has not been largely increased. The Mediterranean Fleet has received an addition of two cruisers and a torpedo gunboat.

The increased number of first-class battleships and large cruisers now maintained in commission afloat leads to greater demands than previously upon supply of seamen, while for ships in the Fleet Reserve skeleton crews are not to render them ready for service within a few hours of mobilisation. This all but important condition of service involves the necessity of having a larger number of men of various classes immediately available. The new torpedo-boat destroyer now being built will also involve a considerable increase, particularly in the engine room ratings.

NEW CONSTRUCTION.

SHIPBUILDING UNDER NAVAL DEFENCE ACT, 1893-94.

The progress made in the advancement and completion of ships building under the Naval Defence Act has fully realised the anticipations of my Statement of last year.

Of the ten first-class battleships, seven will be in commission, and the R. Oak, Repulse, and Revenge will be ready for service in April, 1894.

Of the 42 cruisers, only five of the Astræa, or second-class, which are advanced, will remain unfinished. Ten will be in commission.

Of torpedo gunboats of the Halcyon class, three or four only remain to be completed.

It is estimated that most of the vessels not yet finished will be ready available for service early in the next financial year. In one or two cases, to secure continuity of employment for the workmen in the Dockyards, there will be a long period given for completion. The estimated expenditure to complete the ships built under the Naval Defence Act will be about £292,000.

In order to complete so many battleships and cruisers within a limited period great exertions have had to be made, but the difficulties involved have been overcome by the energy and ability of those employed in the Royal Dockyards, particularly at Portsmouth.

OTHER SHIPBUILDING IN 1893-94.

Battleships.

The battleship Renown, laid down at Pembroke in 1892-93, has been considerably advanced.

The first-class battleships Majestic and Magnificent were begun during 1893-94 at Portsmouth and Chatham respectively. Owing to the expediency of postponing their commencement until all the circumstances connected with the construction of the Victoria had been thoroughly considered by the Admiralty, definite orders to commence the construction of these two vessels were not given to the Dockyards until late in 1893; it became, therefore, impossible to expend upon them during the financial year the full amounts for labour which had been inserted in the Estimates. Both vessels are, however, now being rapidly advanced.

Cruisers, &c.

The first-class cruisers, Powerful and Terrible, were commenced by contract at the Naval Construction Co.'s works at Barrow, and at Messrs. Thompson's works on the Clyde. The preparation of the design of these vessels has involved many new problems in regard to armament, protection, and propelling machinery. They have been solved in a manner which increases the fighting efficiency of the ships; but, owing to the time necessarily taken to decide these preliminary questions, it was not possible to give orders for either ship until a later period in the financial year than had been hoped. The orders were given at the end of December, and the work of construction is now being pushed forward.

Three second-class cruisers, the Eclipse, Minerva, and Talbot (sister ship to the Minerva) were laid down at Portsmouth, Chatham, and Devonport respectively, and a fourth sum was allotted for expenditure on these vessels when it was perceived that there must be unavoidable delay in commencing the battleships.

Two sloops, the Torch and Alert, were also begun during the year at Sheerness.

The principal particulars of the designs of the Talbot class and of the sloops were given in the Appendix to the Estimates for 1893-94. Corresponding information relating to the Majestic and Magnificent and the first-class cruisers Powerful and Terrible was given in Papers presented to Parliament in August, 1893.

In a few particulars the dimensions given in these Parliamentary Papers have been slightly modified in the completed designs. The actual dimensions appear in the Appendix to the Navy Estimates for 1894-95.

Torpedo-boat Destroyers.

The development of this important class of vessel has received special attention during the year, and statements have been given to Parliament of the action taken by the Admiralty.

The original intentions have been greatly exceeded. The first vessel of the class completed, the Havock, built by Messrs. Yarrow, has been tried with very satisfactory results. The vessels first begun by Messrs. Thornycroft and Messrs. Laird are now making their preliminary steam trials.

Forty-two vessels of this class have been ordered by contract, of which six will be completed by the 31st March.

Leading firms of builders on the Thames, Clyde, Tyne, Wear, Mersey, at Hull, Barrow-in-Furness, and Cowes, are occupied in building these vessels.

It has been made a condition in these contracts that the vessels shall be completed in the coming financial year.

NEW PROGRAMME, 1894-95.

In the coming financial year it is proposed to commence seven battleships of the first-class, six cruisers of the second-class, and two sloops.

Battleships.

The main features of the new battleships will follow generally the designs of the Majestic and Magnificent.

It is proposed to build five of the battleships in Dockyards, two at Portsmouth, two at Chatham, and one at Pembroke.

On the first of the vessels to be built at Portsmouth and Chatham and on the battleship at Pembroke it is proposed to make substantial progress during the year; on the second vessels to be built at Portsmouth and Chatham it is proposed to incur only a moderate expenditure, sufficient to open out the work so that in the following year the vessels may be rapidly advanced.

Two of the battleships will be built by contract.

Cruisers, &c.

The six second-class cruisers will be of the Talbot type, and will be built by contract.

It is proposed to build at Devonport two twin-screw sloops. These vessels are specially adapted for service on the China station, and will take the place of gun-boats like the Swift and Linnet. Their machinery and boilers will be made at Devonport.

Summary.

It will thus be seen that independently of the vessels completing under Naval Defence Act, and of six torpedo-boat destroyers which are almost or quite complete, we shall have building :—

In the Dockyards—

Eight first-class battleships.
Three second-class cruisers.
Four sloops.

In private yards—

Two first-class battleships.
Two first-class cruisers.
Six second-class cruisers.
36 torpedo-boat destroyers.

The new scheme of construction for 1894-95 forms part of a complete programme which has been arranged for a term of five years. This Programme been settled after a careful review, not only of the present relative strength of Navy as compared with that of other Powers, but also of the number and class of ships of war which are now being built abroad.

The distribution of the shipbuilding work contemplated has been made to the convenience of building in Dockyards and by private firms, and embracing various types of cruisers as well as battleships. As battleships require long periods for construction than cruisers they must be laid down in the earlier years while cruisers of various types will be built in the later years of the period covered by the Programme.

RECONSTRUCTION AND REPAIRS.

The repair and refit of the Warspite, Agincourt, Rambler, Cruiser, Pyrites will have been completed, and that of the Northumberland will be advanced by the end of the year.

The repair of the Howe is a remarkable work, both on account of the difficulties connected with it, and the rapidity with which it was carried out, and reflecting great credit on all those who were concerned in it.

The Howe grounded off Ferrol on the 2nd November last. A Swedish sailing firm contracted to save her, and after overcoming extraordinary difficulties succeeded in floating her on the 30th March. She was then docked at Ferrol where the Spanish Authorities gave the readiest assistance to the Admiralty Officers, and Dockyard officials in charge of her. She was at once temporarily repaired, and safely reached the Nore on the 22nd and Chatham on the 26th June.

The serious damages which she had sustained were energetically taken in hand there, and in four months, at a cost of £45,000, she was repaired, and was recommissioned on the 31st October, and is now one of the Mediterranean Fleet.

The reconstruction of the Devastation has been completed during 1893-94. The Monarch will be completed in 1894-95, and the Sultan in 1895.

The repair of the Dreadnought, Imperieuse, Phaeton, Cordelia, and Co will be commenced and completed in 1894-95, and that of the Warrior, Conqueror, and Carysfort advanced during the year.

DOCKYARD ADMINISTRATION.

During last year important modifications have been made in the pay of workmen employed in the Dockyards. Certain changes made in 1891 had caused dissatisfaction, the causes of which demanded careful investigation.

Inquiries were conducted at the Yards by the Financial Secretary and the Lord, and were followed by the consideration of the more important questions

Departmental Committee. The final decisions of the Admiralty have been embodied in two Returns, which have been laid before the House of Commons, and the second of which will be shortly published. These Returns show the various changes made, which include the raising of the wages of unskilled labourers and of various other trades, and the abolition of the system of "classification" in the case of shipwrights and five other trades for whom it had been introduced in 1891.

BOILERS AND MACHINERY.

During the year 1893-94 a large number of ships have passed satisfactorily through their contract steam trials. They included eight battleships, six first-class cruisers, three second-class cruisers, eight torpedo gunboats, and the torpedo-boat destroyer "Havock."

The Devastation has been re-engined and fitted with boilers of the common combustion chamber type. The tubes being fitted with the Admiralty cap ferrules enabled the trials to be accomplished satisfactorily. The fitting of these ferrules has been extended in the boilers of H.M. ships with satisfactory results.

In connection with the propelling apparatus of the Powerful and Terrible it became necessary to decide whether, in view of the very high sea speed for which the vessels are designed, and the great power required for the attainment of that speed, a new departure should not be made, and boilers on the "water-tube" principle adopted.

After full inquiry into the experience gained in recent wars with water-tube boilers fitted in sea-going ships, it was decided to adopt a type which has proved successful on a large scale and over long voyages.

These boilers will be made in this country, and the orders for the machinery have been placed with two of the most eminent private firms, whose competency for the task they have undertaken is undoubted.

The Speedy is the first ship in the Navy fitted with a group of water-tube boilers. They are of the Thornycroft type and with engines by Messrs. Thornycroft and Co. She accomplished over 4,700 I.H.P., the contract being 4,500.

Water-tube boilers, of English design and manufacture, have been or are being fitted in a number of torpedo-boat destroyers now in course of construction, and those that have been tested have given the most promising results.

The torpedo-boat destroyer Hornet, engined by Messrs. Yarrow and Co., is fitted with a set of the Yarrow patent water-tube boilers, and her preliminary trials have given very promising results, her speed having exceeded that of the sister vessel, the Havock, the first of her class, which is fitted with locomotive boilers.

ARMOUR PLATE EXPERIMENTS.

The past year has been remarkable for the results obtained from experiments conducted with steel armour treated by the "Harvey" process.

Armour plates supplied by four firms have been tested, by and for the Admiralty. The investigation has been most thorough and extensive, and, as a result, orders have been given for Harveyed steel armour for the Renown, Majestic, and Magnificent.

In the course of the experiments the use of nickel as an alloy of steel for the purposes of armour-plates has been fully tested.

It has been established that Harveyed plates without nickel in the steel show resistance to modern projectiles as great as any hitherto obtained when nickel was combined with steel in plates also treated by the Harvey process. The consequence of adopting this new system will be a great saving in cost for a given defence.

By means of these improvements the power of defence obtainable with certain thicknesses and weights of armour has been very greatly increased, and this circumstance must considerably affect the designs of battleships to be laid down in the future.

NAVAL ORDNANCE.

The progress of gun manufacture has been very satisfactory this year, and the guns are ready for all the ships arming or about to be armed under the Naval Defence Act ; 298 guns have been completed, varying from 16·25-inch to 4·7-inch, the greater number being of the 6-inch quick-firing type, of which 169 are ready, and most of them mounted.

The gunnery trials of the Centurion, with a new description of high-angle fire mountings fitted with complete hand-worked arrangements, were recently carried out, and were very satisfactory. In her sister ship, the Barfleur, electricity will be tried for the first time for facilitating the working of the guns.

The first of the new 12-inch steel and wire guns alluded to in my Statement for 1893-94 has been completed and proved ; it has fully realised the expectations of its designers (the Royal Gun Factory, Woolwich), and it is now with the Ordnance Committee for experiment to ascertain the best form of chamber and rifling to be used with cordite. Five more of these guns are in an advanced stage of construction.

The new 4-inch quick-firing gun has been completed, and it has been very favourably reported on by the Ordnance Committee, and the design is now sealed for future manufacture. The same may be said of the 12-pr. quick-firing ship gun, of which a large number have been ordered for the torpedo-boat destroyers.

Cordite has been approved and adopted as a Service store, and for the quick-firing guns of 6 inches and below may no longer be considered as experimental. For guns of this class it is being issued as fast as manufactured. For the heavier guns it is still under experiment.

The re-arming of the Fleet with the magazine rifle will commence during the financial year 1894-95.

NEW WORKS, &c.

Of the large works in progress, the construction of the two new docks at Portsmouth is proceeding by contract, and is well advanced.

The extension of the Admiralty mole at Gibraltar was commenced last year, and this portion of the work, when completed, will increase the length of the mole to 2,100 feet.

At Portland Harbour the new coaling station will be finished in 1894-95, as well as works which were undertaken subsequently to the preparation of the Estimates of 1893-94 for protecting the eastern side of the harbour.

The Naval Depot which the New South Wales Government is constructing on Garden Island, Sydney, for the Admiralty, in exchange for the depot on the mainland, is expected to be completed and handed over next year.

For 1894-95 it is proposed to obtain the sanction of Parliament to the commencement of several large works, which not only increase the year's Estimates by £270,000 over the Estimates of 1893-4, but will involve heavy future liabilities.

The increase of our ships in size and number necessitates an increase of dock accommodation, and the development of modern naval warfare makes it necessary to find additional anchorage for our fleets, where they will not be exposed to the danger of torpedo attack.

With this in view, works have been begun, and are advanced, for protecting Portsmouth and Portland harbours, and preparations are being made for similar works at Devonport and Southampton Water.

The necessity for protection from torpedo attack, and for increasing the facilities for coaling our men-of-war, have made the Admiralty propose the further elongation of the mole at Gibraltar, which, when completed, will be 3,700 feet in length.

It is proposed to commence at once a graving dock at Gibraltar; this work has long been considered necessary for our Mediterranean Fleet, and the Channel Squadron, which frequently goes to Gibraltar.

For the speedy mobilisation of the Fleet it is most desirable to increase the basin accommodation at Keyham and to have greater facilities for coaling. It is also indispensable to have in the same port more docks. At the present time only one first-class battleship can be docked there, and the entrance to that dock is extremely inconvenient at certain times. To effect these objects provision has been made in the Estimates for a basin area of 41 acres, for three new docks, and a coaling jetty.

It is proposed to deepen, by dredging, the harbours of Portsmouth and Devonport, and to widen the channel of the River Medway, so that sufficient depth of water may be obtained for mooring ships and for facilitating their passage to and from the important Dockyard of Chatham.

The inconvenience of putting seamen in hulks when not on board commissioned ships has been dealt with at Keyham, where some years ago a barrack was erected. The same arrangement has been made for the men training in the Excellent at Portsmouth.

Admirable results upon the health, conduct, and comfort of the men have followed the adoption of this system, and it is most desirable to extend it.

The need is now most pressing at Chatham, and it is proposed to commence the building of a naval barrack for 3,500 officers and men at that place. When this building is completed the hulks, which now occupy valuable space in the basins, will be removed.

The increase in the Royal Marines has made it difficult to carry out thoroughly at Walmer the training of all recruits, which has hitherto been extremely successful; it is proposed to extend these barracks so as to give accommodation for the training of 2,000 recruits annually.

The extension of the Engineer Students' College at Keyham is most necessary, as the present accommodation is insufficient for the number of these important officers, who are trained in this institution for the Navy.

Important works are also contemplated for the storage of ammunition at Gibraltar and Malta.

MOBILISATION.

The united crews of the ships, &c., specially put in commission for the partial mobilisation of 1893 amounted to 9,425, as compared with 8,937 in 1892.

In the course of the year the number of signal ratings had largely increased, so that instead of there being any deficiencies in the signal department when the partial mobilisation was effected, 84 surplus signal ratings were distributed amongst the several manœuvre fleets and squadrons.

During the year preparations have been made for definitely appropriating Petty Officers and men of all ratings to the three home ports, in order that each port may be self-supporting and capable of manning and providing for the care and maintenance of all ships attached to it. A complete establishment for each port has been drawn up, and the numbers voted have been divided between them in proportion to their requirements. New entries from the shore, and boys on completion of their training, will be appropriated to a port, according to the numbers required to complete the respective port establishments.

It is hoped that the establishment of these port divisions will eventually provide for the actual needs of each port, facilitate mobilisation, and enable recruiting to be placed on a continuous and satisfactory system.

The changes in the constitution of the coastguard and port guardships previously instituted, have been further developed during the past year. The coastguard ships now consist for the most part of fast cruisers of modern type, while the old type vessels previously stationed at the naval ports have been replaced by second-class battleships and at Queenstown by an armed cruiser. It has been decided to replace the present old type gunboats attached as tenders to coastguard ships by torpedo gunboats of high speed, and this is now being done.

ROYAL MARINES.

The increase of numbers voted to the Establishment in April last, added to ordinary waste, rendered it necessary to recruit about 2,000 men. Without receding from the standard of height, 1,964 recruits have been obtained since April 1st. To meet the increased competition for the best men, it is proposed to hold out additional inducements to men to join the Royal Marines. Provision has been made in the Estimates for extra payment to men of the Corps while acting as Non-Commissioned Officers, as well as allowances for the gratuitous issue of certain additional articles of clothing.

Hitherto it has been possible to impart instruction in swimming to recruits from the open beach to only comparatively few of the men, the number depending more on the length of the summer season, but the new swimming tank now erected at the Training Depot at Walmer will enable instruction to be given daily, and it is hoped that this essential art will be acquired by every Marine before he proceeds to sea.

During the summer a battalion of Marines was associated with the troops of the various arms of the Service at Aldershot, and the experience gained was of considerable value. It is intended to attach a similar battalion of Royal Marines to Aldershot annually.

It is proposed to add 500 men to the Corps during the year 1894-95.

ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE.

The number of officers who have made themselves efficient by various periods of service in the Fleet is 248, as compared with 192 at the end of the last year.

The lists are now practically full, and for that reason as many as possible of the candidates have been refused during the past year. It is, however, proposed to increase the Lieutenants and Sub-Lieutenants' List by 50 each, which will enable some of the most eligible of these candidates to be admitted.

The number of Officers to be entered for 12 months' training on board Ships of the Fleet has been raised from 50 to 70. Provision has also been made for giving six months' training to 700 men of the R.N.R., in ships of the Fleet.

The First and Second Class Reserve Men are nearly up to the full number voted, and the class of Firemen, attracted by the new regulations, which are referred to in my Statement of last year, have presented themselves so thickly for entry that it has been necessary to check temporarily their enrolment. It is proposed to make provision in the Estimates for an addition of 100 to the List, which will bring the total number up to 1,600.

It was not possible until February of this year to bring into force the Regulations for embarking Second Class men in the coastguard ships for working days' training, but the scheme is now in operation, and the centres of Stornoway and Lerwick, where there are a very large number of the Second Class, have been visited by H.M. ships Superb and Galatea respectively, for the purpose of embarking this Class of the Reserve. The coastguard ships will receive the men at their headquarters.

A marked advantage has been gained by the Gunnery Lieutenants visiting the coastguard ships visiting the R.N.R. batteries to afford a few days' instruction and most satisfactory reports are received of the efficiency of the men and their fitness to take their place as part of the crew of a man-of-war.

There is every cause for satisfaction at the condition of the force, both as regards officers and men.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

In accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee of the House Commons in 1892, the grant of £16,000 per annum formerly paid out of the Consolidated Fund in aid of the funds of Greenwich Hospital, has been restored from the 1st October, 1893, for the benefit of men who entered the Service before the 29th June, 1878. This money has been applied to increasing by 2,000 the number of Age Pensions awarded to Naval and Marine Pensioners of 55 years of age and upwards.

The total number of Age Pensions existing at the present time is about 1,100.

In accordance with another of the recommendations of the Committee, a rent of £5,000 a year has been paid since 1st April, 1892, to Greenwich Hospital funds for the use, for the purposes of the Royal Naval College, of the Hospital buildings at Greenwich. By this means, funds for 600 additional Age Pensions have been provided.

In the case of the Victoria disaster every effort was made to provide promptly for the widows and children of the men who perished. The ship was lost on the 27th of June, and by the 15th of August following the greater number of the cases had been investigated and the widows' pensions, and the allowances to the children, paid.

In all, pensions have been awarded to 77 widows and allowances to 124 children of these seamen, while four cases from Malta, lately reported, are now under investigation. The charge thus entailed upon the funds of Greenwich Hospital amounts to nearly £1,500 a year.

NAVAL DEFENCE ACT.

I stated last year that a Bill would be introduced for the purpose of amending the Naval Defence Act of 1889. This was done, and the Amending Act of 1893 was subsequently passed.

The Act authorised the expenditure of a larger sum upon the ships built in the Dockyards than was originally contemplated, and extended the time within which the vessels should be completed for sea. It also gave the Admiralty greater latitude with regard to the use of savings of previous years.

According to the latest information, the total expenditure upon the ships built in the Dockyards will amount to £12,222,000—namely, £9,814,000 for hulls, &c., and £2,408,000 for armaments, or, in round numbers, an excess of £722,000 over the original Estimate.

It is anticipated that the whole of the expenditure on the ships built by contract will be met out of the £10,000,000 charged under the Act to the Consolidated Fund.

We do not propose to extend to the new Programme of shipbuilding financial machinery like that of the Naval Defence Act. Apart from financial policy and other considerations connected with it, the accounts rendered necessary by the Act have proved difficult and complicated in their working, and I trust that by careful and energetic management the funds placed at the disposal of the Admiralty in the annual Votes will secure the rapid and economical prosecution of shipbuilding work for the Navy.

SPENCER.

10th March, 1894.

I N D E X

TO

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

(AUTHORISED EDITION).

VOLUME XXII. FOURTH SERIES.

FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1894.

EXPLANATION OF ABBREVIATIONS.

Bills, Read 1 ^a , 1 ^o , 2 ^a , 2 ^o , 3 ^a , 3 ^o . Read the First, Second, or Third Time.	A. Answers. c. Commons. Com. Committee. com. Committed. Intro. Introduction. l. Lords. Obs. Observations.	Pres. Presented. Q. Questions. Rep. Reported. R.P. Report Progress. Reso. Resolutions.
1R., 2R., 3R. Speech de- livered on First, Second, or Third Reading.
Adj. Adjourned.

The subjects of Debate, as far as possible, are classified under General Headings : e.g.,

AFRICA	EDUCATION	METROPOLIS
ARMY	INDIA	NAVY
BOARD OF AGRICULTURE	IRELAND	PARLIAMENT
BOARD OF TRADE	LABOUR DEPARTMENT	POST OFFICE
CIVIL SERVICE	LAW AND JUSTICE AND	SCOTLAND
COLONIES	POLICE	SUPPLY
CUSTOMS, EXCISE AND IN-	LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD	WALES
LAND REVENUE	MERCHANT SHIPPING

A CLAND, RIGHT HON. A. H. D. (Vice President of the Council on Education), York, W.R., Rotherham
 Camberwell School Accommodation, 562
 Charities of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford, 1587
 Charity Commission and the Local Government Act, 1002
 Charity Commissioners—Mr. Austie, 903
 Christ's Hospital, 1430
 Eastbourne School Accommodation, 337
 Flitwick School Board, 561
 Highbury Vale School, 1592
 Inspectors, Elementary School Teachers as, 330
 Intemperance, Illustrated Lessons on, 1005
 Liscard (Cheshire) School, 310
 Matlock British School, 309
 Non-Board School Improvements, Res., 961
 Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1372
 Public Elementary School Return, 311
 Secondary Education Commission, 1583

ACLAND, Right Hon. A. H. D.—cont.

Supply
 Elementary Education—Requirements of the Education Department, 381, 385, 386, 390
 Public Education—Circulars Asking for Subscriptions in Lieu of Fees, 380
 South Kensington Museum, 1078
 Training Colleges, 390
 Voluntary Schools, &c., 801, 802, 806, 809, 821, 829
 Teachers, Scarcity of, 692
 Thrift in Elementary Schools, 1508
 Voluntary Schools
 Finances, 692
 Grants Withheld, 693
 Wales—School Inspectors, 1505
 "Warned" Schools, 146, 345
 Worcestershire—Cotteridge School, 446

ACLAND-HOOD, Captain Sir A., Somerset, Wellington

Discharged and Reserve Soldiers, Employment for, Res., 511
 Foreign and Colonial Meat Bill, Intro., 453
 Sergeant Instructors of Volunteers and Railway Fares, 566

Admiralty (see NAVY)AFGHANISTAN

Sir M. Durrand's Mission—Papers, Q. Mr. Curzon; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 15, 336

AFRICA

African Companies (References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 15, 391)
Anglo-Portuguese Treaty, Q. Sir A. Rollit; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 20, 695
Bechuanaland—Concessions Commission, Q. Mr. A. O'Connor; A. Mr. S. Buxton Mar 15, 317
Bechuanaland, Mashonaland, and Matabeleland (References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 15, 405)
Delagoa Bay Railway, Q. Mr. H. Heaton; A. Sir E. Grey April 5, 1451
Kerekhuren's Expedition, Q. Commander Bethell; A. Sir E. Grey April 9, 1576
Lado—Congo Free State Expedition, &c., Q. Commander Bethell; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 20, 699
Mails, South African, Q. Mr. Conybeare; A. Mr. A. Morley April 5, 1461
Mauica Plateau and the Portuguese, Q. Mr. J. W. Lowther, A. Sir E. Grey Mar 19, 584
Matabeleland, Papers Relating to, Q. Baron H. de Worms; A. Mr. S. Buxton Mar 13, 147
Pondoland, Annexation of, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Mr. S. Buxton Mar 20, 689, Q. Mr. Whiteley; A. Mr. S. Buxton April 5, 1437, Q. Commander Bethell; A. Mr. S. Buxton April 9, 1577
Sierra Leone
Conflict between French and British Forces, Qs. Captain Bagot, Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett; As. Sir E. Grey Mar 20, 694
Expedition against the Sofas, Q. Mr. Pictou; A. Mr. S. Buxton Mar 13, 144
Swaziland, Cession of, Q. Baron H. de Worms; A. Mr. S. Buxton Mar 13, 146
Telegrams (References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 15, 362)
Transvaal—Thrashing the Blacks, Q. Mr. S. Smith; A. Mr. S. Buxton Mar 20, 683
Uganda—Sir G. Portal's Report &c., Q. Sir J. Ferguson; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 13, 141; Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 15, 343, Qs. Sir G. Baden-Powell, Sir J. Kennaway; As. Sir E. Grey April 6, 1516; Qs. Sir G. Baden-Powell, Mr. Crawford; As. Sir E. Grey April 9, 1581
 (References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 15, 391)

AFRICA—cont.Umtali

Arrest of Mr. Taylor, Q. Mr. I. Morton; A. Mr. S. Buxton Mar
Queen Chikanga's Consort, Q. Mr. A. Mr. S. Buxton Mar 19, 562
Umtassa's Country—Magistrates, Q. J. C. Morton; A. Mr. S. Buxton 700
Uyoro and Colonel Colville, Qs. Cor. Bethell, Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Grey Mar 20, 700
Zambesi—Collision with Portuguese, Qs. Mr. J. Lowther, Sir A. Rollit, E. Grey Mar 19, 583
Zululand—Prisoners, &c., Q. Cor. Bethell; A. Mr. S. Buxton April 5

Agricultural Depression

Amend. to Address in Answer to Speech (Colonel H. Vincent) Mar

Agricultural Education in Klem Schools Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Jesse Collings; Read 1^o 457

AGRICULTURE, BOARD OF

President—Mr. H. GARDNER

Anthrax, Q. Mr. Fellowes; A. Mr. April 3, 1250
Canadian Cattle Trade, Q. Sir J. H. A. Mr. S. Buxton Mar 15, 308
Farquharson; A. Mr. Gardner Mar
Leaflets, Copy pres. Mar 12, 127
Margarine Act, Q. Mr. H. Plunkett; Gardner Mar 16, 441
Meat, Foreign, Q. Mr. Buchanan; Gardner Mar 13, 141; Qs. Dr. Farq. Sir W. Wedderburn, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Gardner Mar 20, 694; Qs. Sir well, Mr. S. Keay; As. Mr. Gardner 1254; Q. Mr. S. Keay; A. Mr. April 9, 1568
Tuberculosis Report, Q. Mr. Lees E. A. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre Mar 13, 153
Field; A. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre Mar
Veterinary Department, Copy pres. 127

AIRD, Mr. J., Paddington, N.
 Royal Parks, Bands in. 1251

Aliens (see Emigration and Immigration)ALLAN, Mr. W., Gateshead

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 77.
 "Victoria" Disaster, 724, 726

ALLEN, Mr. C. F. Egerton, Pe &c.

Navy—Dockyard Labour and Wag 638

ALLEN, Mr. W., Newcastle - under-Lyme

Navy—Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 646, 647

Queen's Speech—House of Lords, 202

ALLSOPP, Hon. G. H., Worcester

Burial Acts, 1450

AMBROSE, Dr. D., Louth, S.

Ireland—Veterinary Inspectors, 559

AMERICA—UNITED STATES

Derelicts in the Atlantic (see title Atlantic)

Madagascar—United States Consul, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 15, 315

Mail Route

Distances between Ports, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. A. Morley April 6, 1505

Queenstown and Moville, Qs. Sir J. Leng, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. A. Morley April 6, 1506

Return ordered April 4, 1380

ANSTRUTHER, Mr. H. T., St. Andrews, &c.

Business of the House—Scottish Legislation, 327

Civil Service—Second Division Clerks, 684
Shops, Hours of Labour in, 684

Anthrax (see under Agriculture)

Appropriations in Aid

Q. Mr. G. Bowles; A. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 13, 152; Q. Mr. G. Bowles; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 15, 307

(References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 15, 376)

ARMY

Secretary of State—Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN

Under Secretary of State—Lord SANDHURST

Financial Secretary—Mr. WOODALL

Africa — Sierra Leone—Conflict between French and English Forces, Qs. Captain Bagot, Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett; As. Sir E. Grey Mar 20, 694

Appropriations in Aid, Q. Mr. G. Bowles; A. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 13, 152; Q. Mr. G. Bowles; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 15, 307

(References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 15, 376)

Barracks, Bradford, Q. Mr. Caine; A. Mr. Woodall Mar 19, 564

Billetting

Pontefract, Q. Mr. Nussey; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 15, 304

Wakefield, Q. Mr. Nussey; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 2, 1099

Canteens, Temperance, Q. Mr. A. Grove; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 9, 1591

[cont.

ARMY—cont.

Ceylon

Defences of Colombo, Q. Mr. Schwann; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 15, 1443

Rifle Range, Q. Mr. Schwann; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 5, 1444

Rifles—Royal Warwickshire Regiment, Q. Mr. Weir; A. Mr. Woodall April 9, 1579

Contracts

Armour-Piercing Projectiles, Q. Mr. Hanbury; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth; April 6, 1510; Q. Mr. Hanbury; A. Mr. Woodall April 9, 1577

Cordite Dispute (References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 15, 366)

Defences, Res. (Sir C. Dilke) Mar 16, 462

Discharged and Reserve Soldiers, Employment for, Res. (Major Rasch) Mar 16, 507

Factories

Copy pres. Mar 12, 126

Eight Hours Day, Q. Mr. Hanbury; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 13, 151

Enfield and Sparkbrook, Qs. Mr. A. C. Morton, Mr. Benn; As. Mr. Woodall April 5, 1437; Qs. Mr. Weir, Mr. Barran, Mr. J. Collings; As. Mr. Woodall April 9, 1579

Woolwich Arsenal Injury Pay, Return pres. Mar 12, 128

Forage (References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 15, 430)

India

Dum-Dum Murder—Private O'Hara, Q. Mr. Caine; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 5, 1438

Madras and Bombay Commands, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 13, 140

Staff Corps—Promotion, Q. Mr. Talbot; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler April 2, 1099

Ireland

Bantry Bay Military Works, Q. Mr. Gilhooly; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 20, 685

Curragh Buildings—Killaloe Slates, Q. Captain Donelan; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 2, 1108

Soldiers' Institutes in Dublin, Q. Mr. A. O'Connor; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 2, 1113

Soldiers Unloading Coal at Spike Island, Q. Captain Donelan; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 5, 1450

Taffe, Edward, Case of, Q. Mr. Bodkin; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 9, 1572

Lee-Metford Rifle Range (see sub-heading Rifle Ranges)

Medical Department

Hospital Corps, Q. Mr. Arnold-Forster; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 15, 325

"Professional Assistant" to the Director General, Q. Captain Norton; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 2, 1111

Surgeon-Major Hamilton G. Gardner, Q. Mr. Webster; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 6, 1514

Mobilisation, Obs. Colonel Lockwood Mar 18, 519

ARMY—cont.

Musketry—Examination Papers, Q. Mr. Lloyd-Morgan; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 16, 445

Officers

Artillery Majors, Q. Colonel Nolan; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 15, 353

Staff Officers' Pay at the Manœuvres, Q. Colonel Lockwood; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 19, 580

Patriotic Fund Commissioners—Balaciacs Fund, Q. Captain Naylor-Leyland; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 19, 569

Pensioners

Crimean and Indian Mutiny Pensioners, Q. Sir J. Long; A. Mr. Woodall Mar 16, 435

Pensioners and Public Houses, Qs. Mr. J. Burns, Mr. Jeffreys, Mr. Bartley; As. Mr. Asquith, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 5, 1452

Rick, Colonel, Q. Sir G. Chesney; A. Sir J. T. Hibbert Mar 20, 685

Soldiers' Pensions, Copy pres. Mar 29, 999

Pontefract Billetting (see sub-heading Billetting)

Pontefract—Garrison Military Regulations, Q. Mr. Nussey; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 15, 302

Rifles Magazine (References to, on Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill, Mar 24, 896)

Rifle Ranges—Lee-Metford Rifle, Q. Sir H. Fletcher; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 2, 1098

Scotland—Hamilton Brigade Depot, Q. Mr. Hozier; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 13, 142

Stores, Revenue, Q. Sir S. Northcote; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 19, 585

Straits Settlements—Military Contributions, Q. Sir J. Gorst; A. Mr. S. Buxton Mar 19, 573

Troopships (see under title NAVY)

Volunteers

Decorations, Q. Mr. H. S. Wright; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 15, 315; Q. Viscount Wolmer; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 5, 1448; Q. Mr. Webster; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 6, 1515

Officers—Military Instruction, Q. Mr. Griffith-Boscawen; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 29, 904

Sergeant Instructors and Railway Fares, Q. Sir A. Acland-Hood; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 19, 566

Waltham Abbey Powder Factory Inquiry, Qs. Mr. Hanbury, Mr. A. J. Balfour; As. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 13, 154

Army (Annual) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Mar 21, 851
Read 2nd Mar 22, 894

Army (Annual) Bill

Obs. Mr. G. Bowles, Mr. A. C. Morton, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Sir W. Harcourt, Sir A. Rolit, Sir R. Temple Mar 21, 854; Q. Mr. G. Bowles; A. Mr. Campbell-

[cont.]

Army (Annual) Bill—cont.

Bannerman Mar 22, 869; Qs. Mr. B. Mr. Hanbury; As. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 29, 906; Q. Mr. Hanbury; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 2

Army Estimates, 1894-5

Copy pres. Mar 12, 126

Memorandum of Estimates, Copy Mar 12, 126

Ordnance Factories (Supplementaries, 1893-4), Copy pres. Mar 12, 126

£195,000—Supplementary, Additio penditure on Army Service, Com. 429; Report Mar 16, 555

£100—Ordnance Factories (Supplem Com. Mar 15, 431; Report Mar 16 Land Forces (155,347) of all Band Mar 16, 521; Report Mar 19, 675

£5,981,000—Pay, &c., of the Army (Staff, Regiments, Reserve, and ments), Com. Mar 16, 549; Report 675

£100—Ordnance Factories, Com. 550; Report Mar 19, 675

£100—Ordnance Factories—Excess, Com. Mar 20, 784; Report Mar 21

ARNOLD-FORSTER, Mr. H. O., I W.

Army and Navy—Defensive Prep Res., 476

Army Hospital Corps, 325

Ireland

Belfast and Newcastle Post Office, Clare County, Crime in, 825

Cork—Sunday Disturbances, 1586

Personal Explanation, 905

Victoria Tower, National Flag on, 74

ASHHEAD-BARTLETT, Sir E., SA Ecclesiastical

Brazilian Civil War, 331

Loss of British Officers, 867

Franco-Siamese Question, Papers on, Kiang Hung—Cession to China, 1098

Navy

Expenditure, 781

Gibraltar, Construction of Dock at Sierra Leone—Conflict between Fre English Forces, 695

Supply

Bechuanaland, Mashonaland, an beland, 416, 420, 427

Uganda, 398

ASQUITH, RIGHT HON. H. H. tary of State for the Home ment), Fife, E.

Bakehouses in London, 1106

Bell's Match Girls' Strike—Case to Mead, 580

Building Societies Acts, 1595

Bural Acts, 1450

Business of the House, Res., 1621

5

ASQUITH, Right Hon. H. H.—cont.

Children, Imprisonment of, in Holloway Prison, 150, 151
 Church of England Marriage Laws, 702, 1109
 Convictions, Records of, 1001
 Dundee Tailoring Trade, 678
 Factory Acts, Breach of, at Preston, 447
 Featherstone Riots—Compensation, 577
 Gresham University—Draft Charter, 867
 Habitual Inebriates Committee's Report, 332
 Labour Commission—Assistant Commissioners' Reports, 339
 Licence Fees—Home Office, 1446
 Licences, Occasional, 1245
 Liverpool, Houses of Ill-Repute in, 858
 London Building Bye-Laws—County Council Bill, 1107
 Lunacy Laws—"Commissioners in Lunacy v. Sherrard," 584
 Metropolitan Police—C Division, 690
 Metropolitan Police Court Clerks, 343
 Mines
 Explosions in Coal Mines, 314
 Inspectors' Reports, 1574
 Mining Royalties—Rents and Wayleaves, Res., 1547
 Nottingham Execution—Walter Smith, 1112, 1510
 Police Stations—Aldershot and Farnborough, 1446
 "Pridham v. Jennings," 567, 861
 Prisons
 Kirkdale Site, 316
 Warders, 1005
 Publicans and Military Pensioners, 1452
 Queen's Speech—Dynamite Prisoners, 231
 Revolvers and Pistols—Accidents, Res., 1040
 Shops, Hours of Labour in, 684
 Supply
 Dangerous Trades, 360, 361
 Home Office, 361
 House of Commons Offices, Commission on, 354
 Tithe Collection in Wales, 1246
 Vaccination—Legislation, 683
 Wild Birds in Yorkshire—Close Time, 149

Atlantic, Derelicts in

Q. Mr. Macdonald; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 16, 444; Obs. Mr. Macdonald Mar 30, 1059;
 Qs. Sir J. Leng, Mr. G. Bowles; As. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth April 2, 1100; Q. Mr. Macdonald; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 30, 1004, 1007

ATTORNEY GENERAL—Sir C. RUSSELLAUSTIN, Mr. M., Limerick, W.

Cork—Outdoor Sunday Preaching, 1518

BADEN-POWELL, Sir G., Liverpool, Kirkdale

Army and Navy—Defensive Preparations, Res., 503
 Behring Sea Award Bill, 1457, 1574; 2R., 1469, 1481; Com., 1679, 1682, 1685
 Kirkdale Prison Site, 315
 Navy—Reserves, 668, 669

BADEN-POWELL, Sir G.—cont.

Newfoundland Ministerial Crisis, 1581
 Parliament—Business of the House—Financial Business, 270
 Pondoland, Annexation of, 689
 Samoa, British Ships at, 1097
 Uganda—Sir G. Portal's Report, &c., 343, 1516, 1581, 1676
 Unyoro, Affairs of, 700

BAGOT, Captain J. F., Westmoreland, Kendal

Discharged and Reserve Soldiers, Employment for, Res., 512
 Sierra Leone—Conflict between French and English Forces, 694

BAIRD, Mr. J. G. A., Glasgow, Central

Mining Accidents (Scotland) Bill, Intro., 457

Bakehouses in the Metropolis (see under Metropolis)BAKER, Mr. J., Portsmouth

Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 630
 Indian Troopships, 1507

BALFOUR, Mr. G. W., Leeds, Central

Building Societies Acts, 1594
 Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1151

BALFOUR, Right Hon. A. J., Manchester, E.

Army
 Army and Navy—Defensive Preparations, Res., 490
 Waltham Abbey Powder Factory Explosion Inquiry, 155
 Behring Sea Award Bill, 1595; 2R., 1468; Com., 1684
 Ireland—Land Acts, Select Com. on, 1455

Parliament

Business of the House, 156, 267, 271, 587, 1460, 1520, 1675; Res., 1603, 1607, 1648
 Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 132, 133, 135, 159, 160, 161
 Privilege—Lord Rosebery's Speech at Edinburgh, Res., 598
 Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1127, 1502
 Standing Orders, Obs., 608
 Queen's Speech, Reply to, 48, 70, 253, 254
 Administration of Ireland, 245, 246
 Gladstone, Right Hon. W. E.—Retirement from Office, 49
 House of Lords Offices, 245, 261
 Scotland—Home Rule, Res., 1311, 1315

BALFOUR, RIGHT HON. J. B. (Lord Advocate), Clackmannan, &c.

Fatal Accidents Inquiry (Scotland) Bill, Intro., 1688
 North Berwick Provisional Order Bill, Res., 675

[cont.]

[cont.]

BALFOUR, Right Hon. J. B.—cont.

Prevention of Cruelty to Children Bill, 2R., 1377

Scotland

County Councils—Statutory Meetings, 336
Day Trespass Act, Prosecution under, 433
Dingwall Poaching Prosecutions, 859, 1262, 1570

Procurator Fiscal of Lochmaddy, 862

Saddell Tenancy Dispute, 857

Trawling, 145, 333

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1199

BALLANTINE, Mr. W. H. W., Coventry
Nottingham Execution—Walter Smith, 1112, 1510BANBURY, Mr. F. G., Camberwell, Peckham

Building Societies Bill, Intro., 432

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1402, 1404, 1405
Supply—Houses of Parliament, 983

Banstead Common

Q. Lord G. Hamilton; A. Sir C. Russell
April 9, 1582

Barker and Co., Failure of (see under Trade, Board of)BARROW, Mr. R. V., Southwark, Bermondsey

Bakehouses in London, 1106, 1507

Enfield and Sparkbrook Factories, 1580

Local Government Act—London Vestry Elections, 335

BARRY, Mr. E., Cork, S.

Ireland—Skibbereen Custom House, 1572

BARTLEY, Mr. G. C. T., Islington, N.

Church Patronage Bill, Intro., 450

"Corkage" at Temperance Hotels, 1114

Eastbourne School Accommodation, 338

Income Tax, 1009, 1043, 1051, 1052

Ireland—Church Fund, 581

Lightships—The Smalls, 314

Military Pensioners—Payment of Pensions, 1453

Occupying Tenants' Enfranchisement Bill, Res., 787

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1324, 1349, 1353, 1354, 1371

Outdoor Provident Relief Bill, Res., 787

Parliament

Business of the House, 270; Res., 1638

"Parliamentary Debates" Index, 1444

Private Members' Days, 154

Supply

British Museum, 1065, 1067

Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, 1089, 1090

Extension of Admiralty Buildings, 988; Res., 991, 993

Houses of Parliament, 982

Metropolitan Police Courts, 996

South Kensington Museum, 1070; Res., 1074, 1079

BARTON, Mr. D. P., Armagh, Mid Ireland

Cork—Sunday Outdoor Preaching, 15
Land Acts, Select. Com. on, 1456

BAYLEY, Mr. E. H., Camberwell, 1
Camberwell School Accommodation, 86BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. H., Bristol
Bishopric of Bristol Act (1884) Amend Bill, Intro., 461Beaumaris Scheme

Q. Lord Stanley of Alderley; A. Earl Rosebery April 9, 1555

Beer Adulteration Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Round; Read 1^o Mar 16, 45

Behring Sea Award Bill

c. Intro., Sir C. Russell; Read 1^o Mar 998

Read 2^o April 5, 1461

Con. in Com., and reported April 9, 167

Behring Sea Award Bill

Qs. Sir G. Baden-Powell, Mr. G. Bowles
Mr. S. Buxton April 5, 1457; Qs. S.
Baden-Powell, Sir A. Rollit, Mr. J. C.
Berlain, Mr. Bartley; As. Mr. S. Bu
Sir E. Grey, Sir C. Russell April 9, 1
Q. Mr. A. J. Balfour; A. Sir W. Har
April 9, 1595

BENN, Mr. J. W., Tower Ham St. George's

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1404, 1419

Enfield and Sparkbrook Factories, 1437
London, Brighton, and South Coast Ra
Fares, 1249

BETHELL, Commander G. R., 1
E.R., HoldernessAfrica

Kerechoven's Expedition, 1576

Leao—Congo Free State Exhibition
699

Pondoland, Annexation of, 1577

Uyoro and Colonel Colville, 700

Zulu Prisoners, 1576

Navy—Reserves, 660

Supply—Board Schools, &c., 827, 828

Bethnal Green Museum

(References to, in Debate on Supply, 1 1069)

BILLSON, Mr. A., Devon, Barnstap
Ground Game Act (1880) Amendment
Intro., 453BIRRELL, Mr. A., Fife, W.

Scotland—Home Rule, Res., 1294

Bishopric of Bristol Act (1884) Amendment Bill

a. Intro., Sir M. Hicks-Beach; Read 1st Mar 16, 461

Board of Agriculture (see Agriculture)

Board of Trade (see Trade)

Boards of Conciliation Bill

a. Intro., Sir J. Lubbock; Read 1st April 8, 1316

BODKIN, Mr. M. M., Roscommon, N.
Ireland

Monitors, Examination for, 1434
School Books, 1434, 1578
Taffe, Edward, Case of, 1572

BOLTON, Mr. T. H., St. Pancras, N.
Business of the House, Res., 1657

BOSCAWEN, Mr. A. S. T. GRIFFITH-,
Kent, Tunbridge

Mining Royalties — Rents and Wayleaves, Res., 1536
Tithe Collection in Wales, 1245
Volunteer Officers, Military Instruction for, 904

BOULNOIS, Mr. E., Marylebone, E.
East London Water Bill, 2R., 1390
Police (Metropolis) Bill, 2R., 1379

BOUSFIELD, Mr. W. R., Hackney, E.
Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1372
Supply—Dangerous Trades, 361

BOWLES, Mr. T. G., Lynn Regis

Appropriations in Aid, 152, 307
Army (Annual) Bill, 854, 855, 889; 1R. 851; 2R., 895
Atlantic, Derelicts in, 1101
Behring Sea Award Bill, 1458; 2R., 1476, 1480; Com., 1677, 1679, 1680, 1681, 1683, 1685
Danube, Mouths of, 341
Declaration of Paris, 345
Dover Pier Dues, 578
Law Officers of the Crown, Res., 954
Licence Fees—Home Office, 1445
Mercantile Marine Expenditure, 139
Merchant Shipping (Life-Saving Appliances) Act—Board of Trade Rules, 1252

Navy

Coastguard Stations — Life-Saving Apparatus, 307
H.M.S. "Crescent," 443
Oil Fuel, 140, 688
Manœuvres, Drill in, 687
Rations, Condemned, 689
Reserves, 671, 673
Shipbuilding Contract Work, 306

[cont.]

BOWLES, Mr. T. G.—cont.

Parliament

Business of the House, 272; Res., 1670, 1671;
Motion for Select Com., 1281
Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 162
Privilege — Lord Rosebery's Speech at Edinburgh, Res., 605

Quarantine, 955, 957

Supply

Appropriations in Aid, 376
Art and Science Buildings, 1068, 1076
Cholera Precautions, 365, 366
County Courts, 373, 374
Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, 1086, 1089, 1090, 1091
Diplomatic and Consular Services, 834
Extension of Admiralty Buildings, 984
House of Commons Offices, Commission on, 357
Houses of Parliament, 980
Law Charges, 367, 370
Metropolitan Police Courts, 937
Petitions to the House of Commons, 353
Pluralists in the Public Service, 353, 355, 795
Royal Palaces, 967, 969, 970
Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 971, 975, 976
Vote on Account, 349, 305

Brazilian Civil War

Explosion—Loss of British Officers—Compensation, Q. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 22, 867
Surrender of Admiral de Gama, Qs. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett, Colonel H. Vincent, Sir A. Rolit, Mr. Hanbury; As. Sir E. Grey Mar 15, 331

British Columbia, Bank of
Copy pres. Mar 12, 127

British Museum

(References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 21, 831; Mar 30, 1065)

BRODRICK, Hon. W. St. John, Surrey,
Guildford

Army and Navy—Defensive Preparations, Res., 501
Army (Annual) Bill, 906
Army Estimates
Forage, 431
Land Forces, 537
Ordnance Factories, 555
Discharged and Reserve Soldiers, Employment for, Res., 516
Peers Disabilities Removal Bill, Intro., 459

BROOKFIELD, Mr. A. M., Sussex, Rye
Hop Substitutes Bill, Res., 999

BRUNNER, Mr. J. T., Cheshire, Northwich
German Prison-Made Goods, 1103

BRYCE, RIGHT HON. J. (Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster), Aberdeen, S.

Magistrates—Alleged Corrupt Practice by Mr. Johnson, of Wigan, 435

BUCHANAN, Mr. T. R., Aberdeenshire, E.
Business of the House—Scottish Legislation, 326

Indian Tariff Bill, 440

Meat, Foreign, 141, 694

Russia, British Herrings in, 1576

Trawling off Stronness, 145

BUCKNILL, Mr. T. T., Surrey, Epsom
Burgh Heath—Telegraphic Communication, 1578

Budget (see under Ways and Means)

Building Societies Acts

Q. Mr. G. Balfour; A. Mr. Asquith April 9, 1595

Building Societies Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Banbury; Read 1st Mar 16, 452

Burial Acts

Q. Mr. G. Allsopp; A. Mr. Asquith April 5, 1450

Burials Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Carvell Williams; Read 1st Mar 16, 453

BURNIE, Mr. R. J. D., Swansea Town
Mining Royalties—Rents and Wayleaves, Res., 1531

BURNS, Mr. John, Battersea

Bakehouses in London, 1508

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1416

Navy—Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 631, 634, 647

Publicans and Military Pensioners, 1452

Supply—Science and Art Buildings, 1068, 1074, 1081

BURT, Mr. T. (Secretary to the Board of Trade), Morpeth

Notice of Accidents Bill, Intro., 1504

BUTCHER, Mr. J. G., York

Metropolitan Countermen and Telegraph Clerks, 1569

Trade Disputes (Arbitration) Bill, Intro., 458

BUXTON, Mr. S. C. (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies), Tower Hamlets, Poplar

Africa

Bechuanaland—Concessions Commission, 317

Matabeleland Affairs. Papers Relating to, 147

Pondoland, Annexation of, 689, 1438, 1577

(cont.)

BUXTON, Mr. S. C.—cont.

Africa—cont.

Sierra Leone—Expedition against

Sofas, 144

Swaziland, Cession of, 147

Transvaal—Thrashing the Blacks, 6

Umtali—Arrest of Mr. Taylor, 701

Queen Chikanga's Consort, 562

Umtasa's Country—Magistrates, 70

Zululand—Prisoners, &c., 1576

Behring Sea Award Bill, 1457, 1574

Canada

Cattle Trade, 308

Election Disputes, 1454

Cyprus—Dr. Grigsby, 1247

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1410, 1412

Emigrants' Information Office, 637

Newfoundland Ministerial Crisis, 1581

Straits Settlements—Military Contributions, 574

Supply

Bechuanaland, Mashonaland, and Matabeleland, 410, 420, 423

Colonial Office—South African Telegrams, 363, 365

High Commissioner of the Cape Government, 405

Venezuela—Diplomatic Relations, 159

BYLES, Mr. W. P., York, W.R., St

Idle Post Office, 697

Supply—Bechuanaland, Mashonaland, Matabeleland, 426, 427

Uganda, 397

CAINE, Mr. W. S., Bradford, E.

Bradford Barracks, 564

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1409, 1414

India

Balaithun Murder Case, 1094

Councils Act. Return, 1093

Dum-Dum Murder, 1438

Riots—Instruction as to Blank and Cartridges, 1093

Weighing Machines, Stamping of, 1431

CAMERON, Sir C., Glasgow, Colley

Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Acts Amendment (County of Bute) Bill, Intro., Parliament—Introduction of and Ball for Bills, 163

Public Houses (Hours of Closing) (Scotland) Bill, Intro., 853

Road Subvention Abolition (Scotland) Bill, Intro., 853

Sale of Food and Drugs Act (1875) Amendment Bill, Intro., 1379

Scotland—Day Trespass Act, Proposed, 433

Standing Committee (Scotland). Res.,

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, F

HON. H. (Secretary of State for War), Stirling, &c.

Army

Appropriations in Aid—War Office accounts, 307

[con

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Right Hon. H.—cont.Army—cont.

Army and Navy—Defensive Preparations, Res., 495

Billetting

Pontefract, 304

Wakefield, 1099

Canteens, Temperance, 1591

Ceylon

Defences of Colombo, 1443

Rifle Range, 1444

Discharged and Reserve Soldiers, Employment for, Res., 514, 518

Factories—Eight Hours Day, 152

India — Dum-Dum Murder — Private O'Hara, 1438

Ireland

Bantry Bay Military Works, 686

Curragh Buildings—Killaloe Slates, 1108

Mullingar Water Supply, 330

Soldiers' Institutes in Dublin, 1113

Soldiers Unloading Coal at Spike Island, 1451

Taffe, Edward, Case of, 1572

Medical Department

Hospital Corps, 326

"Professional Assistant" to the Director General, 1111

Surgeon-Major Hamilton G. Gardner, 1514

Mobilisation, 521

Musketry Examination Papers, 445

Officers

Artillery Majors, 333

Staff Officers' Pay and the Manœuvres, 580

Patriotic Fund Commissioners and the Balacava Fund, 569

Pensioners and Public Houses, 1453

Pontefract Garrison Military Regulations, 302

Rifle Ranges—Lee-Metford Rifle, 1098

Rifles, Magazine, 899

Scotland—Hamilton Brigade Dépôt, 142

Stores, Reserve, 585

Volunteers

Decoration, 315, 1448, 1515

Officers, Military Instruction for, 904

Sergeant Instructors and Railway Fares, 566

Waltham Abbey Powder Factory Explosion Inquiry, 154, 155

Army (Annual) Bill, 855, 867, 906, 1115 ; 1R., 851 ; 2R., 894, 895

Army Estimates

Additional Expenditure, 430

Egypt, British Soldiers in, 525, 545, 547

Forage, 430

Land Forces, 521, 545, 546, 547, 549

Ordnance Factories, 550, 553, 555

Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 652

Parliament

Business of the House, 271, 272, 273, 1460

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1499, 1500

Standing Orders, 608

CANADA

Cattle Trade, Q. Sir J. Kinloch ; A. Mr. S. Buxton Mar 15, 308 ; Q. Dr. Farquharson ; A. Mr. Gardner Mar 22, 866

Crofters' Settlements, Q. Mr. Weir ; A. Sir G. Trevelyan April 3, 1254

Election Disputes, Q. Sir C. Dilke ; A. Mr. S. Buxton April 5, 1453

CARMARTHEN, Marquess of, Lambeth, Brixton

Business of the House, Res., 1635

Pistols and Revolvers—Accidents, Res., 1036

Supply—Houses of Parliament, 978, 981

CARMICHAEL, Sir J. M., Glasgow, St. Rollox

Disarmament Policy, 436

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1193

CARSON, Mr. E., Dublin UniversityIreland

Boycotting at Kells, 1109

Clare Assizes—Mr. Justice O'Brien's Remarks, 886

Cork—Sunday Disturbances, 1588

Land Acts, Select Com. on, 870, 1455

Registration Bill, 864

Solicitors (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill, Intro., 1316

Census, Cost of

Q. Sir F. Dixon-Hartland ; A. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre Mar 16, 444

CEYLON

Colombo, Defences of, Q. Mr. Schwann ; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 5, 1443

Rifle Range, Q. Mr. Schwann ; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 5, 1444

Rifles—Royal Warwickshire Regiment, Q. Mr. Weir ; A. Mr. Woodall April 9, 1519

CHAMBERLAIN, Right Hon. J., Birmingham, W.

Army Estimates—Ordnance Factories, 551, 555

Behring Sea Award Bill, 1575

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1418, 1419

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1357

Parliament—Business of the House, 449, 1460, 1520 ; Res., 1616, 1621, 1622, 1674

Queen's Speech, Reply to, 70, 189, 251

Gladstone, Mr. W. E.—Retirement from Office, 190

House of Lords, 265

CHANCE, Mr. P. A., Kilkeny, S.

Behring Sea Award Bill, Com., 1682

Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 136

CHANNING, Mr. F. A., Northampton, E.

Eastbourne—School Accommodation, 336

Islands of Arran, 1511

Notice of Motion on the Irish Estimates, 1522

Railway Servants, Injuries to, 1249

CHAPLIN, Right Hon. H., Lincolnshire, Sleaford

German Silver Commission, 155

Trade and Agriculture, Depression of —
Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's
Speech, 115Charitable Trusts Acts Amendment Bill1. Pres., Lord Halsbury; Read 1st April 9, 1865Charity CommissionersAustie, Mr.*, Q. Mr. C. Williams; A. Mr.
Acland Mar 29, 903*Christ's Hospital*, Q. Major Darwin; A. Mr.
Acland April 5, 1430*Hervell's Endowed Schools Trustees*, Q. Mr.
Owen, A. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre Mar 15,
904*Local Government Act—New Duties of Commissioners*, Qs. Mr. Dodd, Mr. J. W.
Lowther; As. Mr. Acland Mar 30, 1002*Oxford—St. Mary the Virgin Charities*, Q.
Mr. Dodd; A. Mr. Acland April 9, 1587*Parliamentary Commissioner*, Q. Mr. C.
Williams; A. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 22, 869*Parliamentary Control—Motion for Select
Com.* (Mr. J. E. Ellis) Mar 30, 1009CHESNEY, General Sir G. T., OxfordArmy and Navy—Defensive Preparations,
Res., 485

Indian Opium Commission, Cost of, 677

Queen's Speech—Indian Finance, 208, 215

Rich's, Colonel, Pension, 685

Chili Convention, Ratification ofQs. Mr. T. M. Healy; As. Mr. Deputy Speaker, Sir E. Grey Mar 16, 447CHINAKiang Hung. Cession of*, Q. Sir E. Ashmead-
Bartlett; A. Sir E. Grey April 2, 1098*Legation and Consular Buildings, Indian Contributions to* (References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 30, 1081)Cholera Precautions (see under Local Government Board)*Christ's Hospital (see under Charity Commissioners)*Church Estates Commission

Copy pres. Mar 12, 129

Church of England*Disestablishment (see under titles SCOTLAND and WALES)Marriage Laws—(see before Mr. de Rutzen, Qs. Sir G. O. Morgan; As. Mr. Asquith Mar 20, 701; April 2, 1108)Church of Scotland Reference Billc. Intro., Mr. Thorburn; Read 1st Mar 16, 458Church Pat

c. Intro., Mr.

CHURCHILL
dingtonArmy and 1
481, 483Business of Motion for 1270, 1Privilege—
burgh, B.Queen's Spe
Gladstone
Office,Civil Servi Compulsory

A. Sir J.

Freemantle
Wolmer;
1448*New Treas*
Sir J. T.Second Div
A. Sir,

Res. (Mr.

Superannua
Sir C. Ru*Superannua*
Copy pres*Superannua*
Copy presCivil Serv
Supply*CLANCY, MrEvicted Ten
Financial 1

Ireland, 1

Ireland

Ballina au
LabourersLand Act
RailwayDroghda
RegistrarsLand Law
(Ireland)

451

Queen's Spe
241CLARK, Dr.Crofters' H
Amendme

Supply

Bechuana
land, 42Colonial C
362, 364County C
Deer ForeExtension
House ofKitchen
886

LARK, Dr. G. B.—cont.

Supply—cont.

Law Charges—Cordite Dispute, 371

Mr. J. G. Lawson's Amendt., 803, 804, 805

Petitions to the House of Commons, 355

Uganda, 391, 398

Women's Franchise Bill, Res., 787

CLARKE, Sir E., Plymouth

Navy—Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 634, 635

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1209, 1488

CLOUGH, Mr. W. O., Portsmouth

Joint Stock Companies' Register Bill, Res., 676

Clubs (see under title Customs, Excise, and Inland Revenue)

Clubs Registration (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Field; Read 1° Mar 20, 787

COBB, Mr. H. P., Warwick, S.E., Rugby

Public Elementary Schools—Return, 311

COCHRANE, Hon. T. H., Ayrshire, N.

Financial Relations of Scotland and the United Kingdom, 350

Naval Reserve, 1248

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1183

Cockenzie Fishery Provisional Order Bill

c. Intro., Sir G. Trevelyan; Read 1° April 6, 1522

CODDINGTON, Mr. W., Blackburn

Rating of Machinery Bill, Intro., 451

COHEN, Mr. B. L., Islington, E.

London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Bill, 2R., 1237

London Streets and Buildings Bill, Select Com., 1428

COLERIDGE, Hon. B., Sheffield, Attercliffe

Merchandise Marks Acts (1887 and 1891) Amendment (Cutlery) Bill, Res., 786

COLLINGS, Right Hon. J., Birmingham, Bordesley

Agricultural Education in Elementary Schools Bill, Intro., 457

Army Estimates—Ordnance Factories, 550, 555

Business of the House, Res., 1669, 1674

Enfield and Sparkbrook Factories, 1580

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1346, 1349

COLONIES

Secretary of State—Marquess of RIPON

Under Secretary of State—Mr. S. BUXTON

(See under names of Colonies)

COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION

Lord President—Earl of KIMBERLEY

Vice President—Mr. A. H. D. ACLAND

(See under title Education)

Commons Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Cozens-Hardy; Read 1° Mar 16, 454

Companies Act (1862) Amendment Bill

c. Intro., Sir W. Houldsworth; Read 1° Mar 16, 452

Compulsory Vaccination (Abolition) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Hopwood; Read 1° Mar 16, 452

Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill

c. Intro., Sir W. Harcourt; Read 1° Mar 19, 675

Read 2° Mar 20, 788

Con. in Com., and reported Mar 21, 852

Con. Mar 22, 896

Read 3° Mar 24, 896

l. Read 1° (Standing Order dispensed with); Read 2°; Com. negatived; Read 3°, and passed Mar 26, 900

Royal Assent Mar 29, 901

CONYBEARE, Mr. C. A. V., Cornwall, Camborne

Dynamite Prisoners — Reply to Queen's Speech, 237

German Prison Labour—Importation of Goods into England, 1458

Mining Royalties—Rents and Wayleaves, Res., 1558

South African Mails, 1461

Supply

Houses of Parliament, 977, 978, 981

Kew Gardens, 971, 973, 974

Royal Palaces, 966, 969, 970

COOKE, Mr. C. W. R., Hereford

Metropolitan Police, C Division, 690

Supply—Houses of Parliament, 978

Trade and Agricultural Depression, Res., 97

Copyhold Consolidation Bill

l. Pres., Lord Herschell; Read 1° Mar 13, 137

Read 2° Mar 19, 558

Cornwall Police Court Procedure (see under Law, &c.)

Coroners Act (1887) Amendment Bill

c. Intro., Captain Grice-Hutchinson; Read 1° Mar 16, 458

Corporate Associations (Property) Billc. Intro., Mr. Howell; Read 1^o Mar 30, 1092Cotton Trade (Forty-Eight) Hours Billc. Intro., Mr. Maden; Read 1^o Mar 16, 456County CouncilsLondon Building Bye-Laws—London CountyCouncil Bill.* Qs. Mr. Howell, Sir A. Rollit;

As. Mr. Asquith, Mr. Speaker April 2, 1107

Scotch Statutory Meetings. Q. Mr. A. Cross;

A. Mr. J. B. Balfour Mar 15, 336

County Councils Association (Scotland) Expenses Billc. Intro., Mr. Renshaw; Read 1^o Mar 20, 786
Read 2^o April 9, 1687County Magistracy (see under Law, &c., sub-heading Magistracy)*COURTNEY, Right Hon. L. H., Cornwall, Bodmin

Behring Sea Award Bill, Com., 1684

Business of the House—Motion for Select Com., 1278

Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 161
Privilege—Lord Rosebery's Speech at Edinburgh, Res., 606

Sale of Intoxicating Liquors Bill, Intro., 863

COZENS-HARDY, Mr. H. H., Norfolk, N. Commons Bill, Intro., 454CRANBORNE, Viscount, Rochester

Civil Service Superannuation, 1516

Parliament—Business of the House—Financial Business, 268

Secondary Education Commission, 1583

Supply—Elementary Education—Requirements of the Education Department, 382, 386

"Warned" Schools, 146, 344

CRAWFORD, Mr. D., Lanark, N.E.

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1176

Uganda Papers, 1581

Warren Hastings Island, Reported Wreck off, 1568

Workmen's Houses (Tenure) Bill, Res., 787

CREAN, Mr. E., Queen's Co., Ossory

Cork—Outdoor Sunday Preaching, 1518

CREMER, Mr. W. R., Shoreditch, Haggerston

Mining Royalties—Rents and Wayleaves, Res., 1562

Navy—"Victoria" Disaster, 731

Parliament—Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, Motion for Select Com., 784

Supply—Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, 884, 885

Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act (1887) Repeal Billc. Intro., Colonel Nolan; Read 1^o MarCriminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act (1887) Repeal (No. 2) Billc. Intro., Mr. Webb; Read 1^o Mar 16,Crofters (see under SCOTLAND)*Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act Amendment Billc. Intro., Dr. Clark; Read 1^o Mar 20,Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Amendment Billc. Intro., Sir W. Wedderburn; Read 1^o 454Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Amendment (County of Bute)c. Intro., Sir C. Cameron; Read 1^o 1379CROMBIE, Mr. J. W., Kincardine, Standing Committee (Scotland), Res. 1168*CROSS, Mr. A., Glasgow, Camlachie, Scotland—County Council St Meetings, 336

Smaller Dwellings (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Standing Committee (Scotland), Res.

Crown Estates (see under Forests, and Land Revenue the Crown)Crown Lands Billc. Intro., Sir J. T. Hibbert; Read 1^o 256
Petitions Mar 19, 588CURRAN, Mr. T. B., Kilkenny, Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Amendment Bill, Intro., 450*CurrencyGermany—Silver Commission.* (Chaplin; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 13, 1
Silver Question and the Eastern T. Mr. Whiteley; A. Sir W. Harcourt 346CURZON, Hon. G. N., Lancashire, Southport

Afghanistan—Sir M. Durand's M Papers, 336

Egypt—Zobeir Pasha, 342

India—Civil Service Examinations, 3

CURZON, Viscount, Bucks, Wycombe, Fire Brigades (Exemption from Jury Bill, Intro., 457

Customs, Excise, and Inland Revenue

Appropriations in Aid, Q. Mr. G. Bowles ; A. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 13, 152

Budget (see under title Ways and Means)

Clubs and Excise Licences, Q. Mr. Dodd ; A. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 30, 1008

"Corkage" at Temperance Hotels, Q. Mr. Bartley ; A. Sir W. Harcourt April 2, 1114

Customs—Statistical Department Allowances, &c., Q. Mr. Grove ; A. Sir J. T. Hibbert Mar 30, 1006

Income Tax

Assessments Return, Q. Mr. Bartley ; A. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 30, 1009

Commissioners, Q. Colonel H. Vincent ; A. Sir J. T. Hibbert April 2, 1100

Debate on, on Motion for Com. of Supply, Mar 30, 1043

CYPRUS

Dr. Grigsby, Q. Major Rasch ; A. Mr. S. Buxton April 3, 1247

DALRYMPLE, Sir C., Ipswich

Scotland—Rev. J. Herkless, 1441

DALZIEL, Mr. J. H., Kirkcaldy, &c.

Business of the House, Res., 1633, 1671

Scottish Legislation, 326

Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 136

Scotland

Home Rule, Res., 1287, 1303

Lord Rosebery's Visit to Edinburgh, 349

School Books, 438, 682

Danube, Mouths of

Q. Mr. G. Bowles ; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 15, 341

DARLING, Mr. C. J., Deptford

Registration Bill, 865

DARWIN, Major L., Staffordshire, Lichfield

Business of the House, Res., 1653, 1655

Christ's Hospital, 1430

Declaration of Paris

Q. Mr. G. Bowles ; A. Sir C. Russell Mar 15, 345

Deep Sea Fisheries (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Mains ; Read 1^o Mar 16, 453

Derelict Vessels (Reports) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Macdonald ; Read 1^o Mar 16, 461

Derelicts in the Atlantic (see Atlantic)DE WORMS, Right Hon. Baron H., Liverpool, East Toxteth

Matabeleland Affairs, Papers Relating to, 147

Swaziland, Cession of, 146

DIAMOND, Mr. C., Monaghan, N.

Labour Commission — Assistant Commissioners' Reports, 338

Post Office—Inland Branch, 1513

DIGBY, Mr. J. K. WINGFIELD-, Dorset, N.

Supply—Education Department and Voluntary Schools, 828

DILKE, Right Hon. Sir C. W., Gloucester, Forest of Dean

Army and Navy Defensive Preparations, Res., 462, 483, 507

Business of the House, 1521 ; Motion for Select Com., 1264, 1268, 1271, 1275, 1276

Canadian Election Dispute, 1453

India—Madras and Bombay Commands, 140

Local Government Act—Overseers and Highway Surveyors, 344

Madagascar—United States Consul, 315

New Battleships Launched in 1893, 560

Newfoundland—Ministerial Crisis, 1581

Supply—Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, 1082, 1086

Disarmament Policy

Q. Sir J. Carmichael ; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 16, 436 ; Q. Sir J. Whitehead ; A. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 30, 1008

Disestablishment

(See under titles SCOTLAND and WALES)

District Councils

(See Parish and District Councils)

DIXON-HARTLAND, Sir F. D., Middlesex, Uxbridge

Census, Cost of, 444

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1501

Thames Conservancy Bill, 2R., 1419, 1425

DODD, Mr. C., Essex, Maldon

Charities of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford, 1587

Charity Commission and the Local Government Act, 1002

Clubs and Excise Licences, 1008

County Magistrates' Returns, 1575

Essex Fishing Grounds—Removal of Cultch, &c., 866, 1003, 1253

Magistrates' Qualification Bill, Res., 1092

Mining Royalties—Rents and Wayleaves, Res., 1542

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1341, 1342

Supply—Board Schools, &c., 820

Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's Speech, 89

DOMINICA, ISLAND OF

Report of Sir Robert Hamilton, Res., Earl of Stamford, Marquess of Ripon Mar 15, 300

DONELAN, Captain A. J. C., Cork, E.
Ireland

American Mail Route, 1506
Cork—Sunday Outdoor Preaching, 1517
Curragh Buildings—Killaloe Slates, 1108
Haulbowline Dockyard—Repairs of H.M. Ships, 316
Labourers' Cottages at Youghal, 328
Soldiers Unloading Coal at Spike Island, 1450

Town Parks (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 453

Dover Pier Dues

Q. Mr. G. Bowles; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 19, 578

DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W. H., Kent, Dartford

Highbury Vale School, 1591
Supply—Voluntary Schools, &c., 821, 823
Thames Conservancy Bill, 2R., 1424

Dynamite Prisoners (see under Law and Justice and Police)EAST INDIA (see INDIA)*East London Water Bill

c. Read 2^o April 5, 1381
Statement (Mr. J. Stuart) April 6, 1505

Eastbourne School Accommodation (see under Education)Ecclesiastical Commission

Copy pres. Mar 12, 128

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND & WALES)

Lord President of the Council—Earl of KIMBERLEY

Vice President—Mr. A. H. D. ACLAND

Camberwell School Accommodation, Q. Mr.
E. H. Bayley; A. Mr. Acland Mar 19, 562

Circulars Asking for Subscriptions in Lieu of Fees (References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 15, 378)

Code of 1894—Copies pres. Mar 19, 676

Eastbourne School Accommodation, Qs. Mr.
Channing, Mr. Bartley, As. Mr. Acland
Mar 15, 336

Elementary Education—Requirements of the Education Department (References to, in Debate on Supply Mar 15, 378)

Elementary Schools—Grants, &c., Copy pres.
Mar 29, 1000

Evening Schools Code, Copy pres. Mar 29, 1000

Flitwick School Board, Q. Sir J. Fergusson;
A. Mr. Acland Mar 19, 561

Gresham University Commission, Report, &c., Q. Mr. C. Williams; A. Mr. Asquith
Mar 22, 867; Q. Sir A. Rollit; A. Sir W.
Harcourt Mar 29, 905

Notice of Res. (Sir A. Rollit) Mar 30, 1009

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (LAND & WALES)—cont.

Highbury Vale School, Q. Sir W. H. I.
A. Mr. Acland April 9, 1591

Inspectors, Elementary School Teachers
Qs. Mr. Jacoby, Mr. Grove; As. Mr. A.
Mar 15, 329

Intemperance, Illustrated Lessons on,
J. Whitehead; A. Mr. Acland Mar
1005

Liscard (Cheshire) School, Q. Sir J. I.
head; A. Mr. Acland Mar 15, 309

Matlock British School, Q. Sir J. I.
head; A. Mr. Acland Mar 15, 309

Non-Board School Improvements, Res.
R. Temple) Mar 29, 958

Public Elementary Schools Return, C.
Cobb; A. Mr. Acland Mar 15, 311

Secondary Education—Commission, Q.
Talbot, Viscount Cranborne; As. Mr. A.
April 9, 1583

Teachers

Elementary School Teachers as Insps.
Qs. Mr. Jacoby, Mr. Grove; As.
Acland Mar 15, 329

Elementary Teachers, Scarcity of,
H. Foster; A. Mr. Acland Mar 20,

Thrift in Elementary Schools, Q. M.
Roundell; A. Mr. Acland April 6, 11

Training Colleges (References to, in I. on Supply, Mar 15, 386, 390)

Voluntary Schools

Finance, Q. Mr. H. Foster; A. Mr. A.
Mar 20, 692

Grants Withheld, Q. Mr. H. Foster
Mr. Acland Mar 20, 693

(Reference to, in Debate on Supply, M.
801, &c.)

Wales

Endowed Schools Act, 1889, and Am.
Arts and Welsh Intermediate Edu.
Act, 1889, Copy pres. Mar 29, 1000

School Inspectors, Q. Mr. Kenyon,
Acland April 6, 1505

"Warned" Schools, Qs. Viscount borne; As. Mr. Acland Mar 13,
Mar 15, 345

Worcestershire—Cotteridge School, Q.
Temple; A. Mr. Acland Mar 16, 446

EGYPT

Zubahr Pasha, Q. Mr. Curzon, A.
Grey Mar 15, 342

Elementary Education (Exemption School Attendance) Bill

c. Intro., Sir R. Temple; Read 1^o Mar 11

ELLIS, Mr. J. E., Nottingham, Cliffe

Business of the House—Motion for
Com., 1272

Charity Commission (Parliamentary Co.
Res., 1009, 1016, 1017, 1023

Coal Mines, Explosions in, 314

Local Government Act, 1894, Copies of Places of Worship (Sites) Bill, Res., 67

Post Office Savings Bank Act, 658
Railway Servants, Injuries to—Return

MR. T. E. (Lord of the Treasury), Merionethshire
Sheshire, New Writ for, 296 of Commons—Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms—Expenses Return, 852

Education and Immigration

Paupers' Returns, Q. Mr. J. Lowther ;
 Mr. Mundella Mar 15, 549
Travellers' Information Office, Q. Mr. Hogan ;
 Mr. S. Buxton Mar 20, 686

Travellers' Liability Bill

Mr. Seton-Karr ; Read 1^o April 3, 1894

Education Acts (see under Education)

Small Arms Factory (see under ARMY—Factories)

DE, Sir T. G., Kerry, W.
 and—Tralee and Dingle Railway, 143

Fishing Grounds (see under Fisheries)

TT, Mr. R. L., Suffolk, Woodbridge

ie Tax, 1058
 Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1335, 2 and Agriculture, Depression of—endt. to Address in Answer to Queen's

 Speech, 119

Land Tenants Commission (see under IRELAND)

Liberty of the Press (Liberia)

pres. Mar 19, 676

Land Act (1889) Amendment Bill

Mr. Greene ; Read 1^o Mar 16, 455

Labour Acts (see under Labour Department)

Factories and Workshops Act (1891) Amendment Bill

Sir H. James ; Read 1^o Mar 21, 853

Travellers' Holiday (Scotland) Bill

Mr. Napier ; Read 1^o Mar 16, 461

HARSON, Dr. R., Aberdeenshire,

Estimates—Land Forces, 549
 Houses in London, 1508
 Limerick Cattle Trade, 866
 Foreign, 694

FARQUHARSON, Mr. H. R., Dorset, W.
 Uniforms Bill, Intro., 450

Fatal Accidents Inquiry (Scotland) Bill

Intro., Mr. J. B. Balfour ; Read 1^o April 9, 1688

Featherstone Riots — Compensation Claims

Q. Mr. Nussey ; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 19, 576

FELLOWES, Hon. A. E., Hunts, Ramsey

Anthrax, 1250

FENWICK, Mr. C., Northumberland, Wansbeck

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1371
 Queen's Speech, Reply to, 41

FERGUSON, Right Hon. Sir J., Manchester, N.E.

Flitwick School Board, 561
 Queen's Speech, Reply to, 121
 Scotland—Church, Disestablishment of, 121
 Uganda—Sir G. Portal's Report, 141

FRENCH, Mr. P., Wexford, S.

Ireland
 Evictions, 697
 Slaney Fisheries, 1571

FIELD, Admiral E., Sussex, Eastbourne

Army and Navy—Defensive Preparations,
 Res., 502

Behring Sea Award Bill, Com., 1681

Navy
 Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 621
 Reserves, 664

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 778, 779

FIELD, Mr. W., Dublin, St. Patrick's

Civil Service, Res., 919, 941
 Clubs Registration (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 787
 German Prison Labour—Importation of Goods into England, 341

Ireland

Agriculture, Board of, 346, 686
 Board of Irish Lights, 572
 Dublin Post Office—Promotions, 690
 Dublin Veterinary College, 345
 Education Act, 334
 Haulbowline Dockyard, 1006
 Irish-Speaking Magistrates, 565
 Lisburn Registrar of Deaths, 679
 Manuscripts, Grants for Publication of, 582
 Public Libraries Act, 334
 Waterford Lunatic Asylum, 565

Irish Education Act (1892) Amendment
 Bill, Intro., 787

Queen's Speech
 Dynamite Prisoners, 225
 Ireland, Administration of, 293

Solicitors (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 787
 Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—
 Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's
 Speech, 92

Tuberculosis Commission Report, 340

Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland

Q. Mr. J. Redmond; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 13, 155; Q. Mr. Cochrane; A. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 16, 350; Q. Mr. Clancy; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 19, 570

FINUCANE, Mr. J., Limerick, E.

Irish Lights Board Constitution Bill, Intro., 453

Fire Brigades (Exemption from Service) Bill

c. Intro., Viscount Curzon; Read 1° Mar 16, 457

Fisheries

British Herrings in Russia—Certificates of Origin, Q. Mr. Buchanan; A. Sir E. Grey April 9, 1576

Essex Fishing Grounds—Removal of Culch, &c., Q. Mr. Dodd; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 22, 866; Qs. Mr. Dodd, Mr. Round; Aa. Mr. Mundella Mar 30, 1003; Qs. Major Rasch, Mr. Dodd; Aa. Mr. Mundella April 3, 1253

FITZWYGRAM, General Sir F., South Hants, Fareham

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 548
Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—
Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's
Speech, 94

FLETCHER, Sir H., Sussex, Lewes

Army Ranges for the Lee-Metford Rifle, 1098

FLYNN, Mr. J. C., Cork, N.

Ireland
Cork—Sunday Disturbances, 1590
Labourers' Cottages at Youghal, 329
Paupers Deportation (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 453

Food Adulteration Bill

c. Intro., Mr. W. Isaacson; Read 1° Mar 19, 676

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Secretary of State—Earl of ROSEBURY
Under Secretary of State—Sir E. GREY (See under names of Foreign Countries)

Foreign and Colonial Meat Bill

c. Intro., Sir A. Acland-Hood; Read 1° Mar 16, 453

Foreign and Colonial Meat (No. 2) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Jeffreys; Read 1° Mar 16, 455
2R., Debate adjourned April 4, 1374

Foreign Goods (Mark of Origin) Bill

c. Intro., Colonel H. Vincent; Read 1° Mar 16, 457

Foreign Meat (see under Agriculture)Foreign Meat Bill

a. Intro., Mr. Lambert; Read 1° Mar 20, 76

Foreign Shell Fish Bill

c. Intro., Major Rasch; Read 1° Mar 16, 4

FORWOOD, Right Hon. A. B., L. cashire, Ormskirk

Indian Troopships—"Bothnia," 574

Navy

Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 64
Ironclads at Sea, 575
"Victoria" Disaster, &c., 744

FOSTER, Mr. H. S., Suffolk, Lowest

Elementary School Teachers, Scarcity 691 Supply—Elementary Education—Requ
ments of the Education Department, 3
Voluntary Schools, 692, 693

FOSTER, Sir B. W. (Secretary, Lc Government Board), Derby, Ilke

Local Government Provisional Order B
Intro., 254, 895, 1688

FOWLER, Right Hon. H. H. (Sec tary of State for India), Wolt hampton, E.

Afghanistan—Sir M. Durand's Mission
Papers, 336

India

Balaithun Murder Case, 1095
Civil Service Examinations, 335
Councils Act, Return, 1093
Import Duties—Cotton Goods, &c., 347, 444, 564, 1440
Kunhi Kannan, Mr. C., Charge agai
1094
Madras and Bombay Commands, 141
Opium Commission, Cost of, 677
Public Service Commission, 316
Railway Contracts, 153, 439
Religious Impartiality, 1447
Riots—Instructions as to Blank and Cartridges, 1093
Staff Corps—Promotions, 1099
Tariff Bill, 440
Text-Books in Schools, 1447
Queen's Speech—Indian Finance, 214, 21.

Supply

Cholera Precautions, 366
Legation and Consular Buildings in Ch
Indian Contribution to, 1086, 1088

Fox, Dr. J. F., King's Co., Tullam

Ireland—Training Ships, 685

FRANCE

Declaration of Paris, Q. Mr. G. Bowles;
Sir C. Russell Mar 15, 845

Sierra Leone—Conflict between French & British Forces, Qs. Captain Bagot, Sir Ashmead-Bartlett; Aa. Sir E. Grey Mar 1874

Franco-Siamese Question

Papers, &c., Q. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett ;
A. Sir E. Grey Mar 22, 868
Debate on, on Motion for Com. of Supply,
Mar 30, 1060

FREEMAN-MITFORD, Mr. A. B., Warwick, Stratford

Business of the House, Res., 1659
Supply—National Gallery, 833

Freemantle's, Sir C., Committee

Q. Viscount Wolmer ; A. Sir J. T. Hibbert
April 5, 1448

Fruit Identification Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Hozier ; Read 1^o Mar 16, 454

GARDNER, Right Hon. H. (President of the Board of Agriculture), Essex, Saffron Walden

Anthrax, 1251
Canadian Cattle Trade, 866
Foreign Meat, 141, 694, 1254, 1569
Margarine Act, 441
Queen's Speech—Depression of Trade and Agriculture, 114

GERMANY

Export Trade, Q. Colonel H. Vincent ; A. Mr. Mundella April 5, 1456
Prison Labour — Importation of Goods into England, Q. Mr. Field ; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 15, 341 ; Qs. Colonel H. Vincent, Mr. Brunner ; As. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Mundella April 2, 1103 ; Q. Mr. Conybeare ; A. Mr. Mundella April 5, 1458
Russo-German Commercial Treaty, Q. Mr. J. W. Lowther ; A. Sir E. Grey April 2, 1097 ; Q. Mr. Holland ; A. Sir E. Grey April 6, 1514
Silver Commission, Q. Mr. Chaplin ; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 13, 155

GIBBS, Mr. A. G. H., London

London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Bill, 2R., 1217
Patent Agents Bill, Intro., 451 ; 2R., 1373
Thames Conservancy Bill, 2R., 1424

GIBNEY, Mr. J., Meath, N.

Ireland
Navan Revision Court, 681
O'Connor, Mr. M. W., 445

GILHOOLY, Mr. J., Cork Co., W.

Guardians of the Poor (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 451
Ireland
Bantry Bay Military Works, 685
Loans to Tenants, 577, 874
Training Ships, 685

GLADSTONE, Mr. H. J. (First Commissioner of Works), Leeds, W.

House of Commons Structural Arrangements, 905
Parliament Houses—Gas Consumption, 1592
Pistols and Revolvers—Accidents, Res., 1042, 1043
Royal Parks, Bands in, 1252
South Kensington Museum—Façade, 1515
Supply
Bethnal Green Museum, 1080, 1081
British Museum, 1066, 1067, 1068, 1071
Buckingham Palace, 968
Cairo Agency House, 1091
Extension of Admiralty Buildings, 984, 985, 993
Holyrood Palace, 968
House of Commons—Accommodation of Members, 884
Houses of Parliament, 980, 982, 983
Imperial Institute, 1071, 1081
Legation and Consular Buildings in China, Indian Contribution to, 1082, 1086, 1088, 1089
Royal Palaces, 968, 969, 970
Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 972, 976
South Kensington Museum, 1079, 1080, 1081
Victoria Tower, National Flag on, 702

Gladstone, Right Hon. W. E.—Retirement from Office

(Reference to, in Debate in Reply to the Queen's Speech, Mar 12, 37, 49, 61, 72 ; Mar 13, 166, 190)

GODSON, Mr. A. F., Kidderminster
Supply—Voluntary Schools, 824

GOLDSMID, Sir J., St. Pancras, S.
Supply

Houses of Parliament, 983
South Kensington Museum, 1071, 1074, 1077

(Rulings as Deputy Chairman)

Supply, 967, 984
Vote on Account, 831, 840, 842, 843, 844, 848, 850

GOLDSWORTHY, Major-General W. T., Hammersmith

Income Tax, 1054
Non-Board School Improvements, 962

GORST, Right Hon. Sir J. E., Cambridge University

Business of the House, Res., 1663
Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 627
Merchant Shipping—Undermanning, 1105
Naval Establishments, Working Hours in, 321
Peers at Elections, 349
Straits Settlements—Military Contribution, 573

Supply
Appropriations in Aid, 375, 376, 377
County Courts, 375

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J., St. George's, Hanover Square

Budget, 1114, 1675
 Business of the House, 271
 Civil Service, Res., 934, 936
 East London Water Bill, 2R., 1399, 1416
 Navy Estimates, 784

Government Contracts

Admiralty Contracts (see under title NAVY)
Army Contracts (see under ARMY)

Government Insurances and Annuities
Accounts pres. Mar 29, 999GREENE, Mr. H. D., *Shrewsbury
Factors' Act (1889) Amendment Bill, Intro., 455Gresham University — Commission, Report, &c.

Q. Mr. C. Williams ; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 22, 867 ; Q. Sir A. Rollit ; A. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 29, 905
 Notice of Res. (Sir A. Rollit) Mar 30, 1009

GREY, Sir E. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Northumberland, Berwick

Africa
 Anglo-Portuguese Treaty, 695
 Delagoa Bay Railway, 1451
 Kerckhoven's Expedition, 1576
 Lado—Congo Free State Expedition, &c., 699
 Manica Plateau and the Portuguese, 584
 Sierra Leone—Conflict between French and English Forces, 695
 Uganda—Sir G. Portal's Report, &c., 142, 344, 1516, 1581
 Unyoro and Colonel Colville, 700
 Zambesi—Collision with Portuguese Troops, 583

Atlantic, Derelicts in, 444
Behring Sea Award Bill, 1574
Brazilian Civil War, 331
 Loss of British Officers, 867, 868
Burmese Frontier—Cession of Kiang Hung, 1098
Chili Convention, Ratification of, 448
Danube, Mouths of, 342
Disarmament Policy, 436
Egypt—Zobehr Pasha, 342
Franco-Siamese Question—Papers, 868, 1063, 1064
Germany—Silver Commission, 155
Madagascar—United States Consul, 315
Russia—British Herrings, 1576
Russo-German Commercial Treaty, 1098, 1514
Samoa, British Warships at, 1097

Supply
 Capitulations in Turkey, 1090, 1091
 Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, 1083, 1090, 1091
 Franco-Siamese Question, &c., 835
 Uganda, 401, 402, 403, 404
 Switzerland—Habitual Inebriates, 333
 Venezuela, Diplomatic Relations with, 1429

Grocers' Certificates (Scotland) Abolition Bill

c. Intro., Sir J. Leng ; Read 1° Mar 20, 788

Grocers' Licences Abolition Bill

c. Intro., Mr. D. Thomas ; Read 1° April 1504

Ground Game Act (1880) Amendment Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Billson ; Read 1° Mar 16, 453

Ground Game Act (1880) Extension Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Lambert ; Read 1° Mar 23, 786

GROVE, Mr. T. N. A., West Ham, N.

Customs—Statistical Department—Allowances, &c., 1006
 East London Water Bill, 2R., 1407
 Elementary School Teachers as Inspectors, 330
 Temperance Canteens, 1591

Guardians of the Poor (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Gilhooly ; Read 1° Mar 16, 451

Habitual Inebriates—Committee's Report

Q. Mr. Lees Knowles ; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 15, 332

HALSBURY, Lord

Charitable Trusts Acts Amendment Bill, Pres., 1565
 Supreme Court of Judicature (Procedure) Bill, 2R., 298

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord G., Middlesex, Ealing

Banstead Common, 1582
 Business of the House—Financial Business, 270

Navy

Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 656
 Expenditure—Manning, &c., 767
 Reserves, 674

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1497

HANBURY, Mr. R. W., *PrestonArmy

Armour-Piercing Projectiles Contracts, 1517
 Factories—Eight Hours Day, 151
 Waltham Abbey Powder Factory Explosion Inquiry, 154

Army (Annual) Bill, 906, 1114

Brazilian Civil War, 332

Convictions, Records of, 1001

Law Officers (Private Practice), 535 ; Res., 941, 944, 945, 946, 947, 949, 950, 953

HANBURY, Mr. R. W.—cont.

Navy

Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 611, 649
H.M.S. "Crescent," 442
Lee-Metford Rifle, 443
Stonehouse Marine Barracks—Alleged
Assault by an Officer, 320
Stores, Inspection of, 314
Torpedo Boat "Havock"—Disclosure of Plans, 434

Parliament

Business of the House, 269, 270; Motion for Select Com., 1276; Res., 1642
Privilege—Lord Rosebery's Speech at
Edinburgh, Res., 593
Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1503
Pistols and Revolvers Accidents, Res., 1039

Supply

Appropriations in Aid, 376
British Museum, 1065, 1069
Buckingham Palace, 965
Colonial Office—South African Telegrams,
363
Dangerous Trades, 361
Elementary Education—Requirements of the Education Department, 384, 385
Extension of Admiralty Buildings, 990
High Commissioner of the Cape Government, 405
House of Commons Offices, 351
House of Commons Offices, Commission on,
354, 356
House of Lords Offices, 799
Houses of Parliament, 983
Kew Gardens, 973
Law Charges—Cordite Dispute, 366, 368
Legation and Consular Buildings in China, Indian Contribution to, 1081;
Res., 1085, 1087
Metropolitan Police Courts, 998
Vote on Account, 804

Harbours of Refuge—East Coast of Yorkshire

Q. Mr. Holden; A. Mr. Mundella April 5, 1445

HARCOURT, RIGHT HON. SIR W. G.
V. (Chancellor of the Exchequer),
Derby

Appropriations in Aid, 153
Army (Annual) Bill, 855
Behring Sea Award Bill, 1596, 1684
Budget, 1114, 1584
Charity Commission (Parliamentary Control),
Res., 1023, 1025
Charity Commissioner, Parliamentary, 869
Cholera Precautions, 1584
Civil Service, Res., 927, 937
Clubs and Excise Licences, 1008
"Corkage" at Temperance Hotels, 1114
Disarmament Question, 1008
Financial Relations—Scotland and the United Kingdom, 350
Gresham University Commission Report, 905
Income Tax, 1050, 1051
Returns, 1009
India—Import Duty, 328
Law Officers (Private Practice), Res., 586,
944, 945, 946, 953

[cont.

HARCOURT, Right Hon. Sir W. G. V.—cont.

Magistracy, County—Property Qualification,
703

Navy

Reserve, 674
"Victoria" Disaster, 737

Navy Estimates, 784

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1363,
1368, 1370

Parliament

Business of the House, 156, 267, 268, 270,
271, 327, 449, 586, 587, 1595, 1675; Res., 1596, 1598, 1599, 1600, 1607, 1646, 1673,
1674, 1675

Deputy Speaker, 1255

Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills,
131, 135, 136, 156, 160, 161, 162

Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, Motion for Select Com., 784

Private Members' Days, 154

Privilege—Lord Rosebery's Speech at
Edinburgh, 348; Res., 593

Sittings and Adjournments of the House—
Alteration of Date of Meeting, Obs., 785

Twelve o'Clock Rule, Suspension of, 1380

Queen's Speech, Reply to, 61, 71, 73, 206, 207, 253, 295

Administration of the Law in Ireland, 246
Gladstone, Right Hon. W. E.—Retirement
from Office, 61

House of Lords, 257

Scotland—Railway Communication in Ross-shire, 1255

Silver Question and the Eastern Trade, 347

Supply

House of Commons Offices, Committee on, 883, 884

Houses of Parliament, 978

Kitchen and Refreshment Committee, 882

Voluntary Schools. &c., 813, 814

Vote on Account, 349, 805

Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—
Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's
Speech, 110

HARDIE, Mr. J. K., West Ham, S.

Admiralty Contracts—Harland and Wolff's
Labourers, 440

HARLAND, Sir E. J., Belfast, N.

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 764

"Victoria" Disaster, 703, 716, 718, 719, 721

HARRINGTON, Mr. T., Dublin, Harbour

Queen's Speech, Reply to, 179

Administration of the Law in Ireland, 244,
280, 284, 290

Dynamite Prisoners, 234

Gladstone, Right Hon. W. E.—Retirement
from Office, 72

Home Rule, 71, 73

HAWKESBURY, Lord

Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 13

HAYDEN, Mr. L. P., Roscommon, S.

- Ireland
 - Civil Service Retirement, 874
 - De Freyne Evictions, 873
 - Dillon's, Lord, Evictions, 879
 - Finnor Postal Facilities, 863
 - Walsh, Michael, Convict, 875
- Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 455

HAYTER, Sir A. D., Walsall

- Army Estimates—Land Forces, 541

HEALY, Mr. M., Cork

- Ireland
 - Cork—Sunday Disturbances, 1588
 - Police Clothing Contracts, 340
 - Post Office Clothing Contracts, 339, 1441

HEALY, Mr. T. M., Louth, N.

- Chili Convention, Ratification of, 447
- Ireland
 - Arran Islands, 1511
 - Clare County, Crime in, 324
 - Donegal Sessional Crown Solicitor, 678
 - Phoenix Park—Vehicular Traffic, 575
- Parliament
 - Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 130, 133
 - Questions in the House—Fermoy Union Accounts, 322
- Queen's Speech, Reply to
 - Administration of the Law in Ireland, 245
 - Dynamite Prisoners, 238
 - House of Lords, 265

HEATON, Mr. J. H., Canterbury

- Delagoa Bay Railway, 1451
- Express Messenger Service, 138
- International Telegraphic Code, 303

HENEAGE, Right Hon. E., Great Grimsby

- Business of the House, Res., 1639, 1673
- Cholera Precautions, 1584
- Parish Councils, 1577

HERBERT, Hon. S., Croydon

- Supply
 - Extension of Admiralty Buildings, 985
 - Houses of Parliament, 984

HERSCHELL, LORD (Lord Chancellor)

- Copyhold Consolidation Bill, Pres., 137
- Law of Inheritance Amendment Bill, Pres., 1566
- Limitation of Actions Bill, Pres., 1565
- Quarter Sessions (Midsummer) Bill, Pres., 137; 2R., 299
- Queen's Speech, 2
- Supreme Court of Judicature (Procedure) Bill, Pres., 137; 2R., 297, 299

HIBBERT, Right Hon. Sir J. T. (Secretary to the Treasury), Oldham

- Army (Annual) Bill, 1R., 851
- Civil Service
 - Compulsory Retirement, 1106
 - New Treasury Rules, 1112

HIBBERT, Right Hon. Sir J. T.—cont.

- Civil Service—cont.
 - Second Division Clerks, 684; Res., 928, 936
 - Sir C. Freemantle's Committee, 1448
- Coastguard Stations—Life-Saving Apparatus, 308
- Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill, Com., & Crown Estates, 1254
- Crown Lands Bill, Intro., 255
- Customs—Statistical Department—Accounts, &c., 1006
- Income Tax Commissioners, 1100
- Ireland
 - Ballina and Killala Light Railway, 87
 - Bangor Pier and Harbour Works, 1509
 - Clogher Valley Tramway, 368
 - Dublin Customs House, 1573
 - Dublin Registry of Deeds Office, 1515
 - Galway and Clifden Railway, 148
 - Loans to Tenants, 577, 874
 - Manuscripts, Grants for the Publication of, 582
 - Phoenix Park, Vehicular Traffic in, 576
 - Queen's Colleges, Compulsory Retirement in, 1248
 - Skibbereen Custom House, 1573
 - Stranorlar and Glenties Railway, 1102
 - "Parliamentary Debates" Index, 1444
- Rich's, Colonel, Pension, 685
- Scotland—Edinburgh Castle Rock, 1449

Supply

- Appropriations in Aid, 375, 376
- British Museum, &c., 832, 833, 1065
- County Courts, 375
- Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, 10
- House of Commons Offices, 351
- Commission on, 352, 356, 357, 358, 3
- House of Lords Offices, 800
- Metropolitan Police Courts, 994, 996, 998
- National Gallery, 833
- Petitions to the House of Commons, 3
- Plurality of Appointments, 353, 355, 7
- Royal New Observatory, 970
- Vote on Account, 806

HICKMAN, Sir A., Wolverhampton, Indian Railway Contracts, 153, 439

HILL, Right Hon. A., Staffordshire Kingswinford

- Behring Sea Award Bill, 2R., 1486

HOBHOUSE, Mr. H., Somerset, E.

- Local Government Act—Overseers and Highway Surveyors, 344

HOGAN, Mr. J. F., Tipperary, Mid.

- Emigrants' Information Office, 686
- West Indian and South American Mails

HOLDEN, Mr. A., York, E.R., Buck

- Harbours of Refuge, 1445

HOLLAND, Mr. W. H., Salford, N.

- Russo-German Commercial Treaty, 1314

HOME DEPARTMENT

Secretary of State—Mr. ASQUITH

Under Secretary of State—Mr. G. W. E. RUSSELL

(See under title Law and Justice and Police, &c.)

Home Office—Licence Fees

Q. Mr. G. Bowles; A. Mr. Asquith April 5, 1445

Home Rule for Scotland (see under SCOTLAND)

Hop Substitutes Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Brookfield; Read 1^o Mar 29, 999

HOPWOOD, Mr. C. H., Lancashire, S.E., Middleton

Compulsory Vaccination Abolition Bill, Intro., 452

Prevention of Cruelty to Children Bill, 2R., 1378

Vaccination—Legislation, 683

HOULDSWORTH, Sir W. H., Manchester, N.W.

Companies Act (1862) Amendment Bill, Intro., 452

Hours of Labour (Local Authorities, &c.) Servants Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Macdonald; Read 1^o April 3, 1316

Housing of the Working Classes Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Stern; Read 1^o Mar 16, 459

HOWARD, Mr. J., Middlesex, Tottenham

Music and Dancing Licences (Middlesex) Bill, Intro., 452; 2R., 1376

HOWELL, Mr. G., Bethnal Green, N.E.

Charity Commission (Parliamentary Control), Res., 1013

Corporate Associations (Property) Bill, Res., 1092

H.M.S. "Crescent," 443

Industrial and Provident Societies Act (1893) Amendment Bill, Res., 785

Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 161

London Streets and Buildings Bill, 1107; Select Com., 1426

Navy—Engine-Room Artificers, 776

Parliamentary Elections Bill, Intro., 456

Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee, 1212

Supply—House of Commons Offices, 352, 358

Trade Union Reports, 564

HOZIER, Mr. J. H. C., Lanarkshire, S.

Fruit Identification Bill, Intro., 454

Parliament

Business of the House—Financial Business, 269

New Writ for Berwickshire, 296

Scotland

Disestablishment, 696

Hamilton Brigade Depôt, 142

Home Rule, Res., 1297

Parochial Grants, 142

Private Bill Legislation, 691

Rosebery's, Lord, Visit to Edinburgh, 348

Standing Committee (Scotland). Res., 1141

Veterinary College Grant, 346

HUGHES, Colonel E., Woolwich

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1409

Public Buildings (London) Bill, Intro., 460; 2R., 1315

HUNTER, Mr. W. A., Aberdeen, N.

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1369

HUTCHINSON, Captain W. G. GRICE-, Aston Manor

Army—Discharged and Reserve Soldiers, Employment for. Res., 519

Coroners' Act (1887) Amendment Bill, Intro., 458

Income Tax (see Customs, &c., and Ways and Means)

INDIA

Secretary of State—Earl of KIMBERLEY

Under Secretary of State—Mr. H. H. FOWLER

Afghanistan—Sir M. Durand's Mission—Papers, Q. Mr. Curzon; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 15, 336

Army

Dum Dum Murder—Private O'Hara, Q. Mr. Caine; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 5, 1438

Madras and Bombay Commands, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 13, 140

Staff Corps—Promotion, Q. Mr. Talbot; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler April 2, 1099

Troopships, Q. Mr. Forwood; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 19, 574; Q. Mr. Baker; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth April 6, 1507

Baladhun Murder Case, Q. Mr. Caine; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler April 2, 1094

Burmese Frontier—Kiang Hung, Cession of, to China, Q. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett; A. Sir E. Grey April 2, 1098

Civil Service Examinations, Q. Mr. Curzon; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 15, 335

Councils Act, Return, Q. Mr. Caine; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler April 2, 1093

Contribution to Legation and Consular Buildings in China—References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 30, 1081

Dum-Dum Murder (see under sub-heading Army)

[cont.]

INDIA—cont.

Finance

Cotton and other Import Duties, Qs. Sir D. Macfarlane, Mr. Whiteley; As. Mr. H. H. Fowler, Sir W. Harcourt Mar 15, 327; Q. Colonel H. Vincent; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 15, 347; Qs. Sir M. Stewart, Mr. Wickham; As. Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 16, 443; Q. Sir D. Macfarlane; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 19, 564; Qs. Sir D. Macfarlane, Mr. Whiteley; As. Mr. H. H. Fowler April 5, 1440

Res., in Debate in Reply to Queen's Speech, Mar 13, 208

Kunhi Kannan, Mr. C., Charges against, Q. Mr. Caine; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler April 2, 1094

Opium Commission

Copy pres. Mar 13, 255

Cost of, Qs. Sir G. Chesney, Sir D. Macfarlane; As. Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 20, 677

Pensions, Return pres. Mar 13, 256

Public Service Commission, Q. Sir W. Wedderburn; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 15, 316

Railway Contracts, Qs. Sir A. Hickman; As. Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 13, 153; Mar 16, 439

Religious Impartiality, Q. Sir W. Wedderburn; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler April 5, 1447

Riots, Instructions as to Blank and Ball Cartridges, Q. Mr. Caine; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler April 2, 1093

Tariff Bill, Q. Mr. Buchanan; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 16, 440

Text-Books in Schools, Q. Sir W. Wedderburn; A. Mr. H. H. Fowler April 5, 1447

Industrial and Provident Societies Act (1893) Amendment Bill

e. Intro. (Mr. Howell); Read 1^o Mar 20, 785

Inebriates (see under Habitual Inebriates Committee)

Intoxicating Liquors (Licences) Bill

e. Intro., Sir H. Roscoe; Read 1^o Mar 16, 456

Intoxicating Liquors Local Veto (Ireland) Bill

e. Intro., Mr. W. Johnston; Read 1^o Mar 16, 455

IRELAND

Lord Lieutenant—Lord HOUGHTON

Chief Secretary—Mr. J. MORLEY

Agriculture, Board of, Q. Mr. Field; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 15, 346; Qs. Mr. Field, Mr. Clancy; As. Mr. J. Morley Mar 20, 686

Army

Bantry Bay Fortifications Works, Q. Mr. Gilhooly; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 20, 685

IRELAND—cont.

Army—cont.

Curragh Building—Killaloe Slates, Captain Donelan; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 2, 1108

Mullingar Water Supply, Q. Dr. Kenn A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 330

Soldiers' Institutes in Dublin, Q. Mr. O'Connor; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 2, 1113

Soldiers Unloading Coal at Spike Island, Q. Captain Donelan; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 6, 1450

Tuffe, Edward, Case of, Q. Mr. Bodk A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 1572

Arran Island, Distress in, Q. Mr. Sheeh A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 15, 319

Evictions (see under that sub-heading)

Bungor Pier and Harbour Works, Q. I M'Cartan; A. Sir J. T. Hibbert April 1509

Belfast Harbour and Wolff's Shipyards, Q. Mr. K. Hardie; A. Sir Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 16, 440

Boycotting—Kells, Qs. Mr. Carson, Mr. J. Kenny; As. Mr. J. Morley April 2, 1109

Church Fund, Qs. Mr. W. Kenny, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Bartley; As. Mr. J. Morley Mar 1 581

Civil Service Retirement, Q. Mr. Hayden; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 22, 874

Clare Assizes—Mr. Justice O'Brien's Remarks (References to in Debate on Suppl. Mar 22, 886)

Clare, Crime in, Qs. Mr. W. Kenny, Mr. T. J. Healy, Mr. Arnold-Forster, Mr. Sexton, Mr. J. Kenny; As. Mr. J. Morley Mar 15, 323

Clogher Valley Tramway, Q. Mr. M'Gilligan A. Sir J. T. Hibbert Mar 19, 567

Cork—Outdoor Sunday Preaching, Qs. M. Barton, Captain Donelan, Mr. T. J. Russell, Mr. M. Austin, Mr. W. O'Brien, Mr. Crean; As. Mr. J. Morley April 6, 151 Qs. Mr. Arnold-Forster, Mr. Carson, Mr. J. Healy, Mr. W. Kenny, Mr. Flynn, Mr. Sexton, Mr. T. W. Russell; As. Mr. Morley, Mr. Speaker April 9, 1588

Custom House

Dublin, Q. Mr. M'Cartan; A. Sir J. Hibbert April 9, 1573

Shibbereen, Q. Mr. E. Barry; A. Sir J. Hibbert April 9, 1572

Distraints

Cattle Seizures in County Tyrone, Q. J. Mac Neill; A. Mr. J. Morley April 1593

Donegal Sessional Crown Solicitor, Q. J. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 20, 4

Dublin

Phoenix Park, Vehicular Traffic in, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Sexton; As. Sir T. Hibbert Mar 19, 575

Post Office (see under that sub-heading)

Registry of Deeds Office, Q. Mr. Plunkett; A. Sir J. T. Hibbert April 1515

Veterinary College, Q. Mr. Field; A. J. Morley Mar 15, 345

{ cont.

{ cont.

IRELAND—cont.

Dynamite Prisoners (see under title Law and Justice and Police)

Education

Books, Qs. Mr. Bodkin; As. Mr. J. Morley
April 5, 1434; April 9, 1578

Education Act, Q. Mr. Field; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 15, 334

Irish Language, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 19, 583

Monitors, Q. Mr. Bodkin; A. Mr. J. Morley
April 5, 1434

Queen's Colleges, Compulsory Retirement in, Q. Mr. Pinkerton; A. Sir J. T. Hibbert April 3, 1247

Evictions, Qs. Mr. Ffrench, Mr. Knox, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Clancy, Colonel Waring; As. Mr. J. Morley Mar 20, 697

Arran Islands, Q. Mr. Sexton; A. Mr. J. Morley April 5, 1459; Qs. Mr. Sexton, Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. Mr. J. Morley April 6, 1511

De Freyne Estate—Evictions and Prosecutions, Q. Mr. Hayden; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 22, 873

Dillon's, Lord, Estate, Q. Mr. Hayden; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 22, 879

Evicted Tenants—Legislation, Q. Mr. Clancy; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 19, 582; Q. Mr. Sexton; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 20, 703

Financial Relations, Q. Mr. J. Redmond; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 13, 155; Q. Mr. Clancy; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 19, 570

Fisheries

Slaney, Q. Mr. Ffrench; A. Mr. J. Morley April 9, 1571

Government Contracts

Killaloe Slates, Q. Captain Donelan; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 2, 1108

Police Clothing, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 15, 340

Post Office Clothing, Qs. Mr. M. Healy; As. Mr. A. Morley Mar 15, 339; April 5, 1441

Gun Licences—Case of Mr. John Lee, Q. Mr. P. J. O'Brien; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 19, 568

Haulbowline Dockyard—Repairs of H.M. Ships, Q. Captain Donelan; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 15, 316; Q. Mr. Field; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 30, 1005

High Court of Justice—Civil Service Retirement, Q. Mr. Hayden; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 22, 874

Home Rule (References to, in Reply to Queen's Speech, Mar 12, 71)

Kilrush Gas Company, Q. Mr. Maguire; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 20, 679

Labourers' Acts, Q. Mr. Clancy; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 20, 693

Cootchill Guardians, Qs. Mr. Young, Mr. Knox; As. Mr. J. Morley Mar 22, 872

Labourers' Cottages

Leislip, Q. Mr. Kennedy; A. Mr. J. Morley April 2, 1099

Youghal, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. Flynn; As. Mr. J. Morley Mar 15, 328

| cont.

IRELAND—cont.

Land Acts

Select Committee, Q. Mr. T. W. Russell; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 13, 139; Qs. Mr. Knox, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Clancy, Colonel Waring; As. Mr. J. Morley Mar 20, 698; Q. Mr. Carson; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 22, 870; Q. Mr. T. W. Russell; A. Mr. J. Morley April 2, 1114; Qs. Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Carson, Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Barton; As. Mr. J. Morley April 5, 1454; Q. Mr. T. W. Russell; A. Mr. J. Morley April 9, 1595

Tenants' Improvements—Case of Mr. John Robb, &c., Q. Mr. M'Cartan; A. Mr. J. Morley April 5, 1433

Town Parks, Qs. Mr. M'Cartan, Mr. Sexton; As. Mr. J. Morley Mar 22, 877; Qs. Mr. M'Cartan, Mr. Knox; As. Mr. J. Morley April 5, 1432

Land Commission

Church Fund (see that sub-heading)

Judicial Rents, Copy pres. Mar 12, 126

Proceedings, Copy pres. Mar 19, 676

Land Purchase—Kilkenny County, Q. Mr. M'Dermott; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 15, 313
Law, Administration of, Res., in Debate in Reply to Queen's Speech, Mar 13, 241

Lighthouses

Board of Irish Lights and the Brigg Reef Buoy, Qs. Colonel Waring, Mr. G. Bowles, Mr. W. Field, Mr. Wolff, Mr. Sexton; As. Mr. Mundella, Mr. J. Morley Mar 19, 570

Lisburn Registrar of Deaths, Q. Mr. Field; A. Mr. A. Morley Mar 20, 679

Lismore—Denouncing a Person for Taking an Evicted Farm, Q. Mr. W. Kenny; A. Mr. J. Morley April 5, 1451

Loans to Leaseholders and the Board of Public Works, Q. Mr. Gilhooly; A. Sir J. T. Hibbert Mar 19, 577; Qs. Mr. Gilhooly, Mr. Sexton; As. Sir J. T. Hibbert Mar 22, 874

Lunatic Asylums

Belfast and Antrim Board of Governors, Q. Mr. M'Cartan; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 22, 878

Belfast Workhouse Lunatics, Q. Mr. M'Cartan; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 22, 876; Qs. Mr. M'Cartan, Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Knox; As. Mr. J. Morley April 5, 1430

Letterkenny, Q. Mr. A. O'Connor; A. Mr. J. Morley April 2, 1113

Monaghan—Tea Contracts, Q. Mr. Young; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 19, 560

Waterford, Q. Mr. Field; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 19, 565

Lunatics, Increase of, Q. Sir T. Lea; A. Mr. J. Morley April 5, 1456

Magistracy

Fermanagh, Q. Mr. M'Gilligan; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 16, 438

Irish-Speaking Magistrates, Q. Mr. Field; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 19, 565

O'Connor, Mr. Weld, Q. Mr. Gibney; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 16, 445

Publicans as Magistrates, Qs. Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. J. O'Connor; As. Mr. J. Morley April 9, 1585

[cont.

IRELAND—cont.

Manuscripts, Grants for Publication of, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Sir J. T. Hibbert Mar 19, 582

Nutan Revision Court, Q. Mr. Gibney; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 20, 681

Police

Clothing Contracts, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 15, 340

Poor Law

Belfast Workhouse, Lunatics in (see under sub-heading Lunatic Asylums)

Ferry Union Accounts, Qs. Mr. W. Kenny, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Sexton, Mr. A. O'Connor; As. Mr. J. Morley, Mr. Deputy Speaker Mar 15, 320

Kenmare Guardians Election, Q. Mr. Kilbride; A. Mr. J. Morley April 6, 1509

Killarney Union—Financial Condition, Q. Mr. T. W. Russell; A. Mr. J. Morley April 9, 1570

Labourers' Cottages (see that sub-heading)

Lisnour Union, Outdoor Relief, Qs. Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Sexton; As. Mr. J. Morley April 9, 1585

Nutan Revision Court, Q. Mr. Gibney; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 20, 681

"Port Yarrack," Loss of, Motion for the Adjournment of the House (Mr. H. Wilson) Mar 29, 906

Post Office*American Mail Route*

Distances between Ports, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. A. Morley April 6, 1506

Queenstown and Merville, Qs. Sir J. Leng, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. A. Morley April 6, 1506

Return ordered April 14, 1580

Belfast and Newcastle Post Office, Q. Mr. Arnold-Forster; A. Mr. A. Morley Mar 15, 350

Clothing Contracts, Qs. Mr. M. Healy; As. Mr. A. Morley Mar 15, 339; April 5, 1441

Dublin—Promotions, Q. Mr. Field; A. Mr. A. Morley Mar 20, 690

Finnor Postal Facilities, Q. Mr. Hayden; A. Mr. A. Morley Mar 22, 863

Hilltown Telegraph Service, Q. Mr. M'Cartan; A. Mr. A. Morley Mar 22, 865

Limerick Postal and Telegraph Staff, Q. Mr. W. Kenny. A. Mr. A. Morley Mar 15, 310

Prisons

Dundalk—Case of Sheridan, Q. Dr. Kenny; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 15, 312

Londonderry—Case of P. M'Keefery, Q. Mr. Mains; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 20, 680

Mountjoy—Case of Mr. Walsh, Q. Mr. Hayden; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 22, 875

Public Libraries Act, Q. Mr. Field; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 15, 334

Queen's College, Compulsory Retirement in, Q. Mr. Pinkerton; A. Sir J. T. Hibbert April 3, 1247

IRELAND—cont.

Railways

Ballina and Killala, Q. Mr. Clanc Sir J. T. Hibbert Mar 22, 877

Drogheda and Dublin, Q. Mr. Clanc A. Mr. Mundella Mar 22, 863

Galway and Clifden, Q. Colonel F. A. Sir J. T. Hibbert Mar 13, 148

Stranorlar and Glenties, Q. Mr. Sullivan; A. Sir J. T. Hibbert A. 1102

Trillick and Dingle, Q. Sir T. Esmond Mr. J. Morley Mar 13, 143

Registration Bill, Qs. Mr. Clancy, Mr. C. Mr. Macartney, Mr. Darling; As. Morley Mar 22, 864

Spike Island—Soldiers Unloading Co, Captain Donelan; A. Mr. Campbell-B. man April 5, 1460

Swine Fever—Cost of Slaughter, Q. C. Nolan; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 13, 14

Times Parks, Q. Mr. M'Cartan; A. Morley Mar 22, 877; Qs. Mr. M'.

Mr. Knox; As. Mr. J. Morley April

Training Ships, Qs. Mr. Gilbooly, Dr. As. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 2

Trustee Act, 1893, Q. Mr. W. Kenny; C. Russell Mar 13, 152

Veterinary Inspectors, Q. Mr. Ambro Mr. J. Morley Mar 19, 559

Walsh, Michael, Convict, Q. Mr. H. A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 22, 875

Irish Education Act (1892) Amendment Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Field; Read 1^o Mar 20, 78

Irish Lights Board Constitution Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Finucane; Read 1^o Mar 16

ISAACSON, Mr. F. W., Tower Hamstead Stepney

Food Adulteration Bill, Res., 676

Mining Royalties—Rents and Way Res., 1557

Trust Companies Bill, Res., 675

Itinerant Street Music (London)

c. Intro., Mr. Jacoby; Read 1^o Mar 16,

JACKS, Mr. W., Stirlingshire

Scotland—Education Act, Working of

JACOBY, Mr. J. A., Derbyshire, M

Elementary School Teachers as Insq

329

Itinerant Street Music (London) Bill, 458

JAMES, Right Hon. Sir H., Bury, cashire

Arnold-Forster's, Mr., Letter to "The'

Factory and Workshops Act (1891),

ment Bill, Intro., 853

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2E

1370

Privilege—Lord Rosebery's Speech at

burgh, Res., 602

JEFFREYS, Mr. A. F., Hants, Basingstoke

Aldershot and Farnborough Police Stations, 1446

Army Estimates—Forage, 430, 431

Foreign and Colonial Meat (No. 2) Bill, Intro., 455

Law Officers of the Crown, Res., 947

Publicans and Military Pensioners, 1452

Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—
Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's
Speech, 120JOHNSTON, Mr. W., *Belfast, S.Intoxicating Liquors Local Veto (Ireland)
Bill, Intro., 455

Introduction of and Balloting for Bills, 163

Joint Stock Companies' Register Billc. Intro., Mr. Clough; Read 1^o Mar 19, 676Jury Law (Amendment) Billc. Intro., Mr. A. Williams; Read 1^o Mar 21,
853Justices of the Peace (see under Law, &c.—Magistracy)*Justices of the Peace Billc. Intro., Mr. Luttrell; Read 1^o Mar 16, 454KAY - SHUTTLEWORTH, RIGHT
HON. SIR U. J. (Secretary to the Admiralty), *Lancashire, ClitheroeNavy

Atlantic, Derelicts in, 1100

Contracts

Armour-Piercing Projectiles, 1510

Contract Work, Overtime on, 440

Harland and Wolff's Shipyard Labourers,
441

Torpedo Boats, 682

Engine-Room Complements, 563

Indian Troopships, 574, 1507

IrelandHaulbowline — Repairs of H.M. Ships, 316, 1007

Training Ships, 685

Lee-Metford Rifle, 443

Manœuvres, Drill in, 688

Nickel Steel Plates, 318

Oil Fuel, 140, 689

Rations, Condemned, 689

Reserve, Training, 1248

Shipbuilding Contract Work—Expenditure,
306, 560Ships

"Bothnia," 574

"Crescent," 442

Ironclads at Sea, 575

New Battleships Launched in 1893, 560

"Powerful," 1577

"Victoria" Disaster, &c., 749

Stores, Inspection of, 314

Torpedo Boat "Havock"—Disclosure of Plans, 434KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Rt. Hon. Sir U. J.—*cont.Navy—*cont.Warren Hastings Island, Reported Wreck off, 1568

White Ensign, 1244

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys—Statement
749, 764, 767, 779

Personal Explanation, 870

KEARLEY, Mr. H. E., *DevonportNavyDockyard Labour and Wages, 321; Res.,
608, 611, 621, 625, 658Stonehouse Marine Barracks — Alleged Assault by an Officer, 320Privilege—Lord Rosebery's Speech at Edinburgh, Res., 607KEAY, Mr. J. S., *Elgin and Nairn

Foreign Meat, 1254, 1568

Scotland—Deer Forest Commission, 1097

KENNAWAY, Sir J. H., Devon, Honiton

Uganda, Affairs of, 1516

KENNEDY, Mr. P. J., Kildare, N.

Ireland—Labourers' Cottages at Leixlip, 1099

KENNY, Dr. J. E., *Dublin, College
GreenIreland

Clare County, Crime in, 325

Dundalk Gaol, 312

Mullingar Water Supply, 330

Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Amendment
(No. 2) Bill, Intro., 452Queen's Speech, Reply to

Administration of the Law in Ireland, 291

Dynamite Prisoners, 221

KENNY, Mr. W., *Dublin, St. Stephen's Green

Business of the House, 1595

Civil Service—New Treasury Rules, 1112

Ireland

Boycotting at Kells, 1111

Church Fund, 581

Clare, Crime in, 325

Cork—Sunday Disturbances, 1588

Fermoy Union Accounts, 321

Limerick Postal and Telegraph Staff, 310

Lismore—Denouncing a Person for Taking Evicted Farm, 1451

Trustee Act (1893), 152

Trustee Act (1893) Amendment Bill, Intro., 457KENYON, Hon. G. T., *Denbigh, &c.

Wales—School Inspectors, 1605

KENYON-SLANEY, Colonel W., *Shropshire, NewportTrade and Agriculture, Depression of—Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's
Speech, 113

KILBRIDE, Mr. D., Kerry, S.
Kenmare Guardians Election, 1509
Land Tenure (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 449

KIMBER, Mr. H., Wandsworth
London County Council (Tower Bridge
Southern Approach) Bill, 2R., 1231

Kingston-upon-Hull (Court of Record)
Bill
c. Intro., Sir A. Rollit; Read 1st Mar 20, 788

KINLOCH, Sir J. G. S., Perth, E.
Canadian Cattle, 308

KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Mr. H. T., Kent, Faversham
Business of the House, Res., 1610
Dockyards
Apprentices Instruction, 1450
Classification, 1251
Labour and Wages, Res., 635, 637
Pensions, 1111

KNOWLES, Mr. LEES, Salford, W.
Habitual Inebriates Committee's Report, 332
Plumbers' Registration Bill, Intro., 461
Tuberculosis Report, 153

KNOX, Mr. E. F. V., Cavan, W.
Africa—Umtali—Queen Chikanga's Consort,
562
Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 162
Ireland
Belfast Workhouse, Lunatics in, 1482
Labourers' Acts — Cootehill Guardians,
873
Land Acts Inquiry, 698
Town Parks and Land Acts, 1433
Supply — Colonial Office, Correspondence,
363

LABOUCHERE, Mr. H., Northampton
Army Estimates—Egypt, British Soldiers in,
545, 546
Business of the House, Res., 1624
Income Tax, 1055
Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 185
Lunacy Laws—"Commissioners in Lunacy v.
Sherrard," 584
Privilege—Lord Rosebery's Speech at Edinburgh, Res., 604, 605
Queen's Speech, Reply to, 185, 194, 263
House of Lords, 196
Supply
Bechuanaland, Mashonaland, and Matabele-
land, 403
Colonial Office—South African Telegrams,
365
Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, 1087
Egypt, British Occupation of, 833
Extension of Admiralty Buildings, 987
House of Commons Offices, Commission on, 357
Law Charges, 368
Metropolitan Police Courts, 993, 995
Pluralists in the Public Service, 357
Uganda, 394

Labour Commission

Assistant Commissioners' Reports, Q.
Diamond; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 15, 338

Labour Department

Army Factories (see under title ARMY)
Bell's Match Girls' Strike—Case before
Mead, Q. Mr. Macdonald; A. Mr. Asquith
Mar 19, 579
Dockyard Labour (see NAVY)
Factory Act, Breach of, at Preston, Q. Mr.
Stanhope; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 16, 447
Railway Servants (see under title Railways)
Shops, Hours of Labour in, Q. Mr. Anstruth
A. Mr. Asquith Mar 20, 684
Trade Unions Reports, Q. Mr. Howell;
Mr. Mundella Mar 19, 564

Labour Minister Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Ernest Spencer; Read 1st Mar 452

Labourers' (Ireland) Acts (see un IRELAND)

Labourers' (Ireland) Acts Amendm Bill

c. Intro., Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Read 1st Mar
451

LAMBERT, Mr. G., Devon, South Mol
Foreign Meat Bill, Intro., 786
Ground Game Act (1880) Extension &
Intro., 786

Land Law (Ireland) and Purchase Land (Ireland) Acts Amendm Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Clancy; Read 1st Mar 16, 451

Land Tenure (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Kilbride; Read 1st Mar 16, 44

Land Values (Taxation by Lo Authorities) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Naoroji; Read 1st Mar 16, 456

Law and Justice and Police

Bell's Match Girls' Strike—Case before
Mead, Q. Mr. Macdonald; A. Mr. Asquith
Mar 19, 579
Children, Imprisonment of, in Hollow
Prison, Qs. Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Pict
As. Mr. Asquith Mar 13, 150
Church of England Marriage Laws
that title)
Convictions, Records of, Qs. Mr. En
Spencer, Mr. Hanbury; As. Mr. Asquith
Mar 30, 1001
Cornwall Police Court Procedure—"P ham v. Jennings," Qs. Mr. Owen; As.
Asquith Mar 19, 567; Mar 22, 861
County Courts (References to, in Debate
Supply, Mar 15, 376)

Law and Justice and Police—cont.

Dynamite Prisoners, Res., in Debate in Reply to Queen's Speech, Mar 13, 221

Law Officers of the Crown—Private Practice, &c., Q. Mr. Hanbury ; A. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 19, 585

(References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 15, 363)

Res. (Mr. Hanbury) Mar 29, 941

Liverpool—Houses of Ill-Repute, Q. Mr. S. Smith ; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 22, 858

Lunacy Laws—"Commissioners in Lunacy v. Sherrard," Q. Mr. Labouchere ; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 19, 584

Magistracy, County

Appointments—Returns, Q. Mr. Dold ; A. Mr. G. Russell April 9, 1575

Magistrates' Clerks (References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 15, 366)

Property Qualifications, Q. Mr. A. C. Morton ; A. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 20, 702

Wigan—Alleged Corrupt Practices by Mr. R. Johnson, Qs. Mr. Legh, Mr. Tomlinson ; As. Mr. Bryce Mar 16, 435

Metropolitan Police Courts (References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 29, 993)

Metropolitan Police Court Clerks, Qs. Mr. H. S. Wright, Mr. Stuart-Wortley ; As. Mr. Asquith Mar 15, 343

Nottingham Execution—Walter Smith, Qs. Mr. Ballantine ; As. Mr. Asquith April 2, 1112 ; April 6, 1510

Police, Metropolitan—C Division, Q. Mr. R. Cooke ; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 20, 690

Police Stations

Aldershot and Farnborough, Q. Mr. Jeffreys ; A. Mr. Asquith April 5, 1446

Prisons

Kirkdale Gaol, Site of, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell ; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 15, 315

Warders' Hours, Q. Mr. W. Long ; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 30, 1004

Law Library, Four Courts (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. J. Morley ; Read 1^o April 2, 1115

Law of Inheritance Amendment Bill

l. Pres., Lord Herschell ; Read 1^a April 9, 1566

LAWRENCE, Mr. W. F., Liverpool, Abercromby

Supply—Uganda, 397, 398, 402

LAWSON, Mr. H. L. W., Gloucester, Cirencester

Town Holdings Bill, Intro., 451

LAWSON, Mr. J. Grant, York, N.R., Thirsk

Supply—Voluntary Schools, 800, 802, 831

LAWSON, Sir W., Cumberland, Cocker-mouth

Liquor Traffic (Local Veto) (England) Bill, Intro., 458

Occasional Licences, 1244

LEA, Sir T., Londonderry, S.

Ireland—Lunatics, Increase of, 1456

Sale of Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 460

LECHMERE, Sir E. A. H., Worcester-shire, Evesham

Market Gardeners' Compensation Bill, Intro., 460

LEFEVRE, Rt. Hon. G. J. SHAW- (President of the Local Government Board), Bradford, Central

Census, Cost of, 445

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1395

Horwell's Endowed School—Election of Trustee, 305

Local Government Act (1894), 151

District and Parish Councils, 1448, 1577

London Vestry Elections, 335

Overseers and Highway Surveyors, 344

Parochial Officials, 328

Translation of into Welsh, 1112

London Bakehouses, 1507

London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Bill, 2R., 1239

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1351, 1354, 1357

Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee, 1243

Public Buildings (London) Bill, 2R., 1315

Quarantine, 957

Registrars of Births as Political Agents, 1440

Supply

Extension of Admiralty Buildings, 986, 987, 991

Kew Gardens, &c., 974

South Kensington Museum, 1069, 1070, 1072, 1073, 1075

Tuberculosis Commission Report, 153, 341

LEGH, Mr. T. W., Lancashire, S.W., Newton

Supply—Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, 1082

Wigan Magistrate—Alleged Corrupt Practice by Mr. R. Johnson, 435

LENG, Sir J., Dundee

American Mail Route

Distances between Ports, 1505

Queenstown and Moville, 1506

Atlantic, Derelicts in, 1100

Crimean and Indian Mutiny Pensioners, 435

Dundee Tailoring Trade, 678

Grocers' Certificates (Scotland) Abolition Bill, Intro., 788

Patent Agents Bill, 2R., 1374

Postmen and the Queen's Birthday, 1587

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1180

Supply—Uganda, 400

LENNOX, Right Hon. Lord W. G., Sussex, Chichester

Members of Parliament—System of Pairing, 1519

LEWIS, Mr. J. Herbert, Flint, &c.

Home Rule for Scotland, Res., 1900

Local Government Act—Translation of into Welsh, 1112

Libel Bill

c. Intro., Sir A. Rollit; Read 1^o Mar 16, 457

Liberia, Extradition Treaty with

Copy pres. Mar 19, 676

Licence Fees—Home Office (see Home Office)

Licensing

Occasional Licences, Q. Sir W. Lawson; A. Mr. Asquith April 3, 1244

Publicans and Military Pensioners, Qs. Mr. J. Burns, Mr. Jeffreys, Mr. Bartley; As. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman April 5, 1452

Life-Saving Apparatus (see under title NAVY—Coastguard Stations, and under title Merchant Shipping)

Lightships

The Snalla, Q. Mr. Bartley; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 15, 314

Lighthouses, &c. (Local Inspections)

Copy pres. Mar 12, 127

Limitation of Actions Bill

l. Pres. Lord Herschell; Read 1^o April 9, 1565

Liquor Traffic (Local Veto) (England)

Bill

c. Intro., Sir W. Lawson; Read 1^o Mar 16, 458

Liquor Traffic Local Veto (Scotland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. John Wilson; Read 1^o Mar 16, 460

Liquor Traffic Local Veto (Wales) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. B. Rowlands; Read 1^o Mar 16, 455

Liverpool Corporation Churches Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Snape; Read 1^o Mar 16, 457

Liverpool, Houses of Ill Repute in

Q. Mr. S. Smith; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 22, 858

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD

President—Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE

Secretary—Sir W. FOSTER

Bakchouses in London, Q. Mr. Barrow; A. Mr. Asquith April 2, 1106; Qs. Mr. Barrow, Dr. Farquharson, Mr. J. Burns; As. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre April 6, 1507

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD

Cholera Precautions, Q. Mr. Heneage W. Harcourt April 9, 1584

London Vestry Elections, Q. Mr. Ba. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre Mar 15, 335

Quarantine, Obs. Mr. G. Bowles, M Lefevre Mar 29, 955

Registrars of Births as Political A Mr. Woods; A. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre 1439

St. Stephens - by - Laurendon 1 Horwell's Endowed School Trust. Owen; A. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre Mar

Tuberculosis Commission (see un Agriculture, Board of)

Local Government (England and Act

Charity Commissioners' New Duties Dodd, Mr. J. W. Lowther; As. M Mar 30, 1002

Copies of, Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis; A. 1 Lefevre Mar 13, 151

District Councils, Q. Colonel Gunter Shaw-Lefevre April 5, 1448

London Vestry Elections, Q. Mr. Ba. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre Mar 15, 335

Oreocers and Highways Surveyor H. Hobhouse; A. Mr. Shaw Mar 15, 344

Parish Councils, Q. Mr. Heneage Shaw-Lefevre April 9, 1577

Parochial Officials, Q. Mr. Taylor Shaw-Lefevre Mar 15, 328

Translation of into Welsh, Q. Mr Lewis; A. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre Apr

Local Government (Ireland) Pro Orders Bills

(No. 1)

c. Intro., Mr. J. Morley; Read 1^o 296

(No. 2)

c. Intro., Mr. J. Morley; Read 1^o Mar Read 2^o April 3, 1316

(No. 3)

c. Intro., Mr. J. Morley; Read 1^o Ma

(No. 4)

c. Intro., Mr. J. Morley; Read 1^o Ap

Local Government Provisional Bills

(No. 1)

c. Intro., Sir W. Foster; Read 1^o M Read 2^o Mar 29, 998 Reported April 5, 1504 Con. April 6, 1522 Read 3^o, and passed April 9, 1687

(No. 2)

c. Intro., Sir W. Foster; Read 1^o Mar Read 2^o Mar 29, 998 Reported April 5, 1504 Read 3^o, and passed April 6, 1522 l. Read 1^o April 9, 1665

Local Government Provisional Orders Bills—
cont.

(No. 3)

c. Intro., Sir W. Foster; Read 1° Mar 22, 895
Read 2° April 6, 1522

(No. 4)

c. Intro., Sir W. Foster; Read 1° April 9, 1688

(No. 5)

c. Intro., Sir W. Foster; Read 1° April 9, 1688

Local Government Provisional Orders (Housing of the Working Classes)
Bill

c. Intro., Sir W. Foster; Read 1° Mar 13, 254
Read 2° Mar 29, 998
Reported April 5, 1504
Con. April 6, 1522
Read 3°, and passed April 9, 1687

LOCKWOOD, Lt.-Colonel A., Essex, Epping

Army

Mobilisation, 519

Staff Officers' Pay at the Manœuvres, 580

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 539, 545

Business of the House, Res., 1674

Central Telegraph Office—Working Hours,
1005

Railways—Fatal Accident to Mr. Theobald,
147

Supply—Houses of Parliament, 981

LOGAN, Mr. J. W., Leicester, Har-borough

Queen's Speech—Administration of the Law in Ireland, 277, 278

London (see Metropolis)

London County Council (see under County Councils)

London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Bill

c. Read 2° April 3, 1217

London Markets Bill

a. Intro., Mr. S. Montagu; Read 1° Mar 16, 455

London Streets and Buildings Bill

c. Com. to Select Com. April 5, 1426

London University Commission (see Gresham University Commission)

LONG, Mr. W. H., Liverpool, West Derby

Army Estimates—Forage, 430

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1364

Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee,
1240, 1243

Prison Warders' Hours, 1004

Supply—Voluntary Schools, 809, 813, 814

LORD ADVOCATE—Mr. J. B. BALFOUR

LORD CHANCELLOR—Lord HERSCHELL

LOWTHER, Mr. J. W., Cumberland, Penrith

Charity Commission (Parliamentary Control),
Res., 1015, 1016, 1017, 1023, 1025

Charity Commissioners and the Local Government Act, 1003

Manica Plateau and the Portuguese, 584

Russo-German Commercial Treaty, 1097

Supply—Uganda, 393

Zambesi—Collision with Portuguese Troops,
583

LOWTHER, Right Hon. James, Kent, Thanet

Alien Paupers, Returns, 349

Business of the House, Res., 1627

Income Tax, 1056

Sport Regulation Bill, 2R., 1091

Supply

Art and Science Buildings, 1067, 1070,
1078

Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, 1083, 1088

House of Commons Offices, Commission on, 354

Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—
Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's
Speech, 107

LUBBOCK, Right Hon. Sir J., London University

Boards of Conciliation Bill, Intro., 1316

Business of the House, Res., 1660

Income Tax, 1051, 1052

London County Council (Tower Bridge
Southern Approach) Bill, 2R., 1236

Shops (Early Closing) Bill, Intro., 456

Lunacy

"Commissioners in Lunacy v. Sherrard," Q.
Mr. Latouchere; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 19, 584

LUTTRELL, Mr. H. C. F., Devon, Tavistock

Justices of the Peace Bill, Intro., 454

Rural Postmen, 681

Tenant Farmers' Sporting Rights Bill Intro., 787

LYELL, Sir L., Orkney and Shetland

Grimsby Trawler "Ceylon," 333

Trawling off Stromness, 144

MACARTNEY, Mr. W. E., Antrim, S.
Ireland—Registration Bill, 864

MACDONA, Mr. J. C., Southwark, Rother-hithe
Derelicts in the Atlantic, 444, 1004, 1007, 1057
Derelict Vessels (Reports) Bill, Intro., 461

MACDONALD, Mr. J. A. M., Tower Hamlets, Bow
Bell's Match Girls' Strike—Case before Mr.
Mead, 579
Hours of Labour (Local Authorities, &c., Servants) Bill, Intro., 1316
Teachers' Registration Bill, Intro., 1316
Telegraphs — Departmental Committee
Report, 1249
Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—
Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's
Speech, 95

MACFARLANE, Sir D. H., Argyll
Business of the House, Res., 1609
Deputy Speaker, 1255
India
Import Duties on Cotton, &c., 327, 544,
1440
Opium Commission, Cost of, 678
Scotland
Loch Fyne Herrings, 311
Saddell Tenancy Dispute, 857
Secondary Education Grant, 678
Supply—Deer Forest Commission, &c., 794
Torpedo Boat "Havock"—Disclosure of
Plans, 435

MACGREGOR, Dr. D., Inverness-shire
Scotland
Procurator Fiscal of Lochmaddy, 862
Saddell Tenancy Dispute, 857
Supply—Scotch Affairs, 840, 843, 844, 849

MAC NEILL, Mr. J. G. S., Donegal, S.
Ireland—Cattle Seizures in County Tyrone, 1593

M'CARTAN, Mr. M., Down, S.
Ireland
Bangor Pier and Harbour Works, 1609
Belfast and Antrim Lunatic Asylums—
Board of Governors, 878
Belfast Lunatics, 876, 1430
Dublin Custom House, 1578
Hilltown Telegraph Service, 865
Land Acts—Tenants' Improvements—Case of Mr. J. Robb, &c., 1433
Town Parks and the Land Acts, 877, 1432

MCDERMOTT, Mr. P., Kilkenny, N.
Ireland—Land Purchase—Kilkenny County,
313

M'GILLIGAN, Mr. P., Fermanagh, S.
Ireland
Clogher Valley Tramway, 567
Fermanagh County Magistrates, 438

M'HUGH, Mr. P. A., Leitrim, N.
Religious Tests (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 455

MADAGASCAR
United States Consul, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. I.
E. Grey Mar 15, 315

MADEN, Mr. J. H., Lancashire, Rossedale
Cotton Trade (Forty-Eight Hours) B.
Intro., 456

Magistrates (see under Law and Justice and Police)

Magistrates' Qualification Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Dodd; Read 1^o Mar 30, 1092

MAGUIRE, Mr. J. R., Clare, W.
Ireland—Kilrush Gas Company, 679
Supply—Bechuanaland, Mashonaland, a Matabeleland, 425

MAINS, Mr. J., Donegal, N.
Deep Sea Fisheries (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 4
Londonderry Gaol—Case of P. M'Keefe
680

Margarine Act
Q. Mr. H. Plunkett; A. Mr. Gardner Mar
441

Market Gardeners' Compensation Bill
c. Intro., Sir E. Lechmere; Read 1^o Mar
460

Marriages (Attendance of Registrar)
III
c. Intro., Mr. Perks; Read 1^o Mar 16, 459

Marriage Laws (see under Church England—Marriage Laws)

MATTHEWS, Right Hon. H., Birmin-ham, E.
Mining Royalties—Rents and Wayleave
Res., 1552
Supply—House of Commons Offices, Commission on, 354

MAXWELL, Mr. W. J., Dumfriesshire
Scotland—Duties of Commissioners of Police
Burghs, 441

MAXWELL, Sir H. E., Wigton
Meat, Foreign and Home Fed., 1254
Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 111
1158, 1163
Supply—South Kensington Museum, 1076
Wild Birds' Protection Act (1880) Amendment Bill, Intro., 1316

Meat (see under Agriculture, Board of)

MELLOR, RIGHT HON. J. W. (Chairman of Committees and Ways and Means, and Deputy Speaker), York, W.R., Sowerby

(Rulings as Deputy Speaker)

When it was 12 o'clock it was his duty to call attention to the fact that a Motion for Adjournment lapsed. The Motion having been made again since 12 o'clock the Member was in Order Mar 12, 130

The noble Lord was in Order in discussing the absence of Home Rule from the Queen's Speech Mar 13, 168

The Deputy Speaker could not say that a Member was out of Order in quoting the words of an English Minister spoken during the current Session in the House of Lords Mar 13, 185

There was no Question before the House, but it was usual to allow the Leaders of responsible Parties to make observations on occasions such as the present (Discussion as to the result of Mr. Labouchere's Amendt. to the Queen's Speech) Mar 14, 266

It was usual to allow questions to be postponed if the Minister wished it Mar 15, 320

Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills—Statement as to numbers Mar 15, 350

The quotations were ruled out of Order in a question because the Member was giving information instead of asking for it Mar 16, 448

The hon. Member, although he had given notice of his Bill on Monday, and his name appeared in the Ballot, could not bring in his Bill then, as he had omitted to give fresh notice Mar 16, 461

The claims of engineer officers in respect of pay could not be dealt with on the Motion as to dockyard labour and wages Mar 19, 637

The discussion of a subject was out of Order when there was a Bill before the House on the subject Mar 30, 1060

Miscellaneous Rulings Mar 15, 322 ; Mar 20, 688

(Rulings as Chairman of Committees)

Supply

The question of pluralists did not seem relevant to the Vote on the House of Commons Offices, and he did not think it would be in Order Mar 15, 353

It had been stated that the Vote did not apply to pluralists, and therefore the Member was not in Order Mar 15, 355

It was in accordance with the Rules of the House for an Amendt. to a Vote on Account to be moved, although the Motion prevented one-half of the Vote being discussed or amended Mar 21, 803

[cont.]

MELLOR, Right Hon. J. W.—cont.

(Rulings as Chairman of Committees)—cont.

When Members gave Notice of Amendts. the Chair called upon them according to their Notices, but on a Vote on Account any Member who was in possession of the Com. was entitled to move a reduction unless he gave way Mar 21, 806

The Chairman's Duty was to put from the Chair every Amendt. moved, and, whether it was withdrawn or not, putting it from the Chair had the same effect Mar 21, 806

The Chairman did not see how the question of the capitulations in Turkey could be dealt with in Supply under the Vote for Diplomatic and Consular Buildings Mar 30, 1090

Miscellaneous Rulings April 9, 1677, 1680

Merchandise Marks Acts (1888 & 1891) Amendment (Cutlery) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Coleridge ; Read 1^o Mar 20, 786

Merchandise Marks (Files) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Stuart-Wortley ; Read 1^o Mar 29, 999

Merchant Shipping

Derelicts in the Atlantic (see title Atlantic) Expenditure and the Estimates, Q. Mr. G. Bowles ; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 13, 139

Harbours of Refuge on the East Coast of Yorkshire, Q. Mr. Holden ; A. Mr. Mundella April 5, 1445

"Hondeklip," Loss of the, Q. Mr. Sweetman ; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 13, 149

Life-Saving Appliances, Copy pres. Mar 13, 256

Life-Saving Appliances Act—Board of Trade Rules, Q. Mr. G. Bowles ; A. Mr. Mundella April 3, 1252

"Port Yarrock," Loss of the, Qs. Mr. Provand, Sir J. Gorst, Mr. H. J. Wilson, Mr. G. Bowles ; As. Mr. Mundella April 2, 1104

Motion for Adjournment of the House (Mr. H. Wilson) Mar 29, 906

Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Neville ; Read 1^o Mar 19, 676

Merchant Shipping Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Mundella ; Read 1^o April 2, 1216

Metropolis

Bakehouses, Q. Mr. Barrow ; A. Mr. Asquith April 2, 1106 ; Qs. Mr. Barrow, Dr. Farquharson, Mr. J. Burns ; As. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre April 6, 1507

Building Bye-Laws—London County Council Bill, Qs. Mr. Howell, Sir A. Rollit ; As. Mr. Asquith, Mr. Speaker April 2, 1107

Police—C Division, Q. Mr. R. Cooke ; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 20, 690

[cont.]

Metropolis—cont.

Police Court Clerks, Qs. Mr. H. S. Wright,
Mr. Stuart - Wortley; As. Mr. Asquith
Mar 15, 343
Royal Parks, Bands in, Q. Mr. Aird; A. Mr.
H. Glalstone April 3, 1251

Metropolitan Police Provisional Order Bill

c. Intro., Mr. G. Russell; Read 1° April 9, 1687

Mines

Explosions in, Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis; A. Mr.
Asquith Mar 15, 314
Featherstone Miners' Riots — Claims for Compensation, Q. Mr. Nussey; A. Mr.
Asquith Mar 19, 576
Inspectors' Reports, Q. Mr. Stuart-Wortley;
A. Mr. Asquith April 9, 1574

Mines (Eight Hours) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Roby; Read 1° Mar 16, 450

Mining Accidents (Scotland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Baird; Read 1° Mar 16, 457

Mining Royalties

Rents and Wayleaves, Res. (Mr. Woods)
April 6, 1523

MONTAGU, Mr. S., Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel

London Markets Bill, Intro., 455

MORGAN, Mr. J. LLOYD-, Carmarthen, W.

Musketry Examination Papers, 445

MORGAN, Mr. W. P., Merthyr Tydvil

Mining Royalties—Rents and Wayleaves,
Res., 1555

MORGAN, Right Hon. Sir G. O., Denbighshire, E.

Business of the House, Res., 1637
Church of England—Marriage Laws, 701,
1108
Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1148

MORLEY, RIGHT HON. ARNOLD (Postmaster General), Nottingham, E.

American Mail Route
Distance between Ports, 1506
Queenstown and Moville, 1506
Express Messenger Service, 138
Idle Post Office, 697
Inland Branch, General Post Office, 1513
Ireland
Belfast and Newcastle Post Office, 350
Clothing Contracts, 339, 1441
Dublin Promotions, 690
Finnor Postal Facilities, 863
Hilltown Telegraph Service, 865
Limerick Postal and Telegraph Staffs, 310

MORLEY, Right Hon. Arnold—cont.

Manchester Post Office—Christmas Day, 1101
Metropolitan Countermen and Telegraph Clerks, 1569
Queen's Birthday Holiday, 1583
Rural Postmen, 682
Savings Banks Act, 558
Savings Bank Deposits—Withdrawals, Telegraph, 868
Telegraphs
Burgh Heath, Communication with, 15
Central Office—Working Hours, 1005
Departmental Committees Report, 1249
International Code, 303
West Indian and South American Mails, 1461

MORLEY, Right Hon. JOHN (Clerk of the House, Secretary for Ireland), Newcastle-upon-Tyne

Business of the House, 1460, 1520, 1564; 1614

Ireland

Agriculture. Proposed Board of, 346, 68
Arran Islands, Distress in, 319
Boycotting at Kells, 1109
Church Fund, 581
Civil Service Retirement, 874
Clare County, Crime in, 323
Cork—Sunday Disturbances, 1517, 1589
Distraints—Seizure of Cattle in County Tyrone, 1594
Donegal Sessional Crown Solicitor, 679
Dublin Veterinary College, 346

Education

Books, 1434, 1578
Education Act, 334
Monitors, 1434

Evictions, 697

Arran Islands, 1459, 1511
De Freyne Estate Evictions and Proscriptions, 873
Dillon's, Lord, Estate, 879
Evicted Tenants' Legislation, 582, 70

Financial Relations, 156, 570

Fisheries, Slaney, 1571
Gun Licences—Case of Mr. John Lee, 3
Kilrush Gas Company, 679
Labourers' Acts, Amending, 693
Labourers' Acts—Cootehill Guardians, 329, 1100
Labourers' Cottages, 329, 1100

Land Acts

Select Committee on, 139, 698, 870, 1454, 1455, 1595
Tenants' Improvements—Case of J. Robb, 1433
Town Parks, 878, 1432

Land Purchase in Kilkenny County, 3

Lights. Board of, 573
Lisburn—Registrar of Deaths, 680
Lismore—Denouncing a Tenant for Talan an Evicted Farm, 1452

Lunatic Asylums

Belfast and Antrim Board of Governors, 879
Belfast Workhouse—Lunatics, 876, 1
Letterkenny, 1113
Monaghan—Tea Contracts, 560
Waterford, 565

MORLEY, Right Hon. John—cont.

- Lunatics, Increase of, 1456
- Magistracy
 - Fermanagh County, 438
 - Irish-Speaking Magistrates, 566
 - O'Connor, Mr. M. W., 446
 - Publicans as Magistrates, 1586
- Manuscripts, Grants for the Publication of, 583
- Navan Revision Court, 681
- Poor Law
 - Fermoy Union Accounts, 322
 - Kenmare Guardians Election, 1509
 - Killarney Union—Financial Condition, 1571
 - Listowel Union—Outdoor Relief, 1585
- Police Clothing Contracts, 340
- Prisons
 - Dundalk—Case of Sheridan, 313
 - Londonderry, 681
 - Mountjoy—Case of Walsh, 875
- Public Libraries Act, 334
- Registration Bill, 864
- Swine Fever—Cost of Slaughter, 148
- Tralce and Dingle Railway, 143
- Veterinary Inspectors, 559
- Law Library, Four Courts (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 1115
- Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order Bills, Intro., 853, 1379
- Queen's Speech, Reply to, 295
 - Administration of Ireland, 172, 179, 246, 284, 291
- Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1501, 1504
- Supply—Clare Assizes—Mr. Justice O'Brien's Remarks, 888

MORTON, Mr. A. C., Peterborough

- Army (Annual) Bill, 855; 1R., 851; 2R., 894
- Budget, 1584
- Business of the House—Financial Business, 272
- Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill; Com., 852; 3R., 888
- Enfield and Sparkbrook Factories, 1437
- Foreign and Colonial Meat (No. 2) Bill, 2R., 1379
- House of Commons Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms
 - Motion for Select Com., 784, 785
 - Returns, 852
- Magistracy, County—Property Qualification, 702
- Patent Agents Bill, 2R., 1376
- Return Tickets Bill, Intro., 786
- Sport Regulation Bill, Intro., 786
- Supply
 - African Affairs, 364, 391, 403, 428
 - Appropriations in Aid, 377
 - Art and Science Buildings, 1068, 1069, 1070, 1071, 1078, 1080
 - County Courts, 372, 373
 - Deer Forest Commission, &c., 835, 837, 842
 - Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, 1082, 1085

MORTON, Mr. A. C.—cont.

- Supply—cont.
 - Extension of Admiralty Buildings, 985, 990, 993
 - Highlands and Islands Public Works, 848
 - Home Office, 361
 - House of Commons Offices, 352, 353, 354, 355, 358, 880, 884
 - Houses of Parliament, 976, 981
 - Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms Committee, 880, 883
 - Law Charges, 371
 - Metropolitan Police Courts, 997
 - Public Education—Circulars Asking for Subscriptions in Lieu of Fees, 378
 - Royal Palaces, 963, 969, 970
 - Royal Parks and Pleasure Grounds, 971, 974
 - Voluntary Schools, &c., 825, 826, 827
 - Vote on Account, 803, 805, 806, 831

MORTON, Mr. E. J. C., Devonport

- Navy—Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 621, 622
- Umtali—Arrest of Mr. Taylor, 701
- Umtassa's Country—Magistrates, 700

MUNDELLA, Right Hon. A. J. (President of the Board of Trade), Sheffield, Brightside

- Alien Paupers, Returns, 349
- Baker and Company, Failure of, 1436
- Derelicts in the Atlantic, 1004, 1007
- Dover Pier Dues, 579
- Essex Fishing Grounds—Removing Cultch, &c., 103, 866, 1253
- German Export Trade, 1457
- German Prison Labour and the Importation of Goods into England, 341, 1103, 1458
- Harbours of Refuge, 1445
- "Hondekliip," Wreck of the, 149
- Ireland
 - Board of Irish Lights—Brigg Reef Buoy, 571
 - Railways—Drogheda and Dublin Facilities, 863
- Lightships—The Smalls, 314
- Mercantile Marine Expenditure, 139
- Merchant Shipping Bill, Intro., 1216
- Merchant Shipping (Life-Saving Appliances) Act—Board of Trade Rules, 1252
- Patent Agents Bill, 2R., 1374
- Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 1) Bill, Intro., 1688
- "Port Yarrock," Loss of the, 1104
- Railways
 - Fares—London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, 1250
 - Fatal Accident to Mr. Theobald, M.P., 148
 - Injuries to Servants, 691, 1249
 - Irchester Fatality, 902
 - Overcharges—Chatham and Dover Railway, 860
 - Rates and Charges—Legislation, 138, 1445
- Sea Fisheries Committee—Report, 870, 905
- Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's Speech, 98, 104, 108, 112
- Trade Unions Reports, 564
- Weighing Machines, Stamping, 1439

Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Amendment Bill

c. Intro., Mr. T. B. Curran; Read 1° Mar 16, 450

Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2) Bill

c. Intro., Dr. Kenny; Read 1° Mar 16, 452

MUNTZ, Mr. P. A., Warwickshire, Tamworth

Business of the House, Res., 1675

Trade and Agriculture, Depression of —
Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's
Speech, 118

White Ensign, 1243

MURRAY, Mr. A. G., Buteshire

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1194, 1203

Music and Dancing Licences (Middlesex) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Howard; Read 1° Mar 16, 452
Read 2° April 4, 1376

NAOROJI, Mr. D., Finsbury, Central

Land Values (Taxation by Local Authorities)
Bill, Intro., 456

Queen's Speech—Finance of India, 220

NAPIER, Hon. M. F., Roxburgh

Farm Servants' Holiday (Scotland) Bill,
Intro., 461

National Debt

Annuities, Account pres. Mar 21, 854

Savings Banks, Copy pres. Mar 29, 999

National Flags

Victoria Tower, National Flag on, Q. Mr.
Arnold - Forster; A. Mr. H. Gardner
Mar 20, 702

NAVY

First Lord of the Admiralty—Earl SPENCER

Secretary—Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH

Civil Lord—Mr. E. ROBERTSON

Arnold Forster's, Mr., Letter to "The Times"
(see under Navy Estimates)

Atlantic, Derelicts in, Qs. Sir J. Leng, Mr. G.
Bowles; As. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth
April 2, 1100

Brazilian Civil War—Explosion at Rio and Loss of British Officers, Q. Sir E. Ashmead-
Bartlett; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 22, 867

Coastguard Stations — Life-Saving Apparatus, Q. Mr. G. Bowles; A. Sir J. T.
Hibbert Mar 15, 307

Condition of—Debate on, on Motion for Com.
of Supply Mar 20, 703

NAVY—cont.Contracts

Harland and Wolff's Shipyard, Overin, Q. Mr. K. Hardie; A. Sir U.
Shuttleworth Mar 16, 440

Overtime on Contract Works, Q. Mr. W.
A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 16, 440

Torpedo Boats, Q. Mr. Woods; A. Sir
Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 20, 682

Defensive Preparations, Res. (Sir C. L.
Mar 16, 462

Dockyards

Apprentices, Instruction, Q. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen; A. Mr. E. Robertson
April 5, 1450

Classification, Q. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen; A. Mr. E. Robertson April 5, 1251

Haulbowline (see under sub-heading land)

Labour and Wages, Res. (Mr. Ke.
Mar 19, 608

Pensions, Q. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen
Mr. E. Robertson April 2, 1111

Working Hours, Qs. Mr. Kearley, S.
Gorst; As. Mr. E. Robertson Mar 19, 321

Engine-Room Complements, Q. Mr. Pe.
A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 19, 56

Engineering Examinations, Q. Mr. Schw.
A. Mr. E. Robertson April 5, 1443

Indian Troopships, Q. Mr. Forwood; A.
U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 19, 574; Q.
Baker; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth
April 6, 1507

Ireland

Haulbowline Dockyard—Repairs of Majesty's Ships, Q. Captain Donegan;
Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 15, 316

Mr. Field; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth
Mar 30, 1006

Training Ships, Qs. Mr. Gilhooly.
Fox; As. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth
Mar 20, 685

Lee-Metford Rifle, Q. Mr. Hanbury; A.
U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 16, 443

Manœuvres, Drill in, Q. Mr. G. Bowles
Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 20, 687

Nickel Steel Plates, Q. Mr. P. William.
A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 15, 316

Oil Fuel, Qs. Mr. G. Bowles; As. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 13, 140; Mar 20, 68

Rations, Condemned, Q. Mr. G. Bowles
Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 20, 689

Reserve

Debate on, on Motion for Com. of Supply
Mar 19, 660

Training, Q. Mr. Cochrane; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth April 3, 1248

Shipbuilding Contract Work—Expenditure
Q. Mr. G. Bowles; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 15, 306; Q. Mr. Forwood
A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 16, 55

Ships

"Bothnia," Q. Mr. Forwood; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 19, 574

"Crescent," Qs. Mr. Hanbury, Mr. G. Bowles, Mr. Howell; As. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 16, 442

Ironclads at Sea, Q. Mr. Forwood; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 19, 575

NAVY—cont.

Ships—cont.

New Battleships Launched in 1893, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 19, 560

"Powerful," Q. Colonel H. Vincent; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth April 9, 1577

"Victoria" Disaster, Debate on, on Motion for Com. of Supply, Mar 20, 703

Stonehouse Marine Barracks—Alleged Assault by an Officer, Obs. Mr. Kearley, Mr. Hanbury, Mr. Deputy Speaker Mar 15, 320

Stores, Inspection of, Q. Mr. Hanbury; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 15, 314

Torpedo-Boat Destroyers—"Harock"—Disclosures of Plans, Qs. Mr. Hanbury, Mr. Tomlinson; As. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth Mar 16, 434

Victualling Yard Manufacturing Accounts, 1892-3—Annual Accounts pres. Mar 29, 999

Warren Hastings Island, Reported Wreck off, Q. Mr. D. Crawford; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth April 9, 1568

White Ensign, Q. Mr. Muntz; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth April 3, 1243

Navy Estimates, 1894-5

Copy pres. Mar 12, 125

Statement Explanatory of Estimates, Copy pres. Mar 12, 126

83,400 Men and Boys, Com., Mar 20, 749; Report Mar 21, 851

£3,918,500—Wages, &c., of Officers, Seamen, Boys, Coastguard, and Marines, Com., Mar 20, 783; Report Mar 21, 851

Navy Estimates

Arnold-Forster's, Mr., Letter to "The Times," Personal Explanation (Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth) Mar 22, 870; Personal Explanation (Mr. Arnold-Forster) Mar 29, 905

NAYLOR-LEYLAND, Captain H. S., Colchester

Army and Navy Defensive Preparations, Res., 504

Old Age Pensions (No. 2) Bill, Intro., 453

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1343

Patriotic Fund Commissioners and the Balaclava Fund, 569

NEVILLE, Mr. R., Liverpool, Exchange Merchant Shipping Acts (Amendment) Bill, Res., 676

NEWDIGATE, Mr. F. A., Warwickshire, Nuneaton

Members of Parliament—System of Pairing, 1520

Newfoundland—Ministerial Crisis

Qs. Sir G. Baden-Powell, Sir C. Dilke; As. Mr. S. Buxton April 9, 1581

NOLAN, Colonel J. P., Galway, N.

Army Estimates

Factories, 550

Rifles, 539, 548

Artillery Majors, 333

Business of the House, 449

Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act (1887) Repeal Bill, Intro., 450

Ireland

Galway and Clifden Railway, 148

Swine Fever, 148

Supply—Uganda, 396, 404

North Berwick Provisional Order Bill

c. Intro., Mr. J. B. Balfour; Read 1° Mar 19, 675

Read 2° Mar 30, 1092

Reported April 6, 1522

Read 3°, and passed April 9, 1687

NORTHCOTE, Hon. Sir S., Exeter

Army Estimates—Reserve Stores, 543

Charity Commission (Parliamentary Control), Res., 1026

Reserve Army Stores, 585

NORTON, Captain C. W., Newington, W.

Army Medical Department—"Professional Assistant," 1111

Civil Service, Res., 924, 927

Parliamentary Elections (County of London Saturday Poll) Bill, Intro., 1316

Notice of Accidents Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Burt; Read 1° April 5, 1504

Nottingham Execution (see under Law, &c.)

NUSSEY, Mr. T. W., Pontefract

Billetting, 304, 1098

Featherstone Riots—Compensation, 576

Pontefract Garrison—Military Regulations, 302

O'BRIEN, Mr. P. J., Tipperary, N.

Ireland—Gun Licences—Case of Mr. John Lee, 568

O'BRIEN, Mr. W., Cork

Cork—Outdoor Sunday Preaching, 1518

Occupying Tenants' Enfranchisement Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Bartley; Read 1° Mar 20, 787

O'CONNOR, Mr. A., Donegal, E.

Bechuanaland—Concessions Commission, 317

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1416

Ireland

Fermoy Union Accounts, 323

Letterkenny Lunatic Asylum, 1113

Soldiers' Institutes in Dublin, 1113

Supply—Magistrates' Clerks, 367

O'CONNOR, Mr. J., Wicklow, W.

Ireland—Publicans as Magistrates, 1588

O'CONNOR, Mr. T. P., Liverpool, Scotland

Labourers (Ireland) Acts Amendment Bill, Intro., 451

Old Age Pensions Bill

a. Intro., Colonel Palmer; Read 1^o Mar 16, 450

2R., Debate adjourned April 4, 1317

Old Age Pensions (No. 2) Bill

c. Intro., Captain Naylor-Leyland; Read 1^o Mar 16, 453

Outdoor Provident Relief Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Bartley; Read 1^o Mar 20, 787

Outdoor Relief (Friendly Societies) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Strachey; Read 1^o Mar 16, 450

Outlawries Bill

c. Read 1^o Mar 12, 36

OWEN, Mr. T., Cornwall, Launceston

Cornwall Police Court Procedure—"Pridham & Jennings," 567, 861

Horwell's Endowed Schools Trustee, Election of, 304

PALMER, Colonel D., Gravesend

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, Intro., 450; 2R., 1317, 1337, 1370

Parish and District Councils

Q. Colonel Gunter; A. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre April 5, 1448; Q. Mr. Heneage; A. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre April 9, 1577

Parliament

LORDS—

MEETING OF PARLIAMENT Mar 12

THE SESSION OF PARLIAMENT opened by Commission

ROLL OF THE LORDS—Delivered Mar 12, 4

Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech

delivered by the LORD CHANCELLOR

The Queen's Speech having been reported by the LORD CHANCELLOR, an Address to HER MAJESTY thereon, moved by Lord SWANSEA, the Motion being seconded by Lord HAWKESBURY, Mar 12, 4

ADDRESS IN ANSWER

Mar 12—Lord Swansea, 4; Lord Hawkesbury, 13; Marquess of Salisbury, 18; Earl of Rosebery, 25; Address agreed to nemine dissente, 33

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS

Reported Mar 26, 900

PARLIAMENT—Lords—cont.

Business of the House

Obs. Marquess of Salisbury, Earlbery Mar 12, 34; Obs. Earl of Mar 13, 137; Mar 15, 297

Standing Order No. XXXIX.—dispensed with Mar 26, 900

Committees

Appeal Committee, Appointed Mar Chairman—The Earl of Morley, nemine dissente, to take the all Committees of this House Privileges Committee, Appointed Sub-Committee for Journals, Mar 12, 33

House of Lords

(References to, in Debate in Queen's Speech, 196

Peers and Parliamentary Elc Lord Rosebery's Visit to burgh

Qs. Mr. Renshaw, Mr. Hozier, Sir Mr. Dalziel; As. Sir W. Harcourt 347

Res. (Lord R. Churchill) Mar 19, 54

Private and Provisional Ord firmation Bills

Res. (The Earl of Morley) Mar 19,

Sat First

Mar 12—Duke of Bedford, after of his brother

April 9—Lord Twealmouth, death of his father

Stoppages in the Streets, C Precent

Renewed Mar 12, 34

Took the Oath

Mar 12—Earl of Buckinghamshire

COMMONS—

Address in Answer to Her Most Gracious Speech

Mar 12—The Queen's Speech ha reported by the SPEAKER: An humb thereon, moved by M 37; and Motion sec Mr. C. Fenwick, 41 Mr. A. J. Balfour, 4 W. Harcourt, 61, 71, Mr. J. Chamberlain, Harrington, 71, 73; Russell, 74; Mr. R. T. Mr. S. Woods, 75 Howard Vincent 75; Major Ras Sir A. Rollit, 8 Doid, 89; Mr. 92; Sir F. FitzWyg

[cont.

PARLIAMENT—Commons—cont.

Address in Answer to Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech—cont.

Mar 12—Mr. Macdonald, 95 ; Mr. Round, 96 ; Mr. Radcliffe Cooke, 97 ; Mr. Mundella, 98 ; 104, 108 ; Mr. Tomlinson, 104, 111 ; Mr. James Lowther, 107, 108 ; Colonel Kenyon-Slaney, 113 ; Mr. Gardner, 114 ; Mr. Chaplin, 115 ; Sir Mark Stewart, 118 ; Mr. Muntz, 118 ; Mr. Everett, 119 ; Mr. Jeffreys, 120 ; (Division), 121 ; Sir J. Fergusson, 121

Mar 13—Lord R. Churchill, 164 ; Mr. J. Morley, 172, 179 ; Mr. Harrington, 179 ; Mr. J. Redmond, 180 ; Mr. J. Chamberlain, 189 ; Mr. Labouchere (Amendt.) 194, 206, 207 ; Mr. W. Allen, 202 ; Sir W. Harcourt, 206, 207 ; (Division), 208 ; Sir G. Chesney ; (Amendt.) 208, 215 ; Mr. S. Smith, 213 ; Mr. H. H. Fowler, 214, 215 ; Mr. Naoroji, 220 ; (Amendt. Negatived), 221 ; Dr. J. Kenny (Amendt.), 221 ; Mr. W. Field, 225 ; Mr. J. Redmond, 227 ; Mr. Asquith, 231 ; Mr. T. Harrington, 234 ; Mr. Conybeare, 237 ; Mr. T. M. Healy, 238 ; (Division), 241 ; Mr. Clancy (Amendt.), 241 ; Mr. Harrington, 244 ; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 245, 246, 253, 254 ; Mr. T. M. Healy, 245 ; Sir W. Harcourt, 246, 251 ; Mr. J. Morley, 246 ; Mr. J. Chamberlain, 251 ; Mr. Labouchere, 253

Mar 14—Ministerial Statement upon result of Mr. Labouchere's Amendt., Sir W. Harcourt, 257 ; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 261 ; Mr. Labouchere, 263 ; Mr. J. Chamberlain, 265, 266 ; Mr. T. M. Healy, 265 ; (Debate resumed on Mr. Clancy's Amendt.), Mr. T. W. Russell, 274, 278, 290 ; Mr. Logan, 277, 278 ; Mr. Harrington, 280, 290 ; Mr. J. Redmond, 290 ; Mr. J. Morley, 291 ; Dr. Kenny, 291 ; Mr. W. Field, 293 ; Sir W. Harcourt 295 ; Colonel Saunderson, 295 ; Mr. J. Morley, 295 ; (Division) ; Address agreed to, 295

Mar 29—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS—Reported, 901

Business of the House and Public Business

Mar 13—Private Members' Nights, Qs. Viscount Cranborne, Mr. Bartley ; As. Sir W. Harcourt, 154
Government Business, Q. Mr. A. J. Balfour ; A. Sir W. Harcourt, 156

Mar 14—Financial Business, Res. (Sir W. Harcourt), 267

[cont.]

PARLIAMENT—Commons—cont.

Business of the House and Public Business—cont.

Mar 15—Scottish Legislation, Qs. Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Dalziel, Dr. Macgregor, Mr. Anstruther ; As. Sir G. Trevelyan, Sir W. Harcourt, 326

Vote on Account, Q. Mr. G. Bowles ; A. Sir W. Harcourt, 349

Mar 16—Statement (Sir W. Harcourt), Qs. Colonel Nolan, Mr. J. Chamberlain ; As. Sir W. Harcourt, 449

Mar 19—Statement (Sir W. Harcourt), Obs. Mr. A. J. Balfour, Sir W. Harcourt, Mr. Tomlinson, 586, 587

Mar 20—Scottish Private Bill Legislation. Q. Mr. Hozier ; A. Sir G. Trevelyan, 691

April 3—Motion for Select Com. (Sir A. Rollit), 1256

April 4—Suspension of the Twelve o'Clock Rule, Notice of, 1380

April 5—Qs. Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. J. Chamberlain ; As. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. J. Morley, 1460

April 6—Qs. Mr. J. Chamberlain, Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. J. Rowlands, Sir C. Dilke, Mr. Bartley ; As. Mr. J. Morley, 1520
Obs., Mr. J. Morley, 1564

April 9—Course of Business, Q. Mr. W. Kenny ; A. Sir W. Harcourt, 1595 ; Qs. Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Goschen, Sir G. Baden-Powell ; As. Sir W. Harcourt, 1675

Government Business, Motion (Sir W. Harcourt), 1596

Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, Obs. Mr. Sexton, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Deputy Speaker, Sir W. Harcourt, Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Dalziel, Mr. Chance, Dr. Tanner
Mar 12, 129

Res. (Sir W. Harcourt), Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Sexton, Mr. J. Stuart, Mr. Howell, Mr. Courtney, Mr. Knox, Mr. G. Bowles, Mr. Snape, Sir C. Cameron, Mr. W. Johnston
Mar 13, 156

Statement by Mr. Deputy Speaker as to Numbers, Mar 15, 350 ; Q. Mr. Seton-Karr ; A. Mr. Deputy Speaker
Mar 16, 461

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., Sir G. Trevelyan
April 2, 1116 ; Debate resumed and further adjourned
April 5, 1487

Closure of Debate (Standing Order 25), Paper laid upon the Table
April 4, 1380

Committees

House of Commons Officers Com. (References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 22, 880)

[cont.]

PARLIAMENT—Commons—cont.

Committees—cont.

Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, Select Com. nominated Mar 20, 784
(References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 22, 880, &c.)

Parliamentary Papers Distribution, Select Com. nominated April 2, 1216

Public Petitions, Select Com. nominated Mar 16, 556; Report April 4, 1380

Privileges Committee Mar 12, 36

Public Accounts, Appointment of Com. Mar 13, 254; Report pres. Mar 16, 556; Additions to Mar 21, 854

Selection, Nomination of Mar 15, 432

Selection (Standing Committee)—Chairmen's Panel, Report April 16, 522

Standing Orders—Select Com. nominated Mar 16, 432

Members

Arnold-Forster, Mr.—Personal Explanation Mar 29, 905

Kay-Shuttleworth, Sir U.—Personal Explanation Mar 22, 870

Pairing, System of, Qs. and Obs. Mr. Sexton, Mr. Speaker, Lord W. Lennox, Mr. Newdigate April 6, 1518

New Members Sworn

Mar 29—Ferguson, R. C. M., Esquire, for the Leith District of Burghs

April 2—Owen, Arthur C. H., for the County of Montgomery
Shaw, Thomas, Esquire, for the Hawick District of Burghs
Tennant, Harold John, Esquire, for the County of Berwick

April 5—Wigram, Alfred Money, Esquire, for County of Essex (Southern or Romford Division)

April 9—Caldwell, James, Esquire, for the County of Lanark (Mid Division)

New Writs Issued

Mar 12—For Leith District of Burghs, r. Ronald Craufurd Munro-Ferguson, Esquire, Commissioner of the Treasury

For Leeds (Western Division), r. The Right Hon. Herbert J. Gladstone, First Commissioner of Works

Mar 13—For Cambridgeshire (Northern or Wisbech Division), r. The Hon. Charles George Brand, Treasurer of Her Majesty's Household
For Hawick District of Burghs, r. Thomas Shaw, Esquire, Solicitor General for Scotland

Mar 16—For the County of Berwick, r. The Right Hon. Edward Marjoribanks, called up to the House of Lords

Mar 19—For County of Essex (South or Romford Division), r. James Theobald, Esquire, deceased

Mar 22—For Lanarkshire (Mid Division), r. John Wynford Phillips, Esquire, Chiltern Hundreds

PARLIAMENT—Commons—cont.

Orders and Resolutions

Elections

Corrupt Practices, Mar 12, 36

Peers as Candidates, Mar 12, 35

Peers Voting, Mar 12, 35

Selection of Constituency, Mar 11

Journals, Printing, Mar 12, 36

Witnesses, Tampering with—Falsification, Mar 12, 36

Police Regulations, Mar 12, 36

Votes and Proceedings, Printing, 1

"Parliamentary Debates" Index
Q. Mr. Bartley; A. Sir J. T. Hibber
1444

Parliamentary Elections (see th

Parliamentary Papers, Distribution
Select Com. nominated April 2, 121

Private Bills

Conference with Chairman of C of the House of Lords Mar 12, 35

Privilege

Lord Rosebery's Speech at Edinburgh (Lord R. Churchill) Mar 19, 588

Rules and Order of Debate
Speaker, Mr.)

Sittings and Adjournments
House

Alteration of Date of Meeting, r. (Sir W. Harcourt) Mar 20, 785

Easter Adjournment, Res. (Sir court) Mar 22, 880

Exemption from Standing Orders, 156

Speaker, Mr.

Deputy Speaker, Q. Sir D. Macfarlane, Sir W. Harcourt April 8, 1255

Indisposition of—The Chairman and Means took the Chair as Speaker Mar 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 123, 24, 29, 30

Standing Orders

Obs. Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Campbellman Mar 19, 608

Exemption from (Standing Com. Bills) April 5, 1461

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER

Gas Consumption in Parliament
Q. Mr. J. Rowlands; A. Mr. stone April 9, 1592

House of Commons—Members, Action of, Mar 22; (References to, in Supply, 884)

Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms
Com. nominated Mar 20, 784
(References to, in Debate on Mar 22, 880)

PARLIAMENT—Commons—Palace of Westminster—cont.

Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms Expenses, Motion for Return (Mr. A. C. Morton) Mar 21, 852

National Flag on the Victoria Tower, Q. Mr. Arnold-Forster; A. Mr. H. Gladstone Mar 20, 702

Structural Arrangements, Q. Mr. Paul; A. Mr. H. Gladstone Mar 29, 905

Parliamentary Elections

Berwickshire, New Writ for, Q. Mr. Hozier; A. Mr. T. E. Ellis Mar 14, 296

Lord Rosebery's Visit to Edinburgh, Qs. Mr. Renshaw, Mr. Hozier, Sir J. Gorst, Mr. Dalziel; As. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 15, 347

Res. (Lord R. Churchill) Mar 19, 588

Warwickshire Polling Districts, Copy pres. Mar 12, 129

Parliamentary Elections Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Howell; Read 1° Mar 16, 456

Parliamentary Elections (County of London Saturday Poll) Bill

c. Intro., Captain Norton; Read 1° April 3, 1316

Parliamentary Elections (Returning Officers) (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Tuite; Read 1° Mar 16, 454

Patent Agents Bill

c. Intro., Mr. A. Gibbs; Read 1° Mar 16, 451
Read 2° April 4, 1373

Patent Agents Registration Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Warmington; Read 1° April 4, 1380

PAUL, Mr. H. W., Edinburgh, S.

House of Commons—Structural Arrangements, 905

Post Office—Savings Bank Deposits—Withdrawals by Telegraph, 868

Scotland—Habitual Offenders, 1435

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1138

Paupers Deportation (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Flynn; Read 1° Mar 16, 453

PEARSON, Right Hon. Sir C. J., Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities

Scotland—Home Rule, Res., 1301, 1303

PEASE, Mr. J. A., Northumberland, Tyneside

Supply—Uganda, 394

PEEL, Right Hon. A. W. (see SPEAKER, Mr.)Peers at Elections (see under Parliamentary Elections)*Peers Disabilities Removal Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Brodrick; Read 1° Mar 16, 459

PENN, Mr. J., Lewisham

Navy

Engine-Room Complements, 563

"Victoria" Disaster, 728, 731

PERKS, Mr. R. W., Lincolnshire, Louth
Marriages (Attendance of Registrars) Bill,
Intro., 459PICKERSGILL, Mr. E. H., Bethnal Green, S.W.

Children, Imprisonment of, in Holloway Gaol, 150

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1414

Expedition against the Sofas, 144

Valuation (Metropolis) Bill, Intro., 1092

PICTON, Mr. J. A., Leicester

Children, Imprisonment of, in Holloway Gaol, 150

Piers and Harbours Provisional Orders

Copy pres. Mar 12, 127

Piers and Harbours Provisional Orders (No. 1) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Mundella; Read 1° April 9, 1688

PINKERTON, Mr. J., Galway

Queen's Colleges, Compulsory Retirement in, 1247

Pistols and Revolvers—Accidents

Res. (Marquess of Carmarthen) Mar 30, 1036

Pistols Bill

l. Pres., Lord Stanley of Alderley; Read 1° April 9, 1565

Places of Worship, &c. (Rating) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Clarence Smith; Read 1° Mar 16, 459

Places of Worship (Sites) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. J. E. Ellis; Read 1° Mar 19, 675

Plumbers' Registration Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Knowles; Read 1° Mar 16, 461

PLUNKET, Right Hon. D. R., Dublin University

Supply

Extension of Admiralty Buildings, 986, 989, 990, 992

South Kensington Museum, 1072

PLUNKETT, Hon. H. C., Dublin Co., S.
Ireland—Registry of Deeds Office, 1515
Margarine Act, 441

Police (see under Law and Justice and Police)

Police and Sanitary Regulations
Appointment of Com. April 3, 1239

Police (Metropolis) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. J. Rowlands; Read 1^o Mar 16, 460
2R. deferred April 4, 1379

Polling Districts (Warwickshire)
Copy pres. Mar 12, 129

PONDOLAND (see under AFRICA)

Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Hayden; Read 1^o Mar 16, 453

PORTUGAL

Manica Plateau, Q. Mr. J. W. Lowther; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 19, 584
Zambesi—Collision with Portuguese Troops, Qs. Mr. J. W. Lowther, Sir A. Rollit; As. Sir E. Grey Mar 19, 583

"Port Yarrock," The (see under Merchant Shipping)

POST OFFICE (ENGLAND & WALES)

Postmaster General—Mr. ARNOLD MORLEY
African Mails, Q. Mr. Conybeare; A. Mr. A. Morley April 5, 1461

American Mail Route

Distances between Ports, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. A. Morley April 6, 1506
Queentown and Morville, Qs. Sir J. Leng, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. A. Morley April 6, 1506

Return ordered April 4, 1380

Countermen, Metropolitan, Q. Mr. Butcher; A. Mr. A. Morley April 9, 1569

Express Messenger Service, Q. Mr. H. Heaton; A. Mr. A. Morley Mar 13, 138

Idle Post Office, Q. Mr. Byles; A. Mr. A. Morley Mar 20, 697

Inland Branch, Q. Mr. Diamond; A. Mr. A. Morley April 6, 1513

Ireland (see under that title)

Manchester Office—Christmas Day Pay, Q. Mr. Schwann; A. Mr. A. Morley April 2, 1101

Queen's Birthday—Holiday, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. A. Morley April 9, 1587

Rural Postmen, Q. Mr. Luttrell; A. Mr. A. Morley Mar 20, 681

Savings Banks Act, Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis; A. Mr. A. Morley May 19, 558

Savings Banks—Withdrawals by Telegraph, Q. Mr. Paul; A. Mr. A. Morley Mar 22, 868

Scotland (see under title SCOTLAND)

POST OFFICE (ENGLAND & W
cont.

Telegraphs

Burgh Heath, Q. Mr. Bucknill; Morley April 9, 1578

Central Office—Working Hours, Lockwood; A. Mr. A. Morley 1005

Departmental Committee's Report, Macdonald; A. Mr. A. Morley 1249

Highman, Henry—Superannual 1884—Copy pres. Mar 29, 999

International Code, Q. Mr. H. H. Mr. A. Morley Mar 15, 303

Metropolitan Clerks, Q. Mr. Bu Mr. A. Morley April 9, 1569

West Indian and South America, Q. Mr. Hogan; A. Mr. A. Morley 561

POWELL, Sir F. S., Wigan
Charity Commission (Parliamentary Res., 1028

Police and Sanitary Regulations C 1242

Rivers Pollution Prevention Bill, R Supply

British Museum, 831, 832

Elementary Education—Require the Education Department, 38 Training Colleges, 386

Prevention of Cruelty to Childr

c. Intro., Sir B. Webster; Read 1^o Ma Read 2^o April 4, 1377; Con. in 4 April 9, 1687

Prisons (see under Law and Ju Police)

PROVAND, Mr. A. D., Glasgow friars

"Port Yarrock," Loss of the, 1104

Public Accounts Committee (see Parliament)

Public Petitions Committee (see Parliament)

Public Buildings (London) Bill

c. Intro., Colonel Hughes; Read 1^o 460
Read 2^o April 3, 1315

Public-Houses (Hours of Closing land) Bill

c. Intro., Sir C. Cameron; Read 1^o 853

Public Service (see Civil Servic)

Publicans and Military Pension under Licensing)

Quarantine

Obs. Mr. G. Bowles, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre Mar 29, 955

Quarter Sessions (Midsummer) Bill

2. Pres. Lord Herschell; Read 1^a Mar 13, 137

Read 2^a Mar 15, 299

Railway and Canal Traffic Act (1888) Amendment Bill

c. Intro., Sir J. Whitehead; Read 1^o Mar 16, 454

Railways

Fares—London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, Q. Mr. Benn; A. Mr. Mundella April 3, 1249

Injuries to Servants—Return, Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 20, 691; Q. Mr. Channing; A. Mr. Mundella April 3, 1249

Irchester Fatality, Q. Mr. J. Stuart; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 29, 902

Overcharges—Chatham and Dover Railway, Q. Mr. J. Stuart; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 22, 860

Rates and Charges—Legislation, Q. Sir J. Whitehead; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 13, 138; Qs. Mr. Richardson, Sir J. Whitehead; As. Mr. Mundella April 5, 1445

Theobald, Mr., M.P., Fatal Accident to, Q. Colonel Lockwood; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 13, 148

Volunteers — Sergeant Instructors and Railway Fares, Q. Sir A. Acland-Hood; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 19, 566

RASCH, Major F. C., Essex, S.E.

Army—Discharged and Reserve Soldiers, Employment for, Res., 507

Business of the House, Res., 1640

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1415

Essex Fishing Grounds—Removing Cultch, &c., 1253

Foreign Shell Fish Bill, Intro., 458

Grigsby, Dr., 1247

Navy Estimates

Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 659

Essex Fishing Ground, 783

Supply

County Courts, 375

House of Commons Offices, Commission on, 356

Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's Speech, 75

RATHBONE, Mr. W., Carnarvonshire, Arfon

Charity Commission (Parliamentary Control), Res., 1027

Rating of Machinery Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Coddington; Read 1^o Mar 16, 451

REDMOND, Mr. J. E., Waterford

Business of the House, Res., 1611

Ireland—Financial Relations, 155

Queen's Speech, Reply to

Administration of the Law in Ireland, 290, 294

Dynamite Prisoners, 227

Home Rule, 180

REED, Sir E. J., Cardiff

Navy

Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 651

"Victoria" Disaster, 715, 716, 718, 719, 721, 723

Registration of Electors Bill

Qs. Mr. Clancy, Mr. Carson, Mr. Macartney, Mr. Darling; As. Mr. J. Morley Mar 22, 864

REID, Mr. R. T., Dumfries, &c.

Queen's Speech, Reply to, 74

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1165

Religious Tests (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; Read 1^o Mar 16, 455

RENSHAW, Mr. C. B., Renfrew, W.

County Councils Association (Scotland) Expenses Bill, Res., 786

Scotland

Lord Rosebery's Visit to Edinburgh, 347

Public Works Expenditure, 303

Return Tickets Bill

c. Intro. (Mr. A. C. Morton); Read 1^o Mar 20, 786

Revolvers and Pistols

Res. (Marquess of Carmarthen) Mar 30, 1036

RICHARDSON, Mr. J., Durham, S.E.

Railway Rates and Charges, 1445

Supply—Voluntary Schools, &c., 814

RIPON, MARQUESS OF (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Dominica—Sir R. Hamilton's Report, Motion for an Address, 301

Rivers Pollution Prevention Bill

c. Intro. (Sir F. S. Powell); Read 1^o Mar 20, 785

Road Subvention Abolition (Scotland) Bill

c. Intro., Sir C. Cameron; Read 1^o Mar 21, 853

ROBERTSON, Mr. E. (Civil Lord of the Admiralty), Dundee

Dockyards

Apprentices Instruction, 1450

Classification, 1251

Labour and Wages, 321; Res., 624, 625

Pensions, 1111

Engineering Examinations, 1443

Essex Fishing Grounds, 783

ROBY, Mr. H. J., Lancashire, S.E., Eccles
Mines (Eight Hours) Bill, Intro., 450

ROLLIT, Sir A. K., Islington, S.
Anglo-Portuguese Treaty, 695
Behring Sea Award Bill, 1574
Brazilian Civil War, 332
Business of the House, 856; Motion for Select Com., 1256, 1259, 1263, 1269, 1270
Charity Commission (Parliamentary Control), Res., 1034
Civil Service—Second Division Promotions, Res., 930
Gresham University Commission Report, 905
Kingston-upon-Hull (Court of Record) Bill, Res., 788
Libel Bill, Intro., 457
London Building Bye-Laws—County Council Bill, 1107
Merchant Shipping—Undermanning, 1105
Navy—"Victoria" Disaster, 740
Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee, 1239
Sea Fisheries, Select Committee's Report, 870, 904
Solicitors' Examination Bill, Intro., 788; 2R., 1686
Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1171
Supply
Colonial Office—South African Telegrams, 362
County Courts, 374
Extension of Admiralty Buildings, 987
House of Commons Offices, Commission on, 359
Metropolitan Police Courts, 997
Petitions to the House of Commons, 352
Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's Speech, 85
Zambesi—Collision with Portuguese Troops, 583

ROSCOE, Sir H. E., Manchester, S.
Intoxicating Liquors (Licences) Bill, Intro., 456

ROSEBERY, EARL OF (First Lord of the Treasury and Lord President of the Council)
Beaumaris Scheme, 1565
Business of the House, 34, 137, 297
Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 25

Rosebery, Earl of—Peers at Elections—Edinburgh Speech
Qs. Mr. Renshaw, Sir J. Gorst, Mr. Dalziel; As. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 15, 347
Res. (Lord R. Churchill) Mar 19, 388

ROUND, Mr. J., Essex, N.E., Harwich
Beer Adulteration Bill, Intro., 451
Essex Fishing Grounds, 1003
Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's Speech, 96

ROUNDELL, Mr. C. S., York, W. A. Skipton
Thrift in Elementary Schools, 1508

ROWLANDS, Mr. J., Finsbury, E.
Barker and Company, Failure of, 1436
Business of the House, 1521; Res., 1630
Charity Commission (Parliamentary Control), Res., 1034
Parliament Houses—Gas Consumption, 159
Police (Metropolis) Bill, Intro., 460

ROWLANDS, Mr. W. B., Cardiganshire
Liquor Traffic Local Veto (Wales) Bill, Intro., 455

Royal Parks
Bands in, Q. Mr. Aird; A. Mr. H. Gladstone April 3, 1251

RUSSELL, Mr. G. W. E. (Under Secretary of State for the Home Department), North Beds.
Magistrates, County, Returns, 1575
Metropolitan Police Provisional Order Bill, Intro., 1687
Music and Dancing Licences (Middlesex) Bill, 2R., 1377
Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee, 1239
Prevention of Cruelty to Children Bill, 2R., 1378

RUSSELL, Mr. T. W., Tyrone, S.
Business of the House, Res., 1641
Ireland
Belfast Workhouse, Lunatics in, 1431, 1432
Cork—Sunday Outdoor Preaching, 1517, 1590
Evictions—Arran Islands, 1512
Killarney Union, 1570
Land Acts—Select Committee, 139, 1114, 1454, 1595
Listowel Union—Outdoor Relief, 1585
Publicans as Magistrates, 1585
Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 137
Queen's Speech, Reply to, 74
Administration of the Law in Ireland, 274, 278, 290

RUSSELL, SIR C. (Attorney General), Hackney, S.
Banstead Common, 1582
Behring Sea Award Bill, 1575; Intro., 998, 2R., 1461; Com., 1676, 1677, 1680, 1681, 1682, 1683
Civil Service Superannuation, 1516
Declaration of Paris, 345
Law Officers (Private Practice), Res., 948, 949, 950
London Streets and Buildings Bill, Select Com., 1427
Supply
County Courts, 373, 375
House of Commons Offices, Commission on, 355
Law Officers of the Crown, 368
Trustees Act (1893), 152

RUSSIA

British Herrings—Certificates of Origin, Q. Mr. Buchanan; A. Sir E. Grey April 9, 1576

Danube—Kilia Mouth, Q. Mr. G. Bowles; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 15, 341

Russo-German Commercial Treaty

Q. Mr. J. W. Lowther; A. Sir E. Grey April 2, 1097; Q. Mr. Holland; A. Sir E. Grey April 6, 1514

Sale of Food and Drugs Act (1875) &c. Amendment Bill

c. Intro., Sir C. Cameron; Read 1° April 4, 1379

Sale of Intoxicating Liquors Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Courtney; Read 1° Mar 21, 153

Sale of Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Sir T. Lea; Read 1° Mar 16, 460

SALISBURY, Marquess of

Business of the House, 34

Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 18

SAMOA

British Warships, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Sir E. Grey April 2, 1097

SAUNDERSON, Colonel E. J., Armagh, N.
Queen's Speech, Reply to, 295

Savings Banks

National Debt, Copy pres. Mar 29, 999

Post Office Savings Banks (see under Post Office)

SCHWANN, Mr. C. E., Manchester, N.
Ceylon

Defences of Colombo, 1443

Rifle Ranges, 1444

Manchester Post Office—Christmas Day Pay, 1101

Navy—Engineering Examinations, 1443

Tramways Bill, Intro., 459

SCOTLAND

Secretary for—Sir G. O. TREVELYAN

Lord Advocate—Mr. J. B. BALFOUR

Solicitor General—Mr. ALEXANDER ASHER

Army

Hamilton Brigade Depot, Q. Mr. Hozier; A. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 13, 142

Births, Deaths, Marriages, and Vaccination, Copy pres. Mar 12, 127

County Council—Statutory Meetings, Q. Mr. A. Cross; A. Mr. J. B. Balfour Mar 15, 336

Crofters

Settlements in Canada, Q. Mr. Weir; A. Sir G. Trevelyan April 3, 1254

[cont.]

SCOTLAND—cont.

Day Trespass Act, Prosecution under, Q. Sir C. Cameron; A. Mr. J. B. Balfour Mar 16, 433

Deer Forest Commission, Q. Mr. S. Keay; A. Sir G. Trevelyan April 2, 1097

(References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 21, 792, &c.)

Dingwall Poaching Prosecutions, Qs. Mr. Weir; As. Mr. J. B. Balfour Mar 22, 858; April 3, 1252; April 9, 1570

Disestablishment, Qs. Mr. Hozier, Mr. Thorburn, Sir W. Lawson; As. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 20, 696

(References to, in Debate on the Queen's Speech, Mar 12, 121, &c.)

Dundee Tailoring Trade, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 20, 678

Edinburgh

Castle Rock, Q. Viscount Wolmer; A. Sir J. T. Hibbert April 5, 1449

Commissary Office, Q. Viscount Wolmer; A. Sir G. Trevelyan April 5, 1449

Lord Rosebery's Visit to, Qs. Mr. Renshaw, Mr. Hozier, Sir J. Gorst, Mr. Dalziel; As. Sir W. Harcourt Mar 15, 347

Res. (Lord R. Churchill) Mar 19, 588

Education

Assault by a Lewis Schoolmaster, Q. Mr. Weir; A. Sir G. Trevelyan April 9, 1567

Books, Q. Mr. Dalziel; A. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 20, 682

Education Act, Working of, Qs. Mr. Jacks, Mr. Dalziel; As. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 16, 437

Peats—Children taking to Schools, Q. Mr. Weir; A. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 22, 865

Secondary Education Grant, Q. Sir D. Macfarlane; A. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 20, 678

Fisheries

Loch Fyne Herrings, Q. Sir D. Macfarlane; A. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 15, 311

Trawling

Grimsby "Ceylon", Q. Sir L. Lyell; A. Mr. J. B. Balfour Mar 15, 333

Moray Firth, Qs. Sir W. Wedderburn; As. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 15, 317; April 2, 1096

Stromness, Qs. Sir L. Lyell, Mr. Buchanan; As. Mr. J. B. Balfour Mar 13, 145

(References to, in Debate on Supply, Mar 22, 890)

Footpaths in the Island of Lewis, Qs. Mr. Weir; As. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 22, 859; April 9, 1566

Habitual Offenders, Q. Mr. Paul; A. Sir G. Trevelyan April 5, 1435

Home Rule, Res. (Mr. Dalziel) April 3, 1287

Invergordon Ferry, Q. Mr. Weir; A. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 22, 860

Legislation, Qs. Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Dalziel, Dr. Macgregor, Mr. Anstruther; As. Sir G. Trevelyan, Sir W. Harcourt Mar 15, 326

Meat, Foreign (see under title Agriculture, Board of)

Parliamentary Business—Standing Committee, Res. (Sir G. Trevelyan) April 2, 1116

Debate resumed and adjourned April 5, 1487

[cont.]

SCOTLAND—cont.

- Parochial Grants*, Q. Mr. Hoxier; A. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 18, 142
- Police—Duties of Commissioners of Police Burghs*, Q. Mr. Maxwell; A. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 16, 441
- Prison, Barlinnie*, Q. Mr. W. Whitelaw; A. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 22, 862
- Private Bill Legislation*, Q. Mr. Hoxier; A. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 20, 691
- Procurator Fiscal of Lochmaddy*, Q. Dr. Macgregor; A. Mr. J. B. Balfour Mar 22, 862
- Public Works Expenditure*, Q. Mr. Renshaw; A. Sir G. Trevelyan Mar 15, 303
- Railways—Ross-shire*, Q. Mr. Weir; A. Sir W. Harcourt April 3, 1255
- Saddell Tenancy Dispute*, Qs. Sir D. Macfarlane, Dr. Macgregor; As. Mr. J. B. Balfour Mar 22, 867
- St. Andrew's University—Rev. J. Herkless*, Q. Sir C. Dalrymple; A. Sir G. Trevelyan April 5, 1441
- Sheriffs and the Gaelic Language*, Qs. Mr. Weir; As. Mr. J. B. Balfour Mar 22, 858; April 3, 1251
- Universities Act (1889) Ordinances* 46, 47, 48, Copies pres. Mar 18, 256
- University of Edinburgh*, Copy pres. Mar 12, 127
- Veterinary College Grant*, Q. Mr. Hoxier; A. Mr. J. Morley Mar 15, 346

Sea Fisheries, Select Committee Report
Qs. Sir A. Rollit; As. Mr. Mundella Mar 22, 870; Mar 29, 904

Secondary Education (see under Education)

Select Vestries Bill

1. Pres. pro forma; Read 1^o Mar 12, 4

SETON-KARR, Mr. H., St. Helen's

Business of the House, Res., 1632
Employers' Liability Bill, Intro., 1316
Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 461

SEXTON, Mr. T., Kerry, N.

Ireland
Board of Irish Lights, 573
Church Faml, 581
Clare County, Crime in, 325
Cork—Sunday Disturbances, 1590
Evictions, 698, 703, 1459, 1511
Fermoy Union Accounts, 322
Land Acts Committee, 698, 878, 1455
Listowel Union, Outdoor Relief, 1585
Loans to Tenants, 874
Phoenix Park—Vehicular Traffic, 576

Law Library, Four Courts (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 1115

Parliament

Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 129, 130, 132, 136, 160
Members "Pairing," 1518

SHEEHY, Mr. D., Galway, S.
Arran Islands, Famine in, 319

Shops (Early Closing) Bill

c. Intro., Sir J. Lubbock; Read 1^o Mar 16,

Shops, Hours of Labour in

Q. Mr. Anstruther; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 684

Siam—Franco-Siamese Question

Papers on, Q. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett
Sir E. Grey Mar 22, 868
Debates on Motion for Com. of Sup
Mar 30, 1060

SIDEBOTTOM, Mr. W., Derbyshire, E Peak

Supply—Elementary Education—Requirements of the Education Department, 3

Smaller Dwellings (Scotland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. A. Cross; Read 1^o Mar 16, 4

SMITH, Mr. C., Hull, E.

Places of Worship, &c. (Rating) Bill, In 459

SMITH, Mr. J. P., Lanark, Partick

Business of the House, Res., 1649

SMITH, Mr. S., Flintshire

India—Finance—Reply to Queen's Speech 213
Liverpool, Houses of Ill-Repute in, 858
Transvaal—Thrashing the Blacks, 683

SNAPE, Mr. T., Lancashire, S.E., H wood

Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 1
Liverpool Corporation Churches Bill, In 457

SOLICITOR GENERAL—Sir J. RIGBYSolicitors' Examination Bill

c. Intro., Sir A. Rollit; Read 1^o Mar 20, 78
Read 2^o April 9, 1686

Solicitors' Government Trust Comp

Dr. Grigby, Q. Major Rasch; A. Mr. Buxton April 3, 1247

Solicitors (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Field; Read 1^o Mar 20, 787

Solicitors' (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Carson; Read 1^o April 3, 1310

South Kensington Museum

Facade, Q. Mr. Webster; A. Mr. H. G. Stone April 6, 1515 (References to, in Debate on Sup
Mar 30, 1069)

Speaker, Mr. (RIGHT HON. ARTHUR WELLESLEY PEEL), Warwick and Leamington

Business of the House

As to whether it was right to put down a Bill for 2R. which had not been printed, Mr. Speaker said it was for the House to judge in view of the circumstances under which it was put down April 4, 1379

Indisposition of

Mar 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 29, 30

Members

There was no official or Parliamentary recognition of the system of pairing. It was a custom that had grown up, owing to the convenience it afforded to Members, and it was fully recognised by all that it must be conducted upon the most strictly honourable principles, which had hitherto never been lost sight of by Members April 6, 1519

Miscellaneous Rulings

April 4, 1371; April 5, 1480; April 9, 1622, 1638, 1655

Private Bills

Any point of Order should have been raised before the 2R. There was no reason why the Bill (London Building Bye-Laws) should not be introduced as a Private Bill. If the Bill raised a question of public policy, that was a question which should have been raised at the proper time April 2, 1107

Questions

Under the Rules of the House a Member was responsible for the statements contained in a Question April 5, 1452

The Question was only an argumentative way of bringing forward a matter having reference to a question other than the one under consideration, and was ruled out of Order April 9, 1591

Rules and Order of Debate

The Motion was Home Rule for Scotland, and the Member was not entitled to go into the question of Home Rule for Wales April 3, 1301

SPENCER, Mr. Ernest, West Bromwich

Convictions, Records of, 1001
Labour Minister Bill, Intro., 452

Sport Regulation Bill

c. Intro., Mr. A. C. Morton; Read 1^o Mar 20, 786

Order for 2R.; Debate adjourned Mar 30, 1091

STAMFORD, Earl of

Dominica—Sir R. Hamilton's Report, Motion for an Address, 300, 301

Standing Committees (see under Parliament)

STANHOPE, Hon. P. J., Burnley

Factory Act, Breach of, at Preston, 447

STANLEY of ALDERLEY, Lord

Beaumaris Scheme, 1565

Pistols Bill, Pres., 1565

Statistical Abstract (Foreign Countries)

Copy pres. Mar 15, 432

Statute Law Revision Bills and Consolidation Bills

l. Res. to refer to Joint Com. Mar 15, 300

April 2, 1216; April 9, 1565

Steam Engines and Boilers (Persons in Charge) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. John Wilson (Durham); Read 1^o Mar 16, 454

STERN, Mr. S. J., Suffolk, Stowmarket

Housing of the Working Classes Bill, Intro. 459

STEWART, Sir M. J., Kirkcudbright

Business of the House, Res., 1655

Indian Cotton Duties, 443

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1178

Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's Speech, 118

Storms

Harbours of Refuge on the East Coast of Yorkshire, Q. Mr. Holden; A. Mr. Mundella April 5, 1445

STRACHEY, Mr. E., Somerset, S.

Outdoor Relief (Friendly Societies) Bill, Intro., 450

Straits Settlements—Military Expenditure

Q. Sir J. Gorst; A. Mr. S. Buxton Mar 19, 573

STUART, Mr. J., Shoreditch, Horton

East London Water Bill, 1505; 2R., 1381, 1404, 1415

Introduction of and Ballotting for Bills, 161
London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Bill, 2R., 1227, 1229, 1238

London Streets and Buildings Bill, Select Com., 1428

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, 2R., 1371

Railways

Chatham and Dover—Overcharges, 860

Irchester Fatality, 902

Thames Conservancy Bill, 2R., 1422; Instr. to Com., 1425

West Middlesex Water Bill, 2R., 1425

SULLIVAN, Mr. T. D., Donegal, W.
Stranorlar and Glenties Railway, 1102

Superannuation Act, 1884

Copy pres. Mar 12, 128; Mar 29, 999;
April 2, 1216

SUPPLY

Army and Navy Estimates (see under those titles)

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1893-4.

Copy pres. Mar 12, 128

CLASS II.

- £1,200—House of Commons Offices, Com., Mar 15, 351; Report Mar 16, 555
- £1,200—Home Office, Com., Mar 15, 359; Report Mar 16, 555
- £1,500—Colonial Office, Com., Mar 15, 363; Report Mar 16, 555
- £1,080—Local Government Board, Com., Mar 15, 365; Report Mar 16, 555
- £25,000—Law Charges, Com., Mar 15, 366; Report Mar 16, 555
- £10—County Courts, Com., Mar 15, 372; Report Mar 16, 555
- £1,200—Register House, Edinburgh, Com., Mar 15, 377; Report Mar 16, 555
- £207,864—Public Education, Com., Mar 15, 378; Report Mar 16, 555
- £16,000—Science and Art Department, Com., Mar 15, 391; Report Mar 16, 555

CLASS V.

- £27,500—Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Aboard, Com., Mar 15, 391; Division, 405; Report Mar 16, 555
- £88,567—Colonial Services and South African Charges, Com., Mar 15, 405; Division, 429; Report Mar 16, 555

CLASS VI.

- £6,400—Superannuations and Retired Allowances, Com., Mar 15, 429; Report Mar 16, 555

CLASS VII.

- £4,500—Temporary Commissions, Com., Mar 15, 429; Report Mar 16, 555

CIVIL SERVICE EXCESSES, 1892-3.

Copy pres. Mar 16, 556

- £685 14s.—Civil Service Excesses, 1892-3, Com., Mar 20, 784; Report Mar 21, 851

VOTE ON ACCOUNT, 1894-5.

- £4,199,768—Com., Mar 21, 789
- Amendt. (Mr. J. G. Lawson), 803; Withdrawn
- Amendt. (Mr. A. C. Morton), 835; Withdrawn
- Amendt. (Mr. Weir), 847; Withdrawn
- Original Question agreed to, Report Mar 22, 880

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1894-5.

Memorandum, Copy pres. Mar 12, 128

[cont.]

SUPPLY—cont.

CLASS I.

- £31,526—Royal Palaces and M House, Com., Mar 29, 963; Report Mar 30, 1077
- £79,228—Royal Parks and Pleasure Com., Mar 29, 971; Report Mar 30, 1077
- £30,855—Houses of Parliament Com., Mar 29, 976; Report Mar 30, 1077
- £31,200—Extension of Admiralty Com., 984; Amendt. (Mr. Bar Withdrawn, 993; Original Question, 993; Report Mar 30, 1092
- £59,278—Miscellaneous Legal Buildings, County Courts, Metropolitan Police and Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland, Mar 29, 993; Report Mar 30, 1100
- £28,614—Art and Science Buildings, Britain, Com., Mar 30, 1064 (Mr. Bartley), 1074; Division Agreed to, 1081; Report April 21, 1161
- £21,161—Diplomatic and Consular and Maintenance of certain Abroad, Com., Mar 30, 1081; (Mr. Hanbury), 1086; Division Agreed to, 1091; Report April 21, 1161

Supply

Mercantile Marine Expenditure, Bowles; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 30, 1064
Vote on Account, Q. Mr. G. Bow W. Harcourt Mar 15, 349

Supreme Court of Judicature (P Bill

1. Pres., Lord Herschell; Read 1st Mar 15, 297
Read 2nd Mar 15, 297

SUTHERLAND, Mr. A., Sutherland
Supply—Deer Forest Commission,

SWANSEA, Lord
Queen's Speech, Address in Answer

SWAZILAND (see under AFRICA)

SWEETMAN, Mr. J., Wicklow
"Hondekliip," Wreck of the, 149

SWITZERLAND
Inebriates, Treatment of, Q. Knowles; A. Sir E. Grey Mar 16, 556

TALBOT, Mr. J. G., Oxford U
India—Staff Corps, Promotions, 10
Secondary Education Commission,
Supply—Elementary Education
ments of the Education Department

TANNER, Dr. C. K., Cork Co.,
Introduction of and Ballotting for TAYLOR, Mr. F., Norfolk, S.

Local Government Act—Parochial
328

Teachers' Registration Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Macdonald; Read 1° April 3, 1316

Telegraphs (see under Post Office)TEMPLE, Sir R., Surrey, Kingston

Elementary Education (Exemption from School Attendance) Bill, Intro., 456

Franco-Siamese Question—Papers, 1060, 1063

Mutiny Bill, 856

Non-Board Schools—Improvements, Res., 958

Pistols and Revolvers—Accidents, Res., 1043

Supply

Art and Science Buildings, 1065, 1066, 1080, 1081

Franco-Siamese Question, 834

Houses of Parliament, 979, 984

Legation and Consular Buildings in China, Indian Contribution to, 1085

Royal Palaces, 970

Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 972, 973

Uganda, 395, 397

Voluntary Schools, &c., 815

Thames Conservancy Bill, 2R., 1423

Worcestershire, Cotteridge School, 446

Tenant Farmers' Sporting Rights Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Luttrell; Read 1° Mar 20, 787

Thames Conservancy Bill

c. Read 2° April 5, 1419

THOMAS, Mr. D. A., Merthyr Tydvil

Grocers' Licence Abolition Bill, Intro., 1504

THORBURN, Mr. W., Peebles and Selkirk

Church of Scotland Reference Bill, Intro., 458

Disestablishment, 696

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1206

THORNTON, Mr. P. M., Clapham

London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Bill, 2R., 1238

Supply

Holyrood Palace, 965

Linlithgow Palace, 972

TOMLINSON, Mr. W. E. M., Preston

Army Estimates—Rifle Ranges, Lancashire, 545

Railway Rates Bill, 587

Supply

Art and Science Buildings, 1065, 1066, 1068, 1079

Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, 1081, 1086, 1087, 1088

Elementary Education—Requirements of the Education Department, 388

Torpedo-Boat "Havock"—Disclosures of Plans, 435

Trade and Agriculture, Depression of—Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's Speech, 104, 111, 112

Wigan Magistrate—Alleged Corrupt Practice by Mr. R. Johnson, 436

Town Holdings Bill

c. Intro., Mr. H. L. W. Lawson; Read 1° Mar 16, 451

Town Parks (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Captain Donelan; Read 1° Mar 16, 453

Trade and Commerce

Depression—Amendt. to Address in Answer to Queen's Speech (Colonel H. Vincent) Mar 12, 75

TRADE, BOARD OF

President—Mr. MUNDELLA

Secretary—Mr. T. BURT

Barker and Compang, Failure of, Q. Mr. J. Rowlands; A. Mr. Mundella April 5, 1436

Dover Pier Dues, Q. Mr. G. Bowles; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 19, 578

German Prison Labour—Importation of Goods into England, Q. Mr. Field; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 15, 341; Qs. Colonel H. Vincent; As. Mr. Mundella April 2, 1103; April 5, 1456; Q. Mr. Conybeare; A. Mr. Mundella April 5, 1458

Labour Department (see that title)

Meat, Foreign and Home Fed (see under title Agriculture, Board of) Merchant Shipping (see that title)

Railways (see that title)

Russo-German Commercial Treaty (see that title)

Trade Union Reports, Q. Mr. Howell; A. Mr. Mundella Mar 19, 564

Weighing Machines, Stamping of, Q. Mr. Caine; A. Mr. Mundella April 5, 1439

Trade Disputes (Arbitration) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Butcher; Read 1° Mar 16, 458

Trade Reports (Annual Series)

Copy pres. Mar 29, 1000

Trade Reports (Miscellaneous Series)

Copies pres. Mar 15, 432; Mar 20, 788; Mar 29, 1000

Trade Unions (see under title Labour)Tramways and Public Companies (Ireland) Act, 1883, Amendment Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Tully; Read 1° Mar 16, 461

Tramways Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Schwann; Read 1° Mar 16, 459

Treasury Chest Fund

Copy pres. Mar 12, 128

Treaty Series (No. 4, 1894)

Copy pres. Mar 15, 432

Treaty Series (No. 5, 1894)

Copy pres. Mar 15, 432

TREVELYAN, RIGHT HON. SIR G. O.
(Secretary for Scotland), Glasgow, Bridgeton

Business of the House—Scottish Legislation, 326, 691

Cockenzie Fishery Provisional Order Bill, Intro., 1522

Scotland

Crofters—Canadian Settlements, 1254

Deer Forest Commission, 1097

Disestablishment, 696

Edinburgh Commissary Office, 1449

Education

Assault by a Lewis Schoolmaster, 1567

Books, 682

Education Act, Working of, 437

Peats—Children Taking to Schools, 865

Secondary Education Grant, 678

Fisheries

Loch Fyne Herrings, 311

Trawling, 317, 1096

Footpaths in the Island of Lewis, 859, 1566

Habitual Offenders, 1435

Home Rule, Res., 1307, 1308

Invergordon Ferry, 860

Parochial Grants, 142

Police—Duties of Commissioners of Police Burghs, 442

Prisons, Barlinnie, 862

Public Works, Expenditure, 303

St. Andrew's University—Rev. J. Herkless, 1442

Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1116

Supply

Deer Forest Commission, &c., 796, 841, 842

Fisheries—Trawling, 892

Scotch Affairs, 847

Trinidad—Diplomatic Relations with Venezuela

Q. Colonel H. Vincent; A. Sir E. Grey April 5, 1429; Qs. Colonel H. Vincent; As. Mr. S. Buxton April 9, 1592

Trust Companies Billc. Intro., Mr. Wootton Isaacson; Read 1^o Mar 19, 675Trustee Act (1893) Amendment Billc. Intro., Mr. W. Kenny; Read 1^o Mar 16, 437Read 2^o April 9, 1687Trustees Act, 1893

Q. Mr. W. Kenny; A. Sir C. Russell Mar 13, 152

Tuberculosis (see under Agriculture)TUITE, Mr. J., Westmeath, N.

Parliamentary Elections (Returning Officers) (Ireland) Bill, Intro., 454

TULLY, Mr. J., Leitrim, S.

Tramways and Public Companies (Ireland) Act (1893) Amendment Bill, Intro., 461

Turkey, Capitulations in

References to, in Debate on Supply, 1090

UGANDA (see under AFRICA)Uniforms Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Farquharson; Read 1 450

Vaccination

Royal Commission Recommendation Hopwood; A. Mr. Asquith Mar

Valuation (Metropolis) Billc. Intro., Mr. Pickersgill; Read 1^o MarVehicles' Lights Billc. Intro., Mr. Webster; Read 1^o MarVenezuela and Trinidad—D Relations with

Q. Colonel H. Vincent; A. Sir April 5, 1429; Q. Colonel H. Vincent; Mr. S. Buxton April 9, 1592

VINCENT, Colonel C. E. H., Central

Brazilian Civil War, 331

Discharged and Reserve Soldierment for, Res., 518

Foreign Goods (Mark of Origin) 457

German Export Trade, 1456

German Prison Labour and Expo 1103

H.M.S. "Powerful," 1577

Income Tax Commissioners, 1100

Indian Imports, 347

Trade and Agriculture, Depreciation Amendt to Address in Answer Speech, 75

Venezuela and Trinidad, Diplomatic relations with, 1429, 1592

WALES

Beaumaris Scheme, Q. Lord Alderley; A. Earl of Rosebery 1565

Endowed Schools Act, 1869, and Acts and Welsh Intermediate Act, 1889, Copy pres. Mar 29, 1

Local Government Act, Translated Welsh, Q. Mr. Herbert Lewis Shaw-Lefevre April 2, 1112

School Inspectors, Q. Mr. Kenyon Acland April 6, 1505

Tithes Collectors, Q. Mr. Griffiths-A. Mr. Asquith April 3, 1245

WALLACE, Mr. J. S., Tower Limehouse

East London Water Bill, 2R., 140

WALLACE, Mr. R., Edinburgh, Civil Service—Compulsory Retirement

WAR OFFICE

Secretary of State—Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN

Under Secretary of State—Lord SANDHURST

Financial Secretary—Mr. W. WOODALL
(See ARMY)

WARING, Colonel T., Down, N.

Ireland

Board of Irish Lights and the Brigg Reef Buoy, 570

Land Acts Inquiry, 699

WARMINGTON, Mr. C. M., Monmouth, W.

Patent Agents Registration Bill, Intro., 1380 ; 2R., 1375

WARNER, Mr. T. C. T., Somerset, N.
Queen's Speech, Reply to, 37

Warren Hastings Island, Reported Wreck off

Q. Mr. D. Crawford ; A. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth April 9, 1568

Ways and Means

Budget, Q. Mr. Goschen ; A. Sir W. Harcourt April 2, 1114 ; Q. Mr. A. C. Morton ; A. Sir W. Harcourt April 9, 1584

WAYS AND MEANS

Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill

Res. to grant out of the Consolidated Fund towards making good Supply for the year ending Mar 31, 1894, the sum of £577,222 ; Com., Mar 16, 556 ; Report Mar 19, 675

Res. to grant out of the Consolidated Fund towards making good Supply for the year ending Mar 31, 1895, the sum of £5,981,100 ; Com., Mar 16, 556 ; Report Mar 19, 675

Res. to grant out of the Consolidated Fund towards making good Supply for the year ending Mar 31, 1895, £785 14s. ; Com., Mar 20, 788 ; Report Mar 21, 852

Res. to grant out of the Consolidated Fund towards making good Supply for the year ending Mar 31, 1895, £3,918,500 ; Com., Mar 20, 788 ; Report Mar 21, 852

WEBB, Mr. A., Waterford, W.

Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act (1887) Repeal (No. 2) Bill, Intro., 452

WEBSTER, Mr. R. G., St. Pancras, E.

Army Medical Staff—Surgeon-Major Hamilton G. Gardner, 1514

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1412

London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Bill, 2R., 1219, 1229

South Kensington Museum Façade, 1515

Vehicles' Lights Bill, Intro., 460

Volunteer Decoration, 1515

WEBSTER, Sir R. E., Isle of Wight

Behring Sea Award Bill, 2R., 1480, 1481 ; Com., 1682, 1686

East London Water Bill, 2R., 1412, 1413

Patent Agents Bill, 2R., 1375

Prevention of Cruelty to Children Bill, Intro., 455 ; 2R., 1377

Supply

Law Charges—Cordite Dispute, 370

Magistrates' Clerks, 370

WEDDERBURN, Sir W., Banffshire

Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Acts Amendment Bill, Intro., 454

India

Public Service Commission, 316

Religious Impartiality, 1447

Text Books in Schools, 1447

Meat, Foreign and Home Fed, 694

Scotland—Steam Trawling, 317, 1096

Weighing Machines (see under Trade, Board of)

WEIR, Mr. J. G., Ross and Cromarty

Ceylon—Warwickshire Regimental Rifles, 1579

Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill, 3R., 896

Enfield and Sparkbrook Factories, 1580

Scotland

Assault by a Lewis Schoolmaster, 1567

Crofters' Settlements in Canada, 1254

Dingwall Poaching Prosecutions, 858, 1252, 1570

Footpaths in the Island of Lewis, 859, 1566

Invergordon Ferry, 860

Peats—Children taking to Schools, 865

Railway Communication in Ross-shire, 1255

Supply

Deer Forest Commission, &c., 838, 840

Fisheries—Trawling, 890

Scotch Affairs, 845, 850

Vote on Account, 805, 831

WEST INDIES

Dominica (see that title)

Mails, Q. Mr. Hogan ; A. Mr. A. Morley Mar 19, 561

West Middlesex Water Bill

c. Read 2^o April 5, 1425

WHITEHEAD, Sir J., Leicester

Disarmament Policy, 1008

Intemperance, Illustrated Lessons on, 1005

Liscard (Cheshire) School, 309

Matlock British School, 309

Railway and Canal Traffic Act (1888) Amendment Bill, Intro., 454

Railway Rates and Charges, 133, 1445

WHITELAW, Mr. W., Perth

Scotland—Barlinnie Prison, 862

Supply—Scotch Affairs, 849, 850

WHITELEY, Mr. G., Stockport
 India—Import Duty, 328, 1441
 Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee, 1243
 Pondoland, Annexation of, 1437
 Silver Question and the Eastern Trade, 346

WHITMORE, Mr. C. A., Chelsea
 Mining Royalties—Rents and Wayleaves,
 Res., 1544

WICKHAM, Mr. W., Hants, Petersfield
 India—Cotton Duties, 443

Wild Birds—Close Time
 Q. Mr. Wilson-Todd; A. Mr. Asquith Mar 13, 149

Wild Birds' Protection Act (1880)
Amendment Bill
 c. Intro., Sir H. Maxwell; Read 1^o April 3, 1316

WILLIAMS, Mr. A. J., Glamorgan, S.
 Jury Law Amendment Bill, Intro., 853

WILLIAMS, Mr. J. CARVELL, Notts, Mansfield
 Burials Bill, Intro., 453
 Charity Commission (Parliamentary Control),
 Res., 1031
 Charity Commissioners
 Mr. Austie, 903
 Parliamentary Charity Commissioner,
 869
 Gresham University Draft Charter, 867

WILLIAMS, Mr. J. P., Birmingham, S.
 Law Officers (Private Practice), Res., 950,
 952
 Naval Construction—Nickel Steel Plates,
 318
 Supply
 Law Officers of the Crown, 368
 Metropolitan Police Courts, 995, 997
 South Kensington Museum, 1069, 1070,
 1071

WILSON, Mr. J., Durham, Mid.
 Steam Engines and Boilers (Persons in Charge) Bill, Intro., 454

WILSON, Mr. J., Lanark, Govan
 Liquor Traffic Local Veto (Scotland) Bill,
 Intro., 460
 Standing Committee (Scotland), Res., 1187

WILSON, Mr. J. Havelock, Middles-brough
 Merchant Shipping—Undermanning, 1105
 Navy Reserves, 665, 669, 673
 "Port Yarrock," Loss of the, Motion for Adjournment of the House, 906

WILSON-TODD, Colonel W. H., Y
N.R., Howdenshire
 Wild Birds in Yorkshire—Close Time, 14

WOLFF, Mr. G. W., Belfast, E.
 Board of Irish Lights, 573
 Dockyard Labour and Wages, Res., 622,

WOLMER, Viscount, Edinburgh, W.
 Edinburgh Castle Rock, 1449
 Edinburgh Commissary Office, 1449
 Freemantle's, Sir C., Committee, 1448
 Volunteer Decoration, 1448

Women's Franchise Bill
 c. Intro., Dr. Clark; Read 1^o Mar 20, 787

WOODALL, Mr. W. (Financial S tary to the War Office), Hanley
Army
 Bradford Barracks, 565
 Ceylon—Warwickshire Regimental I
 1579
 Contracts—Armour-Piercing Proje
 1578
 Crimean and Indian Mutiny Pens
 435
 Enfield and Sparkbrook Factories,
 1580
 Army Estimates
 Forage, 430, 431
 Land Forces, 543, 548

WOODS, Mr. S., Lancashire, Ince Admiralty Contract Work, Overtime on Mining Royalties—Rents and Wayle
 Res., 1523
 Queen's Speech, Reply to, 75
 Registrars of Births as Political Agents,
 Torpedo-Boat Contracts, 682

Woods, Forests, and Land Revenue
the Crown
Crown Estates, Q. Mr. Yerburgh; A
 J. T. Hibbert April 3, 1253 Ever Fishing Grounds (see under Fisheries)

Woolwich Arsenal (see under ARM)

Working Men's Dwellings Bill
 c. Intro., Mr. Wrightson; Read 1^o Mar 16,

Workmen's Houses Tenure Bill
 c. Intro., Mr. D. Crawford; Read 1^o Ma
 787

WORKS, First Commissioner of—
H. J. GLADSTONE

WORTLEY, Mr. C. B. STUART-, Shef
Hallam
 Merchandise Marks (Files) Bill, Intro.
 Metropolitan Police Court Clerks, 343
 Mines Inspectors' Reports, 1574
 Pistols and Revolvers—Accidents, Res.

{ cont

WORTLEY, Mr. C. B. STUART. —cont.

Supply

Dangerous Trades, 359

Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, 1089

Extension of Admiralty Buildings, 984

Metropolitan Police Courts, 994, 995

WRIGHT, Mr. H. S., Nottingham, S.

Metropolitan Police Court Clerks, 343

Volunteer Decoration, 315

WRIGHTSON, Mr. T., Stockton-on-Tees

Working Men's Dwellings Bill, Intro., 459

YERBURGH, Mr. R. A., Chester

Crown Estates, 1259

YOUNG, Mr. S., Cavan, E.

Ireland

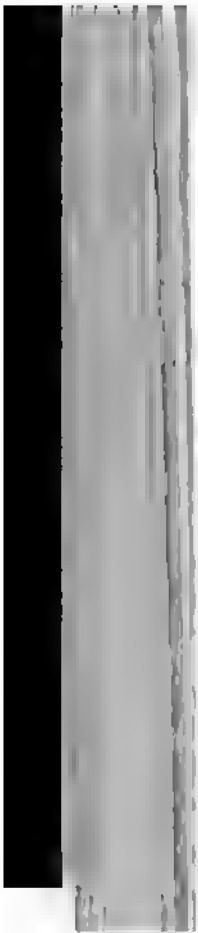

Labourers' Acts, Cootehill Guardians, 872

Monaghan Asylum—Tea Contracts, 560

Zambesi (see under AFRICA)

Zulu Prisoners (see under AFRICA)

END OF VOLUME XXII., AND FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1894.

Session 1894.

VOL. XXII. Second Series.

57 VICTORIA.

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

FIFTY-NINTH VOLUME.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS
AND THE HOUSE OF LORDS

PRINTED BY
H. K. BAKER, 10, ST. MARTIN'S LANE.

FOUND IN LIBRARY,
JUL 8 1965

